36. After the finishing of the War the common sort thought again of their own concerns, and expecting performance of what Servilius had promised, Appius exacted the payment of debts as rigorously as ever. This doubled the people's rage, and made them carry on all things by force, so that they refused their Companions out of the hands of Sergeants, and holding secret councils by night, denied to the succeeding Consuls to take up Arms, till they could have a relaxation of their burthens. This putting the Senate to a stand, Appius still urged that nothing was to be granted to the rabble, and procured a Dictator to be created. When most looked upon him as fittest for the time, the Consuls judged quite otherwise, and made choice of M. Valerius the Brother of Publius, and son of Volefius, a popular man, being persuaded that the terror of the Office alone would do the work, and that a man of mild temper would best manage it. The Dictator told the People, in case they would freely follow him, not only what they justly required concerning their debts, but other rewards also, and by this means lifted ten Legions against the Volsci, Æqui and Sabines, who were all up in Arms, which being brought under, he divided amongst his Soldiers some grounds taken from the Volsci, but requesting of the Senate, that his and their promise might be made good, was checked for his love to the multitude, and because he was an old man above seventy, being unfit as he said to contend, he laid down his Office. The People hereat much enraged, kept private meetings, and consulted how to separate themselves from the Patritians, which when the Senate perceived, they gave order to the Consuls not to disband the Armies, pretending that the Sabines and Æqui had conspired against Rome. The Soldiers being bound by the Oath taken at their lifting (called by them Sacramentum, and ever strongly observed) could not forsake their Standards, but the Consuls having their Camps near to each other, they all went into one by the advice of one Sticinius Bellulus, and taking away the Ensigns from the Consuls, departed to the Mount called afterwards Mont Sacer, lying three miles from the City beyond the River Aniene; now called Taverone.

The first separation of the Commons.

37. Notice hereof being brought into the City, filled all places with marvelous tumults. The Patritians were in great fear lest War should be made upon them; the Plebeians grew exceeding high, and many flocked to the Army, though the other hundred it as much as possible. The Fathers had also great strife amongst themselves, while some pleaded for the multitude, and others would hear of nothing but carrying the matter through by strong hand. But the former sort prevailed to send a message to the Armies, desiring them to return home; promising that for the future all things should be forgot, and the Senate would be ready to reward their faithfulness and serviceableness to their Country; withal, the Ambassadors had it in charge to know the utmost of their desires. To the message nothing would be returned but disdainful words, and high complaints, something mixed with threatening language, which more grievously afflicted the Fathers, not knowing what way to procure a reconciliation; and now would not such as they had by their authority and interest hitherto retained in the City, be with-holden from going to the Army. The time for creation of new Consuls was now at hand. The old ones appointing the Comitia, no Candidates (so called because they appeared in white garments) would stand for the Office, nor any accept of it, till at length the Consuls appointed by their sole authority Posthumus Cominius, and Sp. Cassius, who had born it before, and were equally in favour with the Nobility and Commons. They having entered on the Calends of September (sooner than usual) in the seventy second Olympiad (wherein Tiberias of Crotona was Victor, and Diogenes Archon) first of all consulted the Senate about the return of the Commons. Arrippa Menenius a man of great wisdom and temper, being first asked his opinion, by all means possible exhorted the Fathers to a compromise. He shewed what necessity there was of it in regard of the Roman Dominion, which could not be either preserved or increased without the inferior sort of People, and made it clear, that they could not expect to have any of better temper than the present were, for as much as all, whosoever they were, who by their labour and blood obtained power and Sovereignty of the City, would expect to be sharers in its advantages. He pressed the danger they were now in from their Enemies round about, and having used other motives, concluded with his advice, that they would send messengers with full power to treat and conclude what they should find convenient, without any more consulting the Senate.

38. After Menenius spoke M. Valerius, and upbraided the Senate for not giving him credit when he foretold these distempers. He advised them to cure the Wound while it might be healed, shewed what reason the Commons had to be concerned more of late, because of the Dictatorship, which took from them their former Appeal, as also for that the Senate had denied the honour of Triumph to Servilius when they desired it for him, because he was suspected to favour them, and for that neither he, the Consul, nor he himself the Dictator, could at all profit them in what had been promised. He envenighed against the avarice and cruelty of Creditors, and particularly fell foul upon Appius for his rigour, and raising a Faction, which if others were not wile to prevent, would utterly destroy the Commonwealth. Lastly, he commended the advice of Menenius, and desired it might speedily be executed, so as whatever the Commons required might be granted. Appius a man of an high Spirit, most studious of the Patrian Dignity, and also of a fober and venerable carriage, being asked his opinion next, in excuse of himself recriminated Valerius. With great animosity he noted the ambition and fenseleneff of the multitude, admiring that any of the Fathers should be so absurd, as having denied remission of debts to them when friends, would grant it to them now Enemies, who would not * rest here, but require also a communication of honours, and what not? so that at length the power would come into the hands of the rabble, and the Commonwealth degenerate into a Democracy. He lessened, or rather endeavoured to remove, the danger which threatened either from the Armies revolt, or the hostility of old Enemies. He endeavoured to perswade them, that they were able enough to reduce them by force, having their Wives and Children in the City; and alleging for further confirmation of this, that the multitude were without any persons of good conduct, whereas the Patrian order abounded with experienced Commanders, concluded with this advice, neither to send any message to them, nor to visit them their debts, nor do any other thing which might show the least fear or trouble: If they would lay down their Arms and returning into the City, submit to the Senate, then moderately to determine concerning them; seeing that all fools especially the Vulgar, are insistent against such as condescend, but cowardly towards those that resolutely demean themselves.

39. The wile speech of Appius so inflamed those of his party, especially the younger sort, that nothing could be determined for the heat of contention. This put the Consuls upon dismissing the Senate for that time, admonishing the younger sort to carry themselves more respectfully and modestly for the time to come, or else they would neither use them as Advisers nor Judges, but prefer a Law for limiting a certain age for Senators. The graver men they exhorted also to concord, letting them know they had a way to end the controversy, by referring the matter to the decision of the People, which had right to judge of it, as a case about Peace and War. At the next meeting the ancient men were of the same opinion as formerly, but the younger modestly referred themselves to whatsoever they should determine, so that the major part by far, being wearied with the cries and sollicitations of those who had relations in the Army, rather than any reason, notwithstanding Appius stuck close to his former resolution, resolved to follow the advice of Menenius, who with nine others were commissioned with full power, both by Senate and People, to compose the difference. At first the offers of the Commissioners could not be heard through the infatigation of two cunning and turbulent fellows, Sicinius, and L. Furius, who conceited of his abilities, affected the name of Brutus also. Menenius, to give full satisfaction, promised that such as were unable to pay their debts, should be discharged both from obligation and imprisonment, and for the time to come matters of this nature should be ordered by the joint consent both of People and Senate. Then adding the Fable of the several numbers falling out with the belly, as consuming all which they provided, and thence the ruine and decay of the whole body, he so improved it to the present occasion, likening the Senate to the belly (which digesteth and distributeth sustenance to all the rest, though they provide it) that the whole multitude convinced of the necessity of Union, cried out, He should lead them home without delay.

40. Little wanted of their departure without any other security than the bare word of the Commissioners. But Furius Brutus a Plebeian formerly mentioned with-held them, saying, that they were gratefully to acknowledge the kind offers of the Senate; but whereas some men of tyrannical spirits might reserve their anger to a convenient opportunity, the Commons wanted such good security for the time to come, as might defend them from the unreasonable malice of great ones, and he moved, that they might have certain Officers created yearly out their own body, whose power should only be to give relief to such Plebeians as were injured, and suffer none to be defrauded of their right: and therefore therefore not to resist the Consuls, as some thought. This being received by the multitude with great approbation, was insisted on to Menenius, and his fellows, who thought not fit to admit of a matter of such large consequence, without leave from the Senate, and demanded time to know the pleasure thereof. The Consuls reporting the matter, Valerius thought this favour was to be granted to the Commons, and though Appius opposed it earnestly, crying out, calling their gods to witness, and truly foretelling what calamities they would bring upon the Commonwealth, yet the major part inclining to Peace, it was carried for them, and the Commissioners were sent back with the resolution of the house. The Commons by the advice of Menenius, first sent to take from the Senate a religious confirmation of this privilege, and afterwards in the Assembly of the Curie elected L. Furius Brutus, and C. Sicinius Bellutus, to whom they afterwards joyned C. and P. Licinius, and Sp. Icilius Ruge. These five first entered this new Office on the fourth of the Ides of December according to the History and computation of Dionysius, sixteen years after the expulsion of Tarquin.

41. These Officers were called Tribuni Plebis, there having been from the beginning other Tribunes in the City named Tribuni Celerum, so called from the Peoples being divided into three parts at that time, from which so many were sent into the Army, as (a) Varro and (b) Pomponius derive the word; or because they were elected by the Tribes, or overflow them, as others. Varro seemeth to hold that the Tribuni Plebis were called Tribunos, because they were first made of the Tribunes or Colonels of the Soldiers. Livy nameth C. Licinius, and L. Albinus, for the first two, to whom were shortly after added three more, viz. Sicinius, the Author of the departure, and two others, concerning which, faith he, Authors differ. In the two hundred ninety seventh year of the City five more were added, and this number of ten continued. As these Officers were elected by the Commons, so ever out of their body, except where we read in Livy (in his third Book) of two Patritians; Nay most commonly of the lower sort, till a Law ordained that they should be created out of the Senate; that is, out of such Plebeians as were admitted into the Senate. What time this Law was preferred, cannot certainly be discovered. (c) Appian faith, it is not certain whether Sylla did it. It should appear from (d) Gellius, that there passed a Plebiscitum or Decree of the People, for this purpose, called Plebiscitum Atinium, but what A. tinius this should be is also obscure, there being one P. Atinius Tribune of the Commons when Julius Caesar and Bibulus were Consuls. as concerning their power (e) Cicero faith, they were opposed against the Consuls: but this is not true, the occasion of their making not rising from the Consuls. At the beginning their power was only to relieve the oppressed, as a shield to keep off evil, and not as a weapon to inflict it. They nulled the unjust (as they accounted them) Decrees, and Commands of the Senate and Magistrates, and to these their readines to protect the meanest, (f) their doors stood open night and day to their complaints. (g) Gellius telleth us, that they could not be absent from the City one day; not an hour faith (h) Dion, and (i) Appian going further, confineth them within the Walls. They interposed by this one word Veto solemnly pronounced. They procured themselves afterward to be accounted Sacrosancti, so as by a Law confirmed with an Oath, none might compel a Tribune to do any thing, as one of the vulgar, neither strike, nor command him to be beaten, neither kill, nor command him to be killed. If any did contrary, he was to be held as Sacer, and his goods being Confiscated unto Ceres, it should be lawful for any to kill him. And left afterwards the People should abrogate this Law, they made all the Citizens take the most solemn Oath that could be devised, both for themselves and posterity, to preserve it for ever inviolable, as (k) Dionysius writeth, who hath also exemplified the Law itself. To this (l) Cicero addeth, that they were not only by sacred Laws fortified against Force and Arms, but against words also, and interruption of speech.

42. But as their power of Interposing was most powerful against Consuls and Senate, so also against themselves; the dissent of one man being sufficient to hinder whatever all his Collegues designed. This appeareth to have been the only constant effectual means for moderation of that power which afterwards they assumed, when the Patritians could prevail with one of the College to interpose. By that awe which their Sacrosanct Magistracy struck into all men improved through their prompt boldness (very common in men of meanest condition) they took advantage to enlarge their bounds. Valerius Maximus writeth, that at first it was not lawful for them to enter into the Senate, but they had Seats placed before the Door, where examining the Decrees of the Fathers, such of them as they suffered to pass they signed with the Letter T. But nothing in Dionysius is more common than their speaking in the Senate, and their contentions with the Members thereof in that very place at the very time, and that in the Infancy of their Office. However these fellows at first presumed not to Tyrannise and disturb all, as afterwards they did, they presumed not at first to assemble the Senate, which afterward they did in the two hundred and seventy seventh year of the City, and in process of time to dismiss it also, when called by another. Within a small time they assembled the People, preferred Laws, executed their fawcy Decrees against the Magistrates themselves, commanding the Consuls to be carried to Prison, (especially after the enacting of the Horatian Law, whereby the Plebiscita obliged the whole Roman people) for that they were the chief Officers of the Commons.

Lib. 2. cap. 2.
Exemp. 7.

The extravagance of their power.

43. Great were the Seditions and Tumults, which turbulent Spirits backed with such liberty, stirred up; so as notwithstanding their first end was to preserve right, Lucan rightly termeth them Turbantes jura. Sylla was the first that bridled their extravagancy, by depriving them of liberty to prefer Laws, to make Orations, and obtain any Office of Magistracy; but after his death Aurelius Cotta by a new Law restored the latter privilege to them, and all the rest they recovered when Pompey and M. Crassus were Consuls. Their Power thus recovered they kept till the Emperors swallowed it up themselves, and left them little more than a name, which continued till the time of Constantine. As for the Ensigns of their Office, they wore not the Prætexta, had no Lictors or Sergeants, neither used they a Curule Chair; only a sort of Beadle, called Plator, went before them. For want of these Ceremonies, as because they entered not at the beginning of the year, and laid not down their Office upon the Creation of a Dictator, which others did, Plutarch writeth that some held them to be no Magistrates, but rather a curb and rein to such. Lastly, besides these Tribunes, and the Tribuni Celerum formerly mentioned, there were afterwards many other sorts, as Tribuni Militum, and Tribuni Erarii, during the Commonwealth: under the Emperours are found Tribunus Voluptatum, Tribunus Matrimoniorum, Tribunus Chastitatum, Tribunus Provinciarum, Tribunus Fori, and Tribunus Scholarum, concerning which Cassiodorus in his Epistles, and Lipsius in his Commentary of the Magistrates of old Rome are to be consulted.

Several orders of Tribunes.

44. The Commons having got from the Senate a confirmation of the Office of Tribunes, obtained further, that they might yearly chuse out of their own body two, to be as Ministers to these Officers; to judge certain causes referred to them from the Tribunes, take care of publick buildings and provisions. These were first called the Ministers and Assistants of the Tribunes; but afterward saith Dionysius from one of their Duties had the name of Ædiles. Many things of great consequence were committed to their trust, being very much like to the Agoranomi amongst the Greeks. Festus acknowledging that in the beginning Ædilis was a Magistrate who took care both of publick and private buildings, yet saith he was so called, quod faciliis ad eum plebis aditus esset. Truer is the derivation which Varro giveth, agreeable to that of Dionysius; that they were named Ædiles, from Ædes the buildings, of which they took care, or those particularly, wherein the Plebiscita were kept, of which they had the oversight. This later Etymology is rendred by Pomponius, who in his second Book of the Original of Law, describing the several Offices of Magistracy, maketh the end of the constitution of the Ædiles to have been, that they might take care of that House where the Decrees of the People were laid up. Whence forever the word was derived it came out of Latinus, being a name of certain Magistrates in the Latine Towns, as was also Dictator and Dumviri, as some observe out of Spartianus. To these Ædiles Plebis, who were instituted in the two hundred and seventy first year of the City, at the same time with the Tribunes, were added two more out of the Patritian order one hundred and seven years after, called for distinction Ædiles Curules, because they used the Curule Chair, whereas the other only sat on Benches, as the Tribunes and Quæstors. The occasion of creating these shall be shewn in its place, the end was only then for celebrating of Games.

The Ædiles created.

45. This number continued till the time of C. Fulius Cæsar, who in the seven hundred hundred and tenth year of the City added two more, whom he would have created also out of the Patritians. They were called (a) Cereales from Ceres, being appointed to take care of, and make Provision for Corn. This number of six thus distinguished, continued till the time of Constantine, as is probably conjectured, and were as most other Offices of Magistracy taken away by him. The Ædiles, saith (b) Cicero, are the Curatours of the City, of Provisions, and of Solemn Games. Of the City, because they looked to publick works and Temples; made provision against Fires (which Augustus seemeth to have charged upon them saith Lipsius) had inspection over Funerals, and such like Rites of smaller moment; over Marriages and Adulteries, Baths, Aqueducts, Sinks, and Streets, both for repairing and cleansing of them. Of Provisions, for that they had the oversight of all things to be sold, men, and other Creatures, determining, judging, and censuring by their words and Edicts. Of Solemn Games, and only solenn (not votive and private ones) as the Ludi Florales, Circenses, Megalenses, Romani, &c. Sometimes at their own charge they made these shows, and ever examined the Fables written before they were acted. And (whether from this inspection of Play-books it came or no is uncertain) they seem to have been Licensers and Judges of other Writings, being ordered by a Decree of the Senate, as (c) Tacitus telleth us, to burn the Papers of Crematius Cordus. It is further (d) observed, that the Generals when they returned home after some Victory, delivered up the Corn and Provisions which had been made prize to them, as the Captives to the Prætor, and the Money to the Quæstor. All such Victuallers as offended against the Laws, as also Monopolizers and others that transgressed in this kind, they accused to the People, and with the Fines celebrated Games, made Presents to their Gods, or some publick works. Lastly, this observed, that they took care that none but Roman Gods, and those after the Roman manner only, should be worshipped.

Ædiles.

46. But, to return to the Story, the rabble having obtained these Officers, willingly gave their names to the Expedition against the Polci, under conduct of Posthumus Cominius the Consul. He took Longula and Pulsilla with no great difficulty, and presently laid Siege to Corioli a strongly fortified Town, and the head of the Nation. The Antiates coming to the relief of this place, he left part of the Army to continue the Siege under the Command of Titus Lartius and with the other went to give them battel. Lartius attempting to storm the Town, the Inhabitants sallied out, and charged the Romans so furiously, that they forced them back into their Camp: all but a few whom C. Marcius, a Patritian of great Nobility, and greater Valour, kept about him. This Marcius with so small a Company received the violence of the Enemy, and doing great execution, forced him at length into the Town, and following himself rushed in with him, whereas the besieged were so frightened, that not considering their own numbers, they fled to the contrary part of the City, and suffered him to let in the rest of the Army. When the Soldiers now fell to plunder, he suffered them not, but halted to the Battel to help the Consul, and with the good news of his success to cheer the Army.

Sirnamed Coriolanus.

47. He desired of Cominius that he might be suffered with his men to fight against the middle Battel, wherein the chief strength of the Enemies lay, which obtaining, he shewed there more valour than formerly, and was the greatest cause of the Victory. The day following the Consul gave him extraordinary commendations, and a good share of Booty before it came to be divided amongst the Soldiers; but he would accept of nothing except an Horse, which gained him greater Honour from the whole Army, and moved Posthumus to bestow the firame of Coriolanus upon him for his incomparable valour shewn at that place. The Polci were by this overthrow forced to submission, and made their Peace. This year was the League of Amity and Confederacy renewed with the Latines, with all cheerfulness, because they had been faithful in the late Sedition and War, and had sent to congratulate for the Peace made betwixt Nobility and Commons. The Senate for this Civil Union decreed supplications or thanks to their Gods, a third feria or Holy day, to be added to the other two Latine Ferie, whereof Tarquinius had dedicated one, when he conquered Hetruria, and the People the other after the banishment of Tarquinius. In this Consulship died also Asipus Mæneius, whom the People out of gratitude resolved to bury at the publick charge, every man contributing something, because he died poor, and when the Senate would needs defray the charge out of the Treasury, they bestowed the money upon his Children. Now also the Consus being celebrated above one hundred and ten thousand heads were Ceffed.

A dearth,

48. The year following wherein T. Geganius Macerinus, and P. Minucius were Consuls, a great dearth fell upon the City, the effect of the late Sedition. For, the Commons having departed a little after the Autumnal Equinox, about the time of sowing, the Country was forsaken of Husbandmen; the richer for breaking themselves to the Patritians, and the poorer to the Army, and the division continued till a little before Mid-winter. All the middle space of time there was no tillage, though it was most proper for sowing, and for some time after the agreement, it could scarce be renewed, for that Slaves had run away, and there was great scarcity of Cattle by these means, for the year following they were little beforehand in Corn, either for seed or provisions. This put the Senate upon sending into several parts of Italy, and also into Sicily, to buy Corn. But notwithstanding their care, the multitude being exceedingly pinched with Famine, raised tumults, getting together by companies, and laying all the fault upon the Fathers, as if by their wilful neglect they had in this way revenged themselves. The Volsi being acquainted with this new Sedition, and the weak Estate of Rome, conspired how to improve the advantage; but were diverted by a grievous plague, which so ragged, as Velitra a Noble City of that Country was almost utterly exhausted, the small remnant of the Inhabitants whereof gave up themselves to the Romans, desiring they would send a Colony thither.

Which causeth a Sedition,

49. Of this advantage the Senate was very glad, to lessen the multitude of the City, and the poor were content to inhabit to fertile a place, but when they considered the danger of infection, they were again discouraged, and wrested this to so bad a fence, as to make it a design to destroy them. But the Senate laying a great penalty upon such as refused to go, many obeyed and went thither, as also to Norba a Latin Town. This enraged more such as staid behind, being still pinched by the famine, so that raising great multitudes, they called the Tribunes into the Comitium. Great strife hapned betwixt the Consuls and them; The Tribunes affirming they had promised not to interrupt them in their discourses to the People, to which the other answered, that it was only when they called the People together, not when the Consuls themselves did it, as now they had done, to promise them all fair accommodation from the Senate. Hereupon Brutus, who being so great a flicker before, was chosen one of the first Tribunes, devised a Law, which under such a penalty as the Tribunes should impose, forbid any one to contradict or interrupt them, when they spoke to the People. Such as could or would not give security for the payment of the fine, were to be put to death, and their goods be sacred to Ceres. If any controversy arose about the fine, it was to be determined by the judgment of the People.

And this a new Law in behalf of the Tribunes.

50. This Law being enacted by the suffrages of the Tribes, caused greater disturbance; the Senate refusing to ratify the resolves of the People, and the People the Decrees of the Senate; yet proceeded it not to any greater inconvenience than words, and some blows without weapons. For the poor broke not into the store-houses of the rich, but were content to purchase victuals at an excessive rate; and when money failed were contented with Roots and Herbs: neither did the rich deal harshly with the poor, but carried it towards them as indulgent Fathers, so that we must say, it was the infirmity of the Government, and not any bad disposition of the People which caused the Seditions. The Consuls, to divert their minds, and ease the charge, offered to lead them out into the Enemies Country, but few or none would give their names; so that Marcus Coriolanus with some Patritians, and a few of their Clients made incursions, and returned home laden with booty; the knowledge whereof made the poorer fort murmur against their Tribunes, who had dissuaded them from the Expedition. The following Consuls M. Minucius Augurinus, and A. Sempronius Atratinus, famous for their abilities both in War and Peace, bent themselves, by making provision for Corn, to allay the present distempers; though not with wished success. They procured much to be imported, and this Summer returned those that were sent into Sicily, with a great quantity of Wheat, whereof half they bought at a very cheap rate, and half was bestowed on them by Gelon, the Son of Dionemnes. Now the Patritians considering how to dispose of the Corn; some were for selling it to the poor at easy rates, thereby to win upon the multitude, but others urged they were to be harshly used and afflicted; and the Corn to be sold to them on dear rates; that by necessity they might be brought to sobriety, and become subject to the Laws.

Corn brought out of Sicily.

Coriolanus his Conflict thereupon.

51. Amongst these was Coriolanus the chief, being offended with the Commons, as was given out for a repulse at the last election of Consuls. He had been ever an extraordinary assertor of the power of the Nobility, which made the People afraid to chafe him; but now incensed he much more shewed his inclination, openly declaiming against the innovation of the multitude, and exhorting others to resist the perulant endeavours of the Tribunes and rabble. The Consuls calling together the Senate, he enlarged himself in a set speech to this purpose, and pressed that by force they should take away the Tribuneship, as the only means for the recovery of the State; concluding with his opinion, that no favour at all should be shewed to the multitude in the sale of Corn. Some were offended with this freedom, perceiving what inconvenience it would bring; but others approving of it, the Tribunes who were present (say both Dionysius and Plutarch) ran forth, and crying out, called the People together, and declared to them the effect of Marcus his speech. The multitude enraged, would have violated the Senate instantly, but that the Tribunes stayed them, laying the whole blame upon Marcus. They sent some Beadles for him to come and answer it before the People, but they returning with nothing but ill words, they went themselves, and commanded the Adiles to apprehend him. These were Brutus and Leilius the first Tribunes, who going to do what was enjoined, were repulsed and beaten by the young Patritians he had got about him. This put all into a flame, the whole City being gathered together and ready to destroy it self; but by the wisdom of the Consuls the matter was put off till the following day. Then the Consuls laboured to heal the breach, confirming as from the Fathers, what was formerly granted to the Commons, and palliating as much as might be the supposed offence of Marcus. The Tribunes answering, inveighed against the Senate, as desirous to break their faith, and laying open the fault of Marcus, concluded the action with a Decree of their College, That he should be forthwith cast down headlong from the Tarpian Rock. For, having given him liberty to speak, he was so far from recanting his former speeches, that he flew out into the same invectives, as they were termed.

Put all into a flame.

52. The Adiles laying hands on him, the Patritians again rescued him, the fier part even of them taking it ill he should be condemned to death without due process, and the more understanding sort of the Commons not approving of the attempt; so as a great tumult being raised, the Tribunes nullified their former Decree, and set him a day wherein to answer, and stand or fall by the judgement of the People. In the mean time the Senate, by selling the Corn at moderate rates, and by intreaties, sought either to procure the trial to be utterly laid aside, or at least to defer it till the wrath of the multitude should be appeased, which was also to be employed in a War against Antium. When the former could not be done, and the War was blown over, the Consuls being very unwilling to let the People take so much upon themselves, as without Decree of the Senate first had (according to the ancient Custom) to pass their judgment in any case, procured the Tribunes first to find out such a Decree, on this condition; that they might be heard speak their minds, and each Senator before he gave his judgment, swear solemnly, as was usual in judicatory process, to deliver what he thought most behoveful for the Publick. The Tribunes then argued much in the behalf of the Commons, who they said had undergone the heat of all Wars, both in the time of Kings, in the expulsion of them, and since in the enlarging the Roman Dominion; in consideration whereof, they could not in conscience have lesser privileges than of late they had obtained. They aggravated by several circumstances the Crime of Marcus, who in so high a manner had gone about to infringe them, and therefore as well for maintenance of right, as the safety of the City, they desired he might be left to the justice of the People. Appius Claudius stiffly impugned the Decree, arguing that the Senate would be enervated, and the Commonwealth betrayed, if they granted to the People power of judging Patritians.

53. M. Valerius, and other popular men made a better construction of the People's desire, thinking they would use this power moderately, and in opposition to Appius his politic reasons, strangely conceived it would make for the security of the Commonwealth, and particular Members thereof, if the Commons were admitted to some share in the Government, that so it might neither wholly lie in the Patritians nor Plebeians, but be tempered and poised betwixt both. He urged, that they had allayed the Kingly Power, by giving it to two annual Magistrates, and that therefore there was no fear of its degenerating into Tyranny, ranny, being also awed by the oversight of three hundred most prudent and worthy persons, of which the Senate consisted. But for the Senate itself, there was no curb; so that it might afterwards (though of the present Members he had no cause to judge so) draw all things into extremity, and indeed ruin the State, except the People might be admitted to have an hand in the judgment of such faults as concerned the Commonwealth, as when any was accused of moving Sedition, affecting Tyranny, Treason, or the like crimes; because the more solemn and severe the Trial was, ambitious men would be the more terrified from such attempts. The generality inclining to give up the man, Marcus demanded of the Tribunes whereof they would accuse him. They consulting with themselves apart, knew not well how to form an Impeachment out of his former words, which might pass with the Senate, and therefore answered, they would lay the affectation of Tyranny to his charge. Hereat he very cheerfully put himself upon Trial, not refusing the severest punishment, if it could be proved; and a Decree of the Senate passed accordingly, time being given him till the third Market-day, to prepare for it. For a Market was kept once in nine days, at which time the People that lived in the Country, came either to Traffick, receive Justice, or give their Suffrages in such matters as either primarily concern'd them, or were referred from the Senate. When the day came, a greater multitude of Country-men than ever formerly was seen, early in the morning placed it self in the Forum, and the Tribunes called the People to the Comitia Tributa, or Assemblies of the Tribes, severing each Tribe from another by cords. Now it having been the Custom for the People to give their Suffrages by Centuries in the Campus Martius in Arms, and under their Centurions, the Patritians called hard for them, and protested against this innovation; but by the other way of Centuries brought in by Servius, the ordinary sort of People being excluded, (for that most commonly the two first Classes carried it from the other four) the Tribunes would in no case suffer it, and the Crime of Coriolanus seeming to concern all alike, at length they obtained the consent of the Patritians to this innovation.

He answered before the People.

54. Minucius the Consul beginning the action, declared the worth of the person now to be judged, and exhorting the People to mildness, signified that the Senate became petitioners in his behalf. Sicius one of the Tribunes said, he would neither betray the liberty of the People, nor suffer another to do it; therefore if the Patritians would, as they pretended, subject him to their judgment, he would give forth the balls without any more to do, to which the Consul replied, they did so, but on this condition, that he should answer to the charge of the affected Tyranny, and therewith protesting, went down. Sicius then ripping up all that ever Coriolanus did, that might any way make for his purpose, laboured to put a bad construction upon it. But when the party came to speak, he so related what particular services he had done the State, and shewed the Skars received all over his Body; withal, those that he had saved in the Wars, made such lamentation in his behalf, that the People generally cried out he was to be discharged. Then Decius another of the Tribunes stepping up, said, that seeing the Senate, as the Consul alleged, had absolved Marcus from those words he had spoken in their house, and suffered him not to be accused for them, he would wave his words, and come to actions, by which he would make good the charge. There was a certain Law that all Booty and Plunder got in War, should be appropriated to publick use, so as no General was to meddle with it, but give it up into the hands of the Questor. Now, whereas no man ever brake this Law, or so much as spake against it, this Marcus, faith he, hath dared to condemn it; for when in the late incursion into the Territories of Antium, we had got great plenty of Slaves, Cattel, and Provisions, he neither delivered these things up to the Questor, nor payed any money unto the Treasury, but divided all the Booty amongst his friends, which could not but be taken as an argument that he intended to invade his Country; it being the Custom of Tyrants, this way to procure themselves instruments for their purpose. Though he had done this not with any sinister intention, but for the service of his Country, at such time as all were full of Seditions at home, and the Enemy from abroad wasted the Roman Territories; yet the multitude interpreted it in the same sense as Decius, and the whole matter was quite changed; he being abashed at so unexpected a charge, and the Consuls and Patritians utterly to seek what to answer. The Tribunes named perpetual banishment, and gathered the suffrages of the Tribes, which which being twenty one in number, nine only absolved him, and so he stood condemned by the major part.

55. This was the first sentence passed by the people upon any Patritian, and henceforth the Tribunes were wont to set the day to whomsoever they pleased; whereby the power of the Commons was enlarged exceedingly, and the Interest of the Patritians was more and more diminished; Plebeians at length being admitted into the Senate, Offices, and Priesthoods, which in former times were only communicated to the other: the Senate partly against their wills and by constraint, partly by a wife foresight giving way to it, as will be seen in due place. Marcus being accompanied home with the lamentations and tears of many, saluted his Mother, Wife, and Children, as they made pitiful complaints, and without any appearance of trouble, bidding them bear their condition cheerfully, straitway departed out of the City, attended only by a few Clients, and without anything to bear his charges. He went to Antium, and there in the habit and posture of an obnoxious suppliant betook himself to Tullus Attius, a man of royal condition amongst the Volsci, both for Nobility, Riches, and Valour, whom he knew to be his greatest Enemy in that Nation, because in battle they had often challenged each other, and out of Emulation added a private to the publick hatred. But knowing him to be of a magnanimous mind, and most willing to catch hold of any advantage against the Romans, he cast himself at his feet, bidding him either avenge his Country of him, or else him against Rome, which by her unnatural carriage toward him had forfeited all duty and service that she might have expected at his hands. Tullus embracing him with singular kindness, resolved to make use of his great abilities. Marcus advised that some fair pretext might first be sought for War, and for that purpose sending many of the Volsci to behold the solemn Games at Rome, caused one to go to the Consuls, and accuse them of having some design against the City, that so they forcing them out on a sudden, might be said to have broken the peace. This accordingly succeeding (for the Consuls commanded all by Proclamation to be gone before Sun-set) Tullus so aggravated the matter to his Country-men, that he procured them to send to Rome to demand back all the Towns and Territories which by War had been taken from them.

Invadeth his Territories.

56. The Senate taking the message in great scorn, answered, that if the Volsci first took up Arms, the Romans would last lay them down. Tullus then persuading the Volsci to the War, procured Marcus to be joyned with him as General, with full power, who presently invading the Roman Dominions, wasted all such grounds where ere he came as belonged to the Plebeians, not suffering any thing to be touched which belonged to any of the Nobility. His design was accomplished; for this raised great envy and malice against the Patritians, who upbraiding the people that they had banished unjustly so considerable a man, were accused with greater indignation, that to be revenged for former injuries they had procured Marcus to invade the Country, seeing they were idle spectators, when others were undone, and kept their goods, being out of all danger of the War. Coriolanus leading home his men richly laden with Booty, was sent out shortly after with one half of the Forces, and taking by surrender the Town of the Circians, a Roman Colony, thence invaded the Latines, who being Confederates with Rome sent thither for relief; but the common people were averse to the War, and the Consuls being almost out of their Office were unwilling to begin any thing; so that the Messengers were dismissed without any satisfactory answer. Marcus then by storm took Tolerium, Lavici, Pes, and Bols, which he plundered, and made the Inhabitants Slaves. Such as yielded he mildly treated, but having stormed Bols, which lay within thirteen miles of Rome, he put almost all to the sword that were of age. The Volsci now so admired him, that such as were left to defend the Towns would not stay, but all flocked to him, owning him only for their General. At Rome there was nothing but confusion, all being in despair, and seeking no relief any other way than by venting their spleen one against another: but when news came that Levinium was besieged, it made a marvelous, yet absurd change in their minds. The people now cried out that Coriolanus was to be restored by a repeal of the Decree for banishment; but the Senate utterly refused to assent to it, and plainly forbade it in full house; either for that they desired to oppose the people in all things, or would not have his restitution ascribed to the Commons, or else were incited against Marcus, who was become Enemy to all, though but injured by some, and had declared against his own Country, wherein he knew the greater and better sort to sympathize with him, and account his no other than a common grievance.

He marcheth towards Rome.

57. The resolve of the Senate being published, the People could do nothing as to his restitution, the custom requiring that the Fathers should propound. Marcus hereupon rose from before Lavinium, and marching towards Rome it self, pitched his Camp at the Disches of Clatia, five miles from the City. This forced Senate and People into agreement, all in common being seized with horror and amazement, so that it was agreed a Message should be sent to him, offering him his restitution. The Messengers were Patritians, and such as for their love to him he had most cause to favour; but though with all advantage possible they made their address, yet he received them with wonderful severity in a Council of Officers, and gave them this answer, that if they would expect Peace, they should restore to the Volsci all Towns and Territories taken away in War: and make them free of the City as the Latines were: and he would give them thirty days time to consider of it. Hereat the Captains of the Volsci, especially Tullus, took occasion to malign him, though he employed this time of Truce very profitably, subduing seven great and strong Towns. When the time was out, and he returned, another Message came to him, desiring that refraining himself he would draw off the Volsci, and then consult in common; for they would do nothing by constraint or fear: but if he thought the Volsci were to be gratified, they would yield to him if they would lay down their Arms. He replied, he carried himself not as General of the Volsci, but as a Roman Citizen, and desired, that, having a respect to justice and moderation, they would return within three days with a grant of what he had formerly demanded; else he must proceed in his enterprize. Hereupon the Senate, in so great a Tempest which threatened all, betook them to their sacred Anchor as they accounted it, and ordered all the Pontifices, Priests, Governours of their superstitious Houses and Augurs, in their several habits, should go and beseech him to compose the matter: but neither was Marcus moved with this Pompous train; but required they should either accept of the terms, or expect hostility to the utmost.

58. The Priests being returned, the Citizens were warned to be ready at the Walls, thence to repel the Enemy if he came, for that no other hope remained, than what time, and vicissitude of Fortune might afford. The whole City being full of Tumults, trembling, and amazement, the Women flocked to the Temples, but the most, and especially the chiefest, made their supplications at the Altar of Jupiter in the Capitol. Amongst these was Valeria the Sister of Poplicola, into whose mind came this device, that they should go to Veturia (say Dionysius and Livy) or Volumnia (saith Plutarch) the mother of Coriolanus, and procure her, with Volumnia (say they) or Fulgencia (saith he) her daughter-in-law, to go, and intercede for their Country. Veturia earnestly pressed to undertake so pious a work, answered, they had little hopes to obtain their sute, for that her Son had never sent to see them since his departure, being fallen out with his own family as well as his Country; yet she was ready to improve that interest he had in him, and set forth towards him with her daughter-in-law, and two Nephews. Coriolanus seeing the women come, resolved fully to give them a denial; but when he perceived his Mother amongst them, he descended from his Tribunal, and went to meet her. Having courteously received her with his Wife and Children, he gave ear to her request, which she made with all the Oratory that she could compass out of the impending ruin of his own Country, and the infancy which would necessarily follow a fruitless attempt. When herewith she could not prevail, she put him in mind how much Nature, together with a careful education of him in her Widow-hood, had engaged him to obedience, and in conclusion cast her self down at his Feet which she embraced and kissed. He presently lift her up, and cried out, Mother, thou hast got the Victory, advantageous to my Country, but destructive to my self; and accordingly drew off the Volsci into their own Country, who were variously affected. Some blamed both him and the Action: others that were studious of Peace did neither; and some, though they condemned the thing, yet absolved the man, who was constrained by so great necessity to do it; yet none refused to obey his orders, but followed him, more through the authority of his Virtue than of his Power.

59. But when he was come to Aratium, Tullus, the great Emulator of his Glory, supposing he had a sufficient advantage against him, required him to lay down his his Office, and give an account of his actions to the People. He refused to resign his place, except commanded by the People to do it, unto which he said he was not afraid to give an account of any thing he had done, at that present. The people being called together, the principal of Tullus's faction instigated them against him, but when he rose to speak for himself, those turbulent spirits for shame gave way, and all sober and peaceable men openly declared they would hear him candidly, and judge him according to right and equity. Tullus then fearing the man's eloquence, and sufficiently apprehensive how much repute the very Crime objected would bring him (for they could not seem to be injured by him in not taking Rome, without considering that he had brought things to that pass by his incredible valour and dexterity, that they were near taking of it) would not expect the judgement of the multitude, but crying out with his complices, that the betrayer of the Volsci was not to be suffered to hold the Tyranny over them by refusing to lay down his Office, rushed out, and slew him in the place. Though no man stood up in his defence, yet that this wicked act displeased most, it presently appeared. For upon report of his death they came generally out of the Towns and buried him honourably, adorning his Sepulchre, as of a General and a famous Warrior, with Arms and Trophies. Such was the end of the Eminentest Man of that age for valour, who by his four rigidity procured extreme hazard to his Country, and destruction to himself, whilst he preferred private revenge before public good, and yet would not stoop to any provision for his own safety.

He is slain.

60. At Rome upon Marcus's retreat was such exultation, as is suitable to the joy of those that are rescued from utter desolation. The Senate Decreed to the women what honours they would ask, but they only desired they might build a Chappel to Women's Fortune, in the place where they had delivered their Country, which was done at the publick charge, and they at their own dedicated the Image. When the death of Coriolanus was heard, there was neither expression of joy nor sorrow further than this, that the women were permitted to mourn for him ten months; the longest time allowed by Numa for the nearest relations, according to Plutarch. The Consuls not long after took the field with a considerable Army, but had no occasion to make trial of it; for the Volsci and Aqui joyning their Forces together resolved to take the Romans unprovided; but in their march they fell out about a General, of whether Nation he should be, and from words to blows, in such a manner that they fought a great Battel, and if night had not severed them, one party had been utterly destroyed. The year following the new Consuls, C. Aquilius and T. Sticinius, overthrew the one the Hernici and the other the Volsci, amongst whom fell Tullus Actius, a man of personal valour, but no good conduct. Their Successors, Proculus Virgininus, and Sp. Cassius took the field with the Legions; the Aqui falling to the former, as the Volsci and Hernici to the latter. The Volsci presently asked Peace, having in the last battel lost the flower of their strength, and after them shortly the Hernici, refusing any more to contest for equality with the Romans. Cassius having received money and provisions, as from such as confessed themselves conquered, gave them truce; and referred them for conditions to the Senate.

61. After a long debate, the Fathers resolved they should be received into amity, and that Cassius at his discretion might prescribe the conditions of the League, confirming whatsoever they should be. Cassius returning home, asked, and obtained a Triumph, though he had neither taken any City, worsted any Enemy, nor had any Captives or Spoils for ornament of the solemnity, which possessed men with an apprehension of his arrogance, and procured him envy. After his triumph he published as conditions of peace, the very same that were granted to the Latines, which gave great distaste, it being conceived an unworthy thing to make strangers equal in privilege with their kinsmen the Latines; such as could allege no merit, with those who had exceedingly well deserved of the State: the Patritians took it also disdainfully that he would determine fully on his own head a matter of such weight, without asking any of them his advice. His three Consulships, and two Triumphs, made him seem to himself far superiour to any of the same rank, so that no less than the Principality would now content him. Knowing that the ordinary way to it was to gain the favour of the People, by some great act of kindness, he resolved upon that course, and first to divide amongst them certain publick grounds, which through the neglect of the Magistrates, had been seized on, and possessed by the rich. The success might might have been dubious had he stayed here; but he would also have the Latines into the Lot with the Hernici his new denizens, that he might procure the Favour of those Nations. The day after his Triumph, calling together the People according to the Custom, he recalled to their memories the great services he had done in his several Consulships: how in the first he had subdued the Sabines, in the second reduced the Commons into the City, after the appeasing of the Sedition, as also received the Latines into fellowship and Communion: in the third, the Volsci of Enemies were made Friends, and the Hernici, a great and powerful Nation, received into close and inward confederacy. By these discourses he insinuated, as if above all others he took charge of the Commonwealth, and so would continue to do. And he concluded with a promise to do more for the Commons, than any man ever did who was most in favour, and that should presently appear.

62. The day following, he called together the Senate, which was very much troubled at his Speech, and declared, that because the Common People were very useful both in procuring Dominion, and defending Liberty, it was convenient to divide to them those publick Grounds, which were most impudently held from the State by some Patricians, and pay the money back out of the Treasury, that they had laid out for that Corn, which being given freely to the City by Gelon the Tyrant of Sicily, ought to have been divided amongst the Inhabitants. The Fathers heard him with great disdain, and rejected the motion, his Colleague Virginius grievously accusing him as seditious. For several daies after, Cassius discoursed of this to the People, and Virginius held the Senate consulting how to withstand him. The Tribunes of the People at length, either for that they were jealous of some design, or were displeased that they themselves had not first proposed this thing, withstood it, alleging it was an unjust thing that what they had dearly purchased with their Labour and Blood, should be common to Strangers as well as themselves. As this raised some dislike, so Cassius again drew them to his party, by propounding that the Grounds might be divided amongst such as had most need, and by urging that it was better to have a little, than by expecting much to be frustrated of all. As the People were thus perfwaded to and fro, C. Rabuleius one of the Tribunes found out a way, which for the present ended the dispute. Virginius pretending that he was for a division of the Grounds, but not unto Foreigners, hoping that these would ever be joined; and Cassius being both for Citizens and Strangers; he took them both at their words; for the one and the other yielding there should be a division, he bade the People accept of that, and defer that wherein they differed to another time.

63. For some days after this, Cassius kept his house, pretending sickness, and studied how he might cause his Law, called Lex Agraria, to pass by force. For this purpose he sent for the Latines and Hernici to be present at the Comitia, that he might carry it by greater number of Voices, so as the City was filled with them. Virginius hereupon made Proclamation, that all such as dwelt not in the City, should depart within a short time prefixed, and Cassius caused it to be proclaimed, that all such as were free should stay till the matter were determined. No end of the contention appearing, the Fathers feared it might come to Blows, or further inconvenience, and therefore assembled to make some effectual provision for the publick Peace.

64. After a little debate they came to this resolution, that ten men of Consular dignity should be created to survey the Grounds, and declare how much of them was to be let out to farm, and how much divided to the People. That it should be declared, that for as much as it was inequitable for the new Associates, or Denizens, to expect part in such Lands as were gained to the State before their admission, if any afterward should be got by their assistance, to each several People should be assigned it's portion, according to the League. That for the choice of the ten men, and the distribution of the Ground, the succeeding Consuls should make provision. This Decree being published to the People, appeased all, and frustrated the design of Cassius.

65. In the year following, being the first of the seventy fourth Olympiad, wherein Alysius of Syracuse was Victor, Leophrates executing the place of Principal Archon at Athens, according to the computation of Dionysius, in the first year of Xerxes his Reign, Q. Fabius and S. Cornelius were Consuls. Now two most noble young men, Cato Fabius, the Brother of the Consul, and L. Valerius the Grand-son of Poplicola, being Quæstors, and thereby having authority to assemble the People, set a day to Cassius the late Consul to answer in the Comitia to the charge charge of affected Tyranny. Then in full Assembly did they lay open his actions; how he had bestowed upon the Latines the third part of the Plunder, who thought it happiness sufficient to be made free of the City: then the Hernici, who could expect no less than to be deprived of their own Lands, he chose rather to make Friends than Subjects, and Citizens than Tributaries, whence both grounds and plunder being divided into three parts, two of these must go to Subjects, and Strangers, so that if it were found necessary afterwards to give others the same privilege of the City, the Roman Citizens being by right Lords of all, should not have remaining one third to themselves. They aggravated this with the management of the business, as his doing all without consulting the Fathers, and against the interposition of the Tribunes. That these things tended to the designed establishment of a Tyranny, they proved from the money and arms wherewith the Latines and Hernici had furnished him, as also from the company of stout young men of those Nations which he had about his person. In testimony hereof they produced several credible persons, both Citizens and Associates, who averred it. To these the People giving credit, notwithstanding his premeditated Orations, and his three children, who with many Friends and Clients accompanied him in mourning habit, and interceded for him; notwithstanding all his services, and the honour obtained by them, they would not at all pity him, but out of extreme hatred to Tyranny condemned the man, and that to death, left being banished, he should procure the State such trouble and danger as Marcius lately had done. Therefore judgment being passed, the Quæstors presently led him to the Rock near to the Forum, and thence cast him down headlong in the sight of the People, this being the then ordinary kind of punishment. His Estate was confiscated, and his house razed. Some would have had his Sons also put to death, but the Senate refused to use such severity, and at Rome the children never suffered for their Father's fault, although for high Treason, till the Marrian War, wherein those that broke the custom miscarried, and he who destroyed them restored it to the State, as Dionysius observeth, who disliketh the practice of some of his Countrymen the Græcians, in killing, or condemning to perpetual banishment the sons of Tyrants themselves.

66. By the death of Cassius the Patricians were more elevated, and the Commons grieved after they law this, and considered how serviceable a man to their interest, as they foolishly thought, they had cut off. They now called hard for the Execution of the Agrarian Law, but the Senate being resolved to put it off, caused the Consuls to make provision for an Expedition. None would give their names, and the Tribunes interposing hindred the Consuls from punishing any; but it being given out that a Dictator would be created, the multitude fearing to fall into the hands of Appius, lifted themselves, and so Cornelius waisted the Territories of the Veientes, as Fabius those of the Æqui. The year following, being the two hundredth and seventieth of the City, when Nicomachus was Archon at Athens, the Patricians procured Cato Fabius one of Cassius his accusers, and L. Æmilius, to be created Consuls, during whose Office all was quiet at home, the Volsci renewing the War upon the Romans. Fabius was sent to the assistance of the Latines and Hernici whom they had invaded, and Æmilius led the other part of the Forces to Antium, where he was worsted by the Volsci, and being forced to desert his Camp, had with his whole Army been cut off, but that his Colleague in good time sent some choice Companies to recruit him. For the next year M. Fabius Brother to Cato, and L. Valerius Son of Marcius, who put Cassius to death, being Consuls, propoed it to the Senate to fill up the Army at Antium. A Decree passing for new Legies, the People refused to be lifted, calling for the division of the grounds, and one of the Tribunes withstood the Consuls. This put them upon this device, to fit in the Campus Martius, where whosoever was cited and did not appear, they punished him, if he had any Lands, by cutting his trees, and pulling down his houses; or if he hired grounds, by driving away his Cattel, or other ways, the Tribune not being able to do them any good, for that the power of his Office was confined within the walls, so as it was unlawful for them to tye one night out of the City, except in the Latine feria, where all the Magistrates for the common safety were wont to sacrifice in the Albanian Mount unto Fupiter.

67. This forced the Commons to submit, and so the Consuls making Legies led out the Legions, Fabius to the defence of the Associates, and Valerius against the Volsci; who engaging with him in battle, came off on equal terms; and after afterwards neither part were forward to fight. It was believed in the City, that the Roman Army wilfully neglected an opportunity of Victory, out of hatred against the Consul, whom they despised as a man of no experience, and in revenge against the Fathers who had so long frustrated their hopes about the division of publick grounds. At this time one of the Vestal Nuns Opimia by name, being convicted of Incontinency, was shut up within the ground in the Forum, and her corrupters scourged and put to death. At the next election of Consuls there was great contention, the Patricians having a desire to prefer some in whom they could confide, and particularly pitching upon the son of Appius, a man of the same temper with his Father, and the Commons as much labouring the Contrary. When the Consuls held the Comitia, the Tribunes interposed, and when the Tribunes called the People together, the Consuls would not suffer any thing to be done, contending that it belonged to their Office. Both parties being incompassed with those of their Factions, railed, and sometimes came to hand-cuffs, so that worse threatening, and the Senate consulting what was to be done, some moved to have a Dictator named, who might first correct all distempers of late brought in, and then deliver the power to men of approved integrity; but a middle way pleased; to create Interreges for holding of the Assemblies. The first was A. Sempronius, who for his five days governing affairs in a peaceable manner, the other Magistrates having laid down, created according to the manner Sp. Lartius. He in the Centuriate Comitia made Consuls with the well liking of both sides, C. Julius a favourite of the Commons, and Q. Fabius now the second time elected, a man addicted to the power of the great ones. In their Consulship the Aequi and Volscians invaded the Roman Territories, and did much hurt. Against the later they were sent with the Legions, after some contest with the People (who were hardly drawn in by Lartius, because the Senate had now deferred the execution of the Agrarian Law five years) and harrying the Country returned home with much spoil; neither was any thing else of moment done that year.

Wars abroad.

68. The year following (which was the first of the seventy fifth Olympiad, wherein Xerxes made his Expedition into Greece, Callias being Archon at Athens) had for Consuls Cajo Fabius again, and Sp. Furius, to whom came messengers from the Latines, desiring assistance against the insolence of the Aequi; and all Hetruria was reported now to be in Arms at the desire of the Volscians. The Consuls were ordered to assist the one, and suppress the other; but when they came to raise men, Leilius one of the Tribunes interposed upon the old pretence of the Agrarian Law. The work being hereby hindered, Appius advised the Senate to let one Tribune against another, by drawing over some of them unto their side, as the only way to abate the power of that Office now so sacred and inviolable. This course both at present and afterwards was effectual, and the Consuls with their Armies departed each one into his province; Furius against the Aequi, and Fabius into Hetruria. Furius harried the Enemies Country, and returned home with great Booty. Fabius, though an able Warriour, was so hated by his men, that when they had in battle routed the Enemy, they refused to pursue or do any thing more, but departing against his command to their Camp, thence also marched home, lest they should procure him the honour of a Triumph. The following Consuls Cn. Manlius, and M. Fabius, again were both sent to carry on the War in Hetruria, where they held the Soldiers in the Camp so long, till the Enemy was ready to fall upon it, and for shame they desired to be led forth. Fabius taking this opportunity, upbraided them with their disobedience to the Consul the last year, in that place; and shewing them how little cause he and his Colleague had to trust them, having sufficiently humbled them, led them forth. A greater and longer battle was never fought by the Romans, who were thought to be Victors only, because the Hetruscians, the night following, forsook their Tents. Manlius was slain, and for that cause his Colleague refused the Triumph, saying, it was not right for him to take the Laurel at his Funerals. Having disbanded his Army, he laid down his Office two months before the time, because his wounds disabled him for service; and by the second Interrex in the Comitia, were declared Consul Cajo Fabius his brother (who having extraordinarily deserved in the late battle, was now honoured with this Office the third time) and T. Virginus.

69. Virginus being sent into Hetruria against the Volscians, was overpowered by them, and had lost his whole Army, but that Fabius upon the intimation of his extreme necessity came out of the Country of the Aequi, and brought him him off. When the Romans were retreated, the Volscians made excursions very near the City, to the great loss and disparagement of the State. The Senate found it necessary to have a constant Guard upon the Borders; but the Treasury was low, the Tributes of private men were not sufficient for this new charge, and it seemed that none would give their Names willingly to so constant a Work. When they were at a stand, the whole Family of the Fabii, by the procurement of the Consul, voluntarily offered to take both the charge and trouble upon it self only, which was gratefully accepted. The Fabii then under conduct of Marcus the last year's Consul, fortified a Castle near the River Cremora, and not far from Veli. Their whole number was at first four thousand, whereof their Clients and Friends made up the greater part, and of such as bore the name of the Family there were three hundred and six: afterwards another Company followed, being led by Cajo Fabius the Consul. Out of this Castle, which they named Cremora from the River, they made excursions, and much endamaged the Enemy. This caused the Volscians again to implore the aid of all Hetruria, which making preparations, news came that the Aequi and Volsci also had agreed upon an invasion. The Senate hereupon ordered their Armies to be provided, whereof L. Aemilius the next years Consul led one against the Hetruscians, with whom joined Cajo Babius as proconsul. C. Servilius the other Consul, marched with another part against the Volsci: and Ser. Furius with the third against the Aequi, having also the power of Proconsul. Furius no less happily than Aemilius finished his work. Servilius rashly managing his affairs lost many men, and not daring to adventure all in a battle, drew out the War in length; but Aemilius giving battle to the Volscians and their Associates, overthrew them, and then storming their Camp, forced them to beg Peace.

70. Having purchased a Truce by the grant of Provisions for two months to the Consuls Army, and six months pay, they had leave to send to the Senate. The Fathers upon reading of Aemilius his Letters, who advised them by all means to finish the War, resolved to make Peace, and left the Conditions thereof to him. He having a respect rather to equity than the profit of the Conquerours, made a League with them, neither taking from them any Grounds, nor any more Money, nor receiving any Hostages to secure their obedience, which procured him much evil will, and deprived him of the due honour of a Triumph. They ordered him to assist his Colleague against the Volsci; but he complaining grievously of them to the People, and suggesting to the Multitude that they were angry, because the War was finished, out of a desire to have the Peoples thoughts diverted from the Agrarian Law, disbanded his Army, as also that of Furius, and hereby afforded much matter for contention betwixt the Nobility and Commons. The year following, being the first of the seventy sixth Olympiad, wherein Scamander of Mitylene was Victor in the course, and Phaedon Archon at Athens, the new Consuls, C. Horatius, and T. Menenius, found some obstruction in the Levies; the Commons still complaining that the Agrarian Law was not executed. But necessity cut off the dispute, eleven several Cities of Hetruria having declared against the Volscians, for making Peace without publick consent, and forced them to break it. The pretence was, for that the Fabii were not drawn off from Cremora, who sending Intelligence to the Senate of this intended breach, it ordered Menenius to march into Hetruria, as Horatius against the Volsci. While Menenius loitered in his Expedition, Cremora was taken, and the Fabii all cut off. Some wrote that it was by an Ambush, as they were returning to Rome, to sacrifice for the whole Family, according to their custom. But others delivered more probably, that being accustomed to make depredations, they were drawn into Snairs by the Hetruscians (who caused herds of Cattel to be driven thither, where they had bestowed a sufficient quantity of men) and being overpowered, were all at length destroyed, though with the great loss of the Associates, except such as they had left to keep the Cattel. These were so far from being discouraged at what had befallen their Fellows, that they also stood it out to the last man, enduring all extremity, and fighting when half dead, with Weapons wrested from the Hands of their Enemies.

71. A Tradition remained to posterity, that three hundred and six of this Family being cut off, none remained except one Boy, who for his youth could not serve in the Expedition. Dionysius sheweth the Vanity hereof, by these reasons. 1. All except one could not be unmarried, or without Children, for an ancient Law commanded all at a legitimate age to marry, and provide for Posterity, which being diligently observed till their age, the Fabii alone would not content:

but, 2. Grant this; it is not to be granted, that none of those had a Brother of young years. 3. If their Fathers had been utterly deprived of their Sons, yet certainly all would not have been so old and dry, as to despair of any more Issue, and consequently make no provision for it by marriage. 4. And if they had no Fathers living, yet would it be a prodigious thing to suppose that none of them left any Son as yet an Infant, a Wife with Child, or a young Brother. This is true, that of the three Brothers, Cæso, Marcus, and Quintus, in the Family of whom the Consulship had continued for seven years, Marcus only left a young Son, besides whom none of this Name afterwards being famous, thence the report might rise that none else was preserved. 72. The Vientes having recovered the Castle, went confidently against the Roman Legions, which lay incamped not far off, and as was thought might have relieved the Fabii, but that Mencius the Consul out of envy would not make use of the opportunity. They took the advantage of his unskilfulness, and seized on an Hill near unto him, where placing a Guard, they made Sallies upon the Camp, and so straightened it, that they brought him to fight upon very unequal terms, and put his Army to the worst. The Romans forlook their Camp, and fled in so tumultuous a manner, that had the Vientes not been too greedy of Plunder, they might utterly have destroyed them. The day following they invaded the Roman Territories, and came as far as the Hill Faniculæ, two miles from the City, whereon they seized, and thence made excursions to the great disgrace of the Romans. Horatius the other Consul returning from the Volsci, overthrew them twice, and gave the People some respite from their fear. The following year two skilful men in Military matters, Sp. Servilius and A. Virginius, entered the Consulship after the Summer solstice in the month Sextilis. Now the Hetruscan War, though difficult enough, seemed profitable, compared with domestic Affairs; for the seizing upon the Mount, and the depredations thence made had hindered Tillage for the last Winter, and no Traffick having been for that time, there was such scarcity of Corn that the City was brought into extrem want, containing one hundred and ten thousand men of ripe age, as appeared at the next Census, besides Women and Children, Slaves, Merchants, and Artificers (for no Roman Citizen was allowed to keep a Victualing-house, or to exercise any fordid Trade) thrice as many. The People made great Tumults, and were ready to take away violently the provisions of the rich: the Tribunes also made great disturbance.

The Vientes pitched within two miles of the City.

73. The Consuls laboured to satisfy the poorest sort by buying in all they could, and causing such as had Corn to sell it, till their Levies were finished. Then led they out by night against the Enemy, and passing the River before day, unexpectedly fell upon him, and got a bloody Victory: after which the Mount was forsaken by the Garrison, which having no relief sent in, retired to Veii. This War being ended, Mencius the last years Consul was called to an account, and condemned in a pecuniary Mult for suffering the Fabii to miscarry, whom the people so gratefully esteemed, that they hated all who seemed to have been to blame as to their defeat, and placed the day thereof amongst their Nefasti, or unlucky ones, wherein no good Work was to be begun. The following year also, when Servilius was out of his Office, he was called before the people, for that in the last Battle against the Hetruscans, he had so unadvisedly pursued the Enemy, as thereby to lose the Flower of his Army; but the Mans abilities being considered, and his own defence with that of his Colleague weighed (who desired either to stand or fall with him) he was acquitted. This year and that following, the Vientes were so overpowered, having been overthrown in Battle together with their Associates the Sabines, and now closely besieged, begged Peace once more, and having with a whole years pay for the Consuls Army, and money for two months provision purchased leave to send to the Senate, obtained a Truce for forty years. The next year being the first of the seventy seventh Olympiad, wherein Dates an Argive was Victor, and Chares Archon, L. Æmilius Mancinus the third time, and Popilius Julius were Consuls. Their Consulship was very turbulent through the attempts of Cn. Genatius Tribune of the People, who required them to divide the Grounds formerly Decreed to the people by the Senate.

They

Mencius fined for the miscarriage of the Fabii.

SECT. I.

They denied it belonged to them to execute what had been Decreed in the Consulship of others, and alleged that a Senatus Consultum was not of force, but for one year. Because he could not compel his Superiours, he set the day to Manlius and Furinus, the last year's Consuls, to answer before the People, why they did not divide the grounds, pretending some reasons wherefore they ought to be questioned more than others, though it was now twelve years since the passing of the Decree, and alleging, that except the present Magistrates were quickened by a fence of punishment inflicted upon others, they would never set upon the work.

74. The Patritians exceedingly startled at so bold and impudent an attempt, relieved by force of Arms, if fairer means would not prevail, to protect the accused, and the City might have been in blood had not Genatius died suddenly that very morning; no sign of violence appearing on the Body. This allayed the fury of the multitude, and the Sedition might have been quite appeased, had the Consuls both their success with moderation, and considered what was fitting for the time. But making new Levies, they would force one P. Volero, who had before time been an Officer, to go in the present expedition as a Common Soldier, and when he alleged that he ought not to be compelled so to serve, for that he had not deserved it by any offence, they commanded him to be stripped and beaten. He flying to the assistance of the Tribunes appealed to the People, where, with they not being at all moved, he became a Tribune to himself, with blows repelling one or two Lictors: and when the Consuls sent all their Officers to take him, such Phœbeas as stood by calling one upon another rescued him from their hands. This diverted mens minds from thoughts of Land, and raised a zeal for privilege and liberty; the Patritians complaining that the Chief Magistrates should be so contemned, and the Phœbeas alleging it was a great breach upon their right for a Roman Citizen not to be heard when he appealed to the people, but scourged like a Slave; and they demanded Justice of the Senate against the Consuls, with these first, without any other thing of moment, was their Consulship passed over. For the following year Volero an impudent fellow, obtained, though a man of meanest condition, to be Tribune, having made himself popular by resisting that Office, which was once equal to the Kingly, and promising that he would clip the power of the great ones. He proposed a Law for holding the Assemblies of Tribes at the Election of Tribunes, instead of the other of the Curie, betwixt which there was this difference. In the Curiata Comitia were such things treated on, and confirmed by the suffrages of the Curie, as the Senate had first Decreed, and that with the Auspicia; for except the birds predicted good, the Comitia were null and frustrate. But the Tributa Comitia were managed without any consulting of the Senate, without the superstitious observation of birds (called Auspicia, and observed at the Election also of Patritian Magistrates) and all things were determined by the suffrages of the Tribes gathered apart.

A Law proposed for Creation of Tribunes in the Assembly of Tribes.

75. When the day for determination of the question was come, great endeavours were used on both sides; the whole time consumed in speeches, for, and against the Law. The Tribunes then put it off till the Trinundinum, against which time the Patritians improving all their interest, Volero resolved by force to keep them from the Comitia, and the Consuls from diswading the thing, because they carried mighty highly, and with their friends, and Clients, took up a great part of the Forum. He was prevented by a grievous plague, which like a Torrent carried away multitudes, so as his year being out before he could accomplish his design, by his great promises he obtained to be Tribune again, as also his two Collegues who sided with him in this enterprise. The Fathers to balance him procured to be made Consul Appius Claudius, the Son of Appius, absent, against his will, and to their own prejudice. His Colleague was T. Q. Quinctius Capitolinus, of a contrary disposition. Appius was all for Wars, that by expeditions the multitudes might be diverted from Seditious Attempts, the effects of idleness; and Quinctius contended that causes were not to be fought for, left the ordinary sort being forced to unnecessary War, should break out into rage, and trample Magistracy under their feet; and the Government being his, faith Dionysius, this month, he prevailed. But Volero renewed his endeavour for the Law, and thereto added, that the Ædiles should be elected by the Tributa Comitia, as also whatsoever should concern the Commons, might be transacted, and passed in them, which tended to no other than to transfer the power from the Senate to the people. Appius now earnestly pressed

Appius and Quinctius Consul.

Sect. 1. to make Levies, and undertake some expedition; but Quintius prevailed that they should rather go about to diffwade the people by reasons, than to compel them by force.

ed all.

76. Quintius to this purpose made a seasonable Speech in the Assembly, and so far prevailed, that the Law as unjust had been laid aside, but that his Colleague used, though just and true, yet unseasonable words, speaking to the Commons, not as free Citizens, who had an hand in making, and abrogating Laws, but as a rabble of base persons. He upbraided them with untruthfulness, defrauding of their Creditors, revolting from the Consuls, and voluntary Exile; as also perjury, and turning of the Weapons taken up in defence of their Country, into its bowels. He said, it was no wonder that such as they were should proceed thus from one wicked Act to another, insinuating in their seditious Attempts for the gaining of the just power of the Patricians. Having spared no cruel, malicious, or affronting language, he came to that which gave most offence: that the State would never be at rest so long as the Tribunial power remained; for as much as it was impossible that what took its Original from violence, iniquity, sedition, fear of a Civil War, and other abominable things, could produce any profitable effects. He concluded with an asseveration, that as long as he was Consul, he would neither suffer this, nor any other Law to pass without approbation of the Senate, and this he would stand by, both with Words and Deeds; also if need should require; so that, if never before, they should learn in his Office, of what force was the Consulship. Then stood up C. Licinius, the principal man amongst the Tribunes, and in answer to his accusations related what labours the Commons had sustained before, and since the banishment of Tarquinius; how, for all this pain and danger, they were not made partakers of any thing which they had obtained by their blood, till forced to separate from the Patricians. That then they got this Office of Tribuneship, as a protection for the poor, with other Laws afterwards, as of judging the Patricians, and translating the suffrages from the Centuriata to the Curiata Comitia, all which he accounted nothing. Then reproving Appius sharply, he told him he would shew him of what force that Office was upon which he had trampled, and the power of the people called by him sordid, and without House or Harbour. Having spoken this, he swore most solemnly that he would, and not live except the Law passed, and commanding silence, when all men expected earnestly what he would do, he lawfully required Appius to depart the Assembly.

77. Appius not obeying, but incircling himself with a Company he had brought for that purpose, having made silence to be proclaimed by a Crier, he declared that the College of Tribunes commanded the Consul to be carried to prison, and therewith sent an Officer to apprehend him. He was beaten back by the Lictors, wherewith Licinius himself exhorting the multitude to stick to him, went to lay hands on him. Appius being defended with a company of stout young men, a great and unseemly Contest followed with railings and thrustings to and fro, and at length it came to blows, and casting of stones. The Consul Quintius by his intreaties throwing himself into the middle, and the more grave Senators hindering the tumult from proceeding to further inconvenience, which was ended shortly after by the night. Several days were spent with mutual recriminations; but at length the Tribunes and People seized on the Capitol, and there kept watch night and day. The Senators were very solicitous what to do, both in respect of the danger, and the difference betwixt the Consuls; for Quintius thought the Commons desiring no unjust thing, were to be gratified; but Appius would rather die than yield. Quintius taking great pains, at length procured the Tribunes to refer the Law to the discretion of the Senate, which after a long diffwasion of Appius, and perswasion of the Tribunes, permitted it to be put to the question of the Comitia, wherein the Commons readily passed it. After this, the Consuls were sent out with the Armies; Quintius against the Æqui, whose Territories he wasted, and he returned with honour, which his Soldiers were careful to purchase for him; but Appius going against the Volsci, bore himself so aufterly towards his men, that they would not obey him, but out of hatred, and to procure him an ignominious retreat, when they came to fight, retired to their Camp without striking a stroke, and no more could he draw them forth against the Enemy, so that he was constrained to depart homewards, and in his way put to death such Centurions and Ensigns, as had been faulty, with every tenth man in the Army. Some were beheaded, and some knocked on the head with clubs: this decimation being an usual punishment amongst the Romans, of such as had forsaken, or lost their Colours.

78. The

78. The following Consuls Q. Valerius again, and Tib. Amilius, being both well affected towards the Commons (the former out of envy to the Patricians, for that they had denied his Father a Triumph, and the later because he would reconcile himself to the multitude, offended by him for accusing Cassius the Author of the Agrian Law, when he was Quæstor) promised the Tribunes to promote in the Senate the division of publick grounds. The Tribunes in confidence of their assistance, came into the Senate, and spoke very mildly in favour of the Law, which the Consuls would not contradict, left they should seem to seek after contention, but asked the ancienter Senators their opinions. L. Valerius Father to the Consul, pressed the division of Lands; but Appius so severely and plainly withstood it by several invincible reasons, that he carried it against the others, for which the Tribunes set him a day to answer before the People for his life. The crimes were: That he gave ill advice against the Commons, raised Sedition, laid violent hands forthwith on the Sacrosanct Body of the Tribune, and being General of an Army had received a defeat, and returned with ignominy. The Patricians exceedingly concerned, left nothing unattempted to save him, and desired him, that giving way to the time, he would take the habit agreeable to his condition; but he flatly refused to do any thing poorly, or unworthy of his Ancestors, adding, that he would die a thousand deaths rather than touch the knees of any, as was the custom of Supplicants. He forbade his friends to supplicate for him, saying, his shame would be doubled, if he saw any do that in his behalf, which he himself disdaind to do. Giving out many such like speeches, he neither changed his apparel, nor his countenance, nor remitted any thing of his ancient magnanimity, but when he saw the whole City earnestly intent upon his Trial, a few days before the appointed time he killed himself. His friends gave out that he died of a natural death, and the Body being brought forth into the Forum, his Son was there ready, and asked leave of the Consuls to commend him in a funeral Oration, according to the custom. The Tribunes commanded the body to be taken away without any ceremony; but the People was thereat displeased, and suffered the young man to perform this last and usual Office of honour to his deceased Father.

War with the
Volsci.

79. For this and the two following years the Romans fought successively against the Æqui, Sabines, and Volsci. From the later was taken Antium, being surrendered to T. Quintius Capitolinus the Consul, who placed therein a Garrison. In the following year, wherein were Consuls Tib. Amilius again, and Q. Fabius (son to one of the three brothers, that with their friends and Clients died at Cremera) the Tribunes made new stirrs about the Agrian, and Amilius furthering the business, the Senate to gratify the multitude, decreed that some part of the Lands lately taken from the Volsci and Antiates, should be divided. Yet not many would give their names, being unwilling to forsake their native Country, so that the Colony was made up out of the Latines and Hernici. The Consuls marched, Amilius against the Volsci, and Fabius against the Æqui; both had success; the later forcing the Æqui to beg Peace, the conditions whereof were left to him by the Senate. But the Æqui receiving the Fugitives of Antium, suffered them to make excursions into the Territories of the Latines, and refused to give them up, whereupon succeeded another War, though the Romans obtained a bloody Victory, in the third year after the making of the Peace. In the next Consulship which was executed by L. Eburnius and P. Servilius Priscus, fell a more grievous plague upon the City than ever before happened. It first consumed almost all Cattel, and from the Country came into the City, wherein it swept away an innumerable company of slaves, and a fourth part of the Senators, and amongst these the Consuls, with most of the Tribunes. Livy writeth, that the Baldies supplied the place of Consuls. The disease began about the Calends of September, and continued that whole year, sparing no Sex nor Age.

80. When this was known by the neighbour Nations, the Volsci and Æqui, supposing the time of destroying the Roman Empire to be come, provided all things for a Siege, and to divert the Romans invaded the Latines and Hernici their associates. These sending to Rome for aid, Eburnius was already dead, and Servilius as yet alive, in small hope assembled the Senators, who were brought half dead in their Litters to the Court. They gave them liberty to defend themselves, which doing, when the Enemies had wasted their grounds at their pleasures; they marched for Rome, but contrary to their expectations, found it sufficiently guarded, though with sick and feeble men. When the next Consuls were created, L. Lucretius and T. Petronius Geminus, the Pestilence ceased; and all things being being quiet at home (for the Tribunes making adoe according to the custom about the Agrian, were commanded by the people to desert, and expect better times) they invaded those who had taken advantage at the publick calamity. They had good success abroad, and better near home, when the Æqui in their absence came and thought to have surprized the City. For understanding the Walls to be furnished with armed men, and four Cohorts of six hundred apiece to stand before the Gates, they altered their course when they came to Tusculum; but Lucretius met and gave them battle, which they were hasty to embrace before the coming of his Colleague. For a time they fought courageously; but seeing a band of men behind them, which came from a certain Castle, they thought it had been the other Consul, and fearing to be inclosed ran away, having lost both their Captains, and many other valiant men. Afterwards without any let, the Consuls wasted the Territories both of the Æqui and Volsci, and returned home at the time of the Comitia: Lucretius in full Triumph, and Peturius in the other called Contion, by decree of the Senate, with the like Pomp in all things; except that he entered on foot, and not in a Chariot; which words conclude the ninth Book of Dionysius his Roman Antiquities.

81. For the year following (which was the first of the eightieth Olympiad; wherein Torquatus the Thessalian was Victor, and Pharsicles Archon) P. Volcanus and Ser. Sulpicius Camerinus were created Consuls, who having nothing to do abroad, employed themselves at home in defending the power of the Patricians against the Commons, now much intigated against it by their Tribunes. They were come so far, as to assert, that it was most agreeable with the constitution of a free State, for the Citizens to have equal power in Government. The People now would have all things done by the prescript of Laws, whereof as yet there were none written, the Kings having judged according to their own discretion, and the Consuls by certain precedents of those Princes formerly in power. The least part was recorded in the Books of the Pontifices, which none could come at except the Patricians. C. Terentius or Terentillus Arsa according to Livy, Tribune of the Commons the foregoing year, had endeavoured to circumscribe within certain limits the power of the Consulship; but left the matter unfinished, because the greater part of Citizens were employed in the War; the Consuls on set purpose drawing it out in length, all the Comitia. Now the whole College of Tribunes renewed the attempt by the procurement of A. Virginius one of the number; the whole City being divided about it. Much contention there was in the Senate, betwixt the Tribunes and the contrary Faction; but at length, not doing any good in that place, they called the people together, and propoled a Law, that ten men might be chosen in Lawful Assembly, such as were most eminent for Age, prudence, and dignity, and who especially respected their repute, and honour; that these men should publish Laws both concerning private and publick business, by which right should be preferred, both to private Persons and Annual Magistrates. The Question they put off till the Trinundinium, giving any one leave to speak freely, either for or against it.

82. The Patricians extraordinarily moved, that the Senate's authority in this matter was utterly neglected, both by fair and foul means laboured to hinder the debate; casting the meanest sort like Slaves out of the Forum, who minded their private commodity more than the publick Peace. Amongst those sticklers Cælo Quintius the Son of L. Quintius Cincinnatus, was principal, one of great Nobility, beautiful in person, and very stout and expert in War. Him the Tribunes resolved to make an example to all young men, and called him to answer for his life before the People. He refused to answer, except at the Tribunal of the Consuls; but his Father earnestly intreated for him, recounting the several eminent services he had done for the State, and imputing this miscarriage to his youth, and indiscretion. The multitude plainly declared by signs, that they were ready to gratify him, which when Virginius perceived, knowing, that if Cælo escaped without punishment, the insolence of the young Patricians would be intolerable, he procured M. Volscius, one of his Colleagues, to tell a feigned story, how in the time of the Plague he and his brother returning from a friends house in the night, were set upon by Cælo and his drunken Companions in the Forum, who killed his brother outright, and left Volscius himself half dead. He added, that both the Consuls dying of the Plague, he could have no satisfaction, and in the succeeding Consulship, whenever he cited Cælo before the Magistrates (as several could bear witness) he received nothing but blows. This fo-raged the multitude, that they had torn him in pieces, but that the Consuls and some of the Tribunes kept them off. His Trial then was deferred, not without a great controversy, whether he should lye in prison, or be out upon Bail, the later whereof was at length accepted by the interposition of the Senate, and he fled into Hetruria, leaving his ten sureties to pay the money, which was exacted of them by the Tribunes, who also condemned him. His Father sold the greatest part of his Estate to reimburse the sureties, and content with a small quantity of ground beyond Tiber, and a little Cottage, sustained himself very laboriously by the help of a few slaves; for grief and poverty abstaining from the City and his friends, and neglecting to divert himself with publick solaces.

83. The Tribunes were much crossed in their expectations. For the calamity of Cælo was so far from moderating the insolency of the young Patricians, that they grew much higher, opposing the Question both by words and deeds; so as in this Consulship the Law could not be preferred. For the following year P. Valerius Poplicola, and C. Claudius Sabinus, were created Consuls; and the Commons made the same Tribunes as the year before, who perceiving the Law was not by persuasion to be enacted, sought to terrify both People and Consuls. They caused various rumours to be spread, that Enemies had hatched a great conspiracy against the Commons, then coming into the Senate, there affirmed it, pretending they had letters from some friends to assure them of it. They said certain Senators were in the plot, but that the greatest part consisted of the order of the Equites, which it was not reasonable then to name; but they had designed in Conjunction with Cælo Quintius the Exile, to murder the Tribunes with others by night, and then at their leisure to rescind whatever had been granted by the Senate to the Commons: In conclusion they desired the inquisition of so grievous a design might be committed unto themselves. The Senate being very sollicitous, Claudius the Consul (who was fully persuaded that what the Tribunes went about was the only conspiracy) by ripping up their designs concerning the Agrian Law, and the bad success of their endeavours which put them upon this Exploit, fully convinced the Fathers how the matter stood, especially when they would neither name their friends from whom the Letter came, nor the Messenger: and though the Tribunes highly complained of him, and the Senate, unto the People, yet the most sober amongst the Commons were satisfied with his reasons. Whilst the heat of this contention remained, the City fell into such danger from outward Enemies as never before, which, saith Dionysius, had been foretold by Sibyll's Books that it would arise out of intestine division, and was likewise signified by the prodigies of the foregoing year, when besides strange sights and noises, it rained pieces of flesh, of which some were devoured by all sorts of birds before they fell to the ground, and the rest continued long upon the Earth, without either change of colour or smell.

84. Ap. Herdonius a Sabine with four thousand men seized upon the Capitol, and called the Slaves to their liberty. At this time of extrem danger, the Tribunes made what disturbance they could, intigating the multitude not to fight against the Enemy, except the Patricians would engage by Oath to create ten men for the making of Laws, and suffer the Commons to live with them upon equal terms of privilege. Claudius would have wholly omitted them, and carried on the War by the Patricians, and their Clients only; but Valerius thought it necessary to have a closure in the body before it should go about to defend itself from outward attempts, and therefore promised with an Oath, that if the people would cheerfully carry on that War, as soon as peace was restored, he would permit the Tribunes to put the question, and endeavour to satisfy the desire of the Commons. Claudius then being appointed to look to the City, Valerius on all sides set upon the Capitol, which was taken by storm, though he lost his life, having omitted neither the part of an able General nor valiant Soldier. For though he had received many wounds, yet he gave not over, till climbing the Walls a great stone was tumbled down upon him, which took away his life. The War being ended, the Tribunes required of Claudius to make good the promise of his Colleague; but he deferred the matter by several pretences, and at length alleged he could do nothing of himself. He appointed then the Comitia for Creation of a new Consul into the room of Valerius. The Patricians were very sollicitous to get some chosen that would defend their interest, and resolved upon L. Quintius Father to Cælo, lately banished, who at the day appointed was chosen by all the Centuries of the first Classis, as well Equites as the other,

They that were sent to fetch Quintius into the City, found him at Plow without as much as a Coat about him, only in his Truss, and a Cap on his head. Seeing the company make towards him, he wondered what it meant, but being told by a Viator that run before, he put on other apparel, and in a seemlier habit presented himself. Being saluted not by his own name, but by that of Consul, invested with Purple, honoured by the Falcates, and other Ensigns of Magistracy, he was desirous to begin his journey, whereat pausing a little he answered with tears : Then for this year this little field shall be unown'd, and we shall be in danger of want. After this, taking leave of his Wife, and commending his household affairs to her care, he departed for the City.

85. Quintius refrained the Tribunes from preferring the Law, by denouncing, that except they were quiet, he would lead out all the Citizens against the Volsi. When they said they would not permit him to make Levies, he called the people, and put the younger sort in mind of their Sacramentum, or Military Oath, whereby they had bound themselves to the Consuls to follow whithersoever he would lead them, and not be wanting to the Majesty of the Roman people. He affirmed they were all obnoxious to him by this Oath now he was Consul, and swore he would animadvert upon Offenders according to the Laws. Herewith he commanded the Standards to be moved out of the Ætrurium, and told them that to make them know they should have no leisure for Tribunitia Actions in his Consulship, he let them understand, he would not return out of the Enemy's Country till his office was at an end, and bade them prepare for wintering in the Camp. The multitude terrified heretofore, desired him to forbear this rigour, and he did it upon this condition, that they would not molest him for his whole time, but suffer him to spend it in administering Justice. He behaved himself with such Prudence, Justice, painfulness, and courtesy, that the Commons thought they stood not in need now of any new Laws, and the Senate was desirous to have him Consul for the following year, to oppose him to the Tribunes, who executed that Office now the third time. But as he approved it not in them, so he himself would not commit the same fault as he counted it, and in the Assembly speaking much against such as would not quit their Office when their time was finished, swore most religiously, that he would not accept the Consulship till he had laid down his present charge. Having finished a new Election, he betook himself to his little Cottage, and his former laborious course of life.

86. The year following the Æqui surprized Tusculum, which action caused a War betwixt them and Rome, wherein they were worsted together with their friends the Volsi, and forced to beg peace. But in the next Consulship they were drawn again to revolt, and making War upon the Latines, by Gracchus Clælius their Captain, an industrious man, who had improved the power granted him by his Country almost to regality. He drew the Roman Army into so disadvantageous a place, that it was thought convenient to make a Dictator, which was L. Quintius Cincinnatus. The Messengers found him newly dressed ; for when he elected the company, suspecting they came to him, he left the Country-work he was in hand with, and put on his better Clothes. Seeing himself made Dictator, by the trapped Horfes, the twenty four Axes, the Purple, and other royal Ensigns, he was so far from being delighted with this honour, that he said with indignation : This year's Crop will also be lost by reason of mine employment, and my family must be famished. When he came to the City he encouraged the people, and named Master of Horse-men, L. Tarquinius, a man of no great esteem by reason of his poverty, but a good Soldier : Having gathered together the Forces, he gave Clælius battle, and beat him into his Camp, which having besieged some time, he forced the Æqui to give him up, with other incendiaries, to be punished with death according to their defects, as also to pass under the Fugium (two Spears set in the ground, and a third laid over upon them in form of a pair of Gallows) in token of servitude ; and because they had the year following without any provocation plundered Tusculum, to suffer him to deal in the like manner with Corbin. The choicest part of the plunder he caused to be carried to Rome ; the rest he gave to his own Soldiers, and those of T. Quintius the Questor, saying, that the other of Minutius the Consul, who had been besieged by the Enemy, ought to be content that they fell not as a prey into his hands. Having caused Minutius to lay down his Office, he returned to the City with a more illustrious Triumph than any Captain before him, (the General of the Æqui

That absolute power which he might have kept for six months he presently resigned, having first given an account of his administration. And when the Senate and his private friends would have enriched him with publick Ground, Plunder, and Contributions, he utterly refused it, and breaking himself again to his small Cottage, preferred a laborious life before Kingly power, for that he pleased himself more in his poverty, than others in the abundance of their wealth.

87. The year following, the Sabines, whose grounds the other Consul Nautius had wasted, as also the Æqui, were in Arms, having retaken Corbin, against whom when Levies came to be made, the Tribunes again withstood them, being all new Created the fourth time. Hereupon the Fathers with weeping eyes signified to the People, that being forsaken by them, who hitherto had shield themselves their Children, they would go forth and fight against the Enemy in their own persons, wherewith the multitude being fore moved, and Virginius seeing that do he what he could they would give their names, he averred it to be the resolution of the Commons to live and die with them ; only they desired some reward for all their pains and danger, which was, that they might live in equal freedom. If this could not be granted, they waved it, and desired another thing, which he was sure would not intrench upon the Senate's privileges. The Consul affirming the thing should be proposed if they would but refer it to the Senate, he desired that the number of the Tribunes might be increased unto ten. The Senate debating the matter, C. Claudius, the son of Appius the Elder, spake against it, alleging, that the Commons would never be satisfied ; but Quintius, who now bore the greatest sway, commended the opinion of Appius, that the * only way to cross the design of the Tribunes was to let them one against another ; and if so, it would make more for the Interest of the Senate to have their number increased. Accordingly a Senatus Consultum was drawn, that it should be lawful for the Commons to increase their College of Tribunes to the number of ten, and it was presently confirmed by the People. After this the Sedition being appeased, the Consuls levied Forces, and managed the War successfully against the Sabines and Æqui.

88. The ensuing year, being the second of the eighty first Olympiad, and the two hundred and ninety seventh year of the City according to Cato, as the two hundred and ninety eighth after the account of Varro, had for Consuls M. Valerius and Sp. Virginius, who having nothing to do abroad, had too much employment in the City. Before this time, the Tribunes only reigned in the Assemblies, neither taking upon them to call together the Senate, nor give their voices therein : But now they ventured to assemble the Fathers, by the procurement of Julius principal of the College, an industrious, and eloquent man, who presumed to make a further innovation in the State, requiring the Acventine Mount for the People to build upon, which being a mile and an half in circuit, was not as yet fully inhabited, but publick, and full of wood. The Tribunes moving the Consuls to procure a Decree of the Senate for his new project, and they deserring the matter, an Apparitor was sent from the College to cite the Consuls before it. He applying himself to one of their Licitors, was beaten, and sent back, which so enraged the Tribunes, that apprehending the Licitor, they led him to the Tarpeian Rock, the Consuls, though much troubled, not being able to rescue him ; for that none could hinder the execution of what the whole College resolved ; all they could do was to desire some of the Tribunes themselves to interpose. But this could not be effected, they having resolved at the beginning not to dissent from one another, that thereby they might preserve their Authority inviolable. As concerning the Licitor, then they answered they were resolved, yet they put not the man to death, giving his life to the intreaties of the graver sort of Patricians, lest that order should be driven by just indignation to attempt some thing extraordinary. Having then assembled the Senate, the Consuls sharply reprehended them, but Julius excused what had been done to the Licitor, by the sacred Laws, which forbade all, both publick and private, to cross a Tribune. By a premeditated Oration he endeavoured to shew, that he had not unjustly assembled the Senate, and when he had seemed sufficiently to have answered the charge of the Consuls, he mentioned the Law : That what private men were possessed of, and was justly gotten, should remain unto them ; what ground by force, or fraud, was already furnished with buildings, the expense of building being considered by

He shewed that this Law would be exceedingly profitable for the suppression of all Agrarian Seditions, so far as much as the Commons would be satisfied with possessions at home. No man dissenting, except C. Claudius, a Decree of the Senate passed for it accordingly.

Differences renewed.

89. The remainder of the year was spent in building. For the next were created Consuls T. Romulus and C. Petrusius, Julius and his Colleague being continued in their Office: The civil dissensions supposed to be removed by the late Law, were again revived, and the foreign Enemies of the Commonwealth were in Arms, to the greater profit than discommodity of it. For such a vicissitude now there was, that Peace brought Sedition, and War procured Concord, which the chief Magistrates apprehending, wished for nothing more than external motions, and when there was Peace abroad, sought occasion for War; as understanding the growth of the City's prosperity to be procured thereby. The present Consuls were of this mind, being jealous of the beggerly and idle multitude. And their opinion was right, that they were to be diverted; but there they failed, that whereas in so ill a Crisis of the State, they ought to have proceeded gently, they admitted the excuse of none who desired exemption from the War, but severely inflicted penalties upon all; which gave occasion to the Tribunes to make disturbance, crying out, that they violated the privilege of their Office, by imprisoning such as appealed to it. From mutual revilings sometimes it came to blows, both parties being surrounded with those of their faction, and the people not fully complying with the Tribunes in their demands; they went into the Senate, where they required, that the Consuls might either lay down their Offices, or answer to their Crime against the Sacrosanct Tribunal power before the People. The Senate determined nothing, seeing it dangerous to diminish the power either of the Consuls or Tribunes, at which the later much discontented, returned to the multitude. Some were for departing again from the Patritians; others more moderate, would expect the course of Law against those who had violated so sacred an Office; and a third (the most sober party) disliked this as well as the other, for that the Consuls were the Supreme Magistrates; and thought it meet to punish their Abettors. If the Tribunes had not at length restrained their anger against Senate and Consuls, the City that day had destroyed itself, so intent were both parties upon Arms and War. But they set the Consuls a day to answer before the People, and then were prevailed with to let the matter fall, telling the Commons that they remitted what concerned themselves for their sakes whom they ought not to deny it, but would revenge the injury done to the whole, to prevent an ill example.

The Agrarian Law after 50 years with another of equal right published.

90. This was by promulgating the Agrarian Law, which hitherto had lain dormant for thirty years, to which another was added of equal right, which the former year could not be passed. Having with an oath promised to prefer these Laws, they appointed a day for the Comitia, wherein having first themselves spoken largely, several others related what good service they had done for the Commonwealth, and laboured to shew how unworthy a thing it was for them to be defrauded of those grounds, which by their labour and danger they had gained, and admitted to no part of reward. The multitude gladly hearing such discourses, none more affected mens minds than L. Sicinius Dentatus, a man of admirable shape, fifty eight years old, and furnished with military eloquence, for a sedition attempt. He told them, he had served his Country in the Wars forty years, and been an Officer thirty; sometimes a Centurion, afterwards a Tribune. He was raised to that honour by Sicinius the Consul, for defending the Ensign of his Cohort, when the Centurion was slain, for which he was also adorned by his fellow Soldiers with a golden Crown. In another battle, wherein the Tribune of the Camp was struck to the ground, and the Eagle (or Standard) taken, fighting for the whole Legion, he recovered it and saved him, for which the Tribune would have given him his place, but he refused it, and the Consul made him Tribune of the first Legion, which Office was then void. Having thus purchased himself honour; to maintain his credit he spared no labour, nor refused any danger, being ever rewarded by the Consuls with spoils, crowns, and other rewards and honours.

The achievements of Sicinius Dentatus.

91. In short; during those forty years, he had fought one hundred and twenty battles, received forty five wounds, all before and none behind, whereof twelve that day wherein he fought against Herdonius, who seized upon the Capitol. As for rewards after the several battles, he had obtained fourteen Crooked Crowns (which faith Gellius, were bestowed upon him who had preserved the life of a Citizen, and were made of Oak, because the most ancient meat was thought to be the fruit of that tree;) three Murals (which were given by the General unto him who first mounted the walls, and entered a Town, being adorned with an image of the battlements) and eight Golden Crowns; besides eighty three Golden Chains, sixty Golden Bracelets, eighteen pure Spears, (which were Spears having no iron at the ends of them, being also called Hastæ donasica, and Hastæ gramineæ,) and twenty three Horse trappings, whereof nine were for killing Enemies that he had challenged to single Combats. To this relation of Dionysius, Gellius addeth a Crown, called Obsequialis (which was given to one who had freed the prisoner from a Siege) and increaseth the number of Bracelets to above one hundred and sixty, that of Spears to twenty two, and the other of Horse trappings to twenty five. He calleth him L. Sicinius Dentatus, and writeth, that for his incredible achievements, he had the appellation of Achilles Romanus.

Lib. 2. c. 11.

92. Sicinius proceeded, saying, that though he had fought so many years, served in so many Expeditions, received so many wounds, and helped to gain such large Territories for the Roman People, yet neither he, nor his fellow-soldiers partakers with him in the same dangers, had received any portion of those Lands, being possessed by others, who could neither shew title nor merit for them. After this, he accused the Patritians of having put Cassius to death, for no other cause than favouring the Commons, as also of privily murdering Genucius the Tribune, eleven years after, which had terrified others since from such attempts as his were. He mentioned the affronts lately made to the Tribunes, and concluded with an exhortation to the multitude, to free themselves from this Tryanny of the great ones, by passing the Law without giving heed to the disfavours of any. The Assembly was so moved by his words, that they seemed impatient of any thing to be said against it; but Julius rising up, after he had extolled the worth of the man, said, it was neither just, nor agreeable with the custom of the City, to hinder any one from speaking against the Law, especially such an one as asserted right, and opposed violence. He adjourned then the Comitia till the next day, when he commanded all to be present, who would speak any thing against it. The Patritians meeting at the Consul's house in the evening, resolved, if they could not with words, by deeds to hinder the passing of the Law, and betimes in the morning took up the Forum, spreading themselves all over to hinder the uniting of the Commons. The Comitia being full, those that spoke could not be heard, some encouraging, and others interrupting them with great clamours. The Consuls protested against this carriage, and that if any violence succeeded, the Commons were the procurers of it; and the Tribunes answered, that they had heard long such discourses as they were now making. The day being far spent, the People required the ballots; but then the young Patritians hindered them from uniting in their Tribes, and snatched away the pots and ballots, beating out of the Forum the Officers attending for the gathering of Suffrages. The Tribunes crying out, and casting themselves into the throng, they gave way to them, where ever they went, but hindered such as would have followed, and rendered their Office thereby unserviceable. At length the Patritians prevailed against the passing of the Law, by the means of three Families especially, viz. the Posthumii, Sempronii, and Clavii, most eminent for Nobility, Riches, and Clients, who, also, especially hindered the confirmation of the Agrarian by a Plebiscitum.

Tumults about the Law.

Directed by War.

93. The Tribunes consulting how to vindicate their cause, the most moderate opinion prevailed, that neither the Consuls, nor any other Patritians, save those of the three Families now mentioned, should be called to answer before the People; and not for their lives, but estates, for resisting the Tribunes in preferring the Law. The Patritians gave way to it, and having redeemed the estates, restored them to the owners. Afterwards, when the Tribunes again went about to prefer the Law, news came that the Enemy was on his march to Rome, as far as Tusculum, which place only stopped him, but could not long hold out. Levies now being to be made, according to a Decree of the Senate, the Tribunes endeavoured to hinder them, but another Decree being published, that the Patritians with their Clients, and such as voluntarily came in, would undertake the War; some for shame, some for plunder, and others to gratify the Nobility, gave their names; and amongst the rest Sicinius himself, whom followed a Cohort of eight hundred old Soldiers to do him honour, though excofrom warfare by the Laws. A strong Army being presently raised, the Enemies retired, and were followed by the Consuls to Antium, where the Armies lying incamped one against the other, the Æqui, confident of their strength, at length provoked the Romans to fight. Romulus having then the command, sent for Sticcius, as the story goes, and gave him order with his Cohort to go a certain way, and fall behind upon the Enemies Camp; intending either to disgrace him upon refusal, or destroy him by so impossible an undertaking. When Sticcius laboured to shew him that the thing could not be done, he upbraided him with his speeches used in the Comitia concerning his own exploits, and objected to him pretended valour. Hereat he undertook the matter, and giving all to understand his case, departed with his men all weeping, to the regret of the Army, who expected of these eight hundred to see no man return alive. Sticcius led them not the same way as the Consul thought, which being mountainous, would have brought certain destruction to them ascending, but another through a Wood, by which they came upon the Camp of the Æqui, where it was forsaken of the guard, now gone to behold the fight of the two Armies, before this time joyned. Falling in with a shout, the Æqui supposing the other Consul present, forsook the Camp and fled, after which Sticcius and his Cohort marched down towards the battle, whom the Enemy discovering on their back, and knowing their Camp to be taken, were also discouraged and fled: The Romans pursued them till night, and did great execution, but none so valiantly demeaned himself as Sticcius Dentatus.

94. Sticcius having lodged himself and his men in the Enemies Camp, the next day set it and all the stuff therein on fire, and with haste marched for Rome, on purpose to deprive the Consuls of the honour they expected. Coming into the Forum, he related to the Tribunes and People the whole passage, how he and his old men being destined to ruin, had obtained the Victory. Hereby he not only ingratiated himself with the People, but procured the displeasure of the Senate also against the Consuls, who were denied the honour of a Triumph. The Commons gratified Sticcius in the highest measure they could, making him one of their Tribunes for the following year, wherein Sp. Tarpeius, and A. Terentius (or Therminus rather as Gellius hath it) were Consuls. The first he did relating to his Office, was to set the former Consuls a day to answer before the People, for violating the power of the Tribuneship, and devising the destruction of him and his Souldiers: and so resolved was the whole College, that the judgment passed without interruption intended by the Patritians, and they were both condemned in a pecuniary mulct. The present Consuls were hereby rendered more inclinable towards the Commons; so that they procured a Decree of the Senate, and a Law passed in the Centuriate Comitia, that All Magistrates should have liberty to punish such as violated their authority, which was formerly the privilege of the Consuls only. But the mulct was not left to their discretion, provision being made, that it should not exceed the worth of two Oxen, or thirty Sheep; which Law was long observed by the Romans. After this, the Tribunes propounded to the Senate, that Laws might be made, which the Cite should use for ever. After a grave debate, the advice of Romulus the late condemned Consul prevailed, who contrary to the expectation of both parties spoke in behalf of the thing propounded. He said, he was for the interest of the Patritians as long as there was any hopes of its continuance, but finding things in such a condition, as it must necessarily decline, he thought it wisdom to comply with that necessity, and advised that Ambassadors might be sent to the Greek Cities in Italy, and to Athens, thence to fetch such Laws as were most excellent, and befitting the Commonwealth. After their return was to be propounded to the People the choice of Law-makers, what their power should be, for how long, and what other things should appertain to them. Sticcius extraordinarily affected with the mans ingenuity, said he was now friends with him, and remitted his fine; but he refused to forbear the payment of it, because already sacred to their gods. A Senatus Consultum being made, and confirmed by a Plébiscitum, Ambassadors were chosen to fetch Laws from the Greeks. These were Sp. Posthumius, Ser. Sulpicius, and A. Manlius, to whose use Gallies were assigned, and furnished at the publick charge, as was suitable with the Majesty of the Roman People.

sing the Office of principal Archon, the three hundredth year of the City being now ended (as Dionysius computeth, following the account of Cato) P. Horatius and Sext. Quintilius were Consuls. Now fell a greater plague than ever had been known, upon both City and Country, which swept away Quintilius the Consul, and Sp. Furius chosen in his place, with four Tribunes, and many Senators. The succeeding Consuls were L. Menenius and P. Sextius, who took care for Corn to supply the City, which laboured under a famine, by reason that the grounds lay untill the former year. In their year the Ambassadors returned out of Greece with Laws, presently after which the Ambassadors required, that according to the Senates Decree, law-makers might be appointed. The Consuls knowing not how to deny them, yet unwilling to weaken the interest of the Patritians, deferred the matter, saying, that the time of the Comitia was at hand, after which they would labour, jointly with the Consuls Elect, in the business. The Tribunes were content; but when the Comitia were past, wherein Appius Claudius, and T. Gentilius were chosen, they grew idle, and neglected the administration of affairs, as now belonging unto others; and Menenius was sickly, pining away, as was thought, by melancholy; of which Sextius took advantage, pretending he could do nothing by himself. The Tribunes then betook themselves to the Consuls Elect, and though they had not yet entered upon their Magistracy, importuned them to gratifie the Commons, by proposing great honours and rewards. Appius being elevated with the hope of a new kind of Magistracy, grew popular, and persuaded his Colleague to a compliance, so that Sextius was forced to call together the Senate, and propound concerning Laws.

96. Many things were spoken, as well by those that desired a new model, as others, who thought it sufficient to rest satisfied in the customs of their Country. But the opinion of the designed Consuls prevailed, which Appius the principal of the two delivered, being asked his advice, according to the custom, before any other Senators. Their sense was, that ten men out of the chief of the Senate were to be Elected, whose power continuing for a year should be the same with that of the Kings and Consuls, and all other Magistracies cease till they might be renewed according to Laws: in the mean time the ten men, or Decemviri, were to administer Justice to private men, and model the Commonwealth. When the day came wherein this Senatus Consultum was to be confirmed by the People, the designed Consuls resigned their Office, for which they were exceedingly admitted, and remembered in the choice. In the Centuriate Comitia were created App. Claudius and T. Gentilius, late Consuls Elect, P. Sextius Consul for that present year, the three Ambassadors who fetched Laws out of Greece, P. Posthumius, Ser. Sulpicius, A. Manlius, and one of the former year's Consuls T. Romulus, who had been condemned by Sticcius the Tribune, and afterwards was the author of this popular act: besides these, out of the Senate C. Julius, T. Veturius, and P. Horatius, all of Consular dignity. The Tribunes, Adiles, Quæstors, and all other Magistrates were for a time devoted of all power. Instead of Horatius, Livy mentioneth P. Curiatius.

SECT.

S E C T. II.

From the Creation of the Decemviri to the War of Priverna, which fell out the same year that Darius Codomanus died.

Containing the space of one hundred and twenty one Years.

The second change of Government when,

1. The second change in the Government (from Consuls to Ten Men, or Decemviri, as the first was from Kings to Consuls) hapned in the three hundred and second year of the City, according to the account of Cato, and the three hundred and third after the computation of Tarrutius and Varron, which fell in with the second and third years of the eighty second Olympiad, the fourteenth of the Reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus, four hundred and forty nine before the Era of Christ, A. M. 3554. and, as may be gathered both out of Dionysius and Livy, on the Ides of May.

The first of the Decemviri for the first year.

2. The Decemviri having taken upon them the Government, in reference to a new constitution, agreed that only one of them at one time should have the Fasces and other consular Ensigns. He assembled the Senate, confirmed the Decrees, and did other things agreeable with chief Magistracy. The rest (to lessen envy) differed little in habit from private men, having only an Acensulus, or sort of Beadle, going before them, which Livy addeth to the relation of Dionysius. They succeeded by turns, for a certain limited time, till the year went about. The present Possessor of the Fasces only saith Livy, but all of them as Dionysius seemeth to mean, judged private causes together with publick ones belonging to their Subjects, and associates. All things they managed with such Justice and moderation, that the Commonwealth seemed most happy under them having no need of appeal. Appius above the rest grew exceeding popular by his familiarity with the ordinary fort; so as in a manner he carried away the praise from the whole College, for he had a further design than any of the rest.

3. At length having made a model out of such Laws as were brought out of Greece, and their own Country's Customs, they proposed it to the view of all men in ten Tables, that any one might make exceptions; liberty being given to private persons to inform the Law-makers, who consulted much with the Nobility about the work. When all approved of them; a Senatus Consultum passed, nemine contradicente, for the ratifying of these Laws, and the question being put to the People in the Centuriate Comitia, they were confirmed most religiously in presence of the Pontifices, Augurs, and Priests. Then were they engraven in brass, saith Dionysius and others, in Ivory saith Pomponius the Lawyer, and proposed to the publick view in the most conspicuous part of the Forum, as Minos of old, according to Plato, and long after him Solon caused his Laws to be written in Tables by the Athenians called * Cybes and Axones. The year being almost out, the Decemviri moved the Senate about the Comitia. After a great debate it was resolved to continue this kind of Magistracy for the following year; because something seemed yet wanting to the new model, through the shortness of time allotted to the work; but especially for that by this Office the Tribuneship was suspended, of which the Patritians had cause to be most jealous. The Commons thought they had good reason to concur with the Fathers in this choice, and the day for holding the Comitia was appointed.

4. The most ancient and honourable of the Fathers stood for this Office, fearing that if turbulent spirits were possessed of it, they might have a great advantage against the State. Above all others was Appius extolled extolled to the Skies, the Commons labouring earnestly to retain him in his place, for that none had behaved himself better than he. He desired to be excused, pretending he had rather be discharged of so troublesome and ingratul work. At length overcome as it were by the intreaties of the people, he professed himself amongst the Candidates, and by accusing all others, as owing him ill will for his publick spirit, made way for himself and his friends: In the Centuriate Comitia he was made Decemvir the second time, and with him was joined Q. Fabius Vibulanus, who had been Consul three times, a man hitherto of unblameable carriage: out of the other Patritians by the procurement of Appius were created M. Cornelius, M. Servilius, L. Minucius, T. Antonius, and Manius Rabuleius, persons of no great Eminency, and out of the Commons Q. Perillius, Cato Duellius, and Sp. Oppius, whom he took in, the more to ingratiate himself with the rabble, saying, it was just that the Commons should share in that Magistracy, which was to govern and command all.

He and his Collegues laboured to establish themselves.

5. Appius, a man more popular than any Magistrate that ever governed, either King or Consul, with his nine Collegues, entered his Office on the Ides of May, which saith Dionysius hapned in the full Moon, according to the course whereof months at that time were observed. The first thing the Decemviri did, was mutually to agree and confirm by Oath to be of one mind, not to hold the Assemblies, but perpetually to retain the power in their own hands: to admit none into their number, and to be of equal power and authority amongst themselves: to make sale of Senatus Consultum's, and Placitum's, but rarely, and never except in case of necessity, after most things by virtue of their own power. On the first day (which to the Romans was ever Festival and Religious) after their superstitious Ceremonies were over, they all appeared with regal Ensigns, which exceedingly terrified the People, especially the Axes added again to the Rods, which Poplicolas had laid aside, and none of his Successors the Consuls used in the City. By this fear they sought to procure themselves security, each of them getting about him a company of stout young men, such as were most addicted to him.

6. Some preferring their private commodity before the publick good flattered them, and even amongst the Patritians themselves those were not wanting, who though Eminent both for Birth and Estate patiently bore the oppression of their Country. The Decemviri indulging their pleasures, exercised now their authority with all licentiousness, nothing valuing the Roman Senate and people. Being both Legislators and Judges, many Citizens they unjustly put to death, and deprived others of their Estates, whose causes were all formally judged, that they might have some shew, and pretence of Justice, accusers being suborned out of their Dependents, each one affording all assistance herein to his Collegue. Such private persons as in their lutes feared their cause were constrained to joy in themselves to the party of their Judges; so as it came to pass in a short time that most of the Citizens were also corrupted. Such as were offended with the extravagancy of the ten retired themselves, expecting the Comitia for the Creation of new Magistrates.

They add two Tables of Laws to the ten.

7. The Decemviri added two Tables of Laws to the ten that were made the year before. Amongst these new Laws there was one which forbade marriage betwixt the Patritians and Placians, for no other cause as Dionysius conjectureth, than left the families being joyned together, concord should ensue betwixt the two orders. These Laws thus by accident, saith (a) Pomponius, came to be called the Laws of the twelve Tables, being written by the Decemviri, through the perversion of one Hermodorus an Ephebian, as some reported, then banished into Italy, concerning which person (b) Cicero and others are to be consulted. These Laws being established, it followed, that disputations and controversies of the Court should be necessary, for as much as an interpretation was to be built upon the authority of the Learned. This disputation, or this unwritten Law, framed by the Learned, was not called by any peculiar name, as all other parts, but by the common one of Fus Civile, or Civil Law only. Besides, out of these Laws, at the same time almost, were composed certain cases, wherein men contended one with another, which cases, left the People should make them at their pleasure, were to be certain and solemn; and this part of Law was called Actiones Foris; or Cases at Law. Thus almost at the same time these three sorts of Laws arose, viz. the Laws of the twelve Tables; from these flowed the Civil Law: and from the same were were composed Cæses at Law. But the knowledge of expounding all these, and the Cæses themselves, were kept by the College of Pontifices, who appointed yearly those that judged Private Persons; which custom the People used almost one hundred years. Afterward, when Appius Claudius had propounded, and reduced these Cæses into form, (c) Gnaeus Flavius his Scribe, and the son of a Libertine (or of one whose father was once a Slave) stole the Book, and gave it to the People, which accepted so thankfully of the gift, that he was made Tribune of the Commons, a Senator, and Ædilis curulis. This Book was called Fus Civile Flavianum, as the other Fus Civile Papirianum. Yet Flavius added nothing of his own to the Book. The City increasing, and there being as yet wanting certain sorts of Cæses, not long after Sextus Ælius composed other Cæses, and gave a Book to the People called Fus Ælianum.

Now the parts
by degrees.

8. There being now in the City, the Lex, or Law of the twelve Tables, the Fus Civile, or Civil Law, and the Cæses of Law, it came to pass, that the Commons disagreeing with and separating from the Patritians, appointed Laws of their own making, called Plebiscites. After their return there being a great controversy about these, it was thought good to receive them also for Laws, and so it was enacted by a Law preferred by * Hortensius the Dictator; so though there was a difference in the form of making a Law (called Lex) and a Plebiscitum, yet the authority was the same. Then for that it was difficult for the People to meet, because of its multitudes, necessity it self devolved the care of the Commonwealth upon the Senate. So the Senate began to interpose, and whatsoever it resolved was observed; and that Law was called Senatus Consultum. At the same time the Magistrates also administered Justice, and that the People might know what they would determine concerning any thing, and to fore-arm themselves, they published Edicts, which Edicts of the Prætors constituted the Fus Honorarium, so named from the honour and authority of the Prætor. Lastly, as the courts of affairs reduced the making of Laws to fewer fashions, at length it came to pass through several Factions, (viz. of Sylla, Marius, Pompey, and Cæsar) that there was necessity of the Commonwealth's being governed by a single person. For the Senate not being able to govern all the Provinces, a Prince was ordained, and what he appointed was taken for Law. So that in the Commonwealth of Rome, all Law was either constituted by a Law called Lex, as that of the twelve Tables; or properly called Fus Civile, which being unwritten, consisted in the interpretation of the Learned; or Cæses of Law, which contained the form of Pleas; or a Plebiscitum made without the authority of the Fathers; or the Edict of a Magistrate, called Fus Honorarium; or a Senatus Consultum, which without a Law (Lex) was ordained by the sole authority of the Senate; or Præceptis consuetudo, which the Prince himself enacted.

9. These things are written by Pomponius in this narrative of the Original of Law, for the better understanding whereof, it is to be noted, that the word Fus signifieth all Law or Right in general, and is that Genus whereof Lex is but a Species, being defined by (a) Justinian the Emperour to be that which the People of Rome upon the question put by a Senatorian Magistrate (for example a Consul) did enact. As for the twelve Tables, they were furnished with Laws, partly borrowed from the Græcians, partly added at the discretion of the Lawmakers, and partly the same as formerly were in use. Of the first sort were such especially as concerned private interests. Of the second was that which forbade marriage betwixt the Nobility and Commons. And of the third, that Law which from Dionysius we formerly mentioned to have been made by Romulus, giving power to a man to call together his Wives Kindred, and judge her for drinking Wine, or dishonesty: this is attested to have been taken into the twelve Tables by (b) Pliny, and (c) Gellius also hinteth as much. From (d) Aulus Gellius is observed, that these twelve Tables were divided into three parts, whereof the first contained what belonged to the Religion of the Romans, the second what concerned the publick, and the third the rights of private men. Great are the commendations on which many give of them, but the most Eminent is Cicero's Encomium, that we name no more. Disputing under the name of Cicero, in (e) one place he thus speaketh: If diversity of Studies please any, in the twelve Tables there is a great Image of antiquity: because the ancient use of words is known, and certain kind of action we declare the Life and Custom of our Ancestors. If any look at Policy, the twelve Tables are full of it: all in the twelve tables, which describe all the interests and parts of the State.

or if any one be taken with this glorious Philosophy, I will speak more boldly, these are the fountains of all his disputes contained in the Civil Law (Jure Civili) and Laws (Legibus). Though all be displeased, I will speak what I think: that little Book of the twelve Tables alone, in my opinion excelleth the Libraries of all the Philosophers (if one view the Fountains and heads of Laws) both in weight of authority and copiousness of advantage. In another (f) place he writeth, that when he was a boy, they were wont to learn the twelve Tables as some necessary Poem. Lastly, a Collection of the fragments of these Tables out of approved Authors (such especially as conduce to the explication of the Institutions, and of Ancient Law with deep Antiquities) hath been made by J. Crispinus, to which the Reader is referred.

power.

10. But (to return) the Decemviri at the usual time of the Comitia bidding farewell to the Customs of their Country, and the new Laws, neither regarding the approbation of Senate nor People, continued themselves in power for the year following, which was the third of the Decemvirate, the first of the eighty third Olympiad, according to Dionysius, wherein Criso of Himeræ was Vicior, Philiscus being Archon at Athens. They ordered the matter shortly, as even all the considerable part of the Citizens, (Patritians and others) they either killed, or forced to quit the City. This pleased them well enough, but the Sabines and Ægyni thinking it a fit time to attempt some great matter against Rome, invaded the Territories thereof, and of the Latines. The Decemviri much troubled hereat, after a consultation how to make resistance several ways, found themselves constrained to assemble the Senate, wherein Appius with a premeditated Oration propounded the matter of the War. L. Valerius Potitius, the Son of him that besieged the Capitol, and Grandson of Poplicola, first arose, and though he was commanded by Appius to forbear, flew high against the tyranny of the present Usurpers. He being forced to silence, was seconded by Marcus Hortensius Barbatius, great Grandson of the Colleague of Poplicola, who having expressed great indignation, the Decemviri incited with his biting words, threatened to cast him down headlong from the Rock. All the Senators at this cried out as at a breach of their privilege, and made a tumult, whereat the Ten repented of what they had said, and excused themselves, saying, they deprived none of the liberty of speaking to the matter in hand, but interrupted Seditious Orations, which they might do by their power of Consuls and Tribunes received from the People, not for a year only, nor any limited time, but till the work of Laws should be finished, until which time they were resolved to act, and then give an account of their administration. Appius having delivered this in the name of all, asked the opinion of C. Claudius his Uncle.

Senate.

11. Claudius beginning his Oration with the occasion of their meeting, fully shewed what was the occasion of it. The War he demonstrated to be begun by no other inducements than what the present distempers of the State afforded, which were bred by the arbitrary and tyrannical carriage of his Nephew, and his nine Companions. He made out what these distempers were, and by virtue of his relation to Appius, took upon him, after a sharp reproof, by the nearness of their blood, their Ancestors, and the Decemvir's Father with all that was dear ad religious to them both, to conjure him, that putting a stop to his ambitious course (destructive to himself as well as the publick) he would resign his usurped power, and restore the Commonwealth to its former government and liberty. Appius answered him not a word, which so moved him, that with tears he signified he would depart to Rhegium, the seat of his Forefathers, and there continue till that fell upon the Decemvirate, which he guessed would happen in a short time; for as much as he could not endure to behold his Nephew degenerate so much from the ancient worth of his Family. As concerning the War, he advised the Fathers to resolve nothing, till the accustomed Magistrates were first created. The graver and more eminent sort of Senators that spake after, were all of this opinion, which made the Ten resolve to ask none now according to their age, as the Custom was, but M. Cornelius called upon his Brother Lucius to deliver his opinion. He attributed all that had been said against the Decemviri to envy, saying, it was because the speakers themselves could not compass the Office, and laboured to shew, that it was most foolish Counsel to resolve upon new elections, which would require time, and defer the War that threatened ruine and desolation. By pressing the danger very close, and urging what necessity there was of committing the War to the management of the Decemviri, he drew almost all the younger fort to his party, there being many even in the Senate from whom fear wrested compliance. After all these, the Decemviri gave Valerius leave to speak, whom first of all they had interrupted. He professed he was of Claudius his judgment as to the whole, and answered all the reasons of Cornelius by one proposal; that a Dictator might be instantly named, shewing, that if they missed of this opportunity, they could not expect again to be assembled by the Decemviri.

12. Few that delivered their opinions after him remained unconvinced, and many were changed from the sense they had before delivered. He required then of the Ten, that the matter might be further considered of, and all might have liberty to recall their votes, which caused a great contest betwixt him and Cornelius, who desiring that the Decemviri might have the command in the War, cried out, that the thing was already decided in a legal manner, and desired the parties might be counted. Much heat being shewed by both, the Fathers were also divided, which advantage the Ten took to do what they pleased. Appius then formally declaring for what cause they had been assembled, told them they were divided according to the three several opinions of Claudius, Cornelius, and Valerius, every one having had liberty to speak his mind freely: and seeing that most had approved of what Cornelius had propounded, he declared his party to have overcome. Then commanded he the Clerk to draw up a Senatus-Consultum, whereby power of raising Forces, and commanding them, was given to the Decemviri, and therewith the Senate was dismissed. They were by this kind of Victory rendered more confident, and imperious, as having now in their own thoughts established themselves, by having an Army at their command, which Valerius had advised the Fathers earnestly to beware of. Horatius and Valerius made provision for their own defence, by gathering together their Clients and dependants, and Claudius, as he had said, departed into the Country of the Sabines; whose example multitudes following, left their native seat, with their Wives and Children going into voluntary exile. The Decemviri troubled hereat, endeavoured at first to hinder them by shutting the Gates, but again fearing they might out of fury attempt some dangerous thing, they let them depart, but seized on such goods as they left behind, having accused them of defection. These things being added to the former misfortunes, incensed much more both Patritians and Plebeians against them. Yet had they proceeded no further in such like outrages, they might probably for a much more longer time have secured their power, through that influence which the mutual emulation of these orders afforded. For the Plebeians were glad to see the high spirits of the Patritians dejected, and the Senate void of all power: on the other side, the Nobility rejoiced that the Commons had lost their former liberty, having not the least help, because the Tribunitial power was taken away. But they neither using moderation in War, nor temperance at home, constrained all to unite for their destruction, which followed certain heinous offences committed against the Commons.

13. They divided their Army into three parts, whereof one remained with Appius and Oppius in the City, the two other their Collegues led forth against the Sabines and Aequi. The latter forced the Romans to forsake their Camp, and shamefully to fly, which caused great rejoicing in Rome amongst the Enemies of the Decemviri, so that Appius fearing some attempt, wrote to his Collegues in the Army, by one means or other to destroy their known adversaries, which was effected upon diverse. But at Rome, Sicius Dentatus, the Roman Achilles as he was named, amongst others spake much against the Captains as Cowards, and unskilful, which Appius understanding, with good words persuaded him to go as Lieutenant or Legatus to the Army then lying at Crustumeria against the Sabines. He not suspecting what was designed, undertook the employment, for that the Office of Legatus was most sacred and honourable amongst the Romans, having the authority and power of a General, and the inviolableness and veneration of a Priest. When he came to the Camp he was sent out with one hundred men upon service, who had order to kill him. He fought with them all, slew fifteen, and wounded twice as many, so that finding it too difficult a task to kill him by hand-strokes, they threw Darts and Stones at him, and thereby at length, and at a distance, performed what was enjoined them. Though the murderers according to agreement gave out he fell by the Enemy's hand, yet the Soldiers fetching him off to give him honourable burial, by several circumstances plainly perceived the truth, and demanding Justice against the instruments, when that was put off, and they concealed, they easily understood who were the principal cause, and thought of nothing more than how to revolt.

14. The Army lying at Crustumeria and Fidene being thus incensed against the Decemviri, another wicked act of Appius caused the other which lay incumbent at Agidium against the Aequi, not only to think of, but fully to effect a revolt. There was one L. Virginius a Plebeian, who had a Daughter the most Beautiful of all Roman Women. The Maid being but young and at School near the Forum, Appius as he passed that way fell in Love with her in such a measure as by no means could he allay his brutish passion. Marry he could not, being a Plebeian, neither could he hope to obtain her for his Concubine: there remained then no other way for him to enjoy her, than by procuring M. Claudius one of his Clients to challenge her as his Slave, so that the matter being brought before him to judgment, he might judge her so to be. Claudius laid his claim, by affirming she was the true and natural Daughter of his Slave, and that the Wife of Virginius, now dead, her self being Barren, procured the Child, and brought it up for her own; which though he and others knew well enough; yet being young, he had not opportunity till now to right himself. The presence was so impudent, as raised the indignation of all persons no otherwise concerned than as in the publick liberty. Numitor the Maid's Uncle by her mother, and Julius the Son of Julius one of the first Tribunes of the Commons; to whom she was already contracted, sufficiently evidenced the truth; but Appius being bent upon his lustful design, would hear no reason, and had not a tumult hapned out of the indignation of the multitude, would have given her up in the hands of Claudius, till such time as her Father could be sent for from the Army to defend her cause. Being hardly drawn to put off the matter till the next day, and not giving any more time, wrote to Agidium to hinder Virginius from coming, bidding Antonius Commander of that Legion to confine him, lest he should hear any thing of his Daughter. But Numitor, and the brother of Julius, prevented the Letters, and Virginius pretending the death of a near Relation, getting leave to depart, through by-ways returned to the City, fearing a pursuit after the arrival of the Letters, which accordingly hapned, but he thus evaded it.

15. Virginius then was present in the morning to the great astonishment of Appius, when his Daughter was commanded to be brought forth. He proved the Maid to be his own Daughter, and no suppositious Brood: but Appius, a man of no great natural abilities, besides the brutish, corrupted by the greatness of his power, and inflamed with the excess of his passion, neither considered the defence of Virginius, nor was moved by the bitter tears of the Virgin, being angry at the pity of the standers by, who apprehended the case of Father and Daughter no otherwise than as their own, as if he himself were more to be pitied, enduring more for her beauties fake than she herself. Interrupting those that spake in her behalf, and commanding them silence, he told them, that this was not the first time he had had knowledge of this matter, for that Claudius his Father being a Client to their Family had committed him yet a Boy, when he died, to his protection. In the time of his Guardianship he said it had been cleared to him how Numitoria had procured the Girl of Claudius his Slave, but he thought it more convenient to let the matter rest till Claudius was grown up, either to take, or sell her as he should like best. Since he came into employment he had not meddled with his Clients affairs, but he himself it seemeth making an inventory of his goods, and having notice of this Slave, now challenged his right, and accordingly he both witnessed, and judged him to be the right Lord and owner of her. Great our cries and lamentation being made, as well by the by-standers as the Virgin's relations, Appius commanded all to depart, and gave order to Claudius to take possession of his Slave. Virginius, seeing there was no way but to yield to the Tyrant's lust if his Daughter lived, desired he might speak with her a little aside, as to take his farewell, which being granted, he drew her, hanging upon him, and pitifully bewailing her condition, towards a Butchers stall, whose knife taking into his hands, he said, Daughter, I will send thee to our Ancestors; both free, and of honest repute; for the Tyrant will not suffer thee to be either here; and therewith he stabbed, and dispatched her.

16. With the bloody Knife in his hand he ran through the City, calling the People to their liberty, and coming to the Gate, rode Post to the Army; a company

Sect. 2.

The third great change of Government to the Tribune Militum.

the eighty fourth Olympiad, as Dionysius computeth. Diphilus being then Archon at Athens; but as others, in the first year of that Olympiad, which fell in with the three hundred and tenth year of the City, and the twenty first of Atracæxæ Longimannus, M. Genutius and C. Quintus according to him, but L. Papyrius and L. Sempronius according to them, being Consuls. These new Magistrates called Tribuni Militum, were A. Sempronius Atratinus, L. Atilius Longus, and T. Cl. Atilius. Livius lib. 21. Thus at first they were but three in number, afterward it arose to six, and at length to eight. Pomponius the Lawyer writeth, that sometimes there were twenty, and sometimes more, which seemeth incredible, no other Author agreeing with him herein, so that Endans lib. 2. ff. 4. with reason thinketh the place to be corrupted from Seni to Plebei. This number of Collegues, together with the mixture of Plebeians who afterwards pressed in, procured, that although they had both the power and ensigns of Consuls, yet their privilege and dignity seemed unlike, whence a Tribune in way of contempt called them a Proconsular Image, and P. Manlius the Dictator, shewing that a Master of horse-men was inferior to a Consul, compareth his power to that of theirs. Having been for some years created, and for others laid aside, at length in the three hundred and eighty eighth year of the City, they were quite cast off at what time Q. Sextius a Plebeian was admitted to the Consulship. But these first Tribunes having held their Office seventy three days, then were constrained to lay it down, for that the Augures found some flaw in their election, and the Government returned into its former course, the Senate naming T. Quintus Barbatus, who in the Comitia created L. Papyrius Mugillanus, and L. Sempronius Atratinus, although it be doubtful, to say truth, whether there were Tribunes only, or Tribunes and Consuls both for this year.

Another change after 73 days to Consuls again.

Consuls.

21. But to be sure, for the year following the People having it in their power whether to elect Tribunes or Consuls, relolved upon the later, and created in December, the Moon being then full, M. Geganius Macerinus the second time, and T. Quintus Capitolinus the fifth. This year were the Censors made, Officers who being but contemptible at the beginning, rose to great dignity and power. Their original and power might have been more clearly discovered, but that Dionysius his History is here in the beginning of this story broken off, the remaining part being lost, to the great damage of the studious in Antiquity. For not to speak of his smooth style, and the Attick purity thereof, he hath therein delivered the Antiquities of Rome from their first Original, with such diligence, that he seemeth in this respect to have excelled all Writers, both Greek and Roman. For what Latin Authors have neglected, as vulgarly known amongst themselves, as Sacrifices, Games, Triumphs, Ensigns of Magistrates, the universal discipline of the Roman Commonwealth, the Census, Aspicia, Comitia, that difficult distribution of the whole People into Curie, Classes, Centuries, and Tribes: further, the authority of the Senate, and Commons, with the power of Magistrates, he of all others hath delivered most accurately. That these things may be better understood, he compareth them with the Customs of Greece, as where he speaketh of Clients, he occasionally maketh mention of this relation amongst the Athenians and Thessalians, as Cæsar also writeth it to have been ordinary amongst the Galls. He compareth the Roman Dictator with the Harmotes of the Lacedæmonians, the Archons of the Thessalians, and the Æphorætes of the Mityleneans. The Laws of Romulus, Numa, and Servius, had perished but for him, as also the knowledge of the Original of Rome in a great measure: and fo choice are all his Collections, that they tend, as to the instruction of the Reader in the depth of State Mysteries, fo also to his acquiring or retaining a religious awe of Providence. Such is his History (saith * one well able to judge) that if it had been kept intire (for it consisteth of twenty Books, as Photius informeth us) there would have been no cause of bewailing the loss of Varro's treasures, with whom he was very familiar, as well as Pompey the Great and Tubero; and from whom he seemeth to have derived his choicest Antiquities. These things render a sufficient account, why he is made use of in the History of Roman matters, rather than any other.

In commendation.

22. Servius Tullius the sixth King of Rome first instituted the Census, as was then before, and did the work himself, without any peculiar Officer, as also did the Consuls until this time. But now in the sixty sixth year from the banishment of Tarquinius, and the three hundred and eleventh of the City, there having been no Census for seventeen years, for that the Consuls were necessarily diverted from that work by more more urgent business, the Senate procured out of their own order two peculiar Officers to be created, who were called Censors, because according to their Census or estimation the People was ceased, saith Varro, or because every one accounted himself worth so much, quanti illi censuissent, as they judged, or estimated, according to Festus.

The duration of the Office of Censors.

23. At the beginning they were created for five years, because according to Servius his constitution the People were to be ceased at ever Lustrum, which contained so many. But their dignity and power fo increasing, that they seemed of too long a continuance, nine years after, in the three hundred and twentieth of the City, by a Law which Amernus Æmilius the Dictator preferred, the duration of their Office was confined within the term of one year and an half. Though their Office at first was only to take an estimate of mens Estates, and describing all publick and private riches, to distribute the People according to their wealth into Classes and Centuries; yet within a while they came to have inspection into manners also. For they upon misdemeanour put out of the Senate, took away publick Horses, and cast out of the Tribes. The former kind of punishment was inflicted upon Senators, the second upon Equestes, and the last upon meer Plebeians. Their removing Senators, was by passing them by at the new election. For, such Senators saith Festus, as were passed by in former times, were liable to no disgrace, because as the Kings chose and substituted whom they pleased, so after them the Consuls and Tribunes Military, such as they had greatest interest in; first Patritians, and then after Plebeians, fill by the Tribunitial Law of Ovinus, it was ordained, that the Censors out of every order or rank, should (curiatim) elect the most worthy into the Senate, whence it came to pass, that such as were passed by or removed, were noted with ignominy. This note out of Festus hinteth to us the ancient power of the Roman Kings in making Senators, one of the greatest supporters of the Throne of their Empire.

Their power.

24. As for the disgrace which they put upon Equestes; It was the custom for every Equestes at the publick Census to appear before the Censors with their Horses in their hands. If they approved of them, they bade them pass by and lead away the Horse; if they determined otherwise, they took away the Horse, and commanded him to be sold. The third note of disgrace concerned the Plebeians, whom they either removed from their own Tribe into another less honourable, according to Livy, or made them Æbrarii, and registered them in the Tables of the Cerites, whereby they were deprived of their Centurie, and remained Citizens only in this respect, ut pro capitibus suis tributum nomine ara solverent, as writeth Alconius Pedianus upon the Oration of Cicero against Q. Cæcilius, called Dravinatio, which disparteth who ought to be admitted the Acculer of Verres. Gellius telleth us what was meant by the Tabula Ceritum. The Cerites (inhabitants of Cære in Tuscany, once called Ægylis) we understand to have been first of all made Municipals, without any right of Suffrage: and it was granted them that they might receive the honour of being free of Rome, without any trouble or burthen, for that they received the Sacra (or Idols) of the Romans, and preserved them in the Gallick War; that is, when Rome was taken by the Galls, as Livy hath the story also in his fourth Book. Hence were those called Tabula Ceritum, vice versa, wherein the Censors caused such to be registered as they deprived of the right of Suffrage. Although these several sorts of punishment respected the several ranks of men, yet sometimes those of higher degree tasted of all or most of them, so that Senators might not only be passed by, and Equestes deprived of their Horses, but lose their Tribes also, and be reduced to the condition of Æbrarii.

The effects of it.

25. This Office being committed to the prudent management of able persons, became effectual to the repression of such vice, as fell not under the particular cognifiance of penal Laws. Private faults, and domestic miscarriages were by them noted, with such actions sometimes as now would not simply incur the censure of precise illegality or indecency. Some of their questions upon Oath were such as these: (1) Hast thou a Wife according to thy mind? to which one once making a jesting answer, was made an Æbrarius. A certain man yawning before the Censors, had been punished in that sort, but that he swore he did it unwillingly, being troubled with that disease which the Romans called Ofcedo. P. Scipio Nasica and M. Pomponius being Censors, and finding a certain Knight very fat and comely, whose horse was exceeding lean and ill favoured, they asked him the reason of that difference, to which he answered: Because

SECT. 2. Because he looked to himself, but Statius to his horse; for which irreverent answer he was registred amongst the Ararii according to the custom. Now Statius was a servile name, given by the antients to most Slaves, whence Cælius the famous Writer of Tragedies was called Statius, though it was afterwards as it were turned into a surname, and he called Cælius Statius. They were wont also to take away horses from very big and corpulent men, as unfit for service, but (b) Gellius observeth, that this was no punishment, as some thought, but a taking away of the employment without ignominy. This Censur was managed in the Campus Martius, and it being compleated, the Lustrum was made, with prayers for the publick safety, and a sacrifice of the Suovetaurilia formerly mentioned. Besides these employments, the Censors (c) let to farm the customs, and sent (d) out their confittutions throughout the Provinces, called Leges Censorie. They erected (e) publick buildings, made other publick works, and took care for their repair, as also of the high-ways, in, and about the City more early; and in other places afterwards: they also provided for the expence of publick sacrifices. But not only were there Censors at Rome (as the Gracians also used the Censur) but the Colonies also had their Subcensors, who gave account to the other, what numbers of men, and what wealth they found in the several places, which upon information was registred in the publick Tables.

26. The power of the Censorship remained untouched (although the power of the Censors was weakened by restraining their time to a year and a half, though they were named every fifth year) until the Tribuneship of P. Clodius, who by a Law which he preferred (a) forbade any Senator to be passed by, or any of the other Ranks to be noted with ignominy, except lawfully accused, and condemned by sentence of both the Censors. He took an advantage (as it seemeth from (b) Pedianus) at the hatred which had possessed the multitude against the severity of the Office, which procured it to be intermitted for certain years. But afterwards (whether by reason of the corruption that was crept amongst Judges, or for other reasons) Metellus Scipio the Consul procured Clodius his Law to be abrogated, and so the ancient Vigour of this office returned. Lippus writeth, that under the Emperours it was diminished, and lay for dead till the time of Decius. But C. Cæsar the Dictator, that he might better execute the Censur, went to every ones house; and because the principal part of the Office consisted in forming of manners, he called himself Magister Morum, not Censor. Then the form of the State being changed after the victory of Actium, Augustus having the care of manners committed to him by the Senate, looked to nothing more diligently than the Censur, for thrice he performed it, not only in reverence to Roman Citizens, but all Subjects of the Empire, with such care and diligence as none ever before him. Under Tiberius and Caligula the Censur was not observed; but under Claudius the seventy fourth Lustrum was celebrated. Being intermitted during the reign of Nero, Vespasian renewed it, and celebrated the seventy fifth Censur. Domitian named himself amongst his other titles Perpetual Censor, but made no Lustrum, so that for an hundred and sixty years the Censur was intermitted till Decius the Emp. created Valerian Censor with unlimited power. After this the Censorship was utterly omitted to the great detriment of the Roman Empire, which being at length broken into Eastern and Western, the Emperours of the former (Greekish Emperours) made use of it, as others also of later times, and it appeareth that in the intermission thereof, in the days of Trajan, particular Provinces and Towns had their Censors, who made choice of their Senators. Lastly, the Censors during the popular Government were of Consular dignity, ever after the second Punic War, though it was otherwise sometimes before. The same persons were never created twice. And in case one of them died in his Office, his Colleague continued not therein, neither was any put into the place of the dead, because in that year wherein Rome was taken by the Gauls it had so happened; whereupon it was counted ominous, and a Law made against it for the time to come. Their dignity was exceeding great, they being therein though not in power above the Consuls, and having all other Ensigns the same with them except Æ-

27. The Fathers rejoiced they had got these Officers Created out of their own body, and the Tribunes counting that power inconsiderable, which at first was pretended to, gave way unto it. But the commons egged on by the continual complaints of the later, proceeded in their grudge against the Patricians, taking it in ill part that marriage was forbidden berwixt the two orders, and breathing after no less than equal power in the State. This animated Sp. Maelius, a rich Knight, by his large bounty towards the poorer sort in time of a great dearth, to hunt after popularity, and through it to aspire to the Sovereignty. He was hereof accused by L. Minucius, to whom the care of provisions was committed, and the Senate affrighted with the strangeness of the matter, by the advice of T. Quinctius the Consul, commanded a Dictator to be named. Quinctius Cincinnatus now eighty years old was the man, who chose C. Servilius Ahala, for his Master of horse-men. The Dictator summoning Maelius to appear, when he would not obey, Ahala killed him in the Forum, and was justified for so doing by Quinctius, who commanded his goods to be sold, and his house razed. It should seem from Livy that Ahala escaped without punishment: But Cicero and Valerius on the contrary affirm, that he was banished by the incensed multitude. This hapned in the three hundred and fiftieth year of the City after Varro's account. Valerius and Livy say, that the Area of his house for a memorial of his punishment had the name of Æqui-Mælium.

28. The Tribunes enraged about the death of Maelius, procured for the year following Tribunes Military with Consular Power to be created now six years after their Institution, hoping that into the number of six some Plebeian might creep, which thing would give them an opportunity to revenge the death of Maelius: But three only were created, and their expectation unanswered thereby. This year Fidenæ, a Roman Colony, gave up it self to Tolumnius King of the Veientes, and by his Infatigation murdered the Ambassadors sent thither. For this War Mimerus Æmilinus was named Dictator, who overcame the E-nemies in battle, wherein Cornelius Cossus a Tribune in the Army, slew, and spoiled Tolumnius, thereby obtaining Opima Spolia. Varro thought they were called Opima ab opibus for their riches; but Plutarch thinketh rather ab opere, because the consecration of them was granted to a Captain, who with his own hand slew the General of the Enemy. They were consecrated to Jupiter Feretrius, so called, because the Trophy was carried in a Feretrum, or certain little carriage, as some thought, at that time there being many Greek words in use with the Latines, or a Feriendo, from Jupiter his limiting with Thunder-bolts, or else from the blows given in battle. This honour of carrying in Triumph the Opima Spolia hath only thrice hapned to Roman Captains since Plutarch until our time. First to Romulus, who slew Acon King of Cambræ; Secondly to Cornelius Cossus, who killed Tolumnius, (the Etruscan in one place he calleth him, and the Tyrrhenian in another) and thirdly to M. Marcellus, who so killed and spoiled Britomartus (in one place, but Viridamarus in another) King of the Galls. A controverisie there was of old, whether any but a General from a General could take Opima Spolia, which maketh Livy Apologize for what he writeth in honour of Cossus; but Varro wrote, as (*) Festus witnesseth, that a Manipular Soldier might rightly be said to take them, so it were from a General of the Enemy.

29. Two years after this, Fidenæ was taken by another Dictator, A. Servilius, through the working of a Mine. But when the Consuls had kept the power four years, they were forced to give way to the Tribunes Military, for the Creation whereof, though the Tribuni Plebis prevailed, yet the Chief of the Commons missing all this while of being joined with the Nobility in the honour, were much offended. At the end of two years the Senate took occasion from the War wherewith the Æqui and Volsci threatened Rome, to bring in Consuls, which also gave way to Dictator, A. Posthumus Tiberus, against their wills, through the power of the Tribunes. He finishing the War successfully, laid down his Office. And in this year wherein T. Quinctius Cincinnatus the son of Lucius, and Cn. Fulvius Menio, were Consuls, Livy by a gross mistake would have the Carthaginians to have passed over into Sicily the first time, by an occasion of the disagreement of the Islanders amongst themselves. After five years the Commons prevailed to have Tribunes Military created the fifth time, four in number, who shewed how unprofitable the equal command of many in an Army is, and gave occasion to the making of a new Dictator. For, Fidenæ having now again revolted, and joined with the Veientes, three of those Tribunes were sent against it and them, and the fourth left to Govern the City. When they came to engage with the Enemy, One cried Fight, but another said Stay, and each one being of a several mind, matters were at length brought to that pass, that the Roman Army fled. with great amazement at the report, and was in an uproar, which caused Manner-culus the third time to be named Dictator, though the Censors had removed him from his Tribe, for that in his second Office (to which he was called, because of the stir made by the Hetruscans upon the taking of Fidena) he confined their Office to the term of one year and an half. Emilius being named Dictator, appointed for his Master of Horse *Men A. 30. By the prudence and valour of these two Fidenæ was retaken, and sacked after the Hetruscans were overthrown; and the Dictator returning to Rome in Triumph, laid down his Office when he had held it seventeen days. For three years the Tribunes Military continued, at the end whereof the Senate took occasion at the War which threatened from the Volsci, and at their absence, to bring in the Consuls again, notwithstanding the Tribunes of the Commons opposed it. But C. Sempronius, one of these Consuls, managing this War very carefully, the Tribunes thence took advantage, and the Tribunes Military again resumed the Chief Power. This was for one year, at the end whereof the Senate again procured Consuls to be made. When this year was expired, there was so great contention about two Questors, which the Commons would have created out of their body, that the State fell into an Interregnum. L. Papirius Mugillanus being Interrex for a Compromise procured the Tribunes Military to be again admitted, and four Questors for the following year to be created, either out of Patricians or Plebeians, as the People should think fit in their Comitia; but this satisfied not the Tribunes, nor the better sort of Plebeians, nor one of this order being preferred (though some stood) either as Tribune Military or Questor. In the second year after this, the Slaves conspired to set fire on the City, and seize upon the Capitol; but the plot was timely discovered. The Tribunes Military held the Government for seven years, and then another Interregnum because of the Contention following, Fabius Vibulanus the Interrex brought in Consuls again.

31. The Tribuni Plebei according to their custom made a bad construction hereof, and having now then mentioned the division of publick grounds, pressed it earnestly with an extent now to all that at any time had been gotten by War. The Patricians no less vigorously opposed it, and the Tribunes hindered the Levies of Soldiers, for that with much ado, and upon extrem necessity only could the Consuls procure any to oppose the Æqui and Volsci, who now made incursions. In the fifth year the Commons being crossed in their intentions by the Senate, of refusing the Tribunes Military, created three of the Questors of their own rank, and the chief amongst them desirous to be created Tribune Military for the next year, stickled hard for that kind of Government. The Senate at length was constrained to yield; else no opposition could be made against the former Enemies, who now again made inroads into the Roman Territories, and by confederacies exceedingly strengthened themselves. For this cause also, though much against the mind of the Tribunes, a Dictator was named, who overthrowing the Enemy in one battle, wasted his Country and returned. In the third year after this, the two orders were something reconciled, by the Plunder of a Town taken from the Volsci, and especially by a Decree of the Senate for the publick pay of the Armies (with brass money) before which time every one bore his own charges in the War. But such was the contentious disposition of the Tribunes, those grand incendiaries, that they drew this into Odium, as grievous to such who had formerly maintained themselves in the Wars, and now were to pay others. They effected, that for a time the pay was denied, and after three years they procured a Plebeian (P. Licinius Calvus) to be chosen amongst the Tribunes Military, wherein they mightily applauded themselves, and readily permitted the pay of the Army to be gathered. Licinius carried himself so well in the Office, that for the year following all the Tribunes Military have one, were Plebeians.

32. For these several years the War abroad was carried on with the Hetruscans, with various success, and Veii the principal of their Cities was besieged, no less in compass than Athens, and exceeding wealthy, being within twenty miles of Rome. Its Inhabitants, called Veientes, had in behalf of the Fidenates, waged War with Romulus, afterwards being conquered, had seven times rebelled, and ever perfidious in time of Peace, always wasted the Roman Territories. They compelled the Fidenates also to rebel, persuaded them to kill the Ambassadors, and the Romans thither sent to inhabit, for, they vied with the

Romans themselves for power and riches. They had moreover injured the Roman Ambassadors, and not once procured Hetruria to rise against the State; wherefore the People offended with so many injuries, resolved utterly to destroy Veii. Whereas the Soldiers until this time, were wont in Summer only to be abroad in War, and Winter at home in the City, now were they constrained both Winter and Summer to continue the Siege. The seventh year thereof drawing towards an end, the Tribunes Military were blamed of remissness, so that for the following year new ones were created in their rooms. Amongst them was Furius Camillus, who having got much credit in the battle fought with the Æqui and Volsci under Posthumius Tubertus the Dictator, was honoured other ways, as by being created Censor; in which Office he caused the Bachelors to marry the Widows of such as had lost their lives for their Country, and first of all others obliged Orphans to pay Tribute, for that the depending Wars, especially the Siege of Veii, were very chargeable to the State. Being now Tribune Military the second time, he did nothing against Veii, it having fallen to his lot to represent the Falerienses and Capenates, who disturbed the Romans in their enterprise. At length in the tenth year of the Siege, they created him Dictator, as the most fit person they had to finish it.

Furius Camillus.

Made Dictator.

Surprised Veii.

Incurt the duplicity of the multitude, for hindering the separation of Patricians and Plebeians, and otherwise.

33. Camillus appointed Cornelius Scipio to be his Master of Horse, and first overthrowing in a great battle the Falisci and Capenates, went against Veii. Finding it full of difficulty to take a place of such strength by storm, he wrought a Mine up into it, through which his Soldiers issuing, he easily surprized it. Being elevated by so great an achievement, whereby he had thus subdued the cornival of Rome, in the tenth year of the Siege, he triumphed in a Chariot drawn by four white Horses, which his Country-men thinking proper only to the King and Father of their gods, were much offended at it; and indeed no man neither before nor after him (saith Plutarch) assumed to himself so much honour. Being offended with this carriage, they found themselves as much concerned in another matter. The Tribunes of the Commons propoled a Law for dividing asunder the Senate and People, whereof the one should stay at Rome, and the other remove to Veii; this parting as they thought, being a ready means for the enrichment of both, by the possession of two such considerable Cities. The Plebeians now many and rich vehemently pressed it, and the Patricians judging it would prove the overthrow of the State, as earnestly opposed the Law, betaking themselves to Camillus, who put it off by diverting the multitude into other courses. Having contracted an alienation of mind from them upon these accounts, another thing cast him into an absolute hatred, and that if not upon a just, yet a plausible pretence. He had made a vow, that if he took Veii, he would dedicate the tenth part of the Plunder to Apollo, but when the City was taken, either because he was unwilling to displease the Soldiers, or forgot it, the thing was omitted. After he had laid down the Office of Dictator, he moved the People in it, and the Priests reported that the sacrifices portended the anger of their gods, which must be appeased by gifts; so that the Soldiers who had already spent what they had got upon their necessary uses, were forced upon oath to restore the tenth part, wherewith a present was made to Apollo. Because there was little Gold in the City, the women contributed their ornaments, in way of requital whereof the Senate decreed, that at their burial they should also be commended by funeral Orations, which before this had not been in use.

34. The Tribunes again moving for a separation, the War with the Falisci opportunely fell out to divert the multitude, for which Camillus was chosen Tribune Military with five others. He besieging the Falerii, who inhabited a strongly fortified City, the School-master thereof drew out his boys into his Camp, and offered to give them up into his hands, which treachery he so far detested, as to cause the Pedagogue to be stripped, and put Rods into the hands of his boys, wherewith they drove him back into the Town. Herewith the Falerii were so affected that they yielded, and the Senate referring them for conditions to Camillus, he only found them a sum of money, and received them with all the Falisci into friendship. But the Soldiers who hoped to have enriched themselves with the plunder of this place, envenomed grievously against him, and now the Tribunes pressing again the Law for sepeparation, he used such freedom in opposing it, that they out of revenge accused him of having pilfered the plunder in the Hetruscan War, whereof some brazen dories had been, as they said; seen in his house. The multitude now upon several accounts exasperated against him, resolved to shew their spleen. So that not having any way to evade their displeasure, he went into exile, lifting up his hands towards the Capitol, and praying, that if he was unjustly and merely by the lust and malice of the multitude banished, they might suddenly repent it, and that it might appear to all men, how much the Romans stood in need of, and desired his presence. Being gone, he was fined fifteen thousand Ars, which summ in silver made up one thousand and five hundred Denarii. For Ars, or brass was then used for money, and Denarius thence had the name, for that it contained ten Aes thereof. But within a while it fell out, that Camillus was both misfed and denied according to his wish.

35. Many thousands of the Gallæ called Celte, finding their own Country too narrow for them, with their wives and children left it, to seek out new fears. Some of them passing over the Sea, pierced as far as the Riphean mountains, and placed themselves in the utmost limits of Europe; others took up their habitation betwixt the Pyreneans and the Alps, near the Senones and Celtorii. These a long time after having tasted of some Italian Wine, were furiously transported with a desire of inhabiting so rare a Soil, as brought forth such fruit, and passing over the Alps, got into their power all that Country once belonging to the Etruscans, and which reached from the Alps to both the Seas: for, that the Etruscans once inhabited all this Country, Plutarch proveth thence, that the Northern Sea was named Adriatick, from Adria, one of their Towns, and the Southern, Tyrrhenian, from the Tyrrhent the same with Hetrusci. At this time the posterity of those Galli Senones under the conduct of their King Brennus, besieged Clusium a City of Etruria, whose inhabitants sent to Rome, desiring of that State to interpose, by sending Ambassadors and Letters to their unjust oppressors. The Senate performing this neighbourly part, the Gallæ required part of the Territories of the Clusini, who were, as they said, unable to manage them all, and Brennus not condescending to any other conditions, the Ambassadors (all three of the Fabian Family) in great anger went into Clusium, and caused the Inhabitants to make a fallu out against the besiegers. It happened, that in the fight Fabius Ambustus one of the three killing a Gall, whilst he disarmed him, was discovered; whereupon Brennus conceiving just indignation, broke up his Siege, and marched towards Rome.

36. Yet because he would not seem to proceed unjustly, he sent thither, requiring that the Ambassadors might be given up to him, as having broken the Law of Nations. But favour so far prevailed above equity, that the matter being referred from the Senate to the People, no satisfaction could be had from either: nay the Ambassadors on the contrary, were with three others created Tribunes Military, for carrying on the War. Brennus then continuing his march, and his Army after them. The Gallæ pursued them, being amazed at the flight and cowardize of those who had already obtained for their valour a great name in the World; but were astonished when they found the gates of Rome open, and none upon the walls to make resistance; for it had been resolved to quit the City and secure the Capitol. The greater part of the People departed into the adjoining Country; the rest possessed themselves of the Capitol, all but certain old men of Senatorian degree, who in their robes placed themselves in the Forum, resolving to take such quarter, as the disposition of the Enemy would afford them. Brennus at first fearing some stratagem, after he perceived all to be clear, entered the City. His Soldiers were amazed, to see the grave Senators sitting without fear in the Forum, and hurt them not, till one handling the head beard of M. Papius, the old man struck him with his staff upon the head, whereupon the Gall slew him, and then all the rest were killed, with all of both Sexes and all Ages that were found about the City, which was also now burnt to the ground, and the Capitol closely besieged.

37. While the Gallæ lay before the Capitol, they carelessly demeaned themselves, as secure of any Enemy, and were scattered into the Country adjoining. Camillus at this time living in exile at Ardea, procured the Inhabitants of that City to issue out upon them, and killed many; which the Romans, who lay at Fregi, understanding, chose him for their General, desiring him to forget injuries, and succour his distressed Country. He objected his condition of banishment, and refused to act, except by commission from those in the Capitol, whom he considered to be the body of the Roman State yet surviving. There was one one Pontius Cominius, who undertook to procure him leave from their friends in the Capitol, whither by a strange adventure he got, passing by the Enemy, and swimming the River still he came to the Rock, which then he made a shift to climb, and having procured the Senate to pronounce Camillus Dictator, returned in the same manner. By this time as well the besiegers as besieged were well wearied, both parties for want of provisions, and the Gallæ by reason of a Plague which raged amongst them; so as (having once attempted to surprize the Castel, by climbing up the Rock, they were discovered by the crying of the Geese, consecrated to Juno, and repelled by the valour of one Manlius especially) they agreed for fifty Pounds of Gold to arise and depart. Yet so covetous were they, that they took out the God as it was weighing, and added to the weight, which being complained of, Brennus cast in his Sword also, crying Ve vieti, which afterwards became a Proverb. But in the mean time came Camillus, and nulling this compact, as made without his consent, who before was Dictator, and therefore alone had power of making Peace, overthrew them in fight, and did such execution upon them in pursuit, as what remained of them, was overpowered and cut off by the Country. Thus Rome, which was unexpectedly recovered about the Ides of February, so that as Plutarch writeth, the Barbarians held it seven months, in the three hundred and sixty fifth year of the City, and the sixteenth of Antaxerxes Memon.

38. The Tribunes now renewed their importunity about removing unto Fregi, which caused the Senate to procure Camillus his holding of the Office of Dictator, though contrary to the custom, for the whole year. He with gentle language appeased the multitude, shewing them, how unworthy a thing it was to forsake the seat of their Ancestors, and of their Country rires (which were appropriate to the same place) for to inhabit a conquered and enslaved City. Then was Rome rebuilt in great haste, whereby afterwards it became rather an heap of houses than a well ordered Town, and that the watercourses formerly laid in the streets, now ran for the most part under private houses. Camillus having laid down his Office was forced the year following to reassume it, because of the Volsci, who now took Arms, as also the Æquii and Etruscans, all which he overthrew, and forced the Volsci to yield themselves after the War had continued with them for seventy years. In the third year after this he overcame them again, and with them the Hernici and Latinæ, whereof the later had ever from the battle at Rhegillan Lake been trusty and faithful until now: and from the Etruscans he recovered two Towns which they had taken from the Allies of Rome. This he did being Tribune Military, though envied by M. Manlius, who having done special service in the Capitol, by repelling the Gallæ, obtained the Surname of Capitolinus. Being naturally haughty and ambitious, he was herewith puffed up, so as to extenuate the deserts of Camillus, and by ingratiating himself with the common sort, through paying their debts, and railing against the great ones, plainly to aim at the Sovereignty. This together with the War depending with the Volsci, which was also aggravated by the defection of the Hernici and Latinæ, caused the Senate to resolve that a Dictator should be created.

39. This was A. Cornelius Cossus, as Livy writeth, though Plutarch nameth Quintinius Capitolinus, whom the other reporteth to have been Master of the Horse-men to Cossus. He triumphing over the Enemies from without, called also by the help of the Tribunes Manlius to account, and shut him in prison. The multitude much afflicted hereat, took mourning Garments, and made such disturbance, that after some time he was let at liberty. But holding private meetings in the night, and growing more bold in his design, the Senate committed it to the care of the Tribunes Military, whereof Camillus was one, (as afterward in cases of great exigency to the Consuls) to take care that the Commonwealth should receive no damage. Being then brought to his Trial again in that place, whence a view of the Capitol might be had, he would ever point to it, and put the People in mind of what he had done there for them; whereupon Camillus caused his Judges to remove without the gate, into the grove called Lucus Petelinus, where being no sight of the Capitol, he was condemned: He was thrown headlong from the Tarpeian Rock, the place both of his honour and infamy: and it was decreed; that none of the Manlii should afterward be called Mares.

thrown without, and great tumults hapned within, by reason of the debts of the Commons, now again exceedingly increased. Their Tribunes incensed them against the Patritians, and the content was sharpened by Fabius Ambustus one of this order, who having married one daughter to a Patritian and another to a Commoner, this took such distaste at her husbands condition, being void of honour, that Fabius told her he would so order the matter, that the same dignity should be communicated to her house, as was to that of her Sister. From this time he consulted with Licinius Stolo her husband, and L. Sestius, about the preferring of a Law, for making one Consul out of the Commons. These two being made Tribunes of the People, laboured so vigorously about it, that after long and great contention it came to that pass, that for five years they suffered no Supreme Magistrates to be created. Nine years this dispute continued, those two continuing Tribunes still, and the matter had come to another separation or worse, but that Camillus reconciled both parties. He was made Dictator the fourth time, faith Plutarch, for this purpose, but finding the multitude too stubborn, which threatened to Fine him except he complied, he again laid down his Office. The Senate then caused another Dictator to be named, and under him Licinius Stolo preferred a Law, which forbade any man to possess above five hundred Akers of ground, and afterwards being found himself to have above, was punished by virtue of his own constitution. Whilst the Contention was on foot about the Consulship, news came that the Galls, many thousands in number, were marching from the Adriatic-Sea towards Rome, which composed the difference for the present, and made them cast their eyes upon Camillus as Dictator the fifth time. He being near eighty years of age refused not the employment in this time of great danger, and perceiving the Galls to fight with Swords, striking at the heads and shoulders of their Enemies without any art or dexterity, he furnished his men with light iron Helmers, and bound their Targets about with brags, teaching them how to fence, and receive the strokes. By this device he rendred the swords of the Galls so unserviceable, that giving them batel at the River Aniene, he easily overthrew them, in the twenty third year after he had recovered Rome from their Country-men.

41. After this Fight the Romans despised the Galls whom before they so exceedingly feared, that whereas by a Law immunity from War was granted to Priests, an exception and Proviso was added as to that with the Galls. Camillus in his retreat had Pelitre given up into his hands; but having now finished his warlike exploits, a very considerable one remained to be performed by him at home. For at his return he was received with fierce and impatient Contests betwixt the Senate and Commons about the Consulship, and retaining his power, that thereby he might serve the interest of the Nobility, an Officer was sent from the Tribunes to pull him down from his seat in the Forum, and bring him before them. His attendants repelling the man, such a noise and tumult followed as never before had been known, the multitude crying out, pull him down. Yet he laid not down his Office, but departing to the Senate-house, had a serious debate with the Fathers about the matter, and after great and various Contention, that party prevailed which granted to the Commons that one of the Consuls might be created out of their Body. For this they desired, and obtained of the Commons, to have a Prætor created yearly out of the Patritian order for administration of Justice in the City. By this agreement a good understanding being revived betwixt the parties, for as long a time as the infirmity of the Government could bear, a Temple was dedicated to Concord, which Camillus had vowed, moreover a fourth day was added to the Latine Ferie, and the greater sort of Games were solemnized, which when the Aediles of the Commons refused to manage, the young Patritians offered themselves, and the Senate procured also of the People that two Patritians every year might be made Aediles, who from the Chair called Cells Carulis, had the name of Aediles Carules. What their Office was hath been shewn before. As for this Chair, Gellius writeth, that anciently such Senators as had born a Carule Office, were for honour's sake wont to be drawn to the house in a Chariot, wherein was a Chair in which they sat, and which thence (from the Chariot or Carrus) was called Carulis. But others think that both the Orthography of the word, and the dimension of the thing crossed this derivation, and that it was called Carulis from Cures, a Town of the Sabines. The form of it upon old Coins represents that of Spanish Chairs, used by Princes as Chairs of State: it had also crooked Feet, as

Lib. 3. cap. 18.

Plutarch

Plutarch in the life of Marius describeth it; several accents there were to it: it was covered with Ivory, as several Authors shew, and carved or ingraven, according to Ovid.

42. But as for the Prætor, there were two causes of the Creation of this Officer: Amulation and Use. The former was wrought in the Patritians by the Commons, who now had wrested into their own hands the Consulship. The latter was brought about by reason that the Consuls were for the most part employed abroad in Wars, and therefore there was a necessity of a Magistrate, whose peculiar work it should be to administer Justice in the City. The Prætor was so called a pærendo, as write both (a) Varro and (b) Cicero, and agreeable with this Etymology it was once the name of (c) Consuls also, as we shewed before, and of all, or most other Magistrates, Civil or Military. It is probable, that this name, as the other of Dictator, Aediles, and Duumvirs might come out of Hetruria, there being such Officers there of old, as Spartianus seemeth to hint, and otherwise may be gathered. There being but one created at this time, viz. in the three hundred and eighty eighth year of the City, afterward about the five hundred year another was added, who administered Justice unto strangers, so that for distinction the one was called Prætor Urbanus, and the other Peregrinus, the former being in Dignity above the other, and his Constitution called fas Honorarium, as we shewed before out of Pomponius. This same Author (having shewn, that after the bringing in of this Prætor Peregrinus; the Decemvirs for judging of Causes, the Triumvirs for coining of Brags, Silver, and Gold, the Triumvirs Capitales for keeping of Prisons, and the Quinquivirs for both sides of Tiber for executing what belonged to Magistrates in the evenings (at which time they were not to be abroad) were created by degrees) writeth further, that Sardinia being made a Roman Province, after that Sicily then Spain, and after Gallia Narbonensis, so many Prætors were made as there were Provinces, who partly governed at home, and partly abroad. Lipius more particularly affirmeth, that in the five hundred and twentieth year of the City, Sardinia and Sicily being both made Provinces, there were two added, who as the former two assisted the Consuls in administering of Justice, so these in the government of the Provinces. When Spain (Hispanie in the plural number) was subdued, in the year five hundred and fifty seven, two more were added. So there were in all six Prætors, whereof two only remained in the City, and the other as soon as declared, departed into the Provinces, as they fell to them by lot: this order continuing till the examinations called Questiones Perpetue were appointed, at which time the Senate resolved that all the Prætors for the year of their Office should continue in the City, and judge some controversies, either publick or private.

43. Pomponius proceedeth, saying that Cornelius Sulla appointed other publick Examinations or Inquisitions: As, for example, De falso, De Parricidio, and de Sicariis, for which he added four Prætors more; but Lipius faith he is mistaken in the number, proving out of Cicero that he made but two. C. Julius Cæsar appointed other two, as also two Aediles called Cereales, and afterward sixteen Prætors, as appeareth from Dio, who also relateth the Triumvirs with greater liberty to have made sixty four. Augustus filled up the number to sixteen, faith Pomponius, though first Lipius will have him to have confined the number to twelve. Claudius added two, who were to judge only concerning Fidei Commisiss, as the Law term is. Titus took one from the number: but Nerva restored and appointed him to hear and determine Causes betwixt the Exchequer and private persons. Another was appointed by M. Antonius Philoprophus, called Prætor Tutelaris. So, in all there were eighteen, till, as the Empire decreased, they decreased also in number, and at length were reduced to that of three by a Law of Valentinian and Marcian. As for the Office of Prætors, the Prætor Urbanus, who was also called Præfectus Urbis (though a Præfectus was afterward only chosen for the Latine Ferie) in the absence of the Consuls executed their Office in the Senate and Comitia. But three things especially belonged to them: Games, Sacrifices, and Judicature. The former only continued to them in a manner when the Empire decayed. Their Judicature was either in publick or private matters. Private causes concerning menum and tuum, two only handled, viz. the Urbanus and Peregrinus; Publick or Criminal matters were managed by all the rest, who yet had their several and distinct Crimes, one or two, which they judged; and yet sometimes in their Provinces they managed Civil matters also. They had the same Ornaments and Ensigns of power as the Consuls, only but six Lictors apiece, whereas the other had twelve. In respect of their power and honour, as also because they were created by the same Auspicia, Livy calleth them the Collegues of Consuls.

44. The first Consul out of the body of the Commons was L. Sextius, by whose Law the privilege was obtained; the first Prætor Sp. Furius, the son of Camillus, and the first Ædiles Curules were Qn. Quintus Capitolinus, and P. Cornelius Scipio. To Sextius was given as Collegue from amongst the Patritians L. Æmilius Mamercus, and so the Consuls again returned after twenty three years, these being the eighty eighth pair as they are found in Livy, and the Tribunes Military were for ever laid aside after forty eight courses of that Office, and fifteen changes from the Consulship to it, and from it to the Consulship. Besides these changes of Government in Rome, there were the two Grand ones from Kings to Consuls, and from Consuls to the Decemviri; and to this time from the first of these alterations had intervened twenty Dictatorships, besides the several Interregnums. The first Interregnum was extraordinary, being betwixt the reigns of Romulus and Numa, when the Senate governed for the space of a year: the other were ordinary, and continued but for five days under particular men, at the end whereof another was elected, and called Interrex, having for that time the power of Consuls. All these changes of Government, except the Interregnums betwixt the Reigns of the Kings (whereof none but one is considerable) hapned to the Commonwealth of Rome within the space of one hundred and thirty four years, scarce so many having completely passed from the banishment of Tarquinius, to this alteration in the Consulship. It is not in vain to have made these observations, that the Reader may plainly see the ridiculous sickness, weakness, and danger of the Roman Government after that it came to be Antimonarchical.

45. In the beginning of the year, news came of the Galls their meeting together, who had before been dispersed through Apulia, and of the intended revolt of the Hernici; but all preparations were deferred by the Senate, because it troubled them that any thing should be done by a Plebeian Consul, and there was a great silence with a general intermission of business as in some great Vacation. Only the Tribunes were not silent, because that for one Plebeian Consul the Nobility had got three Patritian Magistrates, who sat as Consuls in their Curule Chairs, and their Prætexta: especially were they concerned about the Prætor, who administered Justice, was a Collegue of the Consuls, and created by the same Auspicia. Modesty therefore suffered not the Fathers to create both the Ædiles Curules out of their own body; so that it was agreed first that every other year they should be chosen out of the Commons; but afterwards they were elected promiscuously. The year following fell a grievous Plague upon the City, which took away, besides great multitudes of the common sort, One Censor, one Ædilis Curulis, and three Tribunes: And who was more than all, Camillus himself now died, having born the Office of Consul more than once, been five times Dictator, having Triumphed four, and done such things as he deservedly was written the second founder of Rome. The Plague raging both in this and the following year, gave place to means that were used, so that all mens minds being superstitiously bent, the Stage-plays were brought up to appease their impure gods. The Actors were sent for out of Hetruria, in the language of which Countrey Hister signifying a Player, thence was derived the Roman word Histrion: these Players were very barbarous and antick at the first. Two years after this the ground cleaving asunder in the Forum, M. Curtius is said to have rode into the hole, and so being swallowed up, purchased conquest for his Countrey, according to the Declaration of their gods. After this there was action abroad with the Hernici and the Galls. One of these provoking any one Roman to a single Combat, T. Manlius accepted of the challenge, and killing his Enemy took a Torques or Chain from his neck, whence he and his posterity obtained the Surname of Torquatus. In this fight the Galls had the worst, so also three years after, and eight years after that, when M. Valerius a young man, and Tribune of the Soldiers, fighting with another Gall, as Manlius did, had the same success. As he was fighting a Crow came, and sitting upon his head, with beak and wings assisted him in his Combat, whence he had the Surname of Corvinus. At this time also were several Victories obtained against the Latines and Hetruscans.

46. But (that we may joyn domestick affairs with those of the Camp) after the Commons

The War with the Samnites.

Commons had enjoyed the Consulship nine years, the Patritians took it from them again, out of disdain that the year before C. Marcus Rutilius a Plebeian had been Dictator. Hereat the multitude was so enraged, that at the end of three years more, the Senate was forced to restore the Office, and because Usury again was grown exceeding burthenfome to the poorer sort, they appointed five men to order the payment of debts out of the Treasury. For the following year also one of the Censors was chosen out of the Plebeians. Hitherto were the Wars of the Romans as it were at their Gates: now they were removed further off, and henceforth continued longer: For in the four hundred and twelfth year from the founding of the City, and the forty sixth from its reftauration, began the War with the Samnites, a People of Italy, so defended from the Sabines, from whom also they had their name, or from Saunia or Sannia, which in the Greek Tongue signifie Spears; or from the Hill Samnium, where, as they came from the Sabines, they seated themselves according to Festus. They had the Sabines, Peligni, and Æqui on the West, the Picemini and Apuli on the East, on the South the Campanians and Sidicini, and on the North the Marucini, Dauri, and Apuli, as is observable out of History, faith * Fob. Stadius. It was the Custom of the Romans * to help others to elpouse quarrels. The Samnites having unjustly molested the Sidicini with War, they betook themselves to the Campanians for succour. These being luxurious and effeminate, were easily won, and sent to Rome for aid, their Ambassadors imploring it with tears, and giving up themselves and Country into the hands of the Senate and People. The Senate was at first unwilling to use any force, for that the Samnites were their friends in confederacy; but upon the importunate cries and prayers of the Ambassadors, and the scornful denial of the Samnites to abstain from the Territories of Capua and Campania, their request was granted, and the Consuls sent forth, the one to Capua, and the other into Samnium, where the Samnites were overthrown in both places, and many thousands of them slain: For, in Campania, Valerius after a bloody Battle became Master of their Camp. In Samnium Cornelius having unwarily led his Army thither where they lay in wait for him, P. Decius a Tribune in the Army, possessed himself of an hill above the Enemy, who much wondering thereat, applied themselves thither, and so gave liberty to the Consul to draw forth his men into a more convenient place. Then brake he through, though besieged, whereat the Enemy was so much astonished, that the Consul falling on obtained so great a Victory, that thirty thousand of the Samnites were slain.

47. This defeat, together with the inroads made upon them the next year, drew them to a Peace, the Sidicini being left to their mercy. They desired that the Latines and Campanians might be commanded not to assist the Sidicini; but because the Senate would not deny that these Nations were under their command, and were also afraid to provoke them, so ambiguous an answer was made, that the Samnites being left but dubious, the Latines and the other thought themselves so far disoblged as to rebel. T. Manlius Torquatus now Consul the third time, with Decius Mus his Collegue, was sent to chastise the Latines. Upon dreams which they both had, that one General on the one part, and the Army on the other, belonged to the Dii Mares and Tellus Mater, they agreed, that in what part the Roman Army should be distressed, he under whose command it was should devote himself, and that strict discipline should be observed, so that all were forbidden to fight without orders. The Army being forely put to it in Decius his wing, he devoted himself, and rushing into the midst of his Enemies, after great laughter made lost his life. L. Manlius the other Consul's Son, passing with his Troop, before the battle, near the Camp of the Enemy, was challenged by Geminus Metius Captain of the Tusculans, whom when he had slain and stripped, his Father for a reward caused him to be put to death; whence cruel Commands were wont to be called Manliana Dicta. The Latines being overthrown were wholly subdued, and begged Peace; which being given to them, though not with the same conditions to all, Manlius returned, and was met by ancient men only, the young ones refusing to do him that honour, who ever after both hated and cursed him in reference to his fon.

48. After his return, the Aniates and Ardeates made incursions into the Roman Territories. Being by sickness rendered unfit for War, he named L. Papyrius

Papirius Crassus for Dictator, who appointed L. Papirius Cursus his Master of Horse-men; but nothing memorable was done. The Consuls for the following year, T. Amilius Mamercus and Q. Publius Philo, overthrew the Latines, who had rebelled because of the grounds taken from them. Publius, by whose conduct and auspicious the Victory was obtained, receiving into amity such Cities as had been worsted, Amilius led the Army against Pedus, which received supplies from several places. Though he had the better in all skirmishes, yet the Town holding out, and he hearing that his Collegue was returned home to his decreed Triumph, he also left the Siege, and departed to demand that honour. The Senate was offended, and denied to permit him the honour, except Pedus was either taken, or surrendered, which caused him out of revenge all the year following to join with the Tribunes against the Fathers, his Collegue not opposing it, because a Plebeian. The Senate having a desire to be rid of them, commanded a Dictator to be named, but it belonging to Amilius to name him, he whose were the Fasces for this month, named his Collegue, who appointed Furius Brutus his Master of Horse-men. And his Dictatorship was very grievous to the Nobility, being full of invectives against them, and procured three Laws, whereof the first altered the very constitution of the State. This was, that the Placida should bind all the Quirites, or the whole People comprising all ranks, and degrees. The second, that such Laws as passed in the Centuriata Comitia, should be proposed by the Fathers before the Suffrage. The third, that one of the Censors at least should be a Plebeian, whereas now it was come to that pass, that both might be such. Thus did the Government of Rome devolve fast to a Democratical temper, the interest of the Patritians being now quite broken by the force of the former Law (which proved as a Lex talionis to them, and as a punishment for their rebellion against their Kings) in the four hundred and sixteenth year of the City, after Varro's account, which fell in with the first of Astes King of Persia, and the twenty third of Philip King of Macedonia.

49. In the following year, wherein L. Furius Camillus and C. Menius were Consuls, Pedus was taken by storm, and the Consuls in pursuit of the Victory subdued all Latium, for which they triumphed, and had Statues on horseback set up in the Forum; an honour but rare in those days. The several People of Latium, had several conditions of Peace set them. To Antium was sent a new Colony, and the old inhabitants were forbidden the Sea, had all their longships taken from them, had leave to enter themselves in the Colony, and were made free of the City. The ships were partly brought into the Roman Arsenal, partly burnt, and with their Rostres or beaks was the Gallery or Pulpit for Orations adorned, which was built in the Forum; whence that Temple was afterwards called Rostres. The year following Minutia a Vestal Nun was buried quick in the Campus Sceleratus, which I believe, saith Livy, had its name from Incest; for so the fault of incontinency in those women was termed. And in this same year Q. Publius Philo was made the first Prator out of the Commons; the Senate not regarding now what hapned in this kind, because they had been overpowered in things of greatest consequence. Now also a War arose betwixt the Aurunci and Sidicini, whereof the former were constrained by the other to forsake their ancient seat, and depart to Suessa, which was afterwards called Aurunca. The Aurunci had given up themselves to the Romans, who thereupon ordered them relief, but the Consuls deferring it, this fell out in the mean time. But the next year the Sidicini and the Aufones who inhabited Cales were overthrown, and Valerius Corvinus now the fourth time Consul for the following year, and the greatest Roman Captain of this time, took Cales also, where a Colony was placed. In the second year after the taking of Cales, the Census was solemnized, and two Tribes added, Metia and Scaptia, for the newly admitted Citizens: the Acerani were also made free of the City, without the privilege of Suffrage, by a Law preferred by L. Papirius the Prator.

50. In the year following, above one hundred and seventy women were put to death for the art of poisoning, being discovered by a free Slave, whereas heretofore there had been no inquisition made after this crime, which therefore was accounted such a prodigy, that a Dictator was made for fixing of a nail, which they had read in their Annals to have been a remedy for the distempers of the State, when the Commons separated from the Patritians. For the two succeeding years a War was managed against the Privernates, who were drawn into it by Vitruvius Vallas, a man of principal note amongst the Fundani. In the first year they were overthrown, in the next he was either taken or delivered up, and Privernum either stormed or surrendered, both being affirmed by Writers, of whom Livy is to be consulted: the principal actors were together with Vitruvius put to death, and the rest of the Inhabitants made free of the City. The first year of this War fell in with the last of Darius Codomanus, the last King of Persia, being the four hundred and twenty fourth of the City, when L. Papirius Crassus the second time, and L. Plantius Vetus (or Pennus) were Consuls.

Alexander riding hard after Dartus, came a little after he had expired, saw the Body, and bewailed his Death with tears: he cast his own Garment over him, and sent him to his Mother to be Royally Interred amongst his Ancestors. His Brother Oxyathres he received into the number of his own Friends, and maintained him in his former Dignity. Then did he begin to pursue Bessus; but finding that he was fled far before into Bactria, he left off his Pursuit, and returned to Hecatompolis in Parthia, where his Soldiers being tickled with a Rumor that the Macedonians should have leave to return home, roused him up from his Idleness and Luxury, to which now he began to give way after the Persian fashion: but they were at length quieted, and persuaded by him to perfect the work thus far carried on in Asia. Leaving then Craterus in this Country with some Forces, he marched into Hyrcania which Nabarzanes had seized on, who yielded it up, and himself to him. After this he invaded the Mardi, a neighbouring People, who, not being wont to be thus provoked by any, made resistance with 8000 Men, and intercepted Bucephalus his most beloved Horse, which, being given him by Demetrius the Corinthian, when unsaddled, would suffer none to come on his back, and when adorned, none but the King himself, whom to receive he bowed down. Alexander exceedingly moved with the loss of him, after he had slain, and taken most of these Men, cut down all the Trees, and threatened the Nation with utter destruction in case they did not restore the Horse; so that for fear they did it, and with him sent their Presents, and asked Pardon by 50 Messengers.

2. Returning back, he received 1500 Men which had been sent out of Greece to Darius with 90 Ambassadors. Over this Party he made Captain Andronicus, who brought them to him, and then went on to Zadracarta, the Principal City of Hyrkania, where he staid 15 days. Higher Thalestris, Queen of the Amazons, is said, with 300 Women, to have come to have Issue by him, which Story, though it be delivered for a truth by some, yet is a better ground to suspect it, if it be that neither Pholony the Son of Lagus, who was then with him, and wrote his Acts, neither any other good Author of those times approved of it: and Alexander himself in his Letters to Antipater, wherein he gave him an account of his Affairs, mentioned how the Scythian King offered to him his Daughter in Marriage, but not a word of this Matter. After this, he returned into Parthia, and purposing now to go against Bessus (who in Bactria had taken upon him a Royal Robe, and the Name and Title of Artaxerxes King of Persia) he thence removed into the Country of the Arii. Satibarzanes the Governor thereof meeting him at the City Satira, he confirmed him in his Place, but after his departure he revolted from him, whereby the King was constrained to March back against him, which he hearing led with 2000 Men towards Bessus; so as Alexander following him some time, but in vain, reduced the Country to obedience, and returned to his former Expedition. Then came he into the Country of the Zarangei, which was governed by one Barlaemes, who having had an hand in the Murder of Darius, now lived in India, where he was afterwards sent, and put to death. Here in this Land of the Zarangei (or Diages) was a Conspiracy against Alexander discovered; first by Dymnus to Nicomedes, who, though he swore secrecy, communicated it to Zebulinius his Brother. Zebulinius (or Ceballinus) acquainted with it Philotas the Son of Parmenio, who, delaying till it to the King, either through heedlessness, or on purpose, thereby procured the destruction of himself and family.

3. For, Ceballinus suspecting him to be in the Plot, because of his delay, discovered the matter to Metro a young Noble-man, and Master of the Armory, who acquainting the King therewith, he presently caused them all to be apprehended. Dymnus knowing wherefore he was called, killed himself. Ceballinus cast all the blame upon Philotas, who denied not that he had been told of such a Business, but said he revealed it not to the King only through neglect, and because he esteemed it of no Consequence. Being brought to the Rack, he either confessed the thing as it was, or feigned a Story, and wrongfully accused himself to escape the extremity of Torment; after which he was put to death. Now was Parmenio his Father, a Man of 70 Years of Age, Governor of Media, one who had done especial service for the King, and his Father Philip. Alexander, either for that he feared he was privy to the Conspiracy, or thought it not safe that he should out-live his Son, sent one away with speed, who delivering a counterfeited Letter to him as from Philotas, slew him as he fled. Amongst others that were put to death for this Conspiracy, was Alexander Lynceus the Son-in-law of Antipater, who had conspired the destruction both of Philip and Alexander, and for his Treason been kept in Durance now Three Years. This being done, the King proceeded in his Expedition against Bessus.

4. Though the Soldiers condemned Parmenio, and his Son while living, yet they pityed them when dead, and conceived great Indignation against their Judges. Alexander understanding this, that he might know their several Minds, gave out, that he was sending into Macedonia, and whosoever would, might have an opportunity thereby to write to their Friends. By their Letters, all which he caused to be opened, he knew who were discontented and ready to Mutiny, and all those he gathered into one company, lest they should corrupt the rest, setting over them one Leonidas an intimate friend of Parmenio. The King in his March came to the Country of the Arimalpi, or Agraspae, called also Euergetae, by Cyrus the Great; for that when he went against the Scythians, they furnished him with Provisions in his great necessity. He used them very courteously, bestowing upon them Money, and as much Ground as they would ask, which was not much: And here he heard that Satibarzanes, being returned from Bessus, had withdrawn the Arii from obedience. Against him he sent 6000 Greekish Foot, and 600 Horse, under the Command of Erycius and others, who joining Battel with him, he pulled down his Helmet, and challenged any one to a single Combate. Erycius accepting of the Challenge, slew him in the Place, and then his Soldiers, who had followed him rather by constraint, than out of any good Will, yielded themselves. Alexander having staid amongst the Euergetae 60 days, passed on, and in his way subdued the Gedrosians, the Drang and and Drangae, as also Anacholia, where he got that Army into his Power of which Parmenio had the Command, consisting of 6000 Macedonians, and 200 Gentlemen, besides 5000 other Greeks, and 600 Horse.

5. The next People he passed through were the Parapanisade. This being in the Winter-season, his Army suffered extremely through the Coldness of the Climate: Thence he came to the Mountain Caucasus or Parapanisus, (as that part of it was called) which he passed in 17 days, and built some Cities about it. Bessus had now in Bactria about 8000 of the Inhabitants up in Arms, who thinking that Alexander would rather turn towards India than come against them, kept with him, till they plainly perceived that the King invaded their Country: Then they all betook them to their own Homes, and Bessus with his other Followers passed over the River Oxus into the Country of the Sogdians, being still accompanied with Spitamenes and Oxyartes, in whose fidelity he confided. But Alexander invading Bactria, after he had taken divers Cities, had the whole Country yielded to him; after which he passed to the great River Oxus, but in his way was so distressed for Water, that his Army languished; and when it came to the River, so many drunk intemperately, that he lost more Men thereby, than he had formerly done in any Battel. Ere he passed the River, he sent home 900 Macedonians and Troglodytes, the former being Old and Wounded, and the latter the remnant of the Volunteers: those he rewarded, and gave thanks to such of the rest that remained as were willing to serve in the Wars yet behind. He passed over the River upon Skins and Bladders joined together, wanting Materials to make a better Bridge, and came to the place where he heard Bessus lay with all his Forces. Bessus was now forsaken by his Friends, for Spitamenes conspiring against him with Dataphernes and Catanes, snatched the Diadem from his Head, tore Darius his Robe from off his Back, and gave notice to Alexander, that if he would send any of his Captains with some Forces, they would deliver him up. Alexander sent Ptolomae the Son of Lagus, and one of his Guard, who brought him to his Presence in an Halter, whence he was delivered to Oxyartes the Brother of Darius, to be tormented to death in that Place where he had most wickedly slain his Sovereign, his Lord and Master.

6. About this time he utterly destroyed the City of the Branchidae, with all its Inhabitants, in revenge for a fault committed 150 years before. For, Heracles flying out of Greece, they betrayed the Treasures of Didymeum Apollo into his hands; and for this, not daring to stay behind, they left Miletus and followed him, who gave them this place, where their Posterity dearly paid for their fault. After this, he marche to the River Tanais, (another than that which severeth Europe from Asia) falling down from the Mountain Caucasus into the Hyrcanian Sea. Here some of his Soldiers going forth to gather Forage, were intercepted by the Enemy, which to the number of 20 or 3000 betook himself to an Hill, and thence was beaten down and wasted to 8000, yet with great difficulty, and hazard to the King himself, who received a Wound in his Thigh. Thence in four days he marched in a Litter to Maracanda, the chief City of Sogdiana, where leaving a Garrison, he over-ran the neighbouring Territories; and thence after came an Ambassage from the Scythians, called Avii, who thereby gave up themselves into his power. But in the mean time the Barbarians of Maracanda slew the Garrison of the Macedonians; being, together with the greatest part of the Sogdians, drawn back by those that took Bessus, who also got to their Party some of the Bactrians and Sakans. Alexander sent to suppress them Spitamenes and Catanes, who had delivered up Bessus; but they confirmed them in their Rebellion, and became Leaders in the Revolt, giving out, that the Bactrian Horse was sent for by the King on purpose to be made away.

7. To reduce these Revolters, Alexander presently sent Craterus, who besieged Cyropolis the chief City, so called, because built by Cyrus the Great; and he himself besieged another called Gaza, which he took, and put all of ripens of Age to the Sword, for a terror to their Country-men. After this he reduced several other Cities, and then went to the Assistance of Craterus against Cyropolis, which was defended by 18000 Men. Here he lost many a valiant Soldier, and by a stroke of a Stone on his Neck was fell down senseless; but this excited his natural Vigor, so that out of Indignation he set furiously on, and presently took the Place. Eight Thousand of the Inhabitants were slain, and the rest retiring into the Castle, shortly after yielded for want of Water; and then one City remaining only of Seven, whither the Barbarians had fled, he reduced that also in a short time. Spitamenes now had thrust himself up in Maracanda, where he besieged the Macedonians in the Castle. Against him he sent a Party; and began to build a City upon the River Tanais, which being raised

Aggrammes (or Xandrames) provided of 30000 Horses, 200000 Foot, above 2000 Chariots, and about 4000 Elephants. These things seeming incredible to the Macedonian, he asked Porus of the truth of them, who confirmed what the other had said as to the strength of that King, but withal added, That being by a Barber begotten on the Queen, who had killed her Husband that he might Reign, he was for this cause despised by his People. Alexander now considered the labours and perils undergone by his Soldiers, who from the beginning of his Reign had followed him Eight Years; withall, how of late for 70 days together they had been forely distressed by Rain, Thunder, and Lightning; that he might oblige them, he gave them the Plunder of the Enemies Country, being very Rich; and in their absence gratified their Wives and Children. Then after their return to the Camp, with a premeditated Oration he laboured to persuade them to undertake the War with him against the Gangaride, but in vain.

20. For, Cannus the Son of Polycrates, answered him in such a manner, as he might easily perceive how contrary the affections of the Soldiers were to the Expedition. After which, as Arrianus writeth, he kept himself close in his Pavilion for three days, and would admit none of his Friends to his Presence. Then sending for his Officers, he told them, That seeing the Minds of his Men were averse from proceeding any further, he intended to return home; yet, ere this, he had Sacrificed for passing over the River, but finding that the Intrails of the Beast were not lucky, he fettered himself in a purpose to retreat. He caused twelve large Altars of fifty Cubits height, like to some Warlike Towers, to be erected near the River, whereon he Sacrificed according to the custom of his Country, and he celebrated Games in the Grounds adjoining. After this he caused to be made a Ditch 15 Foot broad and 10 Foot deep, whereon, of the Earth, he raised a considerable Wall, making the compass of his Camp seem three fold larger than indeed it was. He commanded the Foot, that each one in his Tent should set two Bedsteads of five Cubits apiece, and the Horsemen to make theirs with the Mangers of their Horses as big again as they were wont to be. He caused Arms, Bridles, and other things to be framed after the same proportion, to amuse Posterity with a false appearance of a Gigantick proportion of his own Person and his Followers.

21. He returned the same way he came, setting the Government of the Provinces in his passage, till he arrived at the River Hydaspes. Ever since his departure hence, the weather had been rainy, which spoiled much of his new City Bucephala; but he caused it to be repaired; and here died Cannus his trusty and faithful Friend, but one who had grieved him by his Answer to his late Oration. Down this River Hydaspes he resolved, according to his former purpose, to Sail into the Southern Ocean, and therefore providing for such Places as he should leave, he reconciled Porus and Taxiles by affinity contracted betwixt them, and made the former, King, not of that Country only lying betwixt Acenes and Hydaspes, which formerly he had given to him, but also of such free Nations, as lying betwixt Acenes and Hydaspes he had lately subdued. Having increased his Army by a new supply sent him out of the West, he divided it into three Parts, whereof two he committed to Craterus and Hephæstion, commanding them to march on either side the River, down which he sailed with a third in a Fleet of 1000 Vessels. Looing from shoar about the beginning of November, he first landed upon the Coasts of the Sihari, who being reported to be descended of those Greeks that with Hercules attended the Storming of the Rock Aornus, claimed Kindred of him, and submitted themselves. Making Excursions into the neighbouring Countries, he destroyed many thousands of the Inhabitants that would not yield; and then returning aboard, halted against the Oxydrace and Malli, who, as he heard, had carried their Wives into their strong Towns, and intended resistance.

22. Coming down thither where Hydaspes and Acenes meet, the Channel being narrow, and the Stream exceeding great, two of his tallest Ships miscarried, and he himself mislaid narrowly of being Shipwreck'd: Here his Soldiers also began to murmur that they should begin a new War, but he quieted them easily by a Speech. The Indians having gathered together 80000 Foot and 10000 Horses, shewed themselves near the River, having chosen their General out of the Oxydraces, who made many Fires, and used other vain attempts to affright the Macedonians; yet as soon as these began to Arm, either out of fear, or by reason of dissension amongst themselves, away they fled to the craggy Mountains. Alexander then marched with all speed, through a large, dry, and barren Country, against the Malli, to defeat them ere they should join with the other; and coming unexpectedly upon them, them, many he flew, both in the Country, and those strong places which he storm'd. After this he marched to the River Hydrates, where he killed many of them, and thence to a City of the Brachmans, whither he heard that some of them had fled: This he took, with the Castle into which they retired, as also the chiefest City of the Malli, whence they fled beyond the River Hydrates, on the Bank whereof they drew up into a Battalia. He followed, and with his Horse skirmish'd a little, not thinking it fit to engage with them in Battel, being 50000 in number, till the Foot came up. Then they betook themselves to the next fortified Town, where by his hardships he ran into extreme danger.

23. Demophon his Priest acquainted him, how that by his art, great danger was portended to his Person, and therefore he advised him, either to omit, or at least to defer the siege. But he rebuked the man, because hereby he weakened the Valour of his Soldiers, and dividing them into two parts, set upon the Town, whereat the Defendants left it and fled into the Castle. The King with those about him broke open a Gate, and entered first; Then he commanded Ladders to be set to the Castle-wall, which being but slowly performed, he took one from a Macedonian, and rearing it mounted himself; after him went up Pencestes, who bore usually his Shield before him, (which being taken out of the Temple of Pallas at Ilion, he would always have carried) and after him Leontas by the same Ladder, and one Abreas by another. The Argasphids also, (or those who used the silvered Shields) solicitous for the Kings safety, mounting hastily broke the Ladders, and thereby hindered others as well as themselves. The King upon the Wall was laid at with Darts on every side, and when his left arm was wearied with holding his Target, his Friends would have had him leap down again unto them, who were ready to receive him in their Arms. But by an unparallel'd attempt he leaped down on the other side into the Fort, where if he had not by good chance light upon his feet, he might presently have been slain or taken. But casting himself to fall upon them, and seeing a Tree hard by, he applied himself to it, so as he had it on his right hand, and the Wall on his left.

24. None of his enemies were so hardy as to come near him, only they plied it with Darts afar off, whereof the greatest part being kept off by the Boughs and Leaves of the Tree, the rest he received on his Target. But the Indians drawing nearer, threw showers of Darts upon him, and with stones broke his Helmet. Being spent, and no longer able to stand, he fell upon his Knees, whereupon despising him they came to him; and yet he so received them with his Sword as two fell down dead before him, and after this he killed their General who boldly set upon him; then none would venture to approach nearer, but plied it with Darts afar off. By this time those three that mounted the Wall after him were got down, and fought stoutly for him, of whom Abreas was shot in the Face and fell the King also in the Breast with an Arrow, which piercing through his Armour near his Pap, some affirmed, that Blood and Breath issued together out of the Wound, and he swooned, being covered by Pencestes with his Shield. Now the Macedonians brake into the Castle, and put all to the Sword, sparing neither Sex nor Age. They carried their King out on a Target, not knowing whether he was alive or dead; but shortly after he came to himself, and his wound was dressed, (some say by Critobulus the Physician, others by Perdicas) out of which much Blood issuing, he swooned again, and that very thing staunch'd the bleeding. While he lay'd a little in this place, a report flew to the Army then lying with the Fleet at the meeting of the two Rivers Hydrates and Acenes, that he was dead, and it gained such belief, that the Letters he sent were taken but as counterfeit. Therefore he halted to the Camp, where he presented himself to the view of them all there.

25. Having escaped this great danger amongst the Malli, (for amongst them it was, and not amongst the Oxydrace as some have mistaken) and returned to his Fleet, he sailed down the River, and on the fourth day came to a place forsaken of its Inhabitants, but convenient for to make some stay in. Here he rested many days for the better curing of his Wounds, and employed his men this while in building of Ships. Hither the Malli and Oxydrace sent to ask pardon, and submit themselves. After which he sailed further, and came to the confluence of Hydrates and Acenes, the former whereof loseth it self in the later. Proceeding further, he came through Acenes into Indus, subduing a certain People in his way who lived in a Free State; and here he made Philip Governour of the Malli and Oxydrace, with all the Country down to this place, wherein he also gave order for a City to be built. Following on his voyage, he arrived at the Country of the Sanbelis, (or Sabrac) who living also in a popular way of Government, were very populous and strong, and hearing hearing of his coming had got together 60000 Foot, and near 8000 Horse, but upon a fight of his Fleet they let fall their courage, and sent fifty of their Principal men to ask Peace. From this place on the fourth day he came to the Seat of the Sagde, who also asked themselves; and here by the River Indus he caused to be built another Alexandria, which he furnished with convenient Havens and Arsenals. Thence he failed down with such expedition into the Country of Milefianus, that he was upon him before he heard of his coming; therefore the Indian met him with such Gifts as his Country afforded, and gave up himself with all he had into his hands, acknowledging his fault that he had no sooner done it.

26. Having here commanded Toryestes, whom he had set over the Paropamisadae, to be put to death, for abusing that People by a covetous and tyrannical Government, he caused a Fort to be raised in the chief City of Milefianus, wherein he left a Garrison, because the place seemed very convenient for keeping the Neighbouring Nations in Obedience. Leaving Milefianus in his former power, though not authority, he failed down to the Præstis, another Indian Nation, over which ruled Oxycaenus. Here he stormed two Cities, in one whereof their King being retired into the Castle, sent him to beg pardon, but too late; for ere the Melengers could come at Alexander, two Towers fell down, which made way for the Macedonians, who entering, killed Oxycaenus amongst the rest; which being reported to the other Cities, they all yielded themselves. After this he came into the borders of the Brachmans, whose King Sabus (or Sambus) caused the Gates of his Principal City to be opened, but afterwards revolted at the indignation of his Subjects, some of whom paid dearly for it in a certain Town wherein they were taken, Sambus himself with thirty Elephants escaping. Some of them were upon pain of death to answer to certain hard Questions, which having done, they were dismissed with rewards, as Phitarch informeth us. But ere this, Milefianus had revolted, against whom Pithon was sent, who overpowering him took him Prisoner. He was Crucified in his own Country by Alexander's Command, with all such Brachmans as had drawn him to revolt.

27. Returning to the River Indus, in the fourth day he came to a City of the Brachmans, called Hamatelia, the Inhabitants thereof hearing that he was invincible, poisoned the Heads of the Arrows, trusting to their own valour, and the natural strength of the Place. He sent a party, which by approaching their Walls, and then retreating, drew them forth, by which stratagem, of 3000 he took 1000, and killed 600. Many of his own men died, and those who survived were brought into extreme danger, amongst whom was Ptolomy the Son of Lagus. He being almost ready to dye, the story goeth, that Alexander in a Dream had an Herb shewed to him, which drunk, and outwardly applied, helped against the Poyson; the truth being, that the virtue of this Plant was by some declared to him, and this story feigned out of flattery. For all this, the besieged yielding, had indemnity granted to them, and then came Merie King of the Island Pattalena, which he gave up into the Conquerors Power. Alexander restored, and sent him back, commanding him to provide all necessaries for his Army; but failing down thither he found that he had left the City, and retired to the Mountains, with all his Subjects, both of Town and Country. Alexander sent some Horsemen to perswade them to return, which accordingly divers did. Then did he order Hephestion to build a Fort in the City, and sent a party to dig Wells in that Coast of the Country which wanted Water. The Enemy fell upon these men out of the Wilderness, and killed many of them, which forced the King to send others for supply. Now had he almost failed 10 months when he came to Pattalena.

28. At this Island the River Indus parteth into two branches, whereof both retained the name as far as the Sea it self. Alexander taking the right hand failed down that Channel, his Army being led according to the custom, near the Rivers side. The next day arose such a Tempest, as exceedingly distressed the Fleet, some Ships being driven so far as scarcely could they be recovered; whereupon for some time the King stayed here at a certain Island, and sent men on shore to take up some Natives to be their Guides. Coming lower, where the Channel was very broad, another Tempest forced them into a certain Creek, where as great a fear seized on them, and so much the greater, because they were unacquainted with the occasion of it. It happened, that the Tide being exceeding high (as it is at this day at Cambaja, where the River Indus falls into the Sea) all the Grounds near the River were overflowed, except certain Hills, which appearing like so many Islands to them, the Macedonians swam, and left their Boats. When the Water fell again, the Velds were left on the dry ground, some being overwhelmed, and others turned upon their sides. But the River according to the course of the Tide overflowing again at the due time, such Vessels as stuck fast in the Mud were lifted up unhurt, but those that the Water found otherwise placed, were either dashed against one another, or miscarried after some other fashion.

29. Repairing his Navy, as he could, he sent before two Boats to make discovery of another Island below, by the Indians called Cilista, but by him Scidastis, near which he must needs fail down into the Ocean. Hearing that it was large, and very Commodious to harbour in, he gave order for the Fleet to go thither, but he himself proceeded further, to search whether there was an easy passage at the Rivers fall for the whole Navy into the Sea. Having passed some 200 furlongs, he discovered another Island, and then returned to the Fleet, where having sacrificed to some gods, he went back, and performed this service to others after another fashion, saying, he was commanded so to do by the Oracle of Jupiter Hammon. Saying out of Indus into the Ocean, he sacrificed Bulls to Neptune, and after the burning of Incense cast out a Golden Vial with Golden Cups, into the Sea, praying for a prosperous voyage to his Navy, (which he intended under command of Nearchus his Admiral should fail through the Ocean into the Persian Gulf, and so up Euphrates and Tigris) and that no mortal after him might pass the bounds of his expedition. Then returned he up the River to Pattala, whither he found Pithon come with the Forces, and purposing to leave half the Fleet at the City (at this day called Pattala in Cambaja) he commanded Hephestion there to make a Haven, and provision for shipping. He himself layed down the stream on the left hand, which first led him to a Lake, where he left Leonnatus with most of the Soldiers, and with 20 Ships passed through this Mouth of Indus into the Ocean.

30. His design was to see whether the Fleet might not best fail this way into the Sea; and he satisfied himself that it might. Then did he Travel up the shore, and caused Wells to be digged thereon to furnish the Navy with Water. Returning then to Pattala, he sent part of his Army to dig more, and going to the Lake, he caused Havens to be made, and provision for Shipping; he also left there a Garrison with necessaries for 8 months. At this time the Etesian winds in this Country blowing from the South (though in other places from other quarters) hindered Navigation, wherefore he was constrained to leave Nearchus at Pattala with the Fleet till they should cease. He journeyed through the Country of the Arabite (or Arbite) to the River Arabius (or Arbis) digging Pits on the shore for the use of the Fleet in its passage by these Coasts. Nearchus and his followers were two months after Alexander's departure driven out by the Inhabitants of Patalena, and compelled to begin their Voyage ere the season of the year well served. Coming to the mouth of the River, they were forced to cut through a Rock (for some way) such a Ditch as by the help of the Tide might convey their Ships safe into the Ocean. The Arabite hearing of Alexander's approach, fled into the Mountains, so that without opposition he passed over the River Arabius, and came into the Country of the Orite, of whom killing some, and taking others, (because they had not submitted themselves) he thence marched into the Borders of the Gedrosi, with whom the Orite had joined, but upon his approach sent and begged peace, which he granted, on condition that they would depart to their dwellings. He let over them Apellophanes with whom he left Leonnatus one of the Keepers of his body, with a party of Horse and Foot to expect the coming of the Fleet, and in the mean while to build a new City, and settle the affairs of the Country.

31. In this passage through the Country of the Gedrosi, greater loss and damage hapned to him than in all his expedition through Asia besides; because, what for want of Water, by excess of heat, ill diet and hunger, he carried not out the fourth part of those Forces he brought into India. Yet was not this loss sustained through ignorance; for some tell us he knew of the danger very well; but hearing that this Country had been formerly invaded both by Semiramis and Cyrus, and that the former was forced to fly but with 30 Attendants, and the latter with 7, he had an itching desire to pass through it, and in the glory of his adventure to excel them. After incredible trouble undergone, for 60 days, he came to Pura the chief City, where (as it was time) he refreshed his Army, and thence marched towards the Borders of Caramania. Hither news came that Philip, Governour of the Oxydrace, and of other Indians, was killed by the Mercenary Soldiers; but that his death was rewarded upon them by the Macedonians; whereupon he wrote to Taxiles and Endemus to take care of the Country, till such time as he could find one to succeed by their god Belus, that if he did, it should be fatal to him. He intended to follow their advice; but being persuaded otherwise by Anaxarchus and other Greeks, at length he resolved on the contrary. Then they defired him that he would not enter with his Face upon the West; but it being difficult not to do so, by reason of the Fens about the City, having lighted their former advice, he also rejected this. Being arrived, he gave audience to Ambassadors sent to him now from all parts, not only out of Asia, but from Africa and Europe also; Out of Africa, from the Nations situate upon the Sea-Coasts as far as the Atlantic Ocean: from Europe, besides the Greeks, Thracians, Illyrians and Scythians, from some Nations of Italy, as the Bruttii, Lucani, Tusci; from Sicilie, and Sardinia; as also from the Spaniards and Galls, then first known to the Macedonians; but as for the Romans, though some ranke them in the number, yet have we no reason to give credit to their report. At the celebration of the Olympick Games, he caused it to be proclaimed, that all Greek Exiles might return home, except such as were banished for Sacrilege or Murder, against which the Athenians and Rhetians only made resistance. Then celebrated he the Funerals of Hephestion with vast magnificence, and sacrificed to him as an Heroe. After this he made great preparations for Shipping, intending also to invade and conquer Arabia, which, hearing it was no less than India, he sent some to discover.

38. While these preparations were making, and an Haven digging at Babylon, he passed through Euphrates into Pallacopa, a River, which being supplied with Water from the former, thereby hindreth it from overflowing the Country. Here he opened the passages, made a new one towards the Lakes, and coming into the Borders of Arabia, built there a City. Then deriding the Chaldeans, for that he had both entered and failed in safety from Babylon, he thither returned, and liking the City exceedingly, intended to make it the Seat of his Empire; though it was but for a short space, as it fell out. For, having set up feasting and drinking very late one night, as he was departing to go to Bed, he was again invited by Medius a Thessalian to another carowze, where challenging, and being challenged, he drank too much Wine as put him into a Feaver, whereof he died the eleventh day. Some have delivered that he was poisoned by the procurement of Antipater, who suspecting he was through the malice of Olympias called out of Macedonia for no good towards himself, sent his Son Cassander with Poyson to be delivered to Iollas and his other Sons, that then waited on the King. Indeed Cassander was not at all favourable, as he ought to have been, to the Interest of Alexander's Posterity, as neither to his Reputation; and coming to him a little before his death, he did but little strive to suit his humour. For seeing the Barbarians adore him, and unacquainted with such a fight, he burst forth into laughing, for which Alexander caught him by the Hair, and knocked his Head soundly against the Wall, as Plutarch telleth us. But as for matter of Poyson, the long lying of his Body in so hot a Country, during the contentions of his Captains, betrayed no symptoms thereof, and therefore others give no credit to the report. Moreover, the course of his sickness presenteth us with no such symptoms, as it is described to us by Plutarch and Arrianus out of his Diaries.

39. On the 18th day of the (Macedonian) month Dæsius (May the 12) he slept in a Bath, because of his Feaver. The day following he returned to his Bed-Chamber, and spent it with Medius at Dice; then being washed at night, and having finished his devotions, he supped somewhat liberally, and all the night was much discomposed. On the 20th day he washed, and having finished a solemn sacrifice, in the Bath heard Nearchus relate the story of his Navigation, and of what he had seen in the Ocean. On the 21st having done the same thing his Feaver increased, and he had an ill Night. The day after he was held with a sharp Feaver, and was removed near the great place for swimming, where he discoursed with his Officers about supplying Vacant places in the Army with the fittest persons. On the 24th his Disease increasing he sacrificed, being borne out to the place, and commanded the principal of his Officers to stay in the Court, and the rest to watch before the Gates. Being removed into the Inner Palace on the 25th day he rested a little; but the Feaver abated not, and when the Captains came to see him he spoke not a word. So he passed over the 26th day, whereupon the Macedonians thinking him to be dead, came with great noise to the Door, and compelled his Friends to let them in; so in their Coats every man of them passed by his Bed-side. The same day Pithon and Seleucus were sent to the Temple of Serapis, to ask if he should be removed thither, and received answer, that he should continue where he was. On the 28th day towards the evening he expired. Though he fainted by the violence of his Disease; yet leaning on his Elbow, he reached out his Hand to all Souldiers that would touch it in their passage, and (which seemeth incredible) continued in the same posture he had set himself, till the whole Army had saluted him.

40. The Souldiers being all gone, he asked his friends about him, whether they thought they should have such another King. When all kept silence he said, that as he was ignorant hereof, so he knew, could Prophecie, and almost see with his Eyes how much Blood Macedonia would shed in this Controversie, with what slaughters and bloodshed it would make him a Paveation when he was dead. At length he commanded his body to be buried in the Temple of Hammou, and when his friends asked him to whom he would leave his Kingdom, he answered, to the most Valiant. Yet having taken his Ring from his Finger, he gave it to Perdiccas: whereby all conjectured that he commanded his Kingdom to him till his Children should grow up. Again, Perdiccas demanding of him when he would have Divine Honours given to him, he replied, then, when they (his followers) were happy: which were his last words, and a little after he expired. He lived 32 years and eight months, reigned twelve, and also eight months. He died six years and ten months after the murder of Darius, in the first year of the 114 Olympiad, A. M. 3681, 322 years before the Æra of Christ. Syngambis the Mother of Darius having with some patience born the loss both of her Son's life and Empire, when she heard of Alexander's death refused to live any longer. So, refraining from all sustenance she died the fifth day after.

CHAP. II.

Of such things as hapned after the Death of Alexander amongst his Captains, till their Cantonizing of his Empire into their particular Kingdoms, and their taking the Stile and Title of Kings upon them, Containing the space of 17 years.

1. Some have written that Alexander by his Testament, distributed the Provinces amongst his several Commanders. So the Author of the first Book of Machabees affirms, and the Excerptæ Chronologica of an old Barbarian, as Valesius terms him, published by Scaliger. Alexander, he saith, coming to die wrote his Testament, that every one of the Princes of Alexander might Reign, all of them in their own Provinces. But Quintus Curtius, Arrianus and Diodorus Siculus sufficiently refute this Fable. Curius writes expressly, Some have believed that by the Testament of Alexander the Provinces were distributed; but we have found the fame of that thing, though it be delivered by Authors, to have been vain. Alexander, though he had taken several Wives, yet left but one Son already born of Barrine, the Daughter of Artabazus a Persian, and another in the Belly of Roxane, the Daughter of Oxyartes. His Son called Hercules was designed upon by his Mothers account by the Captains who much scorned the Conquered Nations. He had a Sister named Cleopatra, Widow to the King of Epirus, and their Uncle, who was slain in Italy; and a bafe Brother called Aridanes (begotten on Philina a woman of Larissa) who Married Eurydice the Daughter of Antynus, whom being the right Heir, and his Nephew, Philip kept from the Kingdom of Macedonia, after he had exercised the Office of his Protector, and on him bestowed a Daughter of his own in Marriage. This Antynus bore patiently the want of the Kingdom all Philip's time, but in the beginning of Alexander's reign, with the loss of his life, attempted something. His Title through the prowess of the two late Kings was utterly forgotten; Cleopatra (as a woman perhaps) was not thought of. Aridanes neither by birth, personage, or qualities was fitly endowed; yet upon him the election fell, for want of a better, because the Captains were at a loss what course to take.

2. For, Phlomy, the Son of Lagus (as he was called; but reputed the Son of Philip, who, as it's said, having sold the company of Arjine his Mother, putcher off in Marriage to Lagus, when great with Child), rejecting the Title of the half Persian an Brood, though as Alexander's Children they should have been considered, was for the Captains their taking the rule upon them, and deciding all things by Vote of the major part. But as he might think this course most likely to serve his own ambition, Arifonius perhaps on the same grounds betook himself to the words of Alexander, which he interpreted as meant of Perdiccas, because, saying, that he left his Kingdom to the worthiest, at the point of death he delivered to him his Ring. He was seconded by many, who either bore good will to Perdiccas, or out of fear that he would carry it, would not venture to oppose him. But he would needs make a shew of modesty, thinking thereby the more to incase himself, whereas Meleager an envious man, and one who bore to him a particular grudge, took advantage to inveigh against him, and disturbed all the Councils, by perverting the Souldiers that whosoever was the Empire, they had the best Title to the Treasure. During the uproar Arideus was mentioned, and his Name laid hold on by some peaceable Spirits, who labouring betwixt the Parties wrought a compofure for the time, wherein yet Perdiccas had the better of his Adversary. It was agreed, according to the desire of the Infantry, that Arideus, the base Son of Philip, should be King, and forasmuch as he was stupid and dull (rather through the praftising of Olympias upon him, as some thought, than any Original indisposition) Perdiccas was made his Protector, and Commander of his Forces, who hereby in effect was King for a time, though that Title, with Name of Philip, for a greater Grace was conferred upon the other.

Arideus declared King.

The Provinces distributed amongst the Captains.

Perdiccas subdued Cappadocia.

3. Then did the Officers distribute the Provinces of the Empire amongst themselves. Macedonia and Greece were left to Antipater, Thracia with the neighbouring Countries was assigned to Lyfymachus; Egypt, with all that which of Cyrene, Cyrene, and Arabia had belonged to Alexander, was set over to Ptolomy the Son of Lagus. Syria and Phoenicia were committed to Laomedon; Armenia to Neoptolemus; Mesopotamia to Arceftane. In Asia the less, Cappadocia and Paphlagonia, with the Countries thereto adjoining, which Alexander had passed by in his Conquests, were assigned to Eumenes; Pamphylia, Lycia, Lycania, and the greater Phrygia to Antigonus; the lesser Phrygia as far as the Hellespont to Leontas; Cilicia to Philotas, together with Isauria; and Caria to Cassander. Menander was confirmed in the Government of Lycia given him by Alexander. The Isle of Cyprus remained in the Power of certain Governors to which he had granted it; and all that part of his Empire from Babylon Eastward, continued in the state wherein he left it. Thus was his Dominions disposed of otherwise than he intended, for one telleth us that he made a Will, which he delivered to the *Rhodian*s, and another affirmeth, that thereby all was given to one only Successor. After this his Funerals were thought of, his Body having lain seven days neglected. Yet no corruption had seized on it, and it looked as fresh in the Face as though it had been living, which as it's said made the Egyptians and Chaldeans afraid to touch it; but having prayed that Mortals might lawfully do it, they embalmed, and after that adorned it with Royal Ensigns. The care of the Burial was committed to one Arideus (not the King, though some have so mistaken) another of the Captains, who spent two years in making preparation for it, which made Olympias tax the late ambition of her Son, and bewail his misfortune together in the same Speech, as Ethan observeth. For, the Burial of Alexander was to be ushered in by the Funerals of many of his Followers.

4. Ptolomy got possession of Egypt without any trouble, and settled himself therein, partly by his fair carriage towards the Inhabitants, and partly by the power of an Army, which he raised by virtue of 8000 thousand Talents. Hearing that Perdiccas had an intention to deprive him of his Government, he contracted affinity with Antipater, and making away Cleomenes his Lieutenant, because he was much addicted to the Protector, fortified the Country. Antipater was now employed in the Lania War against the Athenians and Helians, who refused to receive their Exiles, as was hinted before, and so distressed him in Battle, that he was forced to fly to Lania, a City of Peliotis. Here Leontides the Athenian General besieged him; but when he perceived him forsaken by the Helians, he issued out, and slew him in the charge, being an excellent Souldier, and one who had deserved well of Greece. Leontas Governor of the lesser Phrygia, allured by promise of his Daughter, came over to help Antipater; but marching through Thessaly was driven into a Fen by the Grecians, and there slain. At his mishap Antipater (who coming thither the day after, united his Forces with his own) is said to have rejoiced, because he had determined to make himself Master of Macedonia. At this time Perdiccas taking the King along with him, went against Ariarathes of Cappadocia, whom getting into his hands, he Crucified, and subduing those Countries which Alexander had passed by, gave

6. After this began the Civil Wars betwixt the Captains themselves. For, Perdiccas breathing after the Sovereignty, and knowing how able the other were to withstand him, grudged Ptolomy exceedingly the possession of Egypt, and through the persuasion of Eumenes procured much enmity, in that having married Nicea the daughter of Antipater, by his advice, he resolved to put her away, and take Chopatra to wife, the daughter of Philip, and sister to Alexander. This being made known to Antigonus, he certified Antipater of it, and being calumniated by Perdiccas (who intended to make him away) he fled unto him, with Demetrius his son. Perdiccas consulting with his Officers what in this case was to be done, resolved first to set upon Egypt, left Ptolomy during his absence in Greece, should seize upon Asia. And to keep Asia against Antipater and Craterus, he left Eumenes with large power over the Provinces, joining with him Alcetas his own brother, and Neoptolemus. Perdiccas taking along with him Arideus the King, and young Alexander now born of Roxane (who was eight months gone with child of him when his Father died) for a more specious pretence, marched against Ptolomy. Antipater, and Craterus, hearing how things went, clapped up a peace presently with the Helians, and leaving Polyperchon to govern Macedonia and Greece, passed over the Hellespont and dispatched away messengers to Ptolomy to enter into a league and society with him.

7. Alcetas, with those Macedonians he commanded, flatly refused to fight against them; and Neoptolemus envying Eumenes the chief command, plainly revolted. After this, some were sent to feel Eumenes, but he answered, that he would rather die than betray his trust, whereupon Antipater and Craterus divided their Forces. Antipater marched towards Egypt to join with Ptolomy, and Craterus staid to oppose Eumenes, with whom fighting in Cappadocia, his Horse tumbled, and was run through with a Lance, and after the fight died of the wound: Neoptolemus also grappling with Eumenes was slain by him. By this time Perdiccas with the two Kings came to Pelusium in Egypt, where though Ptolomy purged himself of the crimes objected against him, yet he would pursue his enterprize, though contrary to the inclination of his Soldiers, his end being hereby to be brought about. Divers of his friends presently forsook him; yet he set upon a Castell near the Nile, and not being able to gain it, marched away and came over against Memphis, where the River parting into two streams, maketh an Island very convenient for the lodging of his Army. Endeavouring to bring his men into it, he lost 200 in the Ford, for that those who first waded over so removed the sand at the bottom, that the River was too deep for such as followed. Yet did he command those who had got safe over to return; of whom part were drowned, some carried down the stream to the Enemy, and others being tossed to and fro in the River were devoured by Crocodiles. By this imprudent act the minds of his followers were so turned against him, that 200 of his chief Officers revolting, he was slain by certain Horse-men, after he had continued in his power almost three years. * One reporteth, that he was slain at the River Nile by Seleucus and Antigonus.

8. Ptolomy came over to the Kings, whom with the Officers he magnificently entertained, and then an election being to be made of a new Governour for them in the room of Perdiccas, though he could easily have procured himself to be chosen, yet he got two others elected, viz. Pitbon one of Alexander's most intimate friends and Arideus, who having the care of the funeral committed to him, had at the desire of Ptolomy buried the Kings body at Memphis, against the will of Perdiccas. The Army now being dispealed at the death of Craterus, declared Eumenes an Enemy, and chose Antigonus together with Antipater Generals for the subduing of him. But Pitbon and Arideus held not their places long, for Eurydice the wife of Arideus the King, being a woman of a notable spirit, would have nothing done without her knowledge, and grew so intolerable, that Pitbon therewith wearied, and seeing the Macedonians too much addicted to her, called the Souldiers together, and laid down his Protectorship. Into his room then Antipater was elected with full power.

9. Against him also Eurydice raised such a Sedition in the Army, taking occasion at the want of pay, that with much ado he escaped the danger of his life, by the means of Antigonus and Seleucus. After this, he anew divided such Provinces as he saw convenient, placing and displacing Governours. He created Antigonus General against Eumenes, sending his own son Cassander as Colonel with him, by whom he might be certified, in case he attempted any thing for his own establishment; and then with the two Kings he marched for Macedonia. Eumenes having intelligence concerning these Councils, made all preparations possible for resistance. In the Spring Antigonus came against him into Cappadocia, where he first attempted by Libels thrown into his Camp, to draw his Soldiers from their obedience, offering a great reward for his head. Eumenes gave his Soldiers thanks for their fidelity, but told them, that these Libels were feigned by himself to try them, which was a notable device (and of such he was full) to make them wary of giving credit to such for the time to come. Yet some proved false to him, as one Perdiccas, who drew away a considerable party, but was pursued and taken, and being put to death, the Soldiers returned to obedience. But Apollonides his General of the Horse did most mischief; for being corrupted by Antigonus, when they came to joyn battel he passed over with his Troops to him, whereby Eumenes had the worst of it, and lost about 8000 men, with his Carriages.

treachery.

10. Apollonides the Traytor he caught and hanged: then, flying a private way, he returned to the Camp, and there buried his dead, to the wonder and amazement of the Enemy; after which he could have plundered the carriages of Antigonus but for burthening his Soldiers with the booty. Being driven to and fro in this flight, at length he betook himself to a Castle called Nora, situate in the Confinnes of Cappadocia and Lycania, and dismissed all his Army, except 500 Horse-men, and 200 Foot, as also such friends as were unwilling to undergo the hardship of a Siege. Antigonus before he would lay close siege to the place, called him forth to a Treaty, requiring him to come to him a Supplior, to which he answered, that he accounted no man his superior so long as he had a Sword by his side. This parley, though managed with much respect, came to nothing, and Antigonus leaving a party sufficient to carry on the Siege, marched against Aleas and Attalus, two of Eumenes his confederates, whom he suppressed. About this time Antipater died in Macedonia, and at his death more swayed by the Publick good than any selfish respect, left Polyperchon (who after himself was the oldest of Alexander's friends now living) Protector of the Kings, and Captain, with full authority. Cassander his son stomached this very much, and consulting how to advance himself to be chief, secretly entered into confederacy with divers Captains. Amongst these was Philotas, whom he desired that he would send him some ships out of Phenicia (for all that Country, together with Judea, he had now got into his power) into the Hellepont. But the death of Antipater strangely all made way for the enlargement of Eumenes.

11. For, Antigonus now being left in Asia, thought off no less than getting it all into his power, and for that end strove to ingratiate himself with the several Captains. Judging that the conjunction of Eumenes might be of great advantage to him, he sent Hieronymus his Country-man (who being an Historian, wrote of the acts of Alexander and his Successors) to desire him, that forgetting the fight in Cappadocia, he would enter into society with him, and receive a larger Province. He required that he should take an oath, which, slightly passing over the Kings, he had framed to his own advantage. Eumenes unwilling to swear fealty to him, with the assent of Hieronymus and the besiegers, changed the form of the oath, and swore to have the same friends and enemies, not only with him, but with Olympias, and the Kings. Hereupon the siege was raised after a years continuance, which he had born with admirable cheerfulness and prudence, and now being let loose drew many followers after him, so that within a few days, besides the 500 which had continued with him in the Castle, he had 2000 at his devotion. Antigonus was very angry that he had changed the form of the oath, and by Letters checked the besiegers, for admitting of it, requiring them to besiege him again; but it was too late. Thus, they were as far from closing as before; and still were further set at distance by the affairs which now were on foot in Macedonia.

12. Polyperchon having succeeded Antipater (as was before said) recalled Olympias out of Egyptus, whither her enmity with Antipater had driven her, inviting her to take the care of her young grand-son upon her. But Cassander resolving to venture for Macedonia, entered into confederacy with Philotas and Antigonus, the latter whereof gladly promised him assistance, out of love to the memory of his father, as he pretended, but indeed desirous that he should be diverted by so great a War, whilst he in the mean time might make sure of Asia. Polyperchon to secure Greece, in the name of the Kings published an Edict, for the abolishment of all such Oligarchies as since since the passing of Alexander into Asia; had been erected in any of the Cities, which by virtue hereof he restored to their former liberty, hereby to oblige, and keep them from yielding to Cassander. In the same name he also wrote to Eumenes, upon whom he confirmed his former Government, and bestowed more, beseeching him, that together with himself, he would take upon him the protection of the Kings house; if he pleased, in Macedonia, but rather in Asia against Antigonus, who now had visibly revolted from it: Moreover, he wrote to the Treasurers in Gilicia, to furnish Eumenes with money, and to the Argaspride (or the old Soldiers with Silver Shields) to obey him in all things. Olympias also by letters desired his help, owning him as the most faithful of those remaining, who could assist against the ruin and dissolution of her Family.

13. Eumenes not able to stay any longer in Cappadocia, because Menander was sent from Antigonus against him, halted into Gilicia, where the Argaspride being 3000 in number joyned with him. Fearing the envy of the Macedonians, for that he was but a Stranger of the Cherronesus of Thrace, he carried it with great civility towards all, and made himself but equal to the other Captains. To contain them in order, he feigned that Alexander had appeared to him in a dream, sitting upon his Throne, and commanding as formerly, in compliance wherewith, he caused a Throne to be erected in a Tent for the King, whereon was also laid a Diadem and Scepter; and here the Council of Officers were always to assemble: Then sending his friends abroad he raised many men, the report of the largeness of his pay drawing Soldiers out of Greece itself. Philotas and Antigonus sent to take off the Argaspride, and Tentamus one of their Captains was perfwaded by them, but was reduced to his former resolution by Antigonus his Colleague, and the common Soldiers were quieted by Eumenes, who came upon them while yet they were in fear of Antigonus, who threatened, that except they would deliver him up, he would come and destroy them with his Army. After this, Eumenes marched into Phenicia, intending there to provide shipping, that if need were, he might have intercourse with Polyperchon. He also intended to rescue Phenicia out of Ptolemy's hands; but finding himself unable to accomplish this design, he began his march through Celestria, and passed on till he came to Carre near Babylon, where he took up his Winter-quarters.

14. Antigonus having overthrown at Sea Polyperchon's Navy, and attempted something against the Governours near the Hellepont, now halted to make a full conquest of Asia. He chose out of all his Army 20000 Foot, and 2000 Horse, wherewith, for expedition, he marched with speed into Gilicia to suppress Eumenes: his forces ere he could get them together, which caused the other sooner to depart into Phenicia, whence he marched to Carre. While he here remained he sent to Seleucus Governour of Babylon, and Pithon of Media, for aid against the enemies of the Kings; to which they answered, that they were ready to assist the Kings, but not him, who was condemned by a Council of the Macedonians; and they solicited the Captains of the Argaspride to forsake him; but in vain. After this he resolved for Susa, thinking to get aid out of the upper Provinces, and money out of the Treasury, and thither he came with much difficulty, Seleucus having lost drowned his Camp, that he was forced to get off his men with boats. It hapned that the Governours of the Provinces were at this time gathered together with many Forces against Pithon, who having slain Philotas, had placed his own brother Eudamius in his stead. Fearing the like might be attempted against themselves, they armed, and having overthrown him in battel, drove him out of Parthia to Babylon, where he fled to Seleucus for relief. Eumenes formerly sent them Letters from the Kings, now also solicited them for aid when thus met together, to which they agreed, and came down. These were Pencestes Governour of Persia, one of the Keepers of the late King's body and now chosen by the rest for their Generalissimo; Polemon of Carmania; Sibyrtus of Arachosia; Stasander of Aria; and Drangianus; Andrabazus, who was sent from Oxyartes Governour of the Parapamisadae; and Eudamius (or Eudemus) Governour of the Oxydrace and Malli, who brought with him out of India 120 Elephants (besides other Forces) which he got into his hands after he had slain Porus the King. Their united Force consisted of above 18700 foot and 4600 horse, which being joyned to Eumenes his Army, made up a considerable body.

15. They had fallen out about choosing a new General, had not Eumenes his former device of setting up Alexander's Pavilion and Throne prevented it, whither he perfwaded them to repair, and rule in common; after which he took as much money out of the Treasury at Susa as his wants required. In Spring Antigonus being come into Mesopotamia marched to Babylon, where joyning in confederacy with Seleucus and Pithon, he received some Forces from them, and passed the River Tigris. Eumenes hearing hearing of his coming went down to Palligræ, where he fell upon such of his Soldiers as were got over the River, which he filled all with Carkeites, and took 4000 Prisoners. Antigonus therefore bent his course another way to the City Radaca situate upon the River Euleus, whence he journeyed through the Countrey of the Coffians with great difficulty, and hardship, into the habitable parts of Media, where he refreshed, and quieted his men now ready to mutiny, by reason of their tedious journey. Eumenes marched into Perfia, where the whole Army was Magnificently entertained by Pencestus the Stratapa, who now thought to establish himself in the Chief power, but by the great cunning of Eumenes, together with the other Captains, was retained in his former condition, and brought to a greater observance of him. Antigonus, following him into Perfia, he returned to meet him, but fasting his Army, he drunk so excessively, that a great distemper thereby contracted, stopped him for some days, and then was he carried in a Litter out of the noise, till such time as the Front would not march without him in the head of them. He was therefore constrained to lead them, and shortly after to frame the battel in his Litter, which Antigonus saw, and laughed at.

They meet.

16. Four days were spent in light skirmishing, during which time Antigonus endeavoured to draw away Eumenes his men; but to no purpose; and afterwards resolved to go 3 days journey off into Gabienæ, for that the Armies were both much strained for necessaries. Eumenes hearing this, sent some, who as Fugitives should acquaint him how as that night he intended to fall in upon his Camp, which he believing, stayed, expecting him, and then did Eumenes make haste to get into Gabienæ before him. Antigonus seeing himself deluded, marched after with great expedition, and leaving behind the rest of his Army, with a party got before him. He presented then himself to his view upon the Mountains, which Eumenes seeing, and thinking he had all his Forces with him, made an halt, and so they mutually deceived each other. Here in the Countrey of the Parataceni they joyned battel, wherein Eumenes had the better, though the other got the advantage of ground; but then his Soldiers beginning to be refractory would needs depart to their baggage, and not stay to bury their dead. Whereupon Antigonus doing this first, the victory came to be controverted.

The victory controverted.

17. Antigonus finding himself to have had the worst of it, went his way to Gamargæ in Media, where was plenty of Provisions, and then Eumenes finding his Army in no good case to pursue him, departed to Gabienæ. Here he divided his Forces into their Winter quarters, not according to his own desire, but the pleasure of the Soldiers; for the old ones which had followed Alexander in his Conquests were grown so high, as they would rather give Laws to their Captains than receive them. Antigonus hearing this, thought to surprize them on a sudden, and for that they should know nothing of it, resolved to take a by-way, which yet was declared to Eumenes, who not being able to call his Soldiers together so soon as was requisite, betook himself to his seldom failing policy. He caused fires to be made on the Mountains where the Enemy was to pass, which they beholding, thought he had there with him his whole Army, and so took the common way, after they were come into the midst of their journey. Antigonus stayed one day to recruit his Army, and Eumenes gathered in the mean time his Forces together, which admired his prudence so much, as they ordered him to be Chief, and thus brought him into danger of life, divers of the great ones conspiring against him, which made him say he was amongst a company of wild beasts, and caused him to make his Will, and tear his Letters, lest any of them that had wrote unto him should be troubled after his death. This as it was faithfully done to his friends, so was it also in good time, as it after fell out.

18. For shortly after, Antigonus and he came to a Pitch-battel, which decided the controversy, though not for the Conquerour. Eumenes lead into the field 36700, foot, 6500 horse, and 114 Elephants, Antigonus brought 22000 foot, 9000 horse, and 25 Elephants. The Argyraspidæ (or silver shields) got the victory, for they put all Antigonus his foot to flight, and killed 5000 of them, so that though Pencestus with drew himself out of the fight with his own horse, and 1500 more, yet Eumenes with the loss of 700 on his side got the day. But neither valour nor wisdom could befriend him, for the place where they fought being exceeding dusty, so as ones sight was taken away at a little distance, Antigonus sends a party of horse to plunder the Enemies baggage, so that the Macedonians though Conquerors, after the battel fell into a deep melancholy for the loss of their Wives and Children taken away, and Antigonus first without the knowledge of any one sent to Antigonus, who Covenanted with him to restore him all, on condition Eumenes were delivered to him, and they would all pass into his Camp, whereupon the Macedonians, the 1000 which Pencestus commanded, manded, and most of the other Captains revolted, and Eumenes having his hands tied behind him was delivered up; his Army shamefully following him to the Tents of Antigonus, passing it self in triumph after him. Antigonus for shame would not see Eumenes his old fellow Soldier in that condition; but afflicted him to Keepers, at first requiring he should be strictly looked to, but afterwards remitting that rigour till almost all perished him to make an end of him. This he was loath to do, and took seven days to consult in; but then fearing how Sedition might arise in the Army, he commanded his daily allowance of meat should be withdrawn, saying, he would never lay hands upon him. Two or three days he languished in this condition, and then the Army being to march, one was sent in, and killed him without the knowledge of Antigonus; so fell this brave man, who was excelled in Military glory but by few Captains, in the eighth year after the death of Alexander.

And killed.

19. Cassander having obtained of Antigonus 35 ships, and 6000 men, sailed with them to Athens, which together with the Haven he had got into his power, by means of Nicanor, whom he had sent before-hand for that purpose. Against him came Polyperchon, intending to besiege him, but his Provisions failing, he left his son with a party in Attica, and with the greatest part of the Army marched into Poloponnesus against the Inhabitants of Megalopolis, who only amongst the Cities had refused to take away their Oligarchy, and had joyned with Cassander. Here he had the worst of it, and that brought him so into contempt, as most of the Greek Cities revolted from him to Cassander, and the Athenians seeing they could not shake off his Garrison, agreed with him that he should retain the Fort Musychia, till the War was finished with the Kings, but that the City should be governed by one whom he appointed, which was Demetrius; Phalerus the Philosopher, Theophrastus his Scholar, who Governed some years with moderation, and was honoured with 360 Statues. Then Cassander making an expedition into Macedonia, found there many friends. The year after, Polyperchon by the help of Æacida, King of the Molossians, reduced Olympus with Alexander the son of Rhoxane her Grand-Child into Macedonia, whereupon Euridice the Wife of Arideus the King fortified herself, and sent to Cassander for aid, but the Macedonians fearing the Majesty of Olympus fell away from her, and the with her husband being both committed to prison, he was first made away, and then Olympus sent her a Sword, an Halter, and Poyson, to chuse which of them she pleased; so the praying the gods that the might have at length such gifts sent unto her, hanged herself with her Garter. This hapned after Arideus had enjoyed the title of King fix years and four months.

Olympus destroyed Arideus and his Wife.

20. Olympus killed Nicanor the brother of Cassander, and destroyed the Sepulchre of his other brother Lolias, and then chusing out 100 of his chiefest friends put them to cruel deaths. But he hearing she was arrived in Macedonia, marched out of Poloponnesus against her; whereupon she made Aristonous her General, and commanded him to meet Cassander, the betaking herself with Alexander her Grand-son, his Mother, and others, into Pydna, hoping she should have many assistants, but she was deceived. For, Cassander besieged her by Land and Sea. Æacida was coming to assist her, but by his means his men fell away from him, and banishing him his Countrey, joyned themselves and Kingdom to the other; others in Macedonia intended to aid her, but fearing Cassander fell off also to him, and as for Polyperchon in whom rested now all her hope, Callis being sent against him corrupted all most of his Soldiers. The siege therefore lasted without any let, till famine so prevailed in the City, as many of the Defendants came out, and she was then driven by necessity to yield, very hardly obtaining promise of safety to her person. Afterward he caused those whose Kinsfolks he had put to death to accuse her to the Macedonians, who naturally hated, and now incensed by them, condemned her. Then did he send some of her friends to her, willing her to fly, but she denied it, and resolved to plead her cause before the people; so that he fearing their affections might be moved towards her, sent some Soldiers to kill her. They were so struck with her Majesty, that they returned without doing their errand; but then some, the friends of whom she had made away came in, and slew her, not at all amazed, or behaving her self otherwise than as the Mother of Alexander, whom she had outlived eight years.

21. Pithon the Governour of Media, envying Antigonus his power, and greatness, laboured to draw most of the Soldiers now in their Winter quarters to his own party, intending to establish himself, which Antigonus being aware of, gave out that he would commit the East unto him, and by divers friendly Letters drew him to him, after which he got him condemned in a Council of his Associates, and put him to death. Then marched he into Perfia, being received by the Inhabitants as King, for that now without controversy he was Lord of Asia. Here calling a Council, he confirmed divers in their Governments, and amongst the rest Sibyrtius of Arachosia, to whom he delivered 1000 of the most turbulent Argyrafpides (who had delivered up Eumenes) under pretence to serve him in the Wars, but indeed to destroy them, giving him secret order to expose them to ruin, that so they might never see more Macedonia nor the Greek Sea. Perceiving Pencestes to be in great favour here, he removed him from the Government, to the great grief of the people, and then got the Treasure at Susa into his hands, out of which he made 25000 Talents. Thence he journeyed to Babylon, where Seleucus the Governour royally entertained him, but offering to punish a certain Officer of the Army without his knowledge, he called him to an account for the revenues of the place. Seleucus denied to account, saying, that place was given him by the Macedonians for his faithful service performed to Alexander; but the Contest grew sharper every day, so as he remembering, and fearing the case of Pitbon, with fifty horse in his Company fled into Egypt. Antigonus was glad he had gotten Babylon, and that without any violence offered to his ancient friend; but being told by the Chaldeans, that if he let him go he should get all Asia into his power, and he himself should die in a battle against him, he sent some to pursue him, but in vain.

22. Seleucus being courteously entertained by Protony, sent his friends into Europe to stir up Cassander and Lysimachus against Antigonus, who suspecting some such matter, sent also to retain them in his friendship, but they entered into confederacy together with Protony against him, and all three sent their Ambassadors to him, as he was now marching towards the upper Syria, to demand that Cappadocia and Lycia might be restored to Cassander Governour of Caria; Phrygia upon the Hellepont to Lysimachus, all Syria to Protony, and Babylon to Seleucus, and to divide all the treasure he had got into his hands since the death of Eumenes, with them and the other Macedonians who had lost their Governments. To this he answered sharply, and that he was already preparing for Protony, so that the Ambassadors returning without any effect, they made great preparations both by Sea and Land. He understanding how full his hands would be, sent about to the chief States to retain them in friendship, and also to hire more Soldiers; he himself went into Phoenicia, where he besieged Tyre, used great endeavour for the making of ships, and took in Joppe and Gaza. Arifodennus also he sent into Laconia, who there by the permission of the Lacedemonians raised 8000 men, and joyned Polysperchon and Alexander his son in confederacy with him, of whom the former was made general of Greece, and the later he desired to go over to Antigonus, who going accordingly in an assembly of the Army accused Cassander, for that he had put Olympias to death, had committed Roxane and her son to custody, married by force Thesalonica the daughter of Philip and filer of Alexander, and to evidently affected the Kingdom of Macedonia; moreover, that he had re-edified Thebes destroyed by Alexander, and restored the Olimpians; whereupon he was declared an Enemy, except he would amend what was amiss, and obey Antigonus, and set all the Gracians at liberty, and so Alexander rewarded with 500 Talents was sent back. But not long after he revolted to Cassander, being for that declared General of Peloponnesus, and shortly after he was traiterously slain by the Stomians.

23. Seleucus in Cyprus prospered against the party of Antigonus, and Polycritus his Lieutenant overthrew Theodotus his Admiral both at Sea and Land, after which Protony and Antigonus met and conferred together; but to no purpose. Cassander shortly after fearing Antigonus might pass over into Europe, to divert him, sent an Army over into Caria to help those Cities which were confederate with Seleucus and Protony; Cassander the Governour there joyning with him, which Antigonus fearing, left Demetrius his son in Syria, with order to entrap Protony's forces if they should march that way, and for that he was then but 22 years old, left four grave men his friends to counsel and direct him. Upon his coming to Caria, Cassander the Governour having too great a burthen upon him, made a Peace, on condition to keep his place, and gave his brother for an Hostage, whom yet getting again out of his hands, he presently revolted after which Antigonus got divers Cities into his Power, and restored the Milefians to their liberty. At this time the inhabitants of Cyrene revolting, Protony reduced them again to obedience by the means of Agis his General, and in Cyprus suppressed some of the Kings which were of the contrary faction. Returning home he was solicited by Seleucus to undertake an Expedition against Demetrius then in Celestria, so that with 18000 Foot, and 4000 Horse, he marched to Gaza, where Demetrius his expected him. In the fight the Forces of Demetrius seemed rather to prevail, till his Elephants Elephants being wounded and taken, his Horse out of fear ran away. He himself fled accompanied with many followers till he came near Gaza, but then to many forsok him and went in thither to fetch out their goods, that multitudes flocking to the gates, and they therefore being hindered from being shut, the enemies entered with them and took the Town. Protony took Sidon also, and besieged Tyre, whose Governour Andronicus upon summons refused to yield, and reviled him; yet he getting the place into his power through the sedition of the Soldiers, when he looked for present death, not only forgave him, but entertained him courteously as his familiar friend.

24. Protony making himself master of the places about Syria, returned into Egypt, being followed thither by many which were allured by his great courtesy. But Seleucus thinking this a good opportunity for him to return to his former Principality, obtained of him 800 Foot, and 200 Horse, and with them marched for Babylon. In his way in Mesopotamia he procured, partly by fair means partly by foul, those Macedonians which quartered at Carrhe to joyn with him, and when he came to Babylon, the Inhabitants there willingly received him, and he shortly after stormed the Castle which was held by Antigonus his garrison. Nicanor the Governour of Media hearing this, came against him with above 10000 Foot, and 7000 Horse, whom he went out to meet with but few more than 3000 Foot, and 400 Horse, and knowing himself too weak to engage in a set battle with him, he hid his men in the Fens till he was past with his Army, and then came upon him lying carefully in the night without any strict guards; so as the Persians coming to fight, Eumenes their Captain was slain, with other Officers; which being struck, and also weary of Antigonus his government, they revolted; and Nicanor with a few at his heels escaped, being glad he was not delivered up. Seleucus by this means getting a strong Army, easily made himself Master of Susiana, Media, and the Countrey thereto adjoining; so as getting hereby Royal Majesty, and Glory suitable to his dignity, some have from this year fetched the rise of that Ara, which afterwards was called that of the Seleucids, and of the Greeks; for that his Kingdom proved the most considerable; about the year of the World 3694, the first of the 117 Olympiad, 309 years before the Ara of Christ, and twelve years after the death of Alexander.

25. When Antigonus heard of it, he sent his son Demetrius against him. Demetrius had now redeemed his credit by the overthrow of Cillex, sent to expel him out of Syria by Protony, and upon it called thither his Father, so as they recovered all that Country, and Phoenicia out of his hands, he not daring to stay and try a battle with Antigonus. Demetrius led with him an Army of 15000 Foot, and 4500 Horse, and had order to recover the Principality of Babylon, and then go down to the Sea. Patrocles, whom Seleucus had left Governour of Babylon, hearing of his coming, advised the inhabitants to leave the City, and flee some into the Desert, or over the River Tigris; he himself with a Band of men flew up and down, taking advantages at the Enemy, and sent to Seleucus into Media for aid, so that Demetrius coming and finding the City forsaken, stormed one of the Forts therein, and for that his time was out, beyond which he could not stay, he left Archelaus with a strong party to besiege the other. Then giving leave to his Soldiers to plunder all they could light on, he departed according to his Father's orders to the Sea, where he besieged Halicarnassus, but was beaten off by Protony, and so as it were took his leave of that Province for ever, taking what he could get along with him, and perhaps for this reason the Chaldeans with the Author of the second Book of the Machabees in this year (one after the other) fix the Ara of Seleucus. Not long after, Protony, Cassander, and Lysimachus, made a Peace with Antigonus on these terms: that Cassander should be Captain General of Europe; Lysimachus should retain Thrace, and Protony Egypt, and the rest which he now enjoyed, until Alexander the son of Roxane should come to age; and that Antigonus should be over Asia, and the Greeks live after their own Laws. This agreement was not kept long, each one seeking under any pretence to enlarge his Dominions, and indeed they might better do it, seeing that he for whom they pretended themselves Administrators, and was their Sovereign Lord, was taken away. For Cassander taking notice that young Alexander grew up, and that the People began to talk, that now he ought to be delivered out of custody, and to enjoy his Father's Kingdom, and he fearing his own interest, commanded secretly Glaucius his Keeper to kill him and his Mother, and concealing their bodies, to acquaint no person living with it. Thus he who was unborn when his Father died, died by the hands of violence and treason, thirteen years after his death.

26. He had a brother yet living elder than himself, who being begotten of Barines (never married to Alexander) was held as illegitimate by the Captains, though born before his Father's death. His name was Hercules, being now kept at Pergamus, whence he was called shortly after the death of the other, by Polyperchon, who now being in Peloponnesus, and envying Cassander the Principality of Macedonia, sent about to his friends, intreating, that the youth being seventeen years old, might be brought, and established in his Fathers Throne. The Etolians especially, with others, embraced the motion; so as he got together about twenty thousand Foot, and one thousand Horse, in no great space, and within a while after gathered up a numerous Army, with which he marched and came on his way to Stymphalia. Here Cassander opposed him, and seeing that his Macedonians took well enough this reduction of their Prince, and fearing they might revolt to him, sent to Polyperchon, and with vast promises secretly persuaded him to make away the young man, which accordingly was performed. About this time Demetrius overthrew Ptolemy his Lieutenants in Cilicia, and he to be revenged invaded Licia, where he took some Cities, after that failed into Greece, where he endeavoured in emulation to Antigonius to set the Cities at liberty; but the Greeks not keeping their promise of sending money and corn, having received Sicyon and Corinth from the Widow of Alexander the son of Epehestion (who had revenged stoutly her husbands death, and kept still these places) he agreed with Cassander that each should retain such places as he had in his power, and returned.

27. Alexander the Great had yet a sister living called Cleopatra, formerly the Widow of Alexander King of Epirus (who making an Expedition into Italy, perished, against the Lucanians, as Livy tells us) and after that married to Perdiccas, whom also now being at Sardis, Antigonius seems to have wooed. But she inclining rather to Ptolemy, stole out of Sardis to go to him, whereupon Antigonius took such order by the Governour of the Town, that she was not only stopped in her journey, but by means also of some women secretly made away; after which to colour the matter he put some of them to death, and buried her body with royal magnificence. Shortly after this, Demetrius was sent into Greece to set the Cities at liberty, which he accomplished at this time for Athens; Demetrius Phalaris being driven out, and conducted to Thebes where he lived till Cassander's death, and then fled to Ptolemy. Afterward Demetrius being recalled to make War in Cyprus, thither he passed, where he overthrew Menelaus, Ptolemy's brother and Governour there, and pursuing him to the City Salamine, slew three thousand of his men, and took one thousand, and then besieged him in that place. Ptolemy's hearing of the defeat of his men, came both with Sea and Land forces, and engaged the besiegers in battle, wherein though he overthrew that Wing against which he himself fought, yet the other prevailing, he was discomfited with the loss of eight thousand men, and all his ships have eight, with which he fled away, and Demetrius became Master of the Town and Island. Antigonius being elevated with this success, received the title of King given him by his friends, and a Diadem set upon his head, which title and honour he also gave to his Son Demetrius. The Egyptians also hearing this, left they should seem to be dejected for their loss, gave the name of King to Ptolemy, who thenceforth in all his Letters styled himself so. Neither now would the other great ones come behind these; for Seleucus, Cassander, and Lysimachus, after their example, took upon themselves the same dignity and title, all the near relations of Alexander being quite extinct.

CHAP. III.

From Alexanders Captains taking the Title of Kings, to the death of Seleucus the Survivor of them, containing the space of 24 years.

I. Antigonius animated by his late success against Ptolemy in Cyprus, now thought of no less than outing him also of Egypt it self; wherefore recalling his son from the Island, he commanded all his Forces to meet at Antigonia a City newly built by him upon the River Orentes in Syria, as convenient against the upper Provinces and Egypt which afterwards Seleucus destroyed, and translated the Inhabitants to his Seleucia. Leading the Land-Forces himself, he committed the Fleet to his son, which was to sail along upon the Coasts within sight of the Army as it marched. Having good Provision both for men and beast, he marched through the desert; His Navy ran great hazard at Sea, but the Tempest ceasing in good time, they came all together unto the Nile. Ptolemy by this time had fortified the several mouths of the River, as the Sea-Forces could do no good, though they removed from one to another, and the Land-Army could not find any forage at that time of the year, the waters being very high; Moreover, many fell away to the Enemy, being allured with his promise of two pounds to every common Soldier, and a Talent to an Officer; so that Antigonius was fain to retreat into Syria. Ptolemy being exceedingly glad hereof, sent to his Confederates to acquaint them with his good success; and now having thus defended his Kingdom, accounted himself rightly to enjoy it, and hereupon some have accounted the beginning of his reign from this very time, fixing it at nineteen years distance from the death of Alexander.

2. But this want of success allayed not the ambition of Antigonius. He sent his son Demetrius presently against the Rhodians, who had formerly displeased him by a denial to send him aid, and ships. For, they endeavouring as near as they could to keep in with all these great ones; yet were drawn by their private interest, especially to favour Ptolemy, from whole Kingdom they got the greatest part of their livelihood by way of Traffick. Demetrius according to his fathers command, went, and besieged their City, lying before it well-nigh a whole year, during which time he made all sorts of opposition he could, till ordered by his Father to make peace with them, which they were prone to accept of, though Ptolemy and others sent them Provisions, and supplies of men. Departing from Rhodes, Demetrius passed into Greece to restore the Cities which Cassander and Polyperchon had lately mastered in the absence of Antigonius his Forces. Chalcis he freed from a Garrison of the Boeotians, whom he also withdrew from Cassander's friendship, joyined in society with the Atolians, and afterwards restored Sicyon, Corinth, Athens, and other places to their freedom. Cassander seeing things by the help of Demetrius to go well with Greece, sent over to Antigonius to desire peace, but he refused it, except he would refer himself whole unto him. He being affrighted at this, sent to Lysimachus in Thrace, to come and Consult with him, and then they both dispatched away Messengers to Ptolemy and Seleucus, to let them see how they were concerned also to resist Antigonius. They hearkned willingly to the offers made unto them, and joyined in Confederacy against him as their common Enemy, promising great supplies for carrying on the War.

3. Cassander thinking it good policy not to stay for the Enemy, to come upon him, but invade him first, gave part of his Army to Lysimachus to pass over with it into Asia, and with the rest marched for Thessaly, there to oppose Demetrius and the Greeks. There meeting, and incamping with vast Armies, neither of them would begin the battle, expecting how things went in Asia, till Demetrius was recalled thither by his Father. Lysimachus being landed there, the Inhabitants of Lampsaclus submitted to him, whom he restored to their liberty; stormed Sigens, and placed a Garrison there; then he tooketh in Phrygia upon the Hellepont, and divers other places, by the means of Docimus, an Officer of Antigonius, whom he had drawn over to him; Prepelus also, whom he sent with a party ty to subdue the Cities of Æolis and Ionia, took other Towns. Antigonus was at this time celebrating publick Games at Antigonia, when hearing this news, he presently broke them off, and with all speed marched against Lysimachus. Whom he reached, and besieged him in his Camp for some time, till taking the opportunity of a dark and rainy night he fled away : Then hearing that Seleucus was drawing down his Forces from the upper Provinces, he sent for Demetrius to come over with all expedition. Seleucus had lately made peace with Sandroctottus (or Androctottus) who being a man of no quality, had solicited the Indians to revolt after the death of Alexander, and to kill his Officers, and thence took an occasion to subdue them under himself. Bactria being subdued, Seleucus had waged War with him, but now for a Compromise gave to him some Countries lying upon the River Indus, which Alexander had taken from the Arrians, and received five hundred Elephants of him in exchange. Ptolomy with a compleat Army had come into Celestria, where he reduced divers Cities; but as he was besieging Sidon came a false report that Antigonus had overthrown Seleucus and Lysimachus, and now was coming thitherward, wherefore he made a Truce with the Sidonians for five months, and returned, but not long after came up again to that fatal engagement with Antigonus.

4. The Forces of these several Princes were drawn down to be in readiness against the Spring. Antigonus had an Army of seventy thousand Foot, ten thousand Horse, and seventy five Elephants. And the contrary party had made up amongst them sixty four thousand Foot, one thousand five hundred Horse, four hundred Elephants, and one hundred twenty Chariots. Antigonus bragged that he would scatter the meeting of these Kings together, as one might do the flocking of birds gathering Corn, with the throwing of a stone; but when they approached, he was more melancholick than usual, and was seen to discourse with his son in private in his Tent, which he never used to do; he commended him also to the Army as his Successor. The battle was fought at Ipisus, a Town in Phrygia, in which Demetrius leading the best party of Horse, engaged with Antiochus the son (and afterwards Successor) of Seleucus, whom he routed, and put to flight, but being too hot in the pursuit undid all; for retiring back he could not again join himself with the foot, by reason that the Elephants were got between them. Seleucus seeing this, made as if he would have fallen upon the Infantry, thus destitute of the Horse, wherein his expectation failed him not, for they fearing it, part revolted to him, and the rest were broken, and put to flight. Antigonus standing his ground, expected continually Demetrius to come to relieve him: but in that expectation ended his life by a multitude of Darts thrown upon him, being now something above eighty years old. Demetrius his son with five thousand Foot, and four thousand Horse fled to Ephesus; but there fearing his Soldiers might be some way false to him, he layd to Salamine in Cyprus, which he then held. This fell out in the three thousand seven hundred and fourth year of the World, the fourth of the one hundred and nineteenth Olympiad, twenty three years after the death of Alexander, and six after their taking the Title of Kings upon them.

5. The Conquerors parted his Dominions amongst them, as we are told; but it seems to have been chiefly Seleucus and Ptolomy, who did not well agree about their prey, and upon this account left a contention to their Successors. Seleucus fell presently upon building Cities, the first of which he called after himself Seleucia, and the later, to which he transferred the Inhabitants of Antigonia (to the number of three thousand five hundred) as we said before, he called Antiochia, either after his father or son's name; for both are affirmed, and this afterwards proved the Metropolis of Syria. Ptolomy after the death of Antigonus got Syria again, with Cyprus, and afterwards Cyrene also into his power, and Married his daughter Aspasia unto Lysimachus, as, few years after, his other to Agathocles the son. Seleucus seeing that thus these two strengthened themselves in affinity, thought not amiss to join also with Demetrius, though gone down the wind; and accordingly sent to him for his Daughter Stratonice. He receiving this unexpected Match, layd with her into Syria. Pailing by Cilicia, which then Cassander held, Philitarchus his Brother cried out that he would invade his Territories, and went trait to Seleucus to expostulate with him his being reconciled to the common Enemy. But Demetrius landing went to Antiochia, where finding yet two hundred Talents left in the Treasury, he took them away, and so proceeded and met with Seleucus at Oressus, who taking his wife away with him to Antioch, Demetrius seized upon Cilicia, and sent his wife Phila to Cassander her brother, to purge him of those things laid to his charge by Philitarchus.

6. Not-

6. Notwithstanding Cassander he held Cilicia; but Seleucus his Son-in-Law required, that for a sum of money he would give it up into his hands, which he refused, and then with some anger he demanded Tyre and Sidon of him, not being content, though he held all from the Syrian Sea, as far as India, that his Father-in-Law should rest quiet with it, though sufficiently toiled with adverse fortune, but he as stoutly denied this also, saying, that though he were a thousand times more overcome, yet would he never purchase the affinity of Seleucus, and fortified the Cities with Garrisons. The next year Cassander King of Macedonia died of a Dropsie (which was so loathsome, as Lice withal broke out of him) after he had ruled that Country nineteen years; twenty six after the death of Alexander; A. M. three thousand seven hundred and seven.

7. He left three Sons by Thessalonice the Daughter of Philip, and Sister to Alexander; Philip, Antipater, and Alexander. The first succeeded his Father, but died presently of a Consumption, Antipater coming after him killed his Mother, for that after her Husbands death she seemed to favour his younger Brother Alexander more than him in the devision of the Kingdom; though the bequest him by her breaths that gave him luck to spare her life. After her death he endeavoured to expel his Brother out of Macedonia, who therefore craved aid of Demetrius, and Pyrhus King of Epirus, who being expelled out of his Kingdom, had Married Ptolomy's Wives Daughter, and by him was restored. Demetrius being now employed otherways, the other came, and received some Countries in way of encouragement and reward for his service, which he fortified with his own Garrisons. Antipater, now had his recourse to Lysimachus his Father-in-Law, who being also hindred with other affairs, and fearing Demetrius his coming, advised him to make an agreement with his Brother; and for that he knew Pyrhus would in any thing seek to gratifie Ptolomy, that he might take him off, he feigned a Letter to him from him, wherein he advised him for three hundred Talents received from Antipater to forsake the Enterprize. Pyrhus as soon as he opened the Letter, easily discerned it to be counterfeit, for that it was not directed after the usual manner, as from the Father to the Son, but as from the one King to the other.

8. However, Lysimachus his perswasion seems to have wrought so with the Elder Brother, together with the presence of Pyrhus, as they came near to an agreement; but the coming of Demetrius spoiled all. For, he having lost Cyprus lately to Ptolomy (which forced him to quit Lacedemonia, after he had taken Athens, and now had almost taken it also) came into Macedonia to amend his fortunes. Alexander being troubled at his coming, seeing he knew the peace was partly made, went out to meet, and received him with great honour, but told him he now had no need of his help; but he either having, or pretending to have a suspicion of him, procured him to be slain, telling the Macedonians a fair tale afterwards, who seeing the one of Cassanders Sons thus dead, and hating the other for his impiety towards his Mother, received him as King; some have written that Alexander used Demetrius his help first, in killing his Brother Antipater, and so revenged the death of his Mother upon him. Others say that Lysimachus after Alexanders death, for that he was employed in a War with Dromicheus King of the Getes, delivered also up to Demetrius, that part which belonged to Antipater his Son-in-Law, and afterwards killed him also, when he complained to him that by his means he had lost his Kingdom, and imprisoned Eurydice his Wife, his own Daughter, for partaking with him in the complaint. But thus (one way or other) Antipater was rewarded for his Mothers death; and so in a short time fell the posterity of Cassander, by the just Judgment of God, as even Heathen Writers observe.

9. For some time Demetrius enjoyed Macedonia, during which he still aspired after his former height and power: for now having this Kingdom and Thessalie in his hands, as also Athens and Megara, and the greater part of Peloponnesus, he subdued the Beotians. Then hearing Lysimachus to be taken Prisoner by the King of the Getes (who shortly after yet set him at liberty) he resolved to return for Thrace; but the Beotians revolting caused him to retreat, though on his march thither. Coming back he found that his Son Antigonus had overthrown the revolvers in fight, but Thebes still remained untaken, and whilst he was going about that, Pyrhus of Epirus (being now alienated from him since the death of Deidamia his Sister which Demetrius had married) invaded Thessaly from his own Frontiers, and pierced as far as the Straights of Thermopyle. Demetrius hearing this, left his Son in the Siege, and hastened against him; but he stayed not his coming, but retired, and then Demetrius fortifying Thessalie returned to Thebes, where the inhabitants tants so stoutly defended themselves, that he lost many men, and himself was wounded in the neck; yet according to his skill and fortune in taking of Cities (whence he had the Surname of Peloneetes) he formed the place, and though he pretended at first severely to punish the Inhabitants, yet he satisfied himself with the death of ten or thirteen, and banishing a few, pardoned the rest.

10. Finding that his Macedonians were quiet when abroad, but seditious at home, he fell upon the Atians, to divert them. Wasting their borders there he left Pantaneus with some Forces, and with the rest marched against Pyrrhus, who hearing it, came out to meet him, but they misdeed of each other, and went several ways; Demetrius into Epirus which he harassed; Pyrrhus light upon Pantaneus, who challenging him to fight gave him a wound, but he received two for it himself, and thereupon falling he had been slain, but that his friends presently rescued him, after which his Army was put to flight, and five thousand of them taken. After this, Demetrius fell sick at Pella, and then Pyrrhus again invaded his Territories a great way, none resisting him, nay, he had such an opportunity, as scarce could he have desired a better, for seizing upon the whole Kingdom, many revolting to him, and Demetrius his Captains making but slow endeavours to hinder his progress. But he having his mind set more upon booty than any thing else, stayed not their coming, but fled away, losing many of his men in the retreat. For all this Demetrius feeling him have a restless spirit, thought it not amiss to reconcile him unto him; but especially at this time, for now he resolved to make for his Father's Kingdom with all the might he possibly could, and therefore left he should leave an Enemy at his back, concluded a Peace, and entered into a league with him.

11. Greater preparations he made than ever had been since Alexander his decease. For he got together little less than one hundred thousand Foot, and twelve thousand Horse, a Navie also of five hundred sail; some ships whereof were of extraordinary bigness. Seleucus, Ptolomy, and Lysimachus, being startled heretofore, combined together for resistance, and joyntly sent to Pyrrhus to move him to break the League which Demetrius had made with him, as they alleged, not to rest in peace, but to make War upon whom he pleased. He believing as much, agreed with them, for that he hoped Demetrius might as easily lose Macedonia as he had got it, and then Ptolomy failing into Greece, solicited there the Cities from their obedience. Lysimachus from Thrace, and Pyrrhus from his borders made inroads into Macedonia. Demetrius first began to march against Lysimachus, but afterwards hearing that Pyrrhus had gotten Berthea into his hands, returned and went against him thither, where when he was arrived, divers from the Town came into his Camp, and so extolled the valour and kindness of Pyrrhus, that the Macedonians, first in little Companies, and after all the Army revolted to him; so as Demetrius was very much deceived, who fearing they might do so to Lysimachus, little suspected this towards the other being a stranger. Pyrrhus thus obtaining all the Army without a stroke, was saluted King of Macedonia by the Soldiers; but Lysimachus coming shortly after, alleged the endeavour of suppressing the Enemy to have been common to them both, and demanded the parting of the Kingdom; to whom he assented, for that he did not trust the Macedonians, and for the Countreys and Cities, were divided betwixt them.

12. Demetrius thus outed of his Kingdom fled to Cassandria, and thence into Greece, where after a little time he got some Forces together and being angry with Atians, for that revolting from him, the Inhabitants had sent for Pyrrhus, he besieged it; but upon the entreaty of Crates the Philosopher (whom being a man of great Authority they had sent to him) he gathered together his ships and sailed away into Asia with eleven thousand men. His design was to take if he could, Caria and Lydia from Lysimachus, and he took divers Towns, and seized upon Sardis, but Agathocles, Lysimachus his Son, coming down with an Army against him, he marched for Phrygia, with intention to pass into Armenia and Media, and so attempt to make himself Master of some of the upper Provinces of Asia, which at the worst would afford retreating places enough, and other helps to a beaten party. In his way he was superior to Agathocles who pursued him, but being brought into great distress for want of Provisions, there fell withal such a Plague upon his Army, that he lost eight thousand men, and so was forced to retreat, and came to Tarsus. This place being now again under Seleucus, he was very unwilling to endanger, for fear of giving him offence, but being forced by want, he wrote to him, whereby he excused himself, and sadly lamented his condition. Seleucus, pitying him at first, commanded his Governours to use him and his his Army with great respect; but Procles one of his most familiar friends, filled his head with such suspicions, that he led down an Army towards Cilicia against him, whereto he wondering retired to the most convenient place of the mountain Taurus, whence he sent to him to give him leave to seize upon some Country of the Barbarians, that there he might put an end to his flight and wanderings, and spend the residue of his days.

13. Seleucus making a bad interpretation of the message, only would give way, that delivering up for Hostages the chieftest of his friends, he might quarter for two months in Cataonia (a Country bordering upon Cappadocia) and secured the passage out into Syria. Here he was kept up as a wild beast, what by Seleucus on one side, and Agathocles on the other; so that he was constrained to betake himself to force, and wasting the Territories always had the better of Seleucus in their encounters, and got possession of the Straights which led into Syria. This so encouraged him, that he thought now of giving battle to Seleucus, but fell into a sickness whereby his affairs were ruined, his Soldiers going away from him to the Enemy; yet he recovered after forty days, and away he marched, and getting over the hill Ananus wasted the bordering Territories. Then Seleucus coming near him, he joyined and fought him, and overthrew one of his wings; but then all his Army revolted, and he with a very few fled into the Woods, whence endeavouring to pass to the Sea through the mountains, his discovering there the Enemies fires prevented that attempt, and at last one saving he must yield himself, he drew his Sword and would therewith have ended his life, but being hindered by his friends, he sent to Seleucus by their advice and yielded. Seleucus caused him to be royally received at first, but the great confluence thereupon to him, lessened that respect he else would have paid him; so as sending Pausanias with one thousand men, he caused him to be carried straight (without as much as seeing him) into a Peninsula of Syria. Here he wanted nothing desirable, not only for necessity but pleasure; only his liberty, which yet to comfort him there was hoped even of, after that Antiochus should come with his wife Stratonice, whom his Father Seleucus upon his passionately falling in love with her, had yielded to him. Antiochus his Son much interceded for him; so did divers Princes and States; only Lysimachus offered two thousand Talents to have him killed, which Seleucus abhorred. At first he exercised himself much with hunting and such Exercises; but by little and little grew sluggish, and, as if he had never been Demetrius Polorcetes, gave up himself to drinking and dice, whereby he grew fat, and contracted a disease of which he died fifty four years old, after he had continued three of them in restraint.

14. Lysimachus and Pyrrhus, after his expulsion out of Macedonia, presently fell out, for the former seeing Demetrius thus made sure and captivated by Seleucus, grew secure of his condition, despised Pyrrhus, and upbraiding the Macedonians for suffering him (being an alien, whose Ancestors always had served them) now to reign over them, drew many from him, and afterwards overthrew him and Antiochus Son of Demetrius in a great battle, and so quite disposed of him of Macedonia. After this he killed his eldest Son Agathocles at the instigation of his Wife Arifwee, who was solicitous for her own children, if they should fall into their Brothers hands after their Fathers death. Lysandra the Widow of Agathocles, and Sister to Arifwee, accompanied with Alexander another Son of Lysimachus, fled to Seleucus, whom they desired to make War against him; and after this he putting divers of his chief Subjects to death for bewailing the young man, many of his Captains and Governours followed, all earnestly desiring the same thing. Seleucus was easily persuaded to it now, having the whole strength of Asia and Syria united into one Kingdom after the fall of Demetrius, which the other being aware of, thought it best first to begin with him, and so passed over the Hellepont. These two being now only alive of the thirty six Captains and fellow-Soldiers of Alexander, joyined in a great and bloody battle in Phrygia, where Lysimachus, though fighting most valiantly, was overthrown and slain, having formerly lost fifteen children divers ways, and now completing the ruin of his Family, after he had lived eighty years, and held Macedonia four, A.M. three thousand seven hundred twenty two, the second of the one hundred twenty fourth Olympiad, and forty after the death of Alexander the Great.

15. Seleucus being exceedingly elevated with the thoughts of his Victory, and more with consideration that he only survived of Alexander's followers, resolved to go into Macedonia and thereto end his days, giving up Asia to his Son Antiochus. He passed the Hellepont, and journeying towards Lysimachia came to a place called

CHAP. IV.

The Macedonian Kingdom.

Ptolemy Ceraunus King of Macedonia, maketh Alliance.

Ptolemy, that he might provide for the time to come, made Alliances with other Princes, as Antiochus of Asia, and Pyrhus of Epyrus, who now being about to pass into Italy, made him Over-keeper of his son, and Kingdom: he also wrote to his Brother Ptolemy Philadelphus, pretending to acquiesce in the misdoing of that his Fathers Enemy. Moreover, he counterfeited himself to be in love with his sister Arfione, and married her, for that it was according to the custom of Egypt, promising to adopt her Children, which he badly performed, for being received by her into Cassandria, he caused them to be first killed in the bosom of their mother, and then thrust her out of the City, from whence she went to Samothracia. At this time the Galls being too numerous for their own Country, under three Captains went to seek their fortunes by many several ways; some towards Thracia, under the conduct of Cerethrius; others to Pannonia under Brennus and Acleborius, and the rest to Macedonia, being headed by Belgius or Bolgus. These Ptolemy opposed with a fraging company, being more heady than wife, for he refused 20000 men offered him by the King of the Dardaniens, and peace by the Galls, if he would but buy it, which he scornfully refused, and answered, he would not yield it to them, except they would give up the Chiefest amongst them as Hostages, and deliver up their Arms. Joyning battel, his Army was overthrown, and he being sore wounded, was cast by an Elephant on which he rode, and taken alive by the Enemy. They tore him in pieces, and cutting off his head, put it upon a Lance, and carried it about to the terror of his followers, of which a few escaping, all the rest were either taken or slain. To this end came Ptolemy, after he had held Macedonia scarce one year and a half.

Is slain by the Galls.

2. Meleager his brother succeeded, but only for two months: for then the Macedonians call him out as unworthy of the Dignity, and in his room placed Antipater son to Philip, the brother of Cassander, whom they surnamed afterwards Etesia, because he continued but 45 days, during which term the Etesian winds blew. After this succeeded an Interregnum (if we look at the title of King;) for, Sophanes, who gathering together a company of young men, and thereby restraining the pride and covetousness of the Gauls, though he might have been preferred before him of Royal Races; yet refused the name, and made the Soldiers swear to him only as General. But Brennus hearing of the good success of Belgius, and what plunder he had got in the East, with one hundred and fifty thousand foot, and fifteen thousand horse marched thitherwards; but twenty thousand falling off from him by the way, and turning up for Thrace (where they brought under the Cities of the Propontis) he came into Macedonia, and here he made havock of all things; Belgius, as it seems, before his coming being repelled or gone, Sophanes went, and met him with an Army: but carrying too few against so great a number, was easily overthrown; after which the Macedonians securing themselves in the Cities, Brennus wrought his pleasure in the Country and Villages throughout the Land. When he had fatished himself here, with an Army of one hundred and fifty thousand foot, and twenty thousand four hundred horse, of Celtæ (or Cimbres) and Illyrians together, he invaded Greece. Each forerunner had two servants followed him on horse-back, who were if it happened to succeed their dead Masters; which custom they called Trimarkisia, or Trimarkia rather; for, Mare in the Testament signified the whole species, as also in our own Saxon tongue, and so furnished, they entered Theffaly, and came to the Straights of Thermopylae. Here they were opposed by the Greeks, so as they lost many men, till being lead over the Mountains (the same way that in the expedition of Xerxes, Hydarnes passed, and getting over, came upon the backs of the Spartans) the Greeks then fled, and they went to Delphos to spoil the Temple, where with Thunder and Lightnings, Cold, falling of Rocks, and the opposition of the Enemy, most of them came to their ends. Brennus himself being wounded, and not willing (or not daring) to out live this shameful expedition of which he had been the Author at home, first drinking much Wine killed himself, the rest flying were taken with a Pannick feat, and killed one another for Enemies; and what by this means, the rage of the Countreys through which they passed, and with hunger, and cold, scarcely any of them ever returned home.

3. During their stay in Greece, Solites died after he had ruled two years, and Antigonus Gonatas having made peace with Antiochus Soter, returned, and obtained his fathers Kingdom. Brennus departing into Greece, had left some Gauls to defend the borders, and they left they should be idle, being with fifteen thousand foot and three thousand horse, first fell upon the Geta and Triballi, whom overcoming, they then sent to Antigonus, offering him peace if he would purchase it with money; but especially to spy his Camp. He entertained nobly the Ambassadors, and to deter them from any warlike attempts shewed them his strength at Land and Sea; but they were so far from being afraid, as having an itching desire after prey, they stirred up their Companions to endeavour the attaining of that which they saw, no way in words diminishing the goodliness of any thing. By night therefore they set upon his Camp, but he being aware of some such thing, had withdrawn his Army and all things into the Wood; therefore they go and endeavour to plunder the Navy, but are repelled thence with such slaughter, as the credit of the victory over them procured Antigonus his quiet, not only from them, but his Neighbours about him. About this time these Gauls, which parting at Dadania from Brennus, and going into Thrace, had at several places passed the Sea into Asia, here uniting again under seventeen Captains (of which Lutarius and Leopontus were Chief) they helped Nicomedes against Zypæus, who held part of Bithynia, and after he was overcome, wafting the Country far and near, divided the Kingdom with him, and fixed themselves about the River Haly, in that place which since has been known by the name of Gallogracia or Galatia, A. M. 3727. the third year of the 125 Olympiad, the Romans being now engaged in the War with Pyrhus.

But is expelled by Pyrhus.

4. But Pyrhus having finished his fruitless expedition into Italy and Sicily after six years, and being returned home, now wanting money fought an occasion to divert and maintain his Army. He made therefore an excursion into Macedonia (having strengthened himself with a supply of some Gauls) where he took divers Towns, and two thousand Soldiers revolted to him; then marching against Antigonus himself, joyned battel with him. The Gauls on Antigonus his part fought very valiantly; but those which governed his Elephants being compassed in, yielded themselves, and the beasts; after which the foot being affrighted, Pyrhus making sign to them, and calling by name the Officers, drew them all over to his own party. Antigonus fled, but kept some of the Maritime Towns still in his possession, and Pyrhus became Master of the upper part of Macedonia, and of Theffaly. For all this, Antigonus gave not out but returning to Theffalonia, there recruited himself with Mercenary Gauls, and then endeavouring to re-establish himself, was again defeated by Ptolemy, the son of Pyrhus; so that again retiring to hide himself, Pyrhus

Plutarch. in Pyrhus. Justin us lib. 24.

Pyrrhus jeered him, and called him impudent, because for all this he put not on a Coat but wore still the Purple. He in way of return compared Pyrrhus to a Gamester, which could throw the Dice well, but knew not how to improve his chance: for he knew how to conquer Kingdoms, and get Victories, but could not improve his Victory, nor retain what he had Conquered; as it had hapned as to this Kingdom before, and now also shortly followed.

5. Scarcely two years did he hold Macedonia; for, Cleonymus the Spartan being rejected by his Citizens from being King in the room of his father, procured him to march down against his Enemies. He went down thither with an Army of twenty five thousand foot, and two thousand horse, and waiting their Territories deferred the entering of the City till the next day, out of contempt of the small number of the Defendants; who taking that occasion, and making what means they could for resistance, especially the Women, hindered him a little from entering, and when entered, his horse being killed under him, forced him notwithstanding to retreat. During his absence, Antigonus Gonatus recovered again the Cities of Macedonia, and taking it for granted, that after he had done his work in Eaonia he would return again thither, thought it best to hasten into Peloponnesus, and prevent him. Being come to Argos, Pyrrhus provoked him to fight for the Kingdom, but Embassadors came to them both from the Town, desiring they would depart from them, and no suffer it (which was observant of both) to come into the power of either. Antigonus obeyed, and sent his son to them for an Hostage. Pyrrhus pretended he would, but entered the City in the night, being let in by Aristeus; whereupon Antigonus was sent for. He sent in a strong party, and Aeneas King of Sparta was at hand with a thousand Cretians and other Lacedemonians. Pyrrhus marched up into the Market-place, and there saw a Brazen Bull and a Wolf standing in a fighting posture, set there in memorial of Danaus his election, and ejection of Galenus, one thousand two hundred years before, which startled him sore, for that it had been told him by an Oracle, that he should die when he should see a Wolf and a Bull fighting together. Hereupon he would have retreated, but seeing the straits of the Gates, sent to his son Heleus to break down part of the Wall, and come in; but he mistaking, brought his men and Elephants through the Gate, which stopped to up the way, that Pyrrhus in his coming back could not pass, and that occasioned his destruction.

6. Being fore crouded, what by them, those at his heels, and the Enemy, and sensible of his danger, he endeavoured by force to remove the latter. Then received he a wound through his Brigandine with a Lance, and turned himself against him that ran at him. This was the son of a poor Woman, who beholding the fight from the house, and seeing him engaged thus with Pyrrhus, took up a stone with both her hands, and cast it down upon the Kings head, which bruising the Vertebrae of his Neck, he fell down from his horse, and his head was cut off by one Zopyrus. It being brought to Antigonus by Alcioneus his son, who rejoiced at the sight of it, he checked him, and wept over it, and after caused it and the body to be magnificently burned: his bones being put in a Golden Urn, he delivered to his son Heleus to carry them to his brother Alexander in Epirus, and then receiving his Army, dealt very courteously with all his friends. After this the Cities of Peloponnesus were betrayed to Antigonus, which caused great fits in that part of Greece; the Gauls revolting from him, he cut off at Megara, besieged Athens, and notwithstanding that Patroclus from Egypt, and Aeneas the King of Lacedemon came to relieve them, yet he kept all provisions from them, and after they had long stood out came to composition, whereby he placed a Garrison in their Fort Mylæus, which yet not long after he drew forth again. Aeneas for want of necessaries was forced to return home; but they met again afterwards at Corinth, where Antigonus slew him, and not long after was forced to return home; for Alexander King of Epirus, to revenge his fathers death, had invaded Macedonia. Coming thither, his Army revolted from him, so that once more he lost his Kingdom, and was compelled again to shift for himself: But his son Demetrius in his absence gathering some forces together, so ordered the matter against Alexander, that he not only recovered his Fathers Kingdom, but spoiled him also for a time of his own. After this, nothing of great concernment occurs of Antigonus, who died after his first possession of Macedonia 36 years, (having lived in some Greek Cities ten years before) when he had lived above 80. 7. Demetrius his son succeeded him, and hired Agron King of the Illyrians to relieve the Myrdonians. These the Ætoliens had besieged, and he performed it, though the the besiegers were before ready to fall out about their prisoners, whether the old or new Pretor should have the honour to dispose of them and their goods. When it was agreed that both in common should do it, the Illyrians falling upon them, and killing many, forced them to break up their Siege, after which Agron possessed with incredible joy, gave himself up to surfeiting and drunkenness, and thereby falling into a Pleurisie ended his dayes, and was succeeded by his wife Tenta. She being elevated also with the former Victory, and not thinking of any thing from without, gave leave to her Subjects to invade all persons in what place soever by Sea, whereupon they took Phenice the wealthy City of Epirus, and injuring those of Italy, drew upon themselves the displeasure of the People of Rome, which the rashness of their Queen heightened to a War, as will be seen hereafter. But by this act, Demetrius so let the hearts of the Ætoliens against him, that whereas before they took part with his Kingdom against the Acheans, now they joyed in league with them against him.

8. He holding yet the Piræus or Haven of Athens, Aratus the Prætor of the Acheans pretending a desire to set the Athenians at liberty from that bondage which thence lay upon them, endeavoured to take it out of his hands, but was overthrown by Bithyes his General, whereupon a rumour arose that he was slain or taken. Diogenes the Governour of the Piræus hearing this, sent word to Corinth to command all the Acheans there to depart the Town; and the Athenians to please him and his party very solemnly rejoiced, wearing Garlands. But Aratus himself then was at Corinth, and hindring Diogenes his design there, marched down to be revenged on the Athenians, and he came as far as the Academy, but then being overcome by treaty, did them no harm. Some years after this the Ætoliens endeavoured to take away part of Acarnania from Epirus, which then Olympias sister and wife of Alexander now dead, governing in right of her sons Pyrrhus and Ptolemy, betook her self to Demetrius, and gave him her daughter Othia in marriage. He had before this the sister of Antiochus King of Syria to wife (Antiochus Hierax as it seemeth, who endeavouring to dispossess his brother Selenus of his Kingdom, is called King by Justin) who thereupon fled to her brother, and stirred him up to make War upon her Husband. The Acarnanians fled to the Romans for help against the Ætoliens, who were then commanded to abstain from their incursions, but despising the Ambassage, harried both the borders of Acarnania and Epirus; and Olympias having delivered up the Kingdom to her son, they all shortly after died. And Demetrius (whom we read to have also enjoyed Cyrene and all Lybia, but know not how he got it) survived not long after, dying when he had reigned ten years, and fifty after the death of Alexander the Great.

9. He left behind him a son called Philip, who being very young, and the Princes of Macedonia fearing an Anarchy, they constituted Antigonus (the brother or Uncle of the deceased, for both are affirmed) his Tutor, giving his mother to him in marriage. At first he held the Office by the title of Captain General, but afterwards being found moderate and civil, he was saluted King, and surnamed Dofan, for that he promised more than he did perform. After the death of Demetrius, the Greek Cities began to lift up their heads, and the several Tyrants, which, through the encouragement of him and his Predecessors, had got many places, for fear renounced their power, and joined themselves with the Acheans, who being much revered of a long time by all their neighbour Cities of Peloponnesus for their Justice and Prudence, had united themselves together, in the 124 Olympiad, and drawn some others into a body against the Macedonians. Their affairs were mightily strengthened by Aratus the Sicyonian who governing his own City, though but young, joy-ned it unto them, and afterward by his great wisdom and industry secured and bettered their condition. The Athenians being encouraged at Demetrius his death, now thought again of recovering their liberty, and he having done what he might before to help them, though in vain, and they again imploring his assistance, though sick, he made himself be carried thither; and whereas Diogenes had for the Macedonians, Piræus, Smirna, Munychia, and the Island Salamis, he perwaded him for a reward of 150 Talents to deliver them all up, twenty of which Talents he presented of his own money. Whilst he thus laboured for the Publick good, especially of the community of the Acheans, the Ætoliens envying their condition raised a dangerous War against them, in which Antigonus Dofan came to be engaged.

10. The Ætoliens though they had been helped by the Acheans against the house of Macedonia of late, being vexed about the business of Myrdonia; yet now seeing their union, and the flourishing condition of their body, envying and also fearing it; resolved to disunite if possible, and withdraw the Cities one from another. At this time Cleomenes reigned at Lacedæmon, who resolving to better the constitution of his Country by reducing it to it's ancient form, and taking away the Ephori those impudent and rascally Tyrants, fought for an opportunity of War as most fit to bring about his purpose. Ever since the Victories of Lysander, luxury and other vices had crept into Sparta, together with the use of riches. And the equality of possessions in Land was taken away by one Epitades an Ephorus, who having a son that displeased him, that he might disinherit him, procured a law to be passed, that any one might dispose of his Lands, either in his life time or at his death, to whom he pleased. Hereby it was come to that pass, that there being seven hundred Citizens of Sparta and more of those not above one hundred possessed all the Lands and Estate, and the rest being void both of wealth and honour lay idle at home, unwillingly engaging in War, and expecting an occasion of change. The Ephori tyrannized with unparallel'd impudence, domineering over the Kings, and ordering those at their pleasure, the servants of whom they had formerly been. Agis one of the Spartan Kings, of the family of Eurytion, the son of Eudamidas, and the sixth from Agislaus, burned with a zeal to better the state of affaires, and as a means unto it, endeavoured the reduction of Lycurgus his model for the equal division of Lands; but Leonidas his Colleague being of a luxurious temper opposed him, and he was wickedly murdered by the hands of the Popular Villains the Ephori.

War betwixt the Ætoliens and Acheans.

Wherein Cleomenes King of Sparta cometh to be engaged, and how.

Light Plutarch in Agis & Cleomenes.

11. This noble spirited man being taken away, and his brother Archidamus destroyed, Cleomenes the son of Leonidas was King alone, and being of a far different temper from his Father, upon hearing what Agis had gallantly endeavoured, resolved to pursue and accomplish what he had attempted, and to take away utterly the power of those Popular Tyrants, who usurped the whole authority. Neither did these two Kings desire to become assertors of Popular power by the restitution of the Lots of Lycurgus, but rather of Monarchy; for the restitution of those Lots would not promote the power of the Commons who were still to be kept under, as they were by the Laws of Lycurgus; but only reduced them to that equality of wealth which might secure them from being insulted over by their fellow Commons, as they had been of late, by such as had ingrossed the riches of the State. As this might be intended by the two Kings, so it appeareth from Plutarch, that Agis attempted to get himself reputation, and Cleomenes for his preservation, by gaining the good-will of the People, and making them sure of their side whensoever they should be ready for the great design of destroying the Ephori. Now though Agis miscarried in his attempt, yet Cleomenes perfected what he had intended. For he surprized the Ephori by his Mercenaries, killed four of the five, overthrew all their chairs except one, which he intended as a Chair of State for himself. Then restored he the Laws of Lycurgus, as to equal possessions and discipline, and for that there was none left of the family of Eurytion, made his own brother Leonidas King with him. But as was said, perceiving this change would be better made in War than Peace, he caused the War betwixt the State, and the Achæans, and bribed the Ephori to send him forth in the Expedition.

Cleomenes kills the Ephori, and restores Lycurgus his Laws.

12. To him therefore the Ætolians sent, and stirred him up against the Achæans; and that they might strengthen themselves, and more easily suppress them, they made peace again with Macedonia, and without doubt had brought about their purpose, had they not had to do with Aratus, who undermined their Councils. They suffered Cleomenes to take in divers Towns which belonged unto themselves, not only not opposing but confirming him in the possession of them, which Aratus knowing well enough to be intended only to strengthen him against his party, yet thought none were to be first Attacked; but after that Cleomenes with great boldness had begun to build a Fort in the Territories of Megalopolis, then were the Lacedæmonians declared Enemies. At first the Achæans undertook the Warre against them by themselves; partly for that they thought they more honourable and safe to defend their own Estate, and partly for that they were loath to displease Ptolemy (who had been formerly a good friend to them) by seeking for the patronage of any other; but the War going on (Cleomenes now having overthrown the Achæans in divers battels) Aratus thinking it a disgrace for him to be worsted by the young Lacedæmonian, and being jealous full of the knavery of the Ætolians, concluded it was high time to look about him; at least for a supply.

13. Considering with himself the power of Antigonus King of Macedonia, and withall withall his faithfulness; and that he was prone to enter into Leagues and alliances, he resolved to make a Confederacy with him; but that secretly, as well because he knew the Ætolians would seek to prevent him, as for that his people would be discouraged at the thought of expecting help from an Enemy. Knowing therefore the Megalopolitans to be sore pressed with the War (having little help from the Achæans) and how good affection they bore to the Macedonian Court ever since the days of Philip the son of Amyntas, who deserved very well of them, he sent for two of friendship (Nicophon and Cercidas) and dealt privately with them to persuade their Citizens to crave aid of Antigonus. These two were therefore sent to the Achæans, and to Macedonia if they should think fit. They giving way to it, they came to the King, and according to the instructions from Aratus, proposed to him to consider, whether this conjunction of Cleomenes and the Ætolians would tend; and whether when the Achæans were eaten up, he himself would not be in danger, seeing the covetousness of the Ætolians, and Cleomenes his ambition could not be contained in lesser limits than those of Greece. He answered, that if it should seem good to the Achæans, he would send aid to those of Megalopolis. They being at this much encouraged, laboured to persuade them to give way to it, but Aratus then fearing, that if the coming down of Antigonus should breed any inconvenience, the blame would fall all upon him, dissuaded his People from receiving as yet any aid, and made them try first what they could do of themselves, exhorting each particular City to fight stoutly for their liberty. Now Ptolemy finding the Lacedæmonians to be more for his purpose to withstand the Macedonian, stirred up Cleomenes against him, and furnished him with money. He also brought the Achæans by divers engagements to such a low ebb, that they were now in great danger to lose all, and therefore they implored aid of Antigonus, and Aratus lent his son to confirm whatsoever had been offered on his part.

Who marched down. And also Antigonus.

14. He then marched down, though a great difficulty there was at first for this to be hoped for by the Achæans, by reason that the Castle of Corinth which they had taken out of the hands of the Macedonians together with the Town, and which would be now mighty convenient for the carrying on of the War, they knew not how to restore unto him. But Cleomenes prospering exceedingly, and having reduced nine Cities into his power, the Corinthians sent to him, offering him theirs, and commanded all the Achæans to be gone; so that at this Aratus taking occasion (who before durst not give them up into the hands of the Macedonians without their consent) restored the Castle into the power of Antigonus. Cleomenes (who after hithaking the nine Cities, went and sat down before Sicyon) hearing the intention of the Achæans and the King, marched with great speed to the Isthmus, and then fortified the place between the Castle of Corinth and the Mountains Onni with a ditch and bulwark; and Antigonus with twenty thousand Foot, and one thousand four hundred Horse, coming through Rubæa (for that the Ætolians had forbidden him at his peril to pass through the Straights of Thermopylae) found no little opposition from Cleomenes, till Argos revolting to Aratus (by the means of Aristule his friend, who with help from Sicyon set upon the Castle, Megisthenes who was sent to relieve it being slain) for that he feared if this Fort should be taken the Enemy might thereby stop up the passage, and at his ease invade Laconia, he drew down his forces from Corinth. Then Antigonus entering Peloponnesus took Corinth in his way, where placing a Garrison he followed Cleomenes to Argos, who having by a while entered the Town, laboured again to reduce it, and took some parts thereof, but seeing him come down from the Mountains against him, withdrew himself, and so by Mantinea returned to Lacedæmon. Antigonus coming to Argos commended and encouraged the Citizens, and thence marching presently for Arcadia, reduced divers Forts, which he delivered into the hands of the Megalopolitans; after which coming to Regium to the general meeting of the Achæans (where he held consultations with them) he was declared general of all the Associates, and took up Winter-quarters for his Army, at Sicyon and Corinth.

He seizes Mantinea.

15. At the beginning of Spring he gathered his forces together and besieged Tegea, where the Achæans met him. Having this Town yielded to him, he thence marched speedily into Laconia, where Cleomenes meeting him upon the borders there passed some light skirmishes betwixt them, and then he hearing that the Garrison Soldiers at Orchomenus were coming to help the Enemy, departed suddenly thither, and stormed the place at the first onset. Thence moving to Mantinea, that Town presently was taken, the chief of the Inhabitants whereof (because though when Aratus took the City, he restored them to their former privileges, yet they again revolted, and put all his Garrison to the sword,) for their ingratitude were slain; of the rest, part were sold, and part sent into Macedonia, their wives and children made slaves; and their Town was given by Antigonus to the Argives, who thither resolved to send out a Colony, and Aratus being made Pretor, made a Decree for changing the name of it into Antigonica. After this, Antigonus took Herea and Telphusa, and Winter then drawing on he went again to the General Assembly of the Acheans, sending out his Soldiers to their quarters, which Cleomenes taking notice of, and that Megalopolis was three days march from Ægium, and wanted a sufficient Garrison, he brake in thither secretly in the night, where though he found such opposition as both he and his were brought into great danger, yet became he Master of the place, and so cruelly ragged against it (as Polybius a Citizen thereof telleth us) that no hope then seemed to be left of Peopleing it again. This City being taken, he marched away to Argos (where Antigonus wintered) to harraile the Territories; a rash enterprise as the Vulgar judged, but prudent enough of it self, considering that the King's Army being at a great distance, and he thereby unable to refit, the Argives would then murmur against him, and he thereby be brought into contempt. This hapned just as he imagined, but Antigonus though very much spent of the Pelfick, lived to the next Summer to regain his credit.

16. In the beginning of Summer he led towards Laconia an Army of twenty six thousand eight hundred men (his own and of the associates) which Cleomenes expecting fortified the passage betwixt the two mountains Eoa and Olympus, placing his Brother at the former, and securing the later himself, having in all about twenty thousand in his Army. Antigonus wondering at his skill and industry in his fortification, pitcht his Tents upon the River Gorgylias, bethinking himself what he should do; at last finding all passages made up, they both agreed to try the matter in battle. At the beginning of the fight those of Cleomenes his party with the light Armour placed amongst his Horse, seeing the Illyrian cohorts not to be backed by the Acheans, fell upon their Reer, and had done great mischief, but that Philopomenus a Megalopolitan (then but young) giving notice of it to the Officers, and they not regarding him, stirred up his fellow Citizens, and fell upon the Enemies horse, which made the other return to their former place to help their Companions. After this the fortune of the day inclined to Antigonus his side, for Euchides undid himself by the bad choice of his ground, receiving the Illyrians not on the side of the Hill, (whereby though he might have been repulsed, yet still he might have had the advantage of being higher than the Enemy) but just on the top, so that being thence removed, and forced downwards on the other side, the Illyrians had the advantage of him. Cleomenes perceiving his brother overthrown, and the Horse on the plain to have the worst, for fear the Enemy should compels him in, was forced to remove the Carriages from behind his Army, and draw it out as well as he could to prevent that. Then the Files coming to be engaged, Antigonus pressing upon the Macedonians in great violence with his doubled Files, put them to flight, and many being slain, Cleomenes escaped with a few in his Company and got to Sparta.

Defeated
Cleomenes

17. Cleomenes coming to Sparta, advised the people which flocked about him to receive the Conquerour, and then by night getting to Gybiunus, thence went to Alexandria in Egypt, whereas if had either deferred the battle a little longer, or stayed at home, he might easily have recovered his former condition. For, Antigonus suddenly following him got Sparta, and very nobly, and with great humanity used the Citizens, restoring to them their ancient liberties, but shortly after was constrained to leave that place, and Peloponnesus also, being called home by an invasion of the Illyrians into Macedonia, where they made havock of all things. From Sparta he came to Tegea, which he again restored into the form of a Commonwealth, and thence to Argos, at the time of the Celebration of the Nemean Games, where by the Decree of the General assembly of the Acheans in common, and each of the Cities in particular, he had all possible honour given him. After this he marched with great speed into Macedonia, where he overthrew the Illyrians in battle, but got his own death with the victory: for with exhorting his Soldiers, and shouting in the fight, he so strained his Lungs that he spar blood, and thereby his Consumption was heightened, which in a short time made an end of him, after he had discharged the Office of a faithful Guardian, a good King, and of an expert and valiant Captain ten years, A. M. 3782. in the second of the one hundred thirty ninth Olympiad, one hundred years after the death of Alexander.

18. Philip

18. Philip then succeeded this his Uncle, and once his Guardian, being sixteen years old, in whom the Prediction of Sibylla was verified, that the Macedonia glory, as it began in a Philip, so it should end in one of that name. Some three years after his coming to the Government he was also engaged in the Social War of Greece, of which the Ætolians and Acheans were the chief parties. For now the Ætolians (who used to live by Pyracie and Robbing) being weary of peace, though awed by Antigonus as long as he lived, and having in contempt the youth of Philip, and judging themselves stronger than the Acheans, they desired occasion to begin a War. The first occasion was given by Dorimachus one of their body, who being sent to Phigalea, a City of Peloponnesus in the Confines of Messena (under pretence of securing it, and its Territories) to spy what was done in those parts, and seeing the Messenians to live in security, and neglect of any martial Discipline, ever since the peace was made by Antigonus, being covetous gave leave to certain Pyrats to prey upon their grounds and drive their Cattel thence, though they were friends to the Ætolians. They complaining of this to him, he went to Messena, but in stead of giving them any relief, he derided, and threatened the Owners of the Cattel, and by the perswasion of Sciron, then Pretor of that City, he was secured. It so hapned, that at this time there was one Babryta a filthy fellow, so like to this Dorimachus, that one could scarce know them asunder had they been clothed alike. As therefore on a time Dorimachus was malapertly inveighing against the Messenians, Sciron answered him, Doſt thou think, O Babryta, that we either care for thee, or thy threats? This Jeer so affected him, as to begone he restored them their goods; but getting him home, it fat so deeply upon him, as by pretence of this injury alone did he stir up War against the Messenians.

19. He durst not in publick Conventions perswade the Ætolians to the War, for that his private grudge was sufficiently known; but one Scopas being then Pretor, him he perswaded to joyn with him in the invasion of the Messenians. They two therefore, without any publick Decree, took the advantage of that time, wherein a few dayes only were remaining to Timoxenus, the Pretor of the Acheans, to continue in his Office (during which time yet Aratus, who was to succeed him, could not execute it) and calling together the Ætolians to the Promontory of Ægium, layed over into Peloponnesus, and invading the Messenians (who being unable to refit, had secured themselves within their City Walls) waisted all with fire and sword. Not only the Messenians, but the Epirotes, Acheans, Acarnanians, and Macedonians also being declared Enemies by Scopas, they gave out Commissions to Pyrats to infest them by Sea. A Ship of the King of Macedonia was taken, and being brought into the Haven was sold, with all the men, and things belonging to it; the Sea-Coasts of Epirus were invaded; Thyreas a Town of Acarnania was set upon, and a band of men being sent privately through Peloponnesus, a Castle there was seized on in the Territories of the Megalopolitans, which yet Timoxenus reduced by the help of Taurion, whom Antigonus had left to oversee his affairs in those parts.

20. The Acheans meeting at Ægium, Decreed that aid should be sent to the Messenians; but Timoxenus whose time was not yet out, being slow in his preparations, Aratus who was to succeed him got the publick signet five dayes before the time, made Levees, and sent to the Ætolians to draw away their Forces out of the Messenian Territories, and not to trouble Achaia upon pain of being prosecuted as Enemies. Scopas and Dorimachus hearing the Acheans were gathered together, marched towards the Elans their Allies (with whom the Ætolians always maintained friendship, that they might the better prey upon Peloponnesus) so that Aratus hearing this, very indifferently, and not like himself (as Polybius sheweth) for that he thought they would retreat, dismissed all his Soldiers except three thousand foot, and three hundred horse, with which, and Taurion his party, he marched after them. He constrained them to fight in a disadvantageous place for himself, so that his forces were overthrowen by them, and many being slain, therest secured themselves in the Towns thereabouts, and the Ætolians passing without let or hinderance through Peloponnesus, attempted to take Pellene, and waisting the Territories of the Sicyonians, passed through the Isthmus, and so returned home. After this the Acheans assembling together, Aratus was grievously accused for taking up the Office before his time, disbanding the Army when he knew Scopas and Dorimachus were in Peloponnesus, fighting the Enemy with so few, when he might have easily had aid from the Towns thereabout, and, which was worst of all, for engaging not his best Soldiers in the plain, but only skirmishing at the Roots of the Mountains, where the Enemy had the advantage of the ground, besides their being the greater number. But as soon as Aratus appearing put them in mind of his former services, answered to the things objected against him, and craved pardon in case he had failed of his duty in the fight, and desired they would examine the case not maliciously, but with humanity, the people changed so in their affections, that they were angry a long time with his accusers, and rested upon his Counsels alone for the future.

21. These things having given the occasion to the Social War, it presently was decreed against the Ætoliens. For, the Acheans meeting together, ordered that some should be sent to the Epirotes, Boeotians, Phocians, Acarnanians, and unto Philip, to acquaint them that they had broken the League now twice by the invasion of Achaia, to desire help against them, and to receive the Messeniens into the alliance; moreover it was resolved, that the Pretor should agree with the Lacedæmonians and Messeniens, what Forces should be raised by their States. The Ætoliens also assembling, that they might make a breach betwixt the Acheans and their associates, resolved to make peace with the Lacedæmonians and Messeniens, but as for the Acheans themselves, they absurdly decreed, that on no other condition would they have Peace with them, except they forsook the society of the Messeniens. The Epirotes, and Philip, after audience given to the Embassadors, willingly received the Messeniens into the alliance; but as for the Ætoliens, not at all wondering at their carriage (for that it being but agreeable to their custom of Piracy and robbing, their custom something excused the badness of the action) they resolved still to keep peace with them. But Scerdilaidas the General of the Illyrians making an agreement with the Ætoliens about his part in the booty, with them invaded Achaia, and took the City of the Cynethense, being betrayed by some Exiles, which their Citizens had lovingly received again; but to pay for their ingratitude, these Exiles were put to the sword as well as the rest, and their City was burnt down to the ground upon the report of the Macedonians coming into Peloponnesus. For, Aratus had sent to Philip again for aid, who came presently with an Army down to Corinth, where the Commissioners from the several associated Cities met him, and unanimously decreed a War against the Ætoliens, in the first year of the 140 Olympiad (as Polybius telleth us) and about that time that Hannibal took Saguntus.

22. While Philip was about Corinth, great stirrings happened at Lacedæmon by reason of him. For such as were his Enemies there, caused some of his party, left they should tell how they stood affected, to be slain, and afterwards the Ephori (who had brought the People to decree a continuance in the League with him) to be murdered as they were sacrificing, and then joyntly their State to the Ætoliens, and after they had heard of Cleomenes his death in Egypt, made a new election of Kings (whereof one was Lycurgus, an obscure man, and not of the Race of Hercules) having lived in way of a Free State about three years, ever since they were set free by Antigonus, till this time, when their liberty lo called, had bred great strife and emulation. Philip coming to Ægium to the general meeting, the Acheans renewed the Leagues and confederacies formerly made with his Ancestors, and then with a great deal of credit he returned into Macedonia, there to make provisions for the War, where spending the Winter in levying Forces, and fortifying that country against foreign attempts, he also dealt with Scerdilaidas, as drew him over from the Ætoliens to his own party, by reason they had not made him partaker of the booty, as they had covenanted with him. During this time several associates were sent to for assistance in the War, and amongst the rest the Messeniens, who though they gave the occasion of it, yet answered, being overpoured by the Pretors of the Ætoliens, that seeing Phylaxas was situate in their borders and belonged unto them, they would not assist in the War, except it was first taken out of the hands of the Ætoliens. Lycurgus the Lacedæmonian King getting some Forces together, invaded the borders of the Argives, and took several Towns, they not standing at all upon their guard, expecting no acts of Hostility from their friends as they counted them, and then was War proclaimed by the Ætoliens against the Acheans. They were much elevated being now in a flourishing condition, the other on the contrary were put to it, for that Philip in whom was their chiefest hope, was only yet providing for the War: the Epirotes would do nothing till they saw him begin; and the Messeniens remained neuter; but shortly after, the marching of Philip from Macedonia revived their hopes.

23. For having got together an Army of fifteen thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse, he departed from Macedonia, for Thessalia and Epirus, intending through them to invade Ætolia. Coming into Epirus, he was perwaded there by the Illyrians that he should sit upon the City Ambracis and recover it, (which the Ætoliens had gotten out of the hands of the Epirotes) to which he was lo unwise as to agree, and thereby lost the opportunity of finishing the War presently, by neglecting to invade the inland Countries of Ætolia, and by harkening to the Epirotes, who more regarded their private profit than the publick good. In the meantime, in Peloponnesus things went on in favour of the Ætoliens: for though they had been repulsed with some loss from Ægira, a City of the Acheans, yet Euripidas the General of the Eleans made inroads upon divers of the associates, got much booty, and took divers Towns with the Castle of the Dimeans; Lycurgus the Lacedæmonian took Athenae a Town belonging to the Megalopolitans; and Aratus son to the other the Captain of the Acheans could hire no Soldiers (because he had been already with much pay) and with fear and indifferency managed the business. Scopas the Pretor of the Ætoliens through Thessaly invaded Macedonia, where waiting all with fire and sword about Pieria, he thence went to Dium, which the Inhabitants not staying his coming, he burnt, and overthrew the Images of the Kings. Philip by this time had taken Ambracis in the space of forty days, and thereby satisfied the greedy desires of the Epirotes; then hearing what Scopas had done in Macedonia, he passed speedily over the Bay of Ambracia, and through Acarnania invaded the Ætoliens.

24. Pitching his tents before Phœteas, after many sharp skirmishes he received that town upon composition, and overthrew a party of five hundred Ætoliens, who were coming to relieve it; after which, as he was waiting the Country, the Ambassadors of the Acheans came to him desiring help. He promised to take their business into consideration, and marched for Metropolis, the Inhabitants of which flying into the Castle, he burnt the Town, and thence moving towards Compe, some Horse endeavoured to hinder him from passing the River, but finding it to be vain, retired into the Town, and after this, none daring any more to thwart themselves, he passed unmolested through the Country, taking many Towns and Castles, the Walls of which he demolished, only Omiade he resolved to fortify. While he thus employed himself, news came from Macedonia, that the Dardaniens had resolved to make an invasion, whereupon judging it requisite to look home, he dismissed the Achean Ambassadors with this answer, that as soon as he had provided for the security of his own Kingdom, he would use his best endeavour to relieve them. Returning that way he came, with great journeys he passed through Epirus, and when he had arrived at Pella, the Dardaniens hearing of his return disbanded their Army, and then he presently marched back into Thessaly, intending to pass away the remaining of the Summer at Larissa, Dorimachus who being created Pretor of the Ætoliens invaded Epirus, and harrying the Country, robbed, and then destroyed the Dodonean Temple; but Philip now in Winter, when it was little expected by any, leaveth Larissa, and passing over his Army from Thessaly into Eubœa, marcheth through Boeotia, and the confines of Megara, and about the Winter solstice, cometh to Corinth, whither calling Aratus the elder to him to consult of affairs, he writes to the Pretor, and several Cities of the Acheans, assuring them when and where to meet him.

25. Having taken this order he departs from Corinth to Diofcurium, a City of Illyria, the Philiatians, and thence to Caphye, where he had appointed the Acheans to meet him, lighting in his way upon a party which Euripidas was leading towards the Territories of the Sicyonians to waste them, whereof two thousand, two hundred he took; the other being slain and perishing amongst the high Rocks, one hundred only escaped with their Leader. This Victory got him abundance of honour (it being heard he was come, and had overcome also at the same time) which to maintain and increase, after he was come to Caphye, he joyntly Aratus the younger to him with about ten thousand men, and marched to Plöphis an ancient Town of Arcadia, situate in the middle of Peloponnesus, and upon the confines of the Eleans, who then had it in their hands, and whither Euripidas their Captain had now withdrawn himself after his defeat. To this place Philip had a great mind, as very convenient for carrying on the War. He got the Town presently, and after that had the Castle yielded to him, and staying there some time gave up the place into the hands of the Acheans, as also Lasione shortly after, which upon his approaching, was forsaken by a Garrison of the Eleans. After this he came into the Country of the Eleans, which giving his Soldiers liberty to sack and plunder, he passed the River

Passing his men over by a bridge he caused to be made, he presently took Alphira, and within six days all Tryphalia, though Phylidas was sent from the Ætolians to aid the Eleans with six hundred men, to whom were joined five hundred Mercenaries, and one thousand of the Inhabitants of Elea. Placing a Garrison in the Castle of the Lepreutians, he came to Herea, where dividing all the booty amongst his Soldiers, and thence marching to Megalopolis, in the midst of Winter, heafterward came to Argos, where he spent the remainder of that Season. During these motions Chilon the Lacedemonian killed the Ephori who had made Lycurgus King; but the fact being not approved, he was glad to betake himself to his heels.

26. Philip invaded again the Territories of the Ætolians, and thence took very much booty, and returning to Argos to winter, sent his Army into Macedonia. At this time Apelles (who was one of them whom Antigonus had left his Guardians) much maligned Aratus, and joining with Leontius Captain of the Cetrati (called so from the wearing of a short buckler) and Megalas the King's chief Secretary, resolved to remove Taurion from the Government of Peloponnesus, and Alexander from his command of the Life-Guard; and had he not been hindered by Aratus, he had accomplish'd his purpose. He had procured also one Eparatus to be chosen Pretor in the room of Aratus the younger, and he managing his affairs very indifferently, the King could get neither money nor provisions, but was fain to flee to Aratus for relief; and now it being resolved to carry on the War by Sea, he consulting with his two creatures, determined to stop up provisions from coming to the Army, and went to Chalcis for that purpose. He so managed his business, as he forced the King to pawn his plate, who now failed against the Cephalenians, whose ships the Ætolians constantly used in their invasions of Peloponnesus, and coming to Patra, there drew up his Ships on shore. He laid siege to the City of the Pateenians, and having undermined a piece of the Wall, sent Leontius to take the place, but he remembering the conspiracy of Apelles, Megalas, and himself to hinder the affairs of his Master, had corrupted the chiefest of the Officers, and suffered himself to be repulsed, so that Philip raised his Siege, and consulted what was to be done. By this time Lycurgus the Lacedemonian King had invaded the Messenians, Dorimachus also the Ætolian had made an inroad into Thessaly, so that from both parts came Ambassadors to crave aid. Leontius counselled Philip to go to Messina; but Aratus to invade Ætolia again, to whom he agreed, having had experience of his wisdom, and beginning now a little to mistrust the other.

27. Writing to the Pretor of the Acheans to relieve the Messenians, he invaded their Country, and taking Thermus, gave his Soldiers leave to plunder the Villages, in revenge for what the Ætolians had done at Diis in Macedonia, and rifled and burnt the Temple, for which he is grievously reprehended by Polybius. After this returning on shipboard, Leontius and Megalas in their cups so abused Aratus, as to throw stories at him, for which the former escaping, the later was imprisoned and fined twenty Talents at a Council of War. Philip then failed to Corinth, whence sending messengers to the associated Cities to meet him at Tegea, he marched thither in two days, and getting some Forces together he invaded the Lacedemonians, and wasted their territories far and wide, put to flight Lycurgus who came out of the City against him, and then returned again unto Corinth. While he prepared to attempt some notable thing upon Phocis; Leontius, Megalas, and Proclus, moved the Soldiers to sedition, which though he knew very well, yet dissembled he it, at present; but Leontius sent for Apelles from Chalcis, who there had very naughtily behaved himself, and now returning was not entertained by the King after the usual manner, nor admitted to the Council. Megalas heret being affrighted fled, leaving Leontius behind him engaged for the twenty Talents, whose Soldiers Philip sent with Taurion into Thriphyllia as upon service, and then sent him into Prison for the payment of the money, and not long after (the Soldiers malapertly interceding for him, that he should not be tried till their return, otherwise they should take it as a great affront) he put him to death. Then came he to Patra, where he had appointed the Deputies of the Cities to meet him about a Peace with the Ætolians, which the Rhodians and Chians had by Ambassadors moved both parties to. Here letters of Megalas were brought to him, wherein he stirred up the Ætolians to proceed in the War, because he would be in great straits for provisions; whereupon he judging Apelles to have been the chief cause of those evils; clapt him up at Corinth, and ordered

Alexander

Alexander to go to Thebes and pursue Megalas. He hearing this killed himself, and Apelles died soon after.

to death for treason.

28. The Ætolians hearing of these stirr in Philip's Court, and thinking thereby some great sedition would be raised, put off their meeting at Rhion about the peace, which he was not at all sorry for, but exhorted the Allies rather to bend their minds towards thoughts of War. Then, coming to Demetrius, there was condemned Proclus, Apelles his Companion, by the Macedonians, and put to death; and, for that Winter was now begun, having sent his Army before, he himself followed into Macedonia. The next year he got Dylazora the chiefest Town of Peonia into his hands, and Thebes Pithiotick also, which the Ætolians holding, much molested Thessaly; but receiving news that Sceerdilaide being revolted, made great waste of all things about Mileas, he returned into Peloponnesus at the time of the celebration of the Nemean Games. Here he received letters that Hannibal had overthrown the Romans at the Lake of Thrasymene; and Demetrius Phariss, who had waged War with the people of Rome, for the Illyrians, advised him to make peace with the Ætolians, and undertaking the affairs of Illyricum pass thence into Italy, and think of no less than arriving at the Monarchy of the World. Being elevated with this fancy, he perswaded the Acheans to agreement and then sending Taurion and Aratus to the Ætolians, who desired a Treaty, at their request he went also himself down to them, and made Peace on this condition, that all parties should enjoy what now they held. Agelaus of Naupactus perswaded the Greeks to imbrace amity, left cutting one another throats, they might be devoured by the Carthaginians or Romans. So all the Cities returned to their ancient Laws and Customs, and this Social War ended after it had continued four years, in the sixth of the reign of Philip, the first of the 141 Olympiad. A. M. 3789.

Philip having

29. Philip applied himself to the recovery of the Cities which had revolted from him, and then thought of nothing more than settling the affairs of Illyricum, necessary for the promoting of his designs, especially the invasion of Italy, upon which his mind was so settled, as sleeping and waking his fancy ran wholly upon it, being spurred on by Demetrius Phariss, not so much for any great affection born to him, as for the others private interest, who thought hereby to recover the Island Pharus, which once he enjoyed; and out of hatred to the Romans, who having overthrown him in War, about this time sent to demand him of Philip, to whom he had fled: After he had recovered the Cities, and sent his Army to the Winter quarters, he bethought him that there would be need of Ships for the carrying on of his project; not for fighting with the Romans, but conveying of his men; so that he caused one hundred swift Barks to be built, and yet in the Spring exercising his Soldiers a little in rowing, away he goes through Euripus near to Cephalenia, hearkening continually after the Roman Fleet. But the report of it's coming, after a short time put his men into such a panic fear, that though he was going towards Apollonia, he tacked about, and in great disorder after a day and a nights sail came back again to Cephalenia. For all this he was not discouraged from his enterprise, but understanding how Hannibal prospered in Italy, thought good to make him his friend, and thereby get an entrance in thither. And this year being the fourth of the second Punick War, he sent his Ambassadors to him.

30. The Ambassadors landing near to the Temple of Juno Lucina, went through Apulia towards Capua where Hannibal then lay; but in their way fell into the Roman Guards, by which they were brought to M. Valerius Levinus the Pretor, then lying about Numeria. Being thus entangled, Xenophanes, one of them bolder and wiser than the rest, told the Pretor they were come from Philip to make a League and Alliance with the People of Rome, at which he rejoicing that after the revoking of their Associates in Italy so great a Prince should desire their friendship, entertained him and his fellows very lovingly, and sent them away with some to conduct them, so that coming into Campania they presently got to Hannibal. The alliance was made on these terms, that Philip with as great a Fleet as possible (two hundred ships he thought he could procure) should pass into Italy, waste the Maritime parts thereof, and help to carry on the War both by Sea and Land: that Italy being Conquered should all fall to Hannibal, and the Carthaginians with all the spoils; and then they should pass into Greece, and there make War upon what Princes or States Philip pleased, who should enjoy what ever places could be got; either in the continent or Islands, he being willing to content himself with these conditions for a beginning. Things being thus concluded, the Ambassadors were dispatched away, and with them some sent from Hannibal, who shipping themselves again where they landed before, Others sent with better success.

31. The Fathers entered into serious debate about it, being much troubled to find, that though they were scarce able to undergo the Carthaginian War, they should be engaged in another with the Macedonian King; yet notwithstanding they were not dismayed, but considered how they might make work for Philip at home, thereby to divert him from Italy. Having therefore imprisoned the Ambassadors, and fold their followers, they gave order for fifty ships fitly furnished to hover about Italy, and if the Kings attempts should appear answerable to the Ambassage, Marcus Valerius the Pretor was then to invade Macedonia. While these things were in hand, one of the slaves which being taken accompanied the Ambassadors to Rome, escaped, and acquainted Philip how things had passed, who then not knowing what was done or concluded betwixt Hannibal and himself, sent Messengers, who dispatched the business with better success, but the Summer was too far spent for him to do any thing this year. These high thoughts and designs he now had in his head did so puff him up, that from an excellent Prince as he was at the first, he turned tyrannical, so that he began to wax harsh against the Cities of Greece, being set on for Demetrius Pharius, who advised him to get Peloponnesus into his power, and for that purpose to seize on the two Horns of that beast, (as he accounted them) the Castle of Corinth, and that of the Messinians, who being now at odds amongst themselves, he laboured to increase their differences; and for that Aratus was dissatisfied at it, and laboured to dissuade him, he cast him out of favour. The year after he had entered into a League with Hannibal, finding it yet not convenient to make for Italy, he took Oricus a Town of Illyricum, in order to the besieging of Apollonia, both which had joyned themselves in society with the Romans fifteen years before. But when Levinus the Pretor heard of it, leaving the Coast of Brundisium to the care of P. Valerius, he halted to Oricus, and presently recovered it, and afterwards sent a party under the Conduct of Nevius Crispus, which getting into Apollonia, afterwards fell upon the Macedonians who lay so securely in their Camp, that about one thousand men entered the Trenches before it was perceived. Hereupon followed such a Pannick fear, that no body endeavoured to repulse the Enemy; and three thousand men were slain or taken. The King getting out of his bed, fled half naked to the ships; which Levinus being aware of, secured the mouth of the River; so that he was forced to fly with a poor unarmed Army by Land into Macedonia.

Paymenedi Aratus.

Levinus the Pretor at Aratus his work enough.

32. About this time, being angry with Aratus, because he was concerned at his ill usage of the Messinians, he procured him to be poisoned by the help of Taurion his Lieutenant in Peloponnesus. At the first the thing was not known, it being a slow working poison, but Aratus himself was not ignorant of it, yet shewed such calmness of mind as he acquainted none with it, but Cephala his nearest attendant, who observing him to spit blood upon the Wall, he only said, This reward O Cephala have we for our friendship to Philip; but after his death he was honoured by all the Acheans as an Hero. Philip about this time casting his thoughts upon Illyricum, got Lysius a strong Town thereof, and Acrolysius his Castle into his power, having divided his Army into two parts, one whereof he hid on the Land-side, and drew the Defendants towards the Sea with the other, so as they in ambush entered the Castle without opposition (otherwise impregnable) after which he got the Town, though with much trouble, and then most of the Cities out of fear submitted unto him. But the same year M. Valerius Levinus withdrew the Ætolians from their society and alliance with him, by shewing them the civility of the Romans towards their friends, and especially by putting them in hopes to recover Acarnania again into their power, having Scopas the Pretor and Dorimachus to back him in this persuasion. And in this new League were to be included the Eleans and Lacedæmonians, Attalus King of Asia the less, Plennatus of Thrace, and Scerdilidae of Illyricum, if they pleased. Levinus took presently Zacynthus an Island near to Itholia, having a City in it of the same name. Oeniada also and Nessus, Towns of Acarnania, all which he gave up to the Ætolians, and then judging he had made work enough for Philip to keep him at home, that he should not think of the invasion of Italy, or of Hannibal, or the Carthaginians, he departed to Coreyra.

33. He was Winting at Pella, when the news first came to him, and therefore as he had determined to pass into Greece in the Spring, and first to invade, and awe the Illyrians, he now made incursions thither, after that into Pelagonia, and then took a City of the Dardanians in the Borders of Macedonia, being as it were the Key into their Country. This done, he halted into Thessaly, where leaving Perseus with a party to restrain the Ætolians, he thence marched towards Thrace against the Mædi, which were wont to make inroads into Macedonia when the King was absent in the Wars; from them he took Jannapharia, and attempted other places. But the Ætolians now aiming at, and expecting great things, because of their conjunction with their Romans, struck terror into almost all the other Greeks; wherefore the Acheans, Beotians, Eubœans, Epirotes, and Acarnanians implored his help, for all which he provided as well as he might, and sent a party to defend Preparedus the Island, at which he heard that Attalus coming into Europe, arrived, being chosen by the Ætolians their Commander in Chief. Scopas the Ætolian hearing he was gone into Thrace, invaded Acarnania, the Inhabitants whereof conveying away their Wives, children, and Aged into Epyrus, vowed never to return except as Conquerors, resolving never to be again enslaved under the Ætolians. This the Enemy hearing, was something amazed at their resolution, and then knowing of Philip his coming, returned home, and he when he heard they had so done, returned also unto Pella. The year after he favoured the Acheans fore molested by Machani- das Tyrant of Sparta, and the Ætolians, and went against Lamia, a City of the Ætolians, who coming out to meet him, he overthrew them in two several engagements, after which they shutting up themselves in the Town he drew down his Army to Phalara a Maritime City of Thessaly, whither Ambassadors came from Ptolemy, the Rhodian, Chians, and Athenians, to compose the difference betwixt him and them. Though not so much out of love to the Ætolians, as for fear that Philip and his Kingdom should grow too great, and become burdensome to the liberty of Greece. The Treaty was put off to the meeting of the States-General of the Acheans, and a Truce made in the mean time for thirty days.

The Ætolians relate peace.

Philip again worsted by the Romans at Elis.

His aids in Greece.

34. It was also begun with this design, to keep Attalus, or the Romans, from coming into Greece; but the Ætolians observing the Term of the Truce almost to be expired, and hearing that Attalus was come to Ægina, and the Roman Navy to Naupactus, hindered the conclusion; first complaining of some things done during the Truce, and then plainly refusing to agree, except the Acheans would restore Pylas to the Messinians, and except the Romans, Athamanians, Scerdilidae, and Phlurats were included in the peace. Philip holding it an unseemly thing that those who had the worst of it in the War should give Laws to the other, broke up the meeting, and leaving 4000 men for a defence to the Acheans, went to Argos. In the mean while P. Sulpicius coming with the Roman Fleet from Naupactus, landed betwixt Corinth and Sicyon, and waited the Country; but Philip lighting upon his men drove them to their ships, and then going to Dyme, cast out thence the Garrison of the Ætolians, called thither by the Eleans. Their Territories he also waited (Cycliadas the General of the Acheans having united his Forces with his) and then went against the City Elis itself. It happened that Sulpicius was secretly got in thither with four thousand men, which struck a terror into the besiegers as soon as they espied the Roman colours, and Philip would fain have drawn off his men; but a skirmish being begun he was forced to charge the Roman Cohort with his horse-men. His own horse being shot under him, a sharp conflict followed about his person now on foot, but he was rescued by his followers, and mounting another fled away. Then pitched he his Tents five miles from Elis, and the next day marching to Pylæus a Castle not far off, there took a multitude of Country people, which with their Cattel had fled thither for protection; but as he was dividing the plunder, a Messenger came out of Macedonia, and informed him, that a certain man of the Ætians had taken Lychnides, and was raising the Dardanians; wherefore leaving two thousand five hundred men under Government of Menippus and Polyphus for a Guard to the Acheans, away he marched into Thessaly, where he heard the Dardanians had invaded his Kingdom, and that he was reported to be slain. After his departure Sulpicius went and wintered at Ægina with Attalus; and the Acheans fought prosperously against their Enemies.

35. The year after, P. Sulpicius Galba the Proconsul, and Attalus departing from Ægina, with their Navies joyned together (which made up fifty sayls) came into Eubœa, and there took Oreus through the treachery of Plator the Governour. Philip now being at Demetrias, great complaints came to him of the Ætolians; who being very high, troubled grievously the Associates; the Acheans moreover being molested again by Machinidas Tyrant of Lacedæmon, and desiring aid, he dismissed the Messengers with promise to provide for the safety of all as near as he could, and appointed fires to be made on the tops of the Mountains, with a Watch-Tower, to give him warning if the Enemy invaded the Sea-Coasts. The fires upon the coming of the Navy to Oreus were by the cunning of Plator made too late; but upon the sign given he halted with his Army (having beaten off the *Ætoli*ans who opposed him at the Straights of Thermopylæ) and came to Elatea a Town in Phocis. Attalus at this time, and the Proconsul having attempted Chalcis to no purpose, came to Opeus, which being taken, the Kings Soldiers were to have the plunder of it, as the Romans had before Oreus. Here he tarrying too long to gather money, was almost surprised by Philip, and halting to his Ships, had not got all his men aboard before he fell upon him; then departing to Oreus, he there received news that Prusias King of Bithynia had invaded his Kingdom, so that he presently returned home, and Sulpicius to Ægina. Philip chiding the Opuntians for yielding so soon, went, and took Thronium inhabited by them of Thebes Phiotick, who being outed thence by him 8 years before, as we said, the *Ætoli*ans had given them this Town to dwell in. After this returning to Elatia (where the Ambassadors of Polomey and the *Rhodi*ans stayed his coming to move him again about the peace) and hearing that Machinidas had determined to set upon the Eleans, he resolved to prevent him. Machinidas hearing of his coming, retreated presently to Sparta, and then went he to Ægina to the general Council of the Acheans, to whom he restored Horæa and Triphylia; and Aliphera to the Megalopolitans. He made some depredations upon the *Ætoli*ans, then returned to Oreus, and to Demetrias, where he gave order for making of Ships; (things being quiet there after the departure of Attalus) and so into his own Kingdom against the *Dardani*ans.

36. The two years following, little or nothing was done by the Romans in Greece, so that the *Ætoli*ans being destitute of their aid (in which they most confided) were forced to make a Peace with him on his own terms. Scarce was it concluded, when Publius Sæmpronius the Proconsul was sent to succeed Sulpicius (who carefully managed his affairs) with ten thousand Foot, one thousand Horse, and 35 Gallies, who coming to Dyrrachium raised the Parthini, and set upon Damallum. Coming a little after to Apollonia, Philip having received the news of his arrival, marched down thither, and would have given him battle, but the Proconsul refusing it, and he not daring to attempt the Town, as also because he was now inclinable also to Peace, he returned again into his own Kingdom. Not long after the Epirotes bearing also the same mind, sent to him, desiring he would think of Peace, which they despaired not of, so he and Sæmpronius would but meet together. He condescended to go down into Epirus, and then came to an interview with the Proconsul at Phœnicæ, together with Aminander King of the Athamanians, and the Deputies of the Epirotes and *Acarnani*ans, where it was agreed that the Parthini, the Cities Dimalum, Burgulum, and Eugenium, should fall to the share of the Romans, and the Aruntæ (because they had desired it from the Senate at Rome) to Philip: in the confederacy were included on the Kings part, Prusias King of Bithynia, the Acheans, Boeotians, Thessalonians, *Acarnani*ans, and Epirotes; and on the Roman, the Inhabitants of Ilium, King Attalus, Pleaurus, the Eleans, *Messeni*ans, and Athenians with Nabis Tyrant of Sparta, and successor of Machinidas, slain in battle by Philopomenus, who now had begun to defend his Country from the Lacedæmonians and others. A truce was made for two months, to have the consent of the People of Rome, who now having turned the War into Africa upon the Carthaginians, were glad to free themselves from all other troubles, and therefore the Peace was confirmed by the suffrages of all the Tribes.

37. But Philip's mind was so injured to action, that he could not but make himself work; for perceiving Philopomenus (now Pretor the second time of the Acheans) to be in great respect for his Military skill and valour, he sent to murder him at Megalopolis, which being discovered, he deservedly incurred the displeasure of all Greece. He kept some correspondence (together with Antiochus the Great) with Polomey Philopater, when living; but after his death, they two consulted together to deprive his young Son of his Kingdom, and might well have done it, (especially seeing the Ægyptian Court was much vexed by the discord of the great ones) had they not both been diverted by the Romans, and punished justly, as Polybius observeth. And though he had been reconciled to the *Ætoli*ans, and used them as his friends and allies, yet now without any pretence did he withdraw Lyfmachia from their society, and and joyned it to himself, after that Chalcedon; and to gratify his Son in Law Prusias of Bithynia, enslaved the City of the Cians, though the *Ætoli*ans had sent them a Captain who commanded in chief, which cruelty so incensed the *Rhodi*ans, as ever after they became his Enemies, and joyned with Attalus King of Asia against him. Very stoutly did he deal with these his adversaries, never being discouraged by any bad success. He had the worst of it in a battle at Sea near Chius, but driving Attalus on Land, and taking his Ship (though he had never lost so many men in any battle whatever before) he ascribed the Victory to himself. For all this War in which he was employed by two powerful adversaries, yet feared he not to undertake another with the People of Rome, which now a few months after the end of the second Punic War was decreed against him, about fourteen years after his entering into confederacy with Hannibal, of his own reign the 23, and the first of the 145 Olympiad. A. M. 3805.

38. For though there had been a peace made, yet it was conceived he had broken it by his molesting the *Ætoli*ans, and other associates, and of late by sending aid to Antibal in Africa, and the Carthaginians: The Athenians by their Ambassadors also called upon the Senate for help, whose Territories he had wasted, and forced them up into the City. The occasion of the War betwixt him and them was from the *Acarnani*ans; for two young men of that Nation coming to Athens, chanced to go into the Temple of Ceres with the other company at the Feast, being not initiated, and for that reason were put to death, as having committed an unpardonable offence, though ignorantly they did it; now this the Athensians took to heart, as they procured Philip to make War upon them. At the same time were come to Rome Ambassadors also from Attalus, and the *Rhodi*ans, complaining that the Cities of Asia were also molested by him; so that now having little to do after the ending of the second Punic War, the Senate unanimously made a Decree, by virtue whereof Marcus Livinius the Vice-pretor was sent into Macedonia with thirty eight Ships brought out of Sicily by Cn. Octavius: afterwards came news further that he was about to take Athens, and then it being proposed to the People the War (through the persuasion of Publius Sulpicius Galba the Consul, to whom it fell by lot) was decreed against him. He had not besieged that City himself, but, sending down Philades one of his Captains thither, went and subdued the Chersonese of Thrace. Only the Inhabitants of Abydos stood out against him, and that with such resolution, as following the example of the Saguntines in Spain, they fought it out to the last, and made an end of themselves, after he had denied to receive them upon any other terms than yielding to mercy. Yet Attalus and the *Rhodi*ans might have relieved them had they not loitered.

39. Sulpicius the Consul coming to Apollonia, upon the desire of the Athensians, sent C. Claudius Cento with twenty Ships out of the Fleet which lay at Corcyra, furnished with Soldiers, to relieve their City. He hearing that Chalcis was badly looked to, though fortified with a Garrison of the Macedonians, went thither, took it with ease, then plundering it set on fire, and returned to the Pireus, or Haven of Athens. Philip was now come down to Demetrias, where hearing this news he passed over Euripus on a bridge, and through Boeotia halted to Athens, thinking to surprize the Town; but the Inhabitants having got notice of his coming, stood upon their guard, and then perceiving his craft failed him, betook himself to force; but this being to no purpose (the Romans coming in, and the Soldiers of Attalus from Ægina) waiting all about the Town, and not sparing so much as the Sepulchers, he went to Eleusine thinking there to get the Temple and Cattle into his power; but the guards being strong, and the Navy coming to help from the Pireus, he marched thence to Megara and so to Corinth. Hearing now that the Acheans were met at Argos, to consult how to resist Nabis Tyrant of Sparta, he went down thither, and came upon them unawares, and promised he would make War upon him, on condition they would but find him Soldiers to keep Oreus, Chalcis, and Corinth. His design was to engage them in the War against the Romans, which they very well understood, and therefore Cyclades the Pretor answered, that it was not lawful to propose any other matter than that for which they were assembled, and so a Decree being made for raising an Army against Nabis, he broke up the meeting.

40. Nothing yet was done by the Roman Consul of himself, but encamping upon the River Aspus between Apollonia and Dyrrachium, he sent L. Apudius his Lieutenant with a party to harraße the Enemies Country, who performed what he went about, taking divers Towns of Macedonia, and then returned with much booty.

booty. Philip being come home, made all provision possible for the War, and knowing the restlessness of the Ætolians, for fear they might side with the Romans, (which yet they had not done) sent his Ambassadors to the general meeting of them called the Panetolians, whither came also L. Furius Purpureo, sent from the Consul, and others from the Athenians. The Macedonian being first heard, advised them to remain in their society with him; the Athenians inveighed bitterly against Philip, as having broken the Laws of humanity and Religion, in violating their Sepulchres, and Temples; then Purpureo sheweth how the Romans had undertaken the War for them, though they formerly made Peace without them, and now how good an occasion was offered them of being restored into their friendship and society, except they would rather perish with Philip. This inclined all their minds towards the Romans; but Democritus the Pretor thought the business was to be put off to the next Council. But not long after Philip fought twice with the Consul, and that so unpropitiously, as he had like to have been taken himself, and then they embraced the society of the Romans, and invading Macedonia, took and burnt Cercinnum, after which going into Perrhebia, Philip let upon them at unawares, and killing many, forced the rest to flee for their safety under the conduct of Aminander into their own Country. This year the Roman Navy joyning to that of Attalus and the Rhodians, took the Island Andrus, and Oreus, the City we have often spoke of, in Eubœa.

41. Philip taking all care possible for the managing of his affairs, the next Spring sent down his Auxiliaries and others through Epirus into Chaonia, to seize upon the Straights near Antigonia, and he himself following after with the strength of his Army, fortified the Vally betwixt the Mountains, through which the River Aous runneth; Athenagoras his Lieutenant he commanded to look to the Mountain Agnus, and he himself pitched his Tents upon the Hill Æropus. To Sulpicius the Consul succeeded P. Villius Tappulus, who coming late did nothing at all, for leading to towards the Enemy, he with a few went to view the Moors, through which his nearest way lay to him, and consulting many days whether he should pass that way, or take the same Sulpicius went into Macedonia, before he could determine, news came to him, that his Successor was already come to Coreyra. This was T. Quintius Flamininus, created Consul, as he was thirty years old, who falling, this Province came sooner then usual, bringing over with him eight thousand Foot, and eight hundred Horse. Being arrived at the Camp, after some consultation, he determined to set upon Philip's Army in the place where it yet lay; but how to do it was hard to be resolved, and forty days were spent in this deliberation, which time Philip was content to make an opportunity to look after Peace, and accept the procurement of it through the Epirotes. They met at the River Aous (or Asius) but the Consul demanded things seeming so hard to the other, that he asked him if he would impose more hard conditions upon one conquered? and so withdrew himself from the conference.

42. The next day followed some light Skirmishes, neither part receiving either much good or damage, but as they continued in this condition, came a certain Shepherd, sent by Charops Prince of the Epirotes, undertaking to lead the Romans through the Mountains an easy way, and bring them upon the Enemies back. The Consul glad of this opportunity, sent a party with him, and then gave an Alarm with the whole Army to the Camp, which the Macedonians received willingly enough, and both Armies being greedy of fighting, they marched out of their Trenches to receive the battle; but then those on their backs setting up a shout, struck them with such terror, that some of them ran away, others by reason of the difficulty of the place for fight were compassed in, and two thousand slain. The King fled again till he came five miles off, and then rallying his men upon an hill, with a great company went into Thessaly. Where waiting divers Towns to deprive the Enemy of Provisions, he hence passed into Macedonia. The Consul following him into Thessaly, laboured to get the good will of the Epirotes, and called to him Aminander King of the Albanians to conduct him on his way; then took he Phaleria (where were in Garrison two thousand Macedonians) which he plundered and burnt, at which also others being affrighted yielded themselves, and Philip not daring to oppose, but keeping within Tempe, sent relief upon occasion to such places as wanted. At Rhaga the Consul found such opposition as he raised his siege, and thence departing took in divers Cities of Phœcia, and besieged Elatea, during which things the Navy under the conduct of L. Quintius his Brother, in Conjunction with Attalus and the Rhodians, took two of the most considerable Towns of Eubœa, and then prepared to venture for Corinth; but by the Consul's advice, they first sent to the Achaens to see if they might draw them from Philip to their own party.

43. Aristenus or Aristinetus (as he is called by Polybius) their Pretor, laboured to persuade them by all means to embrace the society of the Romans, at which the Dymeans and Megalopolitans out of distaste went out of the Council, as unwilling thus to betray Philip, and the rest unanimously entered into Alliance with Attalus and the Rhodians, and for that they could not do as much with the Romans without content of the People at Rome, put it off only till they might send their Ambassadors thither, and Decreed at the present to dispatch away three to Lacius Quintius, and their Army also to Corinth before which he now lay. The Town was stoutly defended by the Inhabitants, and Androfibenes the Governour for the King, till such time as Philocrates came with 1500 fresh men to their relief, after which it seemed best both to Attalus and Quintius to raise their siege, and then Philocrates had Argos betrayed to him. The Consul in this mean time got Elatea, and then taking up his Winter quarters, news came that the Opuntians were at odds amongst themselves, some calling the Ætolians, and some the Romans, desirous to give up their City to them. The stronger and richer part called the Consul, but the Castle was still held by the Macedonians, who could not be got out by any fair words or foul, and when it should have been stormed, came an Herald from Philip, desiring a time and place might be set for a meeting to treat again of Peace, which being granted, they met in the Bay near Nice at the day appointed, where Philip would not come ashore, for fear as he pretended of the Ætolians. Much talk there was on both sides, the treaty being put off from one day to another; but it being required of the King to quit all Greece, he refused to do it, having a great desire to keep Corinth, Chalcis and Demetrias; and then at his request he had leave given him to send Ambassadors to the Senate, and a Truce was made for two months.

44. The Greeks sent their Ambassadors also, and all came to Rome, when the debate was about the Provinces of the new Consul, whether one of them should have Macedonia, according to the custom, or both stay, and carry on the War against the Gauls then depending; for the Tribunes of the people opposed the custom, alleging that the reason why Wars were so lengthened was because there was every year a new General according to the succession of the Consuls. This being referred to the Senate, it was thought fit to continue the Command to Quintius, and then had all the Ambassadors audience. The Greeks inveighed for against Philip, and earnestly laboured that he should not be allowed to hold Chalcis, Corinth, and Demetrias, for otherwise Greece could have no thoughts of liberty. They alleged it to his own saying, that these three were the Fetters of Greece, and that not without reason; for if he held Corinth, Peloponnesus could have no breathing time: if Chalcis, the Locrians, Boeotians, and Phocians durst not mutiny; and if Demetrias, the Thessalians, and Magnetes should not be able as much as to taste of liberty: seeing therefore he pretended to be willing to quit all other places, this was but a shift for the present, seeing if he was master of these places he might recover what he had before; therefore they desired he might either relinquish them or that the War might be carried on, seeing the greatest part of it was finished already. The Kings Ambassadors beginning a long Oration, were interrupted at the first, and asked whether their Master would be willing to leave the three Cities: they answered they had no Commission to answer any thing to that point: and so being chidden by the Fathers they made an end, and the affairs of Greece were again left to the management of Quintius.

45. Philip seeing how things went, wrote to Philocrates to deliver up Argos to Nes, the Tyrant of Sparta, on condition if he prospered he should again restore it to him; but he presently after his getting into the Town, sent word to Quintius, who giving him a meeting, desired he would make peace with the Achaens, and send aid against the King; the later of which he promised to perform, and as for the peace, granted a Truce for four months. Philip shortly after came down again into Thessaly (it being no policy at all to expect the Enemy in his own Kingdom) which Quintius understanding marched thither, where wandering after each other, they both at length in a thick mist came near to some Hills, from the likeness of the heads of Dogs, called Cynocephalæ. Here both their foreguard fixing came to the discovery of each other, and from the skirmishing, and engagement of them, to a set battle, though the King at first did not intend it. The victory seemed at the beginning beginning to incline towards the Macedonians in one Wing; but the other being overpowered, they both at length were overthrown by the skill and valour of the Romans, eight thousand perishing, and five thousand being taken prisoners: Of the Romans 700 were slain. Philip, when he saw how things went, fled towards Tempe; at the entry of which he stayed for such as had escaped, and then passed through that Country into Macedonia. The Romans coming to plunder the Enemies Camp, found the Ætolians got thither before them, at which they fore-repined, and grumbled at their General, as if he exposed them to danger, and granted the prey to others. Flaminius was fore-displeased to see the greediness of the Ætolians after Prey; and as this gave occasion to that hatred, which afterwards manifested itself, so it made him more willing to agree with the Enemy, that he might not leave them masters of Greece.

46. Philip sent presently to the Roman General to desire another Treaty about a peace, who receiving them in a Council of Officers, without calling the Ætolians, used them very respectfully, and presently granted a Truce for fifteen days. This seeming strange to the Ætolians, they presently concluded he was bribed to it by Philip, not accounting better of others than according to their own covetous humour; But he being displeased with them, not only for the matter of the plunder, but also for that they gave out sleighting words of the Roman valour (attributing the good success to themselves) hearing also that Antiochus King of Asia was coming towards Europe, and so fearing Philip might join with him, and then a new Consul coming might take the glory of concluding the War away from himself, he resolved to make an end of the difference, and appointed a day and place to meet at, to which he summoned the Allies. Being met together he willed them to declare their minds concerning the peace, on what terms they would have it made. Antimander very modestly desired Provisions might be made for him, else he was like to undergo the malice of Philip, who would be able presently to crush him. The Ætolians were point blank against the peace, saying, all would prove fruitless, except the Macedonians were ousted his Kingdom, and that Quintus, except he did it, would neither answer the expectations of Greece, nor of those that sent him; to which he replied, that it was not the custom of the People at Rome utterly to undo at once those with whom they Warred, and that the liberty of Greece would better be provided for by the standing of the Macedonian Kingdom, so weakened as it was like to be, than by the destruction of it; seeing then it would be obnoxious to the invasion of the Thracians and Gauls. The day after arrived Philip himself, and the next, coming into a full Council there, very wisely allayed the heats of all parties against him, offering to ratify the former demands of the Romans, and for the rest to submit himself to the pleasure of the Senate. Therefore four months Truce was granted to him, according to his desire, and paying to Quintus four hundred Talents in ready money, and giving up Demetrius his Son, and others for Hostages, he had leave to send to Rome about the conclusion; but with this caution, that if the business should not succeed, he was to have the Hostages and Money returned back unto him.

47. Both Senate and People admitted of peace, though Marcellus the new Consul laboured against it, out of desire to be sent into Macedonia. Philip was enjoined, besides the setting of all Greece at liberty, before the celebration of the Isthmian Games, to restore all Captives and Renegadoes; to give up all his covered Gallies except five, and one with sixteen Oars on a side; to pay one thousand Talents, half at present, and the other half in the space of ten years, at so many payments. Into Greece were sent ten men of the Chief, with whom Flaminius was joyned in commission, to compose affairs, and restore liberty to the several States thereof, which exceedingly affected all with joy, except the Ætolians, who carpated at the Decree, and affirmed that Greece had only changed its Lords; seeing the Romans had Corinth, Demetrius, and Chalcis. When the Commissioners came to sit, some controversy indeed arose about these Towns; for they having it in express charge to set all others at liberty, these were left to their discretion because of Antiochus, who, as all men thought, had intentions to attempt something upon Europe: therefore Flaminius perswaded them to give up Corinth into the hands of the Achæans, and keep that Castle, Demetrius and Chalcis in their own power. Then going to the solemnity of the Isthmian Games he there pronounced liberty, in that great audience, unto all Greece, which so affected the hearers, as with admiration of the thing they were scarce themselves.

lowed, Philip behaved himself suitably enough to the expectation of the Conquerors: afterwards considering, and comparing his present condition with his former, he grew something impatient, and especially amongst other things, this vexed him, that power of animadverting upon those Macedonians who had revolted in the War, was taken from him; for after that Antiochus was overcome, and the War with the Ætolians was now in hand, Acilius the Consul taking Heraclea, and Philip besieging Lamia, when he was in a fair way of taking it, he was commanded to depart from it, that so it might be surrendered to the other. Acilius to pacify him, gave him leave to make War upon Athamania, and to recover the Cities which the Ætolians had taken from the Thessalians; so that he presently drove out Antimander from Athamania, recovered divers Cities, amongst which was Demetrias, and possessed himself of the Country of the Magnetes, and some Cities in Thrace also. This pacified him for the present, yet did he not let fall his indignation, but in time of peace made all provision possible for another War, increasing his Revenues not only by Customs, but by renewing the works of the Mines, and digging others, as also taking care for encreasing the number of his people now exhausted. Whilst he thus employed himself, there wanted not an occasion to inflame his mind anew; for the Thessalians and Athamanians sent to Rome to complain of him; Eumenes also about the Cities of Thrace. The Senate not being willing to judge the matter in his absence, sent three Commissioners into Greece to hear and determine it, who sitting and hearing all parties as Arbitrators, were something provoked by some words he uttered, affirming, that as yet the Sun of all the days he had to live was not set: and all being heard, they Decreed he should withdraw his Guards from all the Greek Cities, and that the Kingdom of Macedonia should be terminated by its ancient limits. As for the Cities of Thrace, much being alleged pro and con, betwixt him and Eumenes; they kept the middle way, reserving the decision of that to the Senate, and ordered in the meantime that his Garrison-Soldiers should be drawn out of them. The Senate resolved he should quit them; and all the Maritime Coasts of Thrace; so that now being sufficiently incensed, he wanted but convenient Forces to make him revolt.

He is displeased at the favour of the Romans towards his younger son Demetrius.

49. Being commanded to quit Ænus and Maronea, with all the Sea Coasts of Thrace, he procured the principal of the Maronites who were strongly bent against him, to be murdered in the night, and then the Romans complaining of it as an unworthy deed, he denied it, and when Onomastus and Cassander the instruments of the fact were required to be sent to Rome, the latter he gave way for to go, but then (it is thought) procured him to be poisoned in the way, left he should tell tales; and as yet his affairs not being ripe for a revolt, he sent Demetrius his younger son to Rome, to purge himself, and deprecate the displeasure of the Senate. Underhand he solicited the inhabitants upon the River Ister to break into Italy. Demetrius had got heretofore so much good-will at Rome, as coming to have audience in the Senate, though he was abashed at that presence, and the heavy loads of imputations laid upon his Father by the Ambassadors of his Enemies. Yet were his Father's faults passed over at this time for his sake, and so much signified to Philip by Q. Marcius, sent into Macedonia to see whether he had done all that was enjoined him. Then did he quit all the Cities of Thrace inhabited by the Greeks, and performed all other things which the Romans required; that he might not give any suspicion, but get leisure to provide for the intended War. With Demetrius his son he was not well pleased, for that the Senate making no account of himself, had given him the credit of deserving only favour; but especially Perseus his elder son conceived great indignation and malice against him, not only for the credit he had at Rome, but being jealous he might deprive him thereby of his Father's Kingdom. Indeed the Macedonians looking upon Demetrius as one to whom they were obliged for saving them harmless from the Romans, designed the succession to him, whom also they held legitimate, but not Perseus, whose mother was no better than his Father's Concubine.

Which advantage Perseus his eldest son improved.

50. Perseus growing more and more sensible of the favour his brother was in both with the Romans and Macedonians, bent his mind to bring him into the jealousy, and hatred of his Father, and thereby to work his destruction. His visit in way of merriment and jollity to him he represents as an opportunity taken to make him away, whereby the young man is called for by his angry Father, and is forced with tears to make an apology, to which credit is hardly enough given, suspicions jealousies getting ground. At length Perseus accuseth him of having dealt with them at Rome underhand about the Kingdom and place of his Father; who sends two thither to enquire of it, but such as were Perseus his creatures and partners in the plot. Philip having a mind to go up to the top of the Mountain Hemus, for to have a view and prospect of the Country round about, took with him his eldest, and sendeth his youngest into Macedonia to look unto it, with whom he sent one Didas Governour of Peonia with a small guard. He being also one of Perseus his Complices, he gave him in charge to insinuate into him, and thereby get out his most inward intentions, which he easily did, the poor young man being resolved to flecto the Romans for shelter, and desirous to use his help therein. This is presently made known to Perseus, and by him with improvement to Philip, who having wearied himself and Soldiers to little purpose, and being troubled with this report, returneth home, calls Herodatus, Demetrius his chiefest friend into Prison, and causeth him also to be narrowly looked to. Some months remained the King thus exceedingly troubled and anxious in himself till the Ambassadors returning from Rome, put an end within a short time to his resolutions.

51. These men being returned, feigned grievous accusations against Demetrius, and amongst the rest brought counterfeited letters as from Quintius, wherein he begs pardon of the King, if the young man had dealt with him in any kind out of his desire to the Kingdom, but promitteth he will do nothing against any one that belongs to him, for that he would not be accounted for the time to come, the author of any evil purpose. Credit being given hereunto, Herodatus is racked to death, confessing nothing, and Demetrius being again accused by his brother of intended flight, is destined to die, though for fear of giving any offence to the Romans, and discovering his intentions against them, it's resolved to be done cunningly. Being sent to Æstreum a Town of Peonia, and thence called to Heraclea, he is there first poisoned by Didas, crying out against the cruelty of his Father, the parricide of his Brother, and wickedness of Didas. Being tormented with the working of the Poison, two lusty Ruffians were let into the room, who filled him with the Tapestry, and so the innocent young man was murdered. His Father within a year or two fell into a sad melancholy, for the loss of him, which being perceived by one Antigonus the son of Echeater, and Nephew also to Antigonus who was Philip's Father, he having been always a faithful friend to the King, laboured to discover to him the whole device, and brought to him one Xystus, who was privy to the whole design. He laid out the series of all things to him. Hereupon Philocles one of the Ambassadors that were sent to Rome being present, was put to death: Apelles the other, hearing his Father's intention to frustrate his expectations of the Kingdom, which he so wickedly sought after, declared Antigonus his heir and successor, saying, he had rather his Kingdom should be destroyed, than ever come into the hands of Perseus.

The device is discovered.

Not long after being spent with extreme grief and melancholy, and having commended Antigonus to the States of Macedonia, and uttered many a bitter curse against Perseus, he died at Ambipolis, after he had reigned 44 years. A. M. 3826, the second of the 150 Olympiads, 146 years after the death of Alexander the Great.

52. Had Philip lived a little longer, Antigonus had got possession of the Kingdom by his means; but things being not now ripe, he lost it by the procurement of the Kings Physician, who when he saw there was no hopes of life, sent and acquainted Perseus with it, and kept close his death till his arrival, so that then having opportunity to oppress his Enemies not once thinking of it, he obtained the Kingdom. Being a little settled therein, he caused Antigonus to be slain, and then sent to Rome to renew the League made with his Father, and to desire that he might be owned as King, doing this only to secure himself for the present, and intending as soon as his affairs would permit, to make use of the preparation his Father had made for another War; as it afterwards proved. His Father a little before his death had prevailed with the Bithynians, who lived near the River Liger, to leave their ancient feat, and come and live in the Country of the Dardaniens, which he intended to give unto them, that there leaving their Wives and Children, they might together with the Scordisci (who being some of those Galls that invaded Thrace, had feasted themselves at the meeting of Damianus and Sabus, and so called themselves) invade Italy. They re-entred Thrace again with quietness, but after Philip's death falling out with the Inhabitants, and pursuing them to the Mountains, they were set upon with such a Tempest as seized on the Galls at Delphi, and being pressed also by the Thracians, only thirty thousand got into Dardania, the rest of the Multitude returning back beyond Damianus. Those that arrived in Dardania now did Perseus stir stir up against the Inhabitants as much as possible, which being distasteful to the Romans, their Ambassadors also returning from Carthage, reported to the Senate that he held intelligence with them there; for his Ambassadors had private audience of them by night, and others were sent by them into Macedonia.

53. About this time some of the Dolopians refusing to obey him, and willing to submit their cause to the Roman Senate, he went down; and by force brought all their Country into his power; he laboured then to curry favour with several Cities of Æolia and Thessaly in his passage, and either sent or wrote to several others in Greece; desiring them that an end might be put to the ancient grudges betwixt his Father and them; the Æolians especially. The Roman Senate upon the report of the stir in Dardania, sent three to see how matters went, but he refused to see them; it being alleged sometimes that he was absent, and otherwhiles that he was sick; but it clearly appeared to them that he was providing for the War, and so much the more, for that the Ætolians were now so feditious, as though their commissions gave them power to take up the differences amongst them, yet could they not prevail by their authority. Indeed now he was better provided to make War than the Romans to resist, having thirty thousand Foot, with five thousand Horse, in readiness, and provisions too for ten years. Thrace was at Peace with him, and though he was so infamous for his cruelty, not only in respect of his brother's death, but also the killing of Apelles, whom he used as an instrument in that business, and also for making away his Wife, and upon other accounts, yet either out of reverence to the Court of Macedonia, or by reason of their emulation against the Romans, were both the Greeks and Asiatics generally more favourable to him than to Emmanuel the King of Pergamus, though of a clean contrary disposition. Emmanuel himself came to Rome to complain against him; to answer to whose accusations he sent Ambassadors and with them the Rhodiens, who inclined to his side, and as Emmanuel returned home, he most basely sent some to murder him, whom though that King clemenced as to his life, yet was he sore wounded in the straight passage to the Temple at Delphi: This as it left Perseus much with his friends, so it made him be the sooner declared an Enemy by the Romans.

His bad carriage towards Emmanuel maketh him the sooner to be declared an Enemy.

54. It was thought good that some forces should be raised to be in a readiness, and that certain Commissioners should be sent into Greece to retain the States in their fidelity, with Soldiers also to put into such places as wanted. He perceiving their resolutions, began to repent himself and procured a truce, that he might send Ambassadors to Rome, the Commissioners giving way to it, for that they knew him in a good posture for War, and themselves unprovided as yet; but the Senate for all this would not grant him Peace, his faults being so aggravated against him, that the War was denounced. P. Licinius Crassus the Consul being sent against him, he had the better of it in an engagement; but yet his heart failed him, so contrary to his former humour, as that then he sent and desired Peace, offering to perform all his Father was tied to; but had answer by the stout Romans, that on no other terms could it be granted, except he absolutely refer himself and Kingdom to the censure of the Senate, and cast all into their hands. After this he sent to Genthius King of the Illyrians, to draw him to his party, having taken divers Towns from him, and might have done himself good thereby had he not been diverted; for that Prince was inclinable enough to him, only he said, he wanted money, which though he had enough by him, yet neglected he to send. He laboured also to draw into his aid Cotys King of Thrace, and subdued again the Dardaniens, but Quintus Jupiter perdere, domestici prius. Q. Marcus Philippus coming against him, by reason of the difficulty of the wayes, and want of provisions, might easily have been utterly defeated; but he cried out he was conquered, without fighting ran away, left the Straights open for his Enemy, sent to Thessalonica to burn his Ships, to Pella to cast his treasures into the Sea, and then being angry with the Melengers, the one for that he had not obeyed him, the other for that he had, he put them both to death and recovering most of his treasure by those that dived out of the water, only satisfied himself for this madness by recovering Dius, which had been taken by the Enemy.

His confession of mind.

55. P. Paulus Emilius the Consul was at length sent against him, who found some difficulty at first to come to him, having incamped himself near the Sea under the Mountain Olympus; but Scipio Nafica getting over a Rock led the way, and then Perseus retired, and pitched his Tents near to Pydna. The Consul was warie of engaging with him (who now had an Army of thirty nine thousand Foot, and four thousand Horse) his own men being tired; but the night before the fight, the Moon being eclipsed, so terrified the Macedonians, that they accounted it to preface the Cato*, and son in Law to the Consul, behaved himself so stoutly, as this encouraged the rest, and thereby he was the means to gain the victory. Of the Macedonians were slain twenty thousand, and six thousand taken; of the Conquerours but one hundred lost their lives. Perseus fled to Amphipolis, and finding there no relief, layd by Samothrace, where hoping to be secure in that sanctuary, C. Octavius the Admiral being sent after him, promised by the voice of a Crier safety and freedom to all that would come in, whereby he was forsaken of almost all his followers, and Ion of Thessalonica gave up his young children into the hands of the Romans. He thought now of clapping to Crete; but, being left thus, gave up himself and eldest son to Octavius, when he had reigned eleven years; and after being led in Triumph by the Consul was cast into Prison at Alba, where for seven dayes he lay in a most bad condition, till through the importunity of Æmilius it was changed into a better. Two years he thus continued, and then through the desire of life and liberty, encouraging himself in new and vain hopes, ended his dayes, some say through the barbarousness of his Keepers, who would not suffer him to take any rest, but others, by course of nature in free custody, having his Funeral discharged at the publick cost. ## CHAP. V.

The Asian and Syrian Kingdom.

From the death of Seleucus, to the reducing of Syria into the form of a Roman Province by Pompey, containing the space of two hundred and twenty years.

FOUR or five years after the death of Cassander, it hapned that Antiochus the eldest son of Seleucus fell in love with Stratonice, daughter to Demetrius (which woman we said before that Seleucus married, after her father was overthrown, and beaten out of Asia) and for that he was ashamed to reveal his affection, pined away, and resolved to starve himself, had not his disease been discovered by Erasistratus the Physician, by the changing of his countenance when he came in or out, and by other tokens. Seleucus, who was ready to redeem his sons life with his own blood, presently gave him her to wife, though he had a Child by her; and that the business might seem to proceed of himself, calling his Army together, he declared it to be his pleasure to make them two King and Queen of all the upper Countreys, having married them together; and that he thought his son, who had hitherto been obedient to him in all other things, would also herein be ruled by him; but if his wife should distaste so unusual a thing, he desired his friends to strew and persuade her, that whatsoever the King should think fit, and the affairs of State required, that she ought to account of as just, and fitting. After this he took Demetrius her father, and imprisoned him in the Chorfoneus of Syria, where he died, after three years as was before said, and within a year after his death fought his last (and the last of Alexander's Companions) battel with Lysimachus, in which he being Conquerour, and his Enemy slain, left Asia wholly to his son, having a desire to go into Macedonia (where he had never been since he came over with Alexander) and end his dayes in his Native Countrey. But as he was journeying towards Lysimachia, he was traitorously slain by Phlomy Cerannus whom he had lovingly entertained, A. M. 3722. twenty three years after he had taken the title of King, being aged 73. and 42 after the death of Alexander. From his Conquests he was called Nicator and Nicator, and is reported to have had

Antiochus succeeded his father, and was named Soter from repelling the Gauls, which in his time at the invitation of Mithridates King of Bithynia had seized on part of Asia. Having with many battels recovered (though not all) his Fathers Kingdom from divers, which now began feverally to pluck the parts of his great body, he sent over a strong party under the command of Patrocles beyond Taurus, who took to himself Hermogenes for his Lieutenant. He intended amongst other places to fall upon Heraclea a City of Pontus; but the Inhabitants coming out, and pacifying him, he made a League with them, and thence through Phrygia invaded Bithynia, where in an ambush laid for him he was cut off, though he fought stoutly with his whole Army, after which Zipetes the King built a City upon the Hill Lysipolis, which being called after his own name became famous, and not long after he dying, left his Kingdom to Nicomedes his eldest son. Against him Antiochus being about to undertake an Expedition, he craved help of those of Heraclea, promising them to requite them with the like favour in their necessity, which they took as an occasion to fall off again, and break the League made with Hermogenes; and partly by force, and partly by purchase recovered divers places taken from them, and attempting to do so by Ameisus, which one Eumenes held, he chose rather, out of anger, to deliver up the Town to Ariobarzanes the son of Mithridates, than to sell it to them. Not long after Antiochus and Antigonus Gonatas being at difference, and preparing for the War on both sides, Nicomedes joyned himself with Antigonus, against whom therefore the other thought first to try his strength. Mithridates fortifying himself, procured 13 Gallies from Heraclea, which adding to his own Fleet, he went against that of Antiochus, but facing one another for some time, they departed at length without a fight.

Antigonus Gonatas being resolved to venture for Macedonia (where his father Demetrius Poliorcetes once reigned) though he had already been overthrown by Phlomy Cerannus, who now held that Kingdom, made a League with Antiochus. This Prince might be the more willing to embrace it, by reason that the Gauls were now come into Asia, brought by Nicomedes of Bithynia to help him against Zybeus (or Zipetes) the younger, who held from him (whether his brother or no is uncertain) the Maritime part of that Countrey. After they had helped him to recover Bithynia, they harraled all the Countreys far and wide, and though they were but twenty thousand, and of them but half fighting men, yet struck they such a Terror into all Nations on this side Taurus, as most, though they had never seen them, submitted unto them. But Antiochus, as we have it from Appian, repelled them from his Territories, and thence, for saving the Countrey harmless, had the name of Soter or Saviour, having before sent asaid into Greece five hundred men against their Countrey-men, under the conduct of Telearchus the Syrian. After this having married his daughter Apame to Magas King of Cyrene, and brother to Phlomy Philadelphus, he was persuaded by his Son in Law to break the League which his father Seleucus had made with Phlomy, and invade Egypt; but as he was about to do this, he was gathering forces for it, Phlomy sent several parties of Soldiers into all the Countreys over which he reigned, whereof some taking the parts of Robbers, and others of Enemies, diverted him from his purpose. The last engagement he was in that we read of, was with Eumenes, the first King of Pergamus, near Sardis, from whom he received an overthrow.

For there was one Phileterus an Eunuch born at Tier in Paphlagonia, and belonging to Lysimachus who made him Keeper of his Treasure placed at Pergamus, which he built very strong upon the Hill. He continued very faithful to him, till such time as Asiane caused him to murder Agathocles his eldest Son, at which he being troubled, and thereupon the accusing him to her husband, he revolted from him, and sending to Seleucus offered himself, and the money to him: then in the troubles betwixt them two so cunningly behaved himself, as he kept possession, and always swaying upon, and obliging the next, and most potent Prince, remained Master of the place and Treasure for twenty years; For Seleucus being murdered by Phlomy Cerannus, he redeemed the body with a great sum of Gold, and sent the ashes thereof to this Antiochus Soter his Son. This Phileterus had two brothers, Eumenes and Attalus, the former of which had a Son of his own name, who succeeded his deceased Uncle, and having in his possession the places lying about Pergamus, overthrew Antiochus (who now it seemeth counted him an encroaching neighbour) as we said before. Antiochus also built a City in Syria, which he called by his wives of one Hermias, who now ruled all at Court, conspired together to withdraw all the upper Provinces from their allegiance. This Hermias a Carian by birth, had been left by Seleucus to look to his Kingdom when he took his Expedition over Taurus, and then being set in so high a place, began to envy the power of all others, grew proud and cruel, his malice above all others being against Epigenes, who had been Seleucus his General; for that he saw him to be a wife and prudent man, and the Army much in his devotion. A Council being called to consult about the Rebellion, Epigenes advised that the King should go in person to suppress it; for thereby the Rebels would either be terrified and desist, or the Country at his preference would be moved to cross their designs, and deliver them up; but Hermias interrupting him, imputed this to a desire that the Kingdom should miscarry, that thereby he might seize upon his estate, and prevailed that two others should be sent against Molo, and the King go against Ptolemy Philopater (who now thinking himself secure in the youth of Antiochus, and Philip of Macedonia, had given himself up to all luxury) hoping thereby to have an easy War of it, for that he was of a cowardly disposition, and hoped by exposing the young King to dangers and hazards, to escape the punishment due unto him, and maintain that power he already enjoyed. Antiochus being very young, was very earnest to get Celestria, and Hermias to prick him still forward, framed a letter from Achæus, wherein he tells he is desired by Ptolemy to take the Diadem and assume the title of King to himself, promising to send him ships, money, and all things necessary for that enterprise.

Who procured him to march against Ptolemy, though Molo rebelled.

He is necessitated to go against Molo.

11. Having married first Laodice daughter of Mithridates King of Cappadocia, he prepared for his Expedition, when news came that Molo went on with his design, and how the Captains sent against him, out of fear had secured themselves in Garisons. Hereupon he bent his mind to go himself, but Hermias being tenacious of his purpose, again diverted him, telling him, it was fitter for Subjects to fight against such, and Kings against their equals, and so sending one Xinetas an Achean against Molo, again turned his mind now obnoxious to him for want of years. Then marched they to Laodicea, and thence through the Defart to the Valley called Mursia, lying between the Mountains of Libanus and Antilibanus, where about the Straights he took in divers Towns; but the principal Fort held out and put him to a stand, which made him the more desirous to go now against Molo; For Xinetas, who was sent against him with full power, growing arrogant and careless, had rashly ventured over the River Tigris and then Molo making as if he fled, came upon him in the night, and cut him off with most of his men, and those that escaped the Sword taking the River, scarce any got to the other side. After this, Molo pursuing his Victory took Seleucia, all the upper Provinces, the Principality of Babylon, those parts lying upon the Red Sea, all about Tigris as far as Euphrates, and Mesopotamia as far as Dura; only the Castle at Susa stood out, the Town being taken; Antiochus at this report called a Council to consult what was to be done, where Epigenes expostulating that his former advice was not followed, moved the same again; but was taken up as before by Hermias, with foul language, who desired the King he would not think of leaving Celestria; but all being for going against Molo, it was concluded, and he was glad to comply for his own turn.

12. The Army before it stirred mutinied for pay, and then Hermias taking advantage at the Kings necessity; offered to lay down money, on condition Epigenes might be removed from his presence, which having obtained, he procured the mean to be murdered. The Army marched and came to Antioch in Mygdonia at the Winter solstice, where staying forty days till the extremity of the cold was over, after forty days it came to Liba, Molo then lying at hand about Babylon. Here a Council of War being called to consult which way was to be taken, that they might not fall of Provisions; Hermias was for going along by Tigris, that is, and two other Rivers, Lycus and Kapros, they might have for a defence; but Zeuxis, though fearful to speak because of him, shewed the danger of that advice, because it would be a great compass, and after six days travel through a Defart, they should come to a place called The Kings Ditch, which if the Enemy got before them, they should in no wise be able to pass, and be reduced into great Straights for want of Victuals; but on the contrary, if they passed over Tigris, there was no doubt but the Inhabitants of the Country called Apolloniatis would return to obedience, obeying Molo at present out of necessity; further, in that plentiful Country they should have plentiful of Victuals, and (what was most considerable) Molo would be hindered from retreating into Media, and thereby being straightened, after that the place where he yet remained was emptied of provisions, would be forced to fight, or if he durst not do that, then his Soldiers would revolt to the King. This counsel being taken, all things fell out accordingly; for Molo fearing his passage into Media might be stopped, little trusting those parts in which he then was, determined to get if he could, to the hilly Country of Apolloniatis; but it hapned that the Scouts of both parties met there, and skirmishing for some time, afterwards retreated to their several Bodies, and so gave occasion to a total engagement the day following.

13. Molo considering how dangerous it was to bring his Soldiers forth in open face against their King, thought it the best way to chuse out the most strong and valiant, and set upon his Camp in the night. Going about to do this, ten men went over to the King and told him the design of the Rebels, so that Molo was glad to return, and put his other Army left behind him into such an Alarm, for that they were ignorant of the enterprise, that much ado he had to quiet them. The King being provided to fight, drew out his men by break of day, and placed them in batalia; Molo could but do it in great disorder and confusion, by reason of that consternation which fell upon his men in the night. In the fight which presently followed, the right Wing of his Army stood fast to him, and fought very earnestly, but the left as soon as it came in fight all revolted, which he understanding, now compassed in with Enemies, and considering the torments he was likely to undergo if taken alive, killed himself, and so did all his companions in the conspiracy, but his body being found was nailed, for an example, to a cross in the highest parts of Media. After this Victory Antiochus settled the affairs of these Countries, dealing more mercifully with his Subjects than was desired by Hermias, and then resolved to invade the Territories of the Barbarians lying upon his borders, to terrify them from afflicting his rebels for the time to come; which Hermias disliked for the danger of the War, his mind still running upon Celestria, but news being brought that a young son was born to the King, he was content he should expose himself to this danger, hoping that in case he should miscarry he must be made Guardian and Protector of the infant, but he was ignorant that his just reward hung over his head. For one Artabacanes, his Country being invaded, being unfit for resistance because of old age, made Peace with Antiochus, submitting to whatsoever he demanded, and at the same time Apollonius the Physician to the King and his great favourite, perceiving Hermias not able to bear that high condition to which he was advanced, any longer, being solicitous for his Masters safety, and much more for his own, so wrought the King (inclined enough to it before) as being called to walk abroad one morning more early than usual, before his return he was made away.

And Hermias put to death.

14. Antiochus his mind was now turned towards Achean, who, though at the first he had born himself very modestly, being elevated with success, and thinking that the King in his expedition against Artabacanes might possibly miscarry, or if he did not, yet hoping that he being at so great a distance, he might have opportunity enough to break into Syria, and have help to seize upon the Kingdom, marched with his whole Army from Lydia, and coming to Laodicea in Phrygia, then set the Diadem upon his head, and first took the Title of King upon him. He continued his march till he drew near to Lycounia; but there the Soldiers mutinied, refusing to fight against their natural King, so that seeing this, he strove to persuade them that he had no intention to invade Syria, and diverted his course to Paphlagonia, which harassing, and increasing the Army with booty thereby, he returned home again. The King not being ignorant of any of this, first expostulated it with him, and sending him threatening messages, put off the rest for this time, and set himself with all his might to prepare for the War against Ptolemy. Consulting then what way to invade Syria, he was persuaded first of all to attempt Seleucia (held by the Phoenicians ever since the Invasion of Euergetes, to revenge the death of his Sister Berenice) being the Chief Seat almost of the whole Empire, from whence would arise much trouble being thus in the Enemies hands, and very commodious by its situation for carrying on the War both by Land and Sea. He first then corrupted some of the Officers of the Garrison within, who promised, that if he could but take part of the Suburbs, they would procure the whole Town to be yielded. This being done, the Conspirators came to the Governour, and moved him to yield, as from the necessity of the thing, who being struck at this consternation, as it appeared, of the Soldiers, surrendered presently the Town upon Composition.

Yet Antiochus maketh War upon Ptolemy for Celestria.

And getteth into Sileucia.

15. While he was employed about this Town, Letters came to him from one Theodotus, desiring him with all speed to come into Syria, signifying that he would betray it.

it all into his power; for he being an Æthiopian born, had done the Kings of Egypt special service, but was so well requited for it as he was brought into danger of life, and therefore at what time Antiochus went against Molau, looking upon Ptolomy as a defpicable Creature, and distrustful his Courtiers, he had seized upon Ptolomæus and Tyre and solicited him to come down. Now therefore Antiochus putting off the business of Achens till another time, marched down to Marjse, the same Valley and Straights as before, where hearing Theodotus was besieged in Ptolemais, he went, and relieved him, and then having that Tyre delivered up unto him, and beating the Enemy out of the Straights, he had then determined to march towards Pellusum, but understanding that Ptolomey's Army was come thither, and all opposition possible making for hindering his passage, he went on in taking in the Towns thereabouts, divers whereof presently submitted, and others stood it out. Ptolomy himself being given wholly up to sluggishness, though thus betrayed, took no order about his affairs; All the burthen of them lay upon Agathocles and Sophisus, then the greatest Officers of State, who being able men, sent up and down to raise Forces, and make all speedy preparations for the War, thought to divert Antiochus they sent Ambassadors to him to treat of peace (as desiring only to go that way to work) and procured Embassies from the Rhodiens, Byzantines, Æthiopiens, and them of Cyprus, to mediate betwixt them, during which they gained time, and deceived the Enemy, carrying all things to clofe as his Ambassadors could understand nothing of their Provisions. A Truce was granted by Antiochus for four months, during which time he willed them to fend to him Seleucia, giving hopes to make up the difference, but contrary to his intentions: though now he was in a manner constrained to return into his own Kingdom, for that Achens plotted against him, and held Intelligence with Ptolomey.

16. The Commissioners coming to debate the particulars according to their instructions, Antiochus laboured to overcome them with his Arguments for the justice of his cause, as well as with his Weapons, pleading he had done Ptolomey no injury in making that invasion, for that he had but recovered his right, alleging much the Conquests of those parts by Antigonus Coeles, and the possession of them by Seleucus, and that Ptolomey the first waged not War with Antigonus for his own particular, but to help Seleucus to the Sovereignty of that Province, but above all, he pressed the common agreement of all the Kings, made at that time when Antigonus was overthrown, wherein by Lysimachus and Cassander, all Syria was decreed to Seleucus. On the contrary, Ptolomey's Commissioners aggravated the height of the injury offered to him, by the unworthiness of cloaking with the treasonable practices of Theodotus, and affirmed, that Ptolomey the Son of Lagus intended the Dominion of Syria to himself, and joynt with Seleucus on no other terms, than that indeed all Asia should be his, but Syria fall to his own share. Such like objections and replies as there were made often to no purpose, but that which put the greatest stop to the Treaty, was the comprehending of Achens in the League, which Ptolomey stickled hard for, and the other as impatiently heard, crying out of the unworthiness of the thing, that he should protect, or make any mention of Rebels. Winter being thus spun out with these discourses, and Spring drawing on, Antiochus intending to set upon the Enemy both by Sea and Land, drew together his Forces, to the taking in of what remained unconquered of Syria; and Nicolaus on the other part, as the Egyptian General, with Perigenes the Admiral, made all possible provision for resistance.

17. Antiochus going to Marathus, there entered into Confederacy with the Aradians; then entering Syria through Theopropios came to Berytus, in his passage taking in Botris, and burning Trieres and Calamus. The Mountain Libanus straightning much the passage betwixt it and the Sea, and almost making it impassible, Nicolaus with a party also placed himself in the Straights, not doubting but to stop Antiochus there: but he dividing his Forces, and having his Fleet constantly near off him, caused it first to engage with the Egyptian, in which fight both sides came off on equal terms, but Theodotus beating back the Enemy upon the Mountain, got over, and then cleared the passage below for the King. He after this came near Sidon with his Army, but judging it no purpose to set upon the Town very strong with men, and full of Provisions, he gave order to Diogenetus his Admiral to go with the Fleet to Tyre, and marched to Philoteria situate upon the Sea of Tiberias, which he took, together with Sythopolis. Now he conceived great hopes of the perfecting his work, being come into a Countrey plentiful of Provisions, so that placing Garrisons in these two Cities he took in Abasyrum by a Stratagem, making as if he fled before the Inhabitants, but having men lying in wait who arose against them, and then the whole Army with such violence, as put them into a great fear, and they yielded up the place. After this, Kareus, one of Ptolomey's Chiefest of Officers revolted to him. Hippolochus the Thebaisian brought over with him four hundred horse, and then the Arabians moved by his success joyned themselves to him. Shortly after he took in Galatis and Gadara beyond expectation, because of the strength thereof; but the Inhabitants terrified at his preparations themselves: then hearing that a great number of Enemies had met at Rabath-ben Amos, or Rabatana, a City in Arabia, and thence made incursions into the Territories of his friends, he marched thither, and striving by force in vain to be Master of the place, at length he effected it by stopping the course of Water, for want of which it was then surrendered. Then leaving a strong Garrison here, and sending Hippolochus and Kareus to Govern the Coasts of Samarita, he went to Ptolemais, and there took up his Winter quarters.

18. Ptolomey to give him a stop, prepared against the Spring a great Army, and then marched from Alexandria with seventy thousand foot, five thousand horse, and seventy three Elephants, and came to Pellusum. Antiochus hearing this, gathered his Forces together, amounting to seventy two thousand foot, six thousand horse, and one hundred and two Elephants. Ptolomey proceeding on his journey came to Gaza, and thence near to Raphia (the first City of Syria, except Rhinocerus, as one cometh from Egypt) and Antiochus passing by that place shortly pitched his Tents at first within ten furlongs of the Enemy, and the next day, partly for the commodiousness of the ground, and partly to embolden his Soldiers, approached within five furlongs of them. Being so near, several skirmishes fell out amongst those which on both sides issued forth for provisions, and Theodotus the Æthiopian, after a most bold adventure taking but two in his company, for that he had been in Ptolomey's Court, and knew his manner of life, went out in the dusk of the evening, and not being known got into the Kings Tent where he used to give audience, and though he missed of him being in a more obscure place, yet wounded he two which waited there, and killing out-right Andreas his principal Phytician, escaped back in safety to his own Camp; having only failed of his purpose for want of informing himself whenthe King was wont to take his rest. For five dayes continued these two Princes in this posture, and then both resolved to try the matter in a set battel.

19. Ptolomey first drew out his men, and then presently Antiochus ranged his in battel array against him. Each of the Armies had two wings, wherein the two Kings met each other, guarded with Elephants, betwixt which the fight was begun, after Antiochus had caused the charge to be sounded; their manner being first with their Trunks to thrust each other, and strive for the ground, and then after that for the one by force to remove the other's Trunk, and to fall upon him like a Bull, and gore his sides. Few of Ptolomey's beasts would fight at all, for that being Africans, they could neither endure the smell nor noise of those of India, so that the ranks being disordered by them, his left Wing was quite broke by the charge of the Enemy, and put to flight. Ebercates, who commanded in the right, stayed first for the engagement of the former, then seeing that his Elephants would not fight, gave order to Phinidas Commander of the Mercenary Greek to invade his opposites, and he himself also wheeling about to be out of the danger of the Beasts, fell upon the Flanks and Rear of the Enemies Horse; so that both together they made them all being Arabians and Medes to give ground, and put all the Wing to flight, thus being even with Antiochus. Then came the bodies themselves to engage: Antiochus was buile in the pursuit of that Wing wherein he fought; but Ptolomey coming to his Army much encouraged the Soldiers, and disheartned his adversaries, who being charged by Andromachus and Sophisus, the Syrians for some time maintained their ground, but the rest scarce fighting one stroke flinied for themselves. Antiochus being yet unskilful and young, was still following the chase, (thinking because he had the better of it in his Wing, that therefore his whole Army overcame) till admonished by some one about him, he returned, and seeing things so contrary to his expectation, endeavoured to break in with his Guard; to the place where his Army stood, but finding all his men fled, retired also unto Raphia, being persuaded that he had done as became him, however, by reason of the Cowardliness of others the work had miscarried. On his part were slain little less than ten thousand Foot, about three hundred Horse, and four thousand taken prisoners; three of his Elephants were slain outright, and two afterwards died of their wounds.

But Ptolomy thought of nothing less than molesting him, being overjoyed that he had above all expectation recovered Celestria, and desiring exceedingly to be quiet, out of his sluggish disposition, and other vices familiar to him; wherefore at first receiving the Ambassadors with threatening language, and complaints of the injuries received from their Master, he presently granted a Truce for a year, and then sent Sophis to confirm the League, wanting onely courage and resolution to spoil Antiochus of his Kingdom.

21. Antiochus spent all the Winter in preparations, and in Spring marched over the Mountain Taurus against Achens, whom he befieged in the City Sardin. Above a year he lay before it, having only sometimes light skirmishes with the defendants, till Lagoras a Cretian, a man of great experience, observing that the strongest Cities are many times taken at such places as are by reason of their strength least looked to, and perceiving a piece of the wall, beyond which they used to throw cannon and filch into a pit, to be destitute of any watch, by the fitting of fowls upon it, which came to feed on the carkeises, he took unto him Theodorus the Etilian, and Dionysius, with some Soldiers, and they made a lift to get over and open the gates; the King to divert the Enemy making as if he would give the onset at another place, and so the Town was taken. Achens and Aribazus the Governour got into the Castle, and then were straitly befieged again, till such time as Solimus the chief Minister of State in Egypt, pitying the condition of the former, made means for his deliverance, which by the treachery of the instrument wrought his destruction. There was at that time in the Egyptian Court one Bolis a Cretian, second to no one Captain; as he was reputed, for prudence, extraordinary boldness, and military skill; with him Solimus dealt, having obliged him by his favours, and assured him that nothing could be performe more acceptable to the King his Master, than some way or other to work the deliverance of Achens. He asking some time to consider of it, within two or three dayes took the business upon him, which to effect he had as he said a good opportunity, for that Cambyses the Commander of the Cretians serving under Antiochus was not only known to him, but his kinsman, and had the charge of a Fort behind the Castle, which, because it could not be fortified with works, was kept by a continual Guard of Soldiers.

22. Being supplied with money largely by Sophius, and loaded with promises, away he failed for Rhodes: to Nicomachus, and thence for Ephesus, to Melanchon, his acquaintance, and friends of Achew, with whom dealing about his business, he sent one Arianus to Cambylus to let him know that he was sent from Alexandria, to raise Forces, and that he must needs speak with him, desiring he would appoint time and place for their meeting, without the privacy of any. Having obtained this, and bethinking withhimself what to do, he gave him a letter concerning which like Cretians they had a Cretian conference, as Polixius termeth it. For not respecting the safety of the besieged, or their faith given to those that employed them, but agreeing to divide the ten Talents already given in advance by Sophius, they resolved to acquaint Antiochus with the matter, and undertake upon promise of money in hand, and a good reward afterwards, to deliver Achew into his power. This being with great earnestness promised, Bolus prevails with Nicomachus and Melanchon, wholly ignorant of his treacherous intent, to write letters in cipher to Achew, which he sent by Arianus, for whom passage was procured into the Castle by means of Cambylus. Achew being earnestly advised by his two friends to trust Bolus and Cambylus, and withall considering the difficulty from him to escape, hoping if he got out to pass presently into Syria whilst Antiochus was yet at Sardis, and then to get all the parts about Antioch into his power, yielded to put himself into the hands of Bolis, who was sent presently by Melancomas with great entreaties and promises if he could accomplish the business. Bolis went to Cambylus at night, and staying with him the next day to consult of the business how it should be managed, after he had been with Antiochus, and was much encouraged by him, he went up for Achens into the Castle.

23. Receiving Bolis with great respect, and after all his lifting of him perceiving nothing disagreeable to ferrioufness, he much rejoiced; but bethinking himself how weighty a thing it was, and what a hazard he was like to run, he trembled again at the thought of it, and at last resolv'd to send some before to Melanconius; but at length out he went of the Castle, and according to former agreement, Bolis coming behind him by a whistle gave a sign to those in Ambull, and held him by the clothes till he was taken. Being brought into Antiochus his Tent, who late late at night with a few attendants to see the issue of the project, the King was amazed, and could not forbear weeping to see him, so eminent a man, lie bound before him upon the ground in so bad a condition; but a Council of War being called, after several ways of punishment propos'd, at last it was agreed, that he should have his outward members and limbs cut off, after that his head, and that being saw'd into an Affes bladder, his body should be nailed to a cross, which was executed accordingly. This end had he who was son to Andromachus the brother of Laodice Wife to Selenus, who had married Laodice daughter to Mithridates, and had held all Asia on this side Taurus, having recovered it by his own industry and valour: a man he was exceeding wise, and of great experience, yet left (as Polybins observeth for us) a double warning to posterity, not to trust any rashly, and not to be puffed up with posterity, or be secure of any thing incident to mankind, to which we may add another, viz. that none presume to rebel against their Sovereigns, for punishment will overtake them. His death being known within, as they all first agreed in making lamentations for him, so shortly after they fell at odds, being divided into two factions, of which the one stuck to his Wife and the other to Antiochus the Governour; so that having suspicion of each other, both parties yielded themselves and the place to Antiochus.

24. A year or two after, Antiochus undertook an Expedition into the Eaſt to reduce Media and Parthia which had revolted, and he paſſing through both, there-upon cauſed Aſaces to withdraw himſelf into Byrcania, which he conſidering, and judging that he would not have forſaken this Countrey if he had been able to have defended it, reſolved to follow him, ſo that with great difficulty he paſſed over the hills, and entred alſo into that Region, where we finde that he took ſome Towns; but what further he did againſt Aſaces, or upon what terms he returned, if Polyſius his Hiſtory had been kept entire, we might have known. After this he quieted the upper Alia, and coming into Bactria for a good while endeavourd to drive out thence Euthydemus the King thereof, whom he defeated, and behaved himſelf, moſt ſtoutly, whence he got great credit for his valour. At length Euthydemus complaining that he was injurious in oppoſing him ſuch who had not revolted from him, but cut off the poltertry of thoſe that had, beſeeching him alſo not to envy him the name of King, eſpecially conſidering that by this dilention neither of their affaires could be ſecure, for that a number of the Scythian Nomades hovered at the borders, and were like to overrun the Countrey, Antiochus, who being tired with the tediousneſs of the War, had ſought occaſion to make a Peace, not unwillingly now heard the overtures of it, eſpecially after that Euthydemus ſent his ſon Demetrius to him, with whom he was fo taken for his perſon and parts, as thinking him worthy of a Kingdom, he firſt promiſed him one of his daughters, and then yielded that his Father ſhould take the title of King. Then the conditions of the league being writtten down, and ſworn to, and taking with him all the Elephants that Euthydemus had, he marched over Caucuſus, and renewed the confederacy with Sophaſgenus the Indian King; then taking with him more Elephants (of which he had now one hundred and fifty) and leaving Androtiſthenes of Cyzicus to bring the treaſure promiſed him, he cameto Arachofa, and ſo through Drangiana into Carmania, where he was forced to Winter, having received this fruit by this Expedition, that beſides the Countreies recovered, and the maritime Cities and Dynaſties on this ſide Taurus added to his Dominions, he ſtruck ſuch an awe into his Subjects, as kept them more in order, and he waſtought to be eſteemed as well by the People of Europe as thoſe of Alia, worthy to govern.

25. Not long after this, Ptolemy Philopater dying and leaving a young son behind him but four years old, Philip of Macedonia and he (as we before hinted) made a wicked wicked League for the ouing him of his Kingdom, and dividing it amongst them, wherefore he striking again at Celestria and Phoenicia, got Judea into his power, which * as Josephus telleth us, was toiled betwixt these two Crowns as a ship with the waves. For Scopas the Ætolian recovered it again out of his hands for young Epiphanes, and yet again not long after lost it with Celestria, being overthrown by Antiochus (near the fountains or heads of Jordan) at the City Panæas, with whom the Jews then presently joyed, but the Inhabitants of Gaza standing still out for Protony, their City was taken and razed. In the mean time whilst Scopas was recovering the Cities of Syria, Antiochus himself was busie in invading the Kingdom of Attalus, who then being employed with the Romans in the Macedonian War against Philip, had left it naked of defence both by Land and Sea, but upon his complaint to the Roman Senate they sent to Antiochus to tell him, that seeing Attalus was employed by them against Philip the common Enemy, he would do a thing very acceptable unto them to abstain from his Territories, adding withall, that it was convenient for all the Kings which were the friends and allies of the People of Rome to be at peace amongst themselves; with the authority of which message he was so moved, as he drew out his Army again from the borders. But this respect to the Romans continued not many years, he entering upon such courses as gave them offence, and proceeding therein at length to an open War.

26. For having reduced all Celestria into his power, and wintered at Antioch, the next Spring sending before his two sons Ardes and Mithridates with the Army, and command to stay for him at Sardis, he himself followed with the Fleet to attempt the several maritime Towns of Cilicia and Caria, which were under Protony, and also to help Philip both at Sea and Land, who now was busie in the War with the Romans. Divers places by fair and foul means together he took in; yet Coraceum stood out, and whilst he lay before it came Ambassadors from the Rhodiens to denounce War against him, in case he came within Nephele the Promontory of Cilicia, not out of any hatred to him as they said, but left joining with Philip he should hinder the Romans now active for the liberty of Greece. Though he heard this with much disdain, yet thought he it wisdom to give them good words for the present, and please them in this particular, but they, after all danger was over from Philip (who this Summer was beaten at Cynosephale) not tying themselves with him to the former condition, sent aid to the Cities their associates, and preferred several in their liberty. He took at length Coraceum, and after it several others, and amongst the rest Ephesus, where wintering, he endeavoured to reduce also the Cities of Asia, under the obedience they paid to his Ancestors, and thinking it not difficult to be done by any of them, except two, viz. Smyrna in Æolis, and Lampascus upon the Hellepont, he sent Forces to besiege them both.

27. Now the Romans, with all others, doubted not but his Army was for Europe, after his affairs had succeeded in Asia, and they had the more cause to be jealous of him, for that Hannibal their old and sworn Enemy had now been with him; therefore in the setting of the Greek Cities at liberty (after the overthrow of Philip King of Macedonia) the Senate had left it to the Commissioners appointed for that work, to deal as they should think fit with Chalcis, Demetrias, and Corinth, the keys of the Country, and whether out of a desire of the glory of setting all the Greeks at liberty, or to awe and affright him, they decreed, that all such Cities, as well in Asia as Europe, should be freed. The ten Commissioners sitting now in Greece about these affairs, they of Smyrna and Lampascus (whom he had besieged) sent to them for relief, and Antiochus himself thinking fit not to anticipate his opportunities, sent thither also his Ambassadors, to whom the Commissioners layd open the pleasure of the Senate, and in case he contain not himself and Forces in Asia, threaten him with War: and withall promise that some of their number should come to him. Yet he in the beginning of Spring comes over into Europe, got a great part of the Cheronesus into his power, and then marching to Lyfmachia, there found the Commissioners, who pressing him to the things formerly mentioned, he demanded by what right the Romans questioned with him about Asia, seeing he medled with nothing done in Italy; and added, that the Greek Cities should obtain their liberty, nor by their commands, but his bounty. Now it was moved that those of Smyrna and Lampascus might be heard; which being obtained, and the Delegates using their liberty of speech, he out of indignation, that he should be forced to plead with them before those Judges, interrupted them, saying the

Rhodiens (and not the Romans) should have the hearing of the cause; and so the Treaty ended without any conclusion or agreement at all.

28. A rumour was spread abroad, during this Treaty, that Protony the King of Ægypt was dead, which much affected both parties, yet strove they to hide it from each other: Lucius Cornelius one of the ten, who was also ordered to endeavour the reconciliation of the two Kings, demanded a little time to go into Ægypt; and Antiochus being restless, out of an itching desire to get that Country into his hands, failed with his Fleet back to Ephesus, whence sending again his Ambassadors to treat with T. Flamininus chief of the Commissioners (on purpose to hold them a little in hand till he could bring about his design) came to Panæra, where he heard that Protony was alive. Now he changed his purpose of invading Ægypt; but withal resolved for Cyprus, to attempt that Island; but such a tempest fell upon him, that he almost lost his whole Fleet. Not long after, Hannibal being driven from home (by the malice of such as incensed the Romans against him, whilst he only endeavoured the Publick good) returned to Antiochus, who though before he did but fluctuate in his resolutions for the War, yet was now confirmed by him so in his purpose, that henceforth he thought not so much of it, as of the reward of the Victory. Hannibal denied that the Romans could be overcome any where but in Italy, and desired but one hundred Gallies, sixteen thousand Foot, and one thousand Horse, with which he would first go to Carthage, hoping to draw his Countrymen to revolt, and though that should not succeed, yet would he seize upon some part of Italy. The King closing with his propositions at this time, he went not himself, but sent a certain Lyrian to Carthage, who under pretence of trading should break the ice; but he being suspected by Hannibal's adversaries, was glad to shift for himself, and notice thereof was presently given to the Romans. In the mean time Antiochus sent three Ambassadors to Rome, who under colour of procuring a right understanding, should feel how the Senate stood affected. They expostulating the matter, that their Master should be forced to quit the Cities of Asia, and forsake his ancient right in Thrace, were referred to the Commissioners in Greece for answer; to whom repairing, Flamininus and his Colleague, urged that the King should either leave Europe, or the Romans have power to protect their friends in Asia, and make as many more there as they could. The Ambassadors answer, they neither can, nor will conclude any thing to the prejudice of their Master's crown, and so the Peace was not nearer than before.

29. Antiochus his resolution being set therefore for the War, that he might prevent any thing that would divert or call him back, he resolved to make alliances with his neighbours. To Protony he married his Daughter Cleopatra (giving with her in portion all Celestria, which before he had taken from him;) to Ariarathes King of Cappadocia another named Antiochus; and a third he offered to Eumenes of Pergamus, but he being acquainted with his design to make War upon the Romans, and by this affinity to oblige him to his party, conceiving it also his interest rather to stick to them whom he had some ground to think would prove victorious; he waded his offer. In Spring he set upon the Psyllide, a people inhabiting about Selga, being desirous first to bring all Asia to his beck, and at the same time came Ambassadors from Rome to discover his designs and preparations, and either to take the edge of Hannibal's hatred, or at least by their intercourse with him to render him suspected to the King. Visiting Eumenes first, as they had it in charge, they were engaged on by him to the War. Sulpitius one of them falling sick, was forced to stay at Pergamus, but Vilius hearing how Antiochus was employed, went to Ephesus where Hannibal then lay, and according to his instructions often met and discoursed with him. Thence he travelled to Apamea, where the King met him; but news coming that Antiochus his Son (whom he had lately sent into Syria) was dead, it broke off the Treaty; so that Vilius loath to be unreasonable returned to Pergamus, and the King breaking off the War, to Ephesus, where holding secret consultation with one Minio, he gave way that the Ambassadors should be called thither. When they had there arrived, they were referred to Minio, and both sides arguing for themselves as formerly, came to the same conclusion, and the Romans having scarcely obtained that they came for, returned home.

30. The Ambassadors being departed, Antiochus then fell into another serious debate about the War, to which Hannibal being now suspected was not called, till acquainting him how, when a Child, his Father had made him swear at the Altar never to be a friend to the people of Rome, all jealousies were removed. About the same time came Thoon, and others from the Ætolians (who being fallen out with the the Romans about plunder, after the overthrow of Philip at Cynosephale, had ever since greatly grudged, and now stirred up the several Princes against them, offering him the Command of their Forces, and exhorting him to pass over into Greece, where things were ripe enough for the War, and not expect the coming down of his Army from the Inland Countreys. They having gotten Demetrius (a Town of prime note) into their hands by a wile, in confidence of an opportunity there arising, he came over with an Army of ten thousand Foot, five hundred Horse, and six Elephants, after which going to the general meeting, he was by a publick Decree received as General, and then sending to summon Chalcis, had the Gates opened to him, and so easily became Master of all Eubœa. In the midst of Winter holding another Council, he thought fit the Thessalonians should be, by all means, drawn in to joyn with them; but Hannibal pressed above all things that Philip and the Macedonians might be dealt with; for then as he said, the Thessalonians, and other Grecians (seeing themselves invaded by the Romans) would easily return to their accustomed duty: he advised further, that the Forces with all speed should be sent for out of Asia; and this only was observed. Antiochus returning to Chalcis, fell in Love with an obscure Girl, daughter to Cleopolemus his Host, with whom prevailing at length to marry her, he spent all the remainder of the Winter in feasting and jollity, his Army for Company falling into idleness and all excess.

The preparations of the Romans resolved on.

Antiochus his acts in Asia.

31. Hitherto the Romans had rather severally, every man by himself, designed him an Enemy, than made any preparations against him. Italy was Decreed this year to both the Consuls; only one of them, if need should require, was to be in readiness to march to any other place, and Attilius Serranus one of the Prætors, was ordered with his Fleet to go into Greece, and attend the affairs of the Confederates; and with him four Commissioners, men picked out, who by their authority might persuade much. Moreover Marcus Bibulus was commanded to draw down the Legions towards Tarentum and Brundisium, that thence, if need should be, they might pass over into Macedonia. But upon Antiochus his crossing the Hellepont, Eumenes King of Pergamus sent his Brother Attalus to acquaint the Senate therewith, and that the Ætolians were preparing to joyn with him; whereupon Bibulus was then ordered, with all his Forces, to pass over into Epirus, and hover about Apollonia. The next year came over M. Acilius Glabrio the Consul, with ten thousand Foot, two thousand Horse, and fifteen Elephants; who taking in divers places held by Antiochus his Garrisons, marched towards the Bay of Malæa, took Thaumachia, and wasted the Territories of Hypata. Antiochus something herewith awaked, sent to the Ætolians to have all their Forces in readiness, and then came down with less than ten thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse; but fewer of the Ætolians came together than usual, and his own Army, expected out of Asia, loitered, so that wanting it, and forsaken of his Confederates, he fortified himself in the Straights of Thermopylae, and sent the Ætolians (whereof there were but four thousand) to keep Heraclea and Hypata. Upon the approach of this Consul, bethinking himself of the Mountains, which he knew had been formerly paid by some of Xerxes his Army, and fearing the Romans should come over upon his back he procured some Ætolians to secure the passages. But Glabrio hearing of it, sent M. Porcius Cato (then a Colonel in the Army) and L. Valerius Flaccus to beat them off, which being done by the former, he got over, and approaching the Enemies Camp, they at the first light supposed them, to be friends; but then again understanding their error, cast away their Arms and fled. But being closely pursued five hundred of them only escaped, though but fifty of the Romans were missing.

32. Antiochus flying to Chalcis, passed thence with his new married wife unto Ephefus, after whole departure the Gates of Chalcis were presently opened to the Consul, who having taken in Phocis and Boeotia in his passage thither, all Eubœa presently returned to obedience. Then fell he upon the Ætolians, whom (though not long before they had sent to the King for aid, yet) now he forced to yield, and after he had used their Ambassadors something roughly, and threatened to chastise them to purpose; through the intercession of T. Flaminius, gave them liberty to send their Ambassadors to Rome. Antiochus now lay at Ephefus altogether secure of the Romans; but Hannibal told him, he rather wondred they were nor there already, than doubted at all of their coming, and procured the Forces to be sent for out of the upper Provinces; and with those ships which were ready the King sailed into the Chersonesus of Thrace, fortifying it, and placed friends

Garrisons in Sestus and Abydos, where the Romans were to pass over the Hellepont into Asia. At this time Loius Salmator being sent from Rome to succeed Attilius in the Government of the Fleet, came with it to Delus, which Antiochus hearing, halted from Thrace to fight him before the Rhodes and Eumenes should joyn with him; but they coming in in good time, his Fleet was worsted, and chased as far as Ephefus.

33. After this defeat he set himself with all his might to repair his Navy, and left his Son Seleucus in Æolis to look to the Maritime Coasts. Lucius the Roman Admiral coming into the Hellepont, took Sestus, and had done the same by Abydos, had not Polyxenus a Fugitive of Rhodes, destroyed by Treachery all the Fleet belonging to that Island; whereupon he raised his siege and departed. Seleucus fell upon the Territories of Pergamus, and then besieged the City it self (Attalus being unable to grapple with him in the field) with whom also at length Antiochus himself joyned, till hearing that the Roman and Rhodian Fleets were coming to relieve the place; and, worse than this, that Lucius Scipio the Consul (together with his Brother the African) was already in his march as far as Macedonia, and preparing now to pass the Hellepont against him, he sent to Eurytus Rhegillus who had succeeded Loius in the Fleet, to treat of a peace. He calling Eumenes from Pergamus, and the Officers of the Rhodians to consult, these were content to Treat, but Eumenes being averse to it, and urging that nothing could be concluded before the coming of the Consul, an answer to that effect was returned to the King, who leaving his Son still before Pergamus, harried the Territories of the Roman Confederates, and taking divers places, returned to Sardis. Seleucus was presently beaten off, and forced to raise his siege, by one thousand Foot, and one hundred Horse, sent to relieve the place by the Æcheans, and Hannibal returning with ships from Syria, was met by the Rhodians, who put him to flight, and caused him to be blocked up in Pamphilia.

34. Antiochus from Sardis sent to Prusias King of Bithinia, to joyn in Confederacy with him against the Romans; but he (though he formerly hung in suspense, yet) of late was fully drawn to their party by the Letters of the Scipios, and an Ambassage sent from Rome for the same purpose. Failing therefore in this enterprise, he went to Ephefus to his Navy, where (concluding that no other way could he hinder the Consul's passing the Hellepont than by being strongest at Sea) he resolved to try another battle, and so set upon the Maritime Town near to Ephefus, that the Romans coming in to succour their friends, Polyxenus his Admiral might have an opportunity to work some notable feat. But he engaging with ninety Gallies against Eumenes and the Rhodians, who made up a Fleet together of about eighty three, being overmatched both in the valour of his men, and the nimbleness of his Vessels, he lost forty two of his Navy (thirteen of which, together with the men, were taken) having broken but two of the Romans, and by meer chance carried a Rhodian away with him to Ephefus. The King now terrified at the message of this third overthrow, madly drew out his Garrison from Lysimachia (which might have given a stop to the passage of the Consul) lest it should be cut off; and raising his siege from before Colophonis, departed to Sardis, whence he sent into Cappadocia, to Ariarathes his Son-in-law, for aid, and all over else where he could bethink himself, he raised Forces, neglecting in the mean time his true opportunities. For, the Scipios in the mean while came to Lysimachia, where they were received with such plenty of all things, as if Provision had been made for the Roman Army, and thence marched through the Chersonesus of Thrace to the Hellepont, where all things being in readiness through the care of Eumenes, they passed off without any disturbance into Asia.

He sends to the Consul about a peace.

35. Antiochus being so bestord as to lie still, and suffer the Consul quietly to come over, was now exceedingly discouraged, and sent out of hand to him, and his Brother, to treat of peace; with order also to deal in private with the African about it, whose authority he knew would sway his Brother to either side indifferently. The Ambassadors being arrived at the Roman Camp, deferred the delivering of his message till the African's coming, who was yet behind; but after his arrival, and audience given, had these conditions set him: To pay all the expenses of the War, of which Antiochus had been the cause, and not only quit the Cities in Æolis and Ionis but all Asia on this side the Mountain Taurus. Being now wait satisfied with the proposals, he made no further overtures to the Consul; but, according to his instructions, offered to his Brother (in case he would procure a peace on the terms proposed by his Master) the restitution of his Son who had been taken Prisoner, as much Money as he would ask, and more than that, to be partaker of what the Kingdom it self would amount to. The African answered, that the discharging of his Son would exceedingly oblige him, and as for the rest, had he kept Lymnachia in his hands, fortified the passage into the Chersonesus of Thrace; or at least had he opposed them at the Hellepoint, and then offered these conditions, much might have been done for him. As things now stood, he advised to confide into what estate he had brought himself, by all means to decline the War, and refuse no conditions offered to him. But he thought no harsher terms could be imposed upon one already Conquered, and therefore casting off all thoughts of peace, made what Provision he could possible for a battle.

He prepared for a battle.

36. The Consul being desirous to do something before Winter (which now drew on) resolved, if possible, to fight him, though, his Brother the African falling sick, had departed to Elesa, to whom Antiochus now to comfort him, restored his Son without any ransom; which hapning as a Cordial to him in that condition, he advised him in way of requital (being able to do no more at present) that he should not engage in fight with his Brother, before his return to the Camp. Being much moved with his authority, he declined an engagement to his utmost endeavour; but the Consul still digging him from place to place, and being ready to storm his Camp, for fear of utterly discouraging his men, he was forced to draw them out. (a) Some say he had seventy thousand Foot, and about twelve thousand Horſe, (though others (b) mention but seventy thousand in all) with fifty four Elephants. The Consul brought into the field but thirty thousand, whereof two, being Macedonians, were left to keep the baggage; and sixteen African beasts placed in the rear for a reserve, left (being worsted by the Indians) they should break their ranks: The battle was fought near Magnesia a Town situate at the foot of the Hill Siphus. It hapned then that such a mist fell as blinded to the Kings Army, that both the sides thereof could not be seen to one standing still in the same place; and their weapons were also spoiled with the wet. His Chariots armed with fitches which he had placed in the front, proved his ruin: for the Horſes being gored with arrows (according to the direction of Eumenes) brake down all behind them, and so disordered the ranks, that the Avsiliaries fled; which occasion the Romans taking, pressed hard upwards, and discomfited the whole left wing. In the right he had better fortune; for he put both Horſe and Foot to flight, and drove them to their Camp; but M. Rutilius Lepidus who was left there for the security of it, met them; and forced them to face about and to charge the pursuing Enemy, so that he and Attalus (the Brother of Eumenes, who came in in good time with two hundred Horſe) renewed the battle with such earnestness, that now the King (who ere while gave the charge) betook himself to his heels. The Roman Cavalrie, in the pursuit, did great execution, and the rather, because of the multitude of Chariots, and Camels, which blocked up the way; inſomuch as fifty four thousand were slain, and one thousand four hundred taken. Of the Romans fell but three hundred forty nine.

Wherein he is overthrown.

37. Antiochus, with a few about him, fled to Sardis, and thence to Apamea, making Zeno Governour of the former, and Timon of Lydia; but they were despised by the Soldiers and Townſmen that held the Castle, who gave up the places to the Consul; which was followed as an example by divers Cities of Asia. The Consul being once arrived at Sardis (with his Brother now upon his recovery) the King presently sent and desired safe conduct for some Commissioners to treat of Peace. This being granted, Zeno who had formerly governed Lydia, and Antipater the Kings Brothers Son, ſhortly after arrived, desiring their Master might know upon what terms to purchase the friendship of the People of Rome. Publius Scipio the African, in the name of the rest, answered, that the Romans used not to insult over their conquered Enemies, and therefore nothing should be required of him more than formerly; save only to pay fifteen thousand Talents of Babea to defray the charges of the War, by certain portions; four hundred to Eumenes (together with such Corn as was due to him, by virtue of an agreement made with his Father) to give up Hannibal, Thoas the Petolian, and other incendiaries, and lastly, to deliver for the performance of these conditions twenty Hostages. These proposals being accepted of, Ambassadors were out of hand dispatched to Rome, to pray the confirmation of the Peace, which accordingly was ratified both by Senate and People; and for that Eumenes and the Ambassadors of Rhodes, differed about some Cities in Asia, it was ordered by the Fathers, that the People inhabiting on this side Taurus, which before obeyed Antiochus, should now be subject to Eumenes, except Caria and Lydia as far as Meander; and these should be delivered up to the Rhodian. As for the Greek Cities, they which were formerly tributaries to Attalus, should to remain under Eumenes his Successor; but such as had been under the jurisdiction of Antiochus, should be left to their own Laws: and ten Commissioners were sent to compose all differences risen betwixt the several Cities and States.

38. Antiochus, unwilling to give up Hannibal, gave him notice of what was required, that he might suit for himself. The Province of Asia being taken from him, he said the Conquerors dealt bountifully with him therein; for now seeing his Kingdom was contained within moderate bounds, he was only discharged from too great a burthen of Government. Two or three years after, he got another Army together, and having declared his Son Selenus his Successor, made a progress into the upper Provinces; where (either for that he really wanted money to pay the Tribute imposed on him, or took that occasion to pretend poverty) hearing the Temple of Jupiter Belus in Elymais to be exceeding rich, he went with his Forces by night and spoiled it of a vast treasure, making a show as if War had been made upon him by the Inhabitants thereabouts, who getting knowledge of it, came upon him, and without the help of any other, destroyed him and his whole Army. This is the end which, by the consent of Historians, hapned to him; though one there be * that telleth us, how after he was overcome and banished beyond the Mountain Taurus, he was slain by his Companions, whom he had beaten in a drunken fit. He died when he had reigned thirty six years, A. M. 3818. in the second of the one hundred forty eighth Olympiad, one hundred and eighty five years before the Era of Christ: M. Rutilius Lepidus, and C. Flaminius being Consuls.

He is slain in Elymais.

His son Selenus assumed Philipater's succeeded him.

The treachery of Simon a Benjaminite against his religion and Country.

Selenus is slain.

39. Selenus his Son succeeded him (whom he formerly declared his Successor as was said) in the thirty fifth year of Philip King of Macedonia. This Selenus Surnamed Philopater, was no stirring man, and might have an excuse for it, being lo weakened by that blow his Father received from the Romans. Once he got together a considerable force of men, and prepared to pass over Taurus to the aid of Pharnaces King of Pontus (who now waged War with Ariarathes of Cappadocia, and Eumenes of Pergamus); but bethinking himself that it was not lawful to do it, by virtue of the League which the People of Rome had made with his Father, he gave over his enterprize. He revered much at first the Temple of Hierujalem, allowing out of his own revenues the charges of the publick Sacrifices; but afterwards his bounty was almost turned into rapacity by the means of Simon a Benjaminite. This man being Captain of the Temple, and in contention with Onias the High Priest, when he could not have the better of him, told Apollonius Governor of Celeſyria and Phenicia, that in the treasury there were great sums of money, which the Priests having no need of, it might well enough be taken out into the Kings Coffers. Apollonius acquainting the King with this, he sent Heliodorus his Treasurer to seize upon the money, to whom Onias declared that it belonged to widows and orphans, that the sum of it amounted but to four hundred talents of Silver, and two hundred of Gold, and that such was the holiness of the place, that it must not be violated. Heliodorus not being persuaded by this, entered the Temple, and was smitten by an Angel dead for the present, but being restored by the prayers of Onias, returned to the King, declaring the holiness of the place, and power of God. Simon after this calumniated Onias, as if he, who had well deserved of his Nation, had been the cause of this evil, and being backed by Apollonius, in his fury proceeded to slaughters, so that Onias was forced to go to Selenus, and, as some have it, got him banished, though it seems not incredible that the King was dead ere he came to him, being slain by the treachery of Heliodorus after he had reigned twelve years.

40. He left a son behind him named Demetrius, whom he sent, being but young, to Rome, an Hostage in the room of Antiochus his younger brother; for that he was rtyed by the agreement made with his Father, to change the Hostages at the pleasure of the Romans. But when he dyed Antiochus was in his way home come as far as Athens. Eumenes therefore and Attalus, that they might bind him to them, being now a little offended at, and jealous of the Romans, drove out Heliodorus, Apas is Sy- who affected the Kingdom, and placed him in possession of it. He was called by the Syrians Epiphanes or Illustris, because strangers usurping the Kingdom, he appeared the vindicator of the Dominion of his Ancestors, though others accounted him him rather Epimanes or Mad, because of his Phanatick practices, and by the Angel he was termed a vile person. Being possessed of the Kingdom, he would slip privately out, with two other in his company, and wander about the City, keep company and drink with the meanest persons, coming on a sudden upon them with his cup and musick. Laying off his robe he put on a gown, and according to the custom of the Roman Candidates (who flood for Offices) took the people by the hand, desiring their voices for the Adulship or Triumphship of the people. Having then obtained the Magistracy by the Suffrages of the people after the Roman manner, he sat and gave Judgment out of an ivory chair with such diligence, as the wisest wou'd have it meant, some attributing it to simplicity, some to impudence, and others to madness it self.

2 Alectab. 4.

Jason the Jew having bought the High-Priesthood out of his brothers hands, is served in the same manner by Antiochus.

Antiochus seized on Egypt.

Again.

Jason regeeth at Jerusalem against his Countrymen.

Antiochus his cruelty and prophaneness against Jews and Temple.

41. In Syria he was not acknowledged at first by those who favoured Ptolemy; but afterwards obtained it by a counterfeit clemency, and then having entered into League with Eumenes, seized himself strongly enough. In the beginning of his reign Jason the brother of Onias the third, the High-priest of the Jews, purchased the Priesthood of him for three hundred sixty Talents of Silver, and another rent of eighty Talents; and not satisfying himself with wronging his brother, promised one hundred and fifty more for a Licence to set up in Jerusalem a place of exercise for the training up of youth after the fashion of the Heathen, whereby an inlet was made, as unto idolatry, and prophaneness, so unto that bloodied and cruelty which ensued from the wickedness of this Prince, his instruments and successors. For three years only kept he this Office, being then served in his own kind. For, sending Menelaus the brother of that Stemon whom we before mentioned, to the King, to carry the money promised, and solicit his affairs, he circumvented him after the same manner he had done his brother, promising for the Priesthood, over and above what he payed, three hundred Talents; so that he had his desire, and Jason was forced to flee into the Country of the Ammonites. Antiochus being seized of Celestria, Ptolemy Philopater, who pretended it belonged to him being passed over to his father as his mothers portion, fought to recover it out of his hands, whereupon he marched down to Egypt, which, having overthrown his Enemies in battle betwixt Pelufium and the mountain Cassus, he easily got into his power, pretending friendship to the young King for all this, and a provident care for his affairs. Menelaus taking occasion at his absence, took divers Golden Vessels out of the Temple at Jerusalem, some of which he gave away, and others he sold to Tyre, and other places, for which being accused of Sacrilege by Onias the lawful-High-priest, he procured him to be murdered. Going on in such mischief he was accused to the King; but bribing Ptolemy the son of Dorymeus, got off, and procured the death of his accusers. At this time Antiochus went down the second time with a great power into Egypt, which he recovered again (the King thereof flying before him) and getting the fortified Towns into his hands, he staid, till the sons of the Jews procured his return to their destruction.

2 Alectab. 5.

42. A false rumour being spread abroad of his death, Jason having got one thousand men at his heels, set upon Jerusalem, and getting the City into his hands, forced Menelaus into the Castle, and then made slaughterers, as if he had not been amongst his Countrymen and kindred, but foreigners and Enemies, yet obtained he not the Priesthood, but was forced to betake himself back into the Country of the Ammonites, where being accused to Aretas King of the Arabians, he fled from place to place like a Vagabond, hated of all men as a forsaker of the Laws, and as the publick Enemy of his Country, and died at length at Lacedaemon. Antiochus hearing in Egypt that they at Hierusalem rejoiced at the report of his death, and suspecting because of these stirr of Jason, that Judea was about to rebel, in a great rage departed thence, and came and took the City by force, and giving no quarter for three days space, put eighty thousand to the Sword, and afterwards sold as many. Yet not contenting himself with this, he prophanely entered the Temple, Menelaus that Traitor to his Country being his guide, and rifling it of the holy Vessels, killed swine upon the Altar, and with the breath of the Beast of them sprinkled the place; then taking away with him one thousand eight hundred Talents, he got him back to Antioch, leaving behind him to afflict still the people at Jerusalem his 13. Philip a Piryan, and Andronicus in Samaria; and besides them Menelaus more grievous to, and despicable against, his fellow Citizens, than the other. Two years also after this, he sent Apollonius a cruel man with an Army of twenty two thousand, commanding him to kill all that were arrived at ripeness of age, and sell the women and children for slaves. He coming to Jerusalem, kept himself still until the

the Sabbath, and then taking the opportunity of the solemnity of the day, set upon those employed therein, then running through the City flew a great multitude, plundering and setting it on fire, pulled down the houses and walls round about, and led away many women and children into captivity, whilst Antiochus his Master was busie again in his attempts upon Egypt.

43. For Ptolemy being stirred up by Rhodus the Eumeb to attempt again the recovery of Celestria, to prevent that, he went down into Egypt, where putting him again to flight, he might have destroyed all his men, but riding to and fro himself to forbid it, he thereby procured such love, as he presently got into his hands Pelufium, and not long after all Egypt, except Alexandria. Ptolemy after this sent his Ambassadors to him, with those of the Acheans, Athenians, and others, to execute the matter; and lay all the blame upon the Eumeb; but getting no good thereby, after he had spent some time carefully without any further provision for his affairs, he departed to his younger brother to Alexandria, whom the Citizens there had made King after his overthrow. The Alexandrians at first received him, and made him partake with his brother, but afterwards for some distaste banished him again, at which Antiochus took an opportunity, as thinking it best to accomplish his designs, by pretending to protect and reduce him into his Kingdom; wherefore he engaged at Pelufium with Ptolemy the younger in a naval fight, and getting the better, on a sudden laid a bridge over the Nile and besieged Alexandria. Ptolemy and Cleopatra his sister being in this danger, sent Ambassadors to Rome to crave aid; but he attempting once the walls, and experiencing the strength of the places, having sent his Ambassadors also to Rome after the other, raised his siege. About this time came the Ambassadors of the Rhodians to him to intercede, whom he put off, saying, that his intent was only to re-establish the elder Ptolemy, which if the Alexandrians would admit of, all things with his consent might be composed. Presently after this, leaving at Memphis Ptolemy the elder, for whose sake he pretended to wage this War, and giving up the rest of Egypt to him, he only left a strong Garrison at Pelufium, and so departed into Syria, concluding with himself, that keeping this in his power, the key of the Country, he might safely suffer the two brothers to try out the quarrel; for the Conqueror being wearied beforehand, would easily be brought under by him.

Receiveth.

We returneth into Egypt.

But is taken off by the Romans from further attempts.

44. The Ambassadors of Ptolemy obtained their desire, the Romans being jealous of the increasing power of Antiochus. For, C. Popilius Lenax, with two others, were sent with order first to go to Antiochus, after that to Ptolemy, and to denounce unto them, that except they gave over the War, him that was the hinderer of the Peace they would not account as their friend or ally. Whilst they were on their way, Ptolemy the elder bethinking himself what little cause he had to trust Antiochus, sent to his brother, and through the mediation of Cleopatra was reconciled to him, and reigned with him, the Alexandrians being willing to receive him, because their City was much straitened for provisions, by reason of the War. Antiochus hearing this, contrary to his former pretences, was grievously fretted, and then more eagerly than ever preparing for the War against them both, sent a Fleet against Cyprus, where Polonius' Forces were worsted, and in the beginning of Spring marched down for Egypt. In Celestria the Ambassadors of Philometor met him, and gave him thanks in their Masters name, for that by his means he had obtained the Kingdom, desiring he would continue his friend, and protect what he had helped him to, and rather say what he would have done, than by force to attempt it as an Enemy; but he replied, he would neither withdraw his Fleet nor Army, except he had all Cyprus, Pelufium, and all the ground lying upon that Mouth of the Nile given up unto him, and held a day whereon at further he would have an answer to these conditions. Popilius and his companions hearing of his design (Perseus of Macedonia being now overthrown) made haste to get to him before he reached Alexandria, and staying some time at Rhodes, they came to him, when he was but four miles off from the City, upon the sight of whom he reached out his hand to Popilius; but he being a severe man, reached him the Tables, wherein was written the Decree of the Senate, which commanded him to abstain from War, bidding him first to read them. Having perused them, he said he would confider with his friends what was to be done, and then give an answer, but Popilius after a certain insolent fashion made a Circle round about him with his Rod, and commanded him to answer before he went out of it; at which the King being amazed, after a little pause, said he would do whatsoever the people of Rome commanded; and so within a short time prefixed, grievously unwilling, and sorrowing, but judging it fit for the present to yield to the time, he drew out his Forces from Egypt and Cyprus.

He persecuteth the Jews for their Religion.

45. After this he published an Edict, commanding all throughout his Dominions to observe one and the same Religion, and relinquishing their own and former Rites, to conform themselves to the Religion of the Greeks under pain of death. Sending divers Overseers who should compel each people to the observation of his Order. Into Judaea he sent an old man of Athens, with order to defile the Temple, and name it the Temple of Jupiter Olympius, as that at Gorizian the Temple of Jupiter Hospitalis; he commanded the sacrifices to be left off, the Sabbath he prohibited, he commanded them to defile the Sanctuary, built up Altars, Groves, and Chappels to Idols, to Sacrifice Swine, and other unclean beasts, not to Circumcise their Sons, but to forget the Law: Moreover, an order was sent to the Neighbouring Cities, that they should force the Jews to partake of their sacrifices, and kill those which would not come over to their Rites, so that many by fear obeyed, the Temple was polluted by the dalliances of the Gentiles, the abomination of desolation, viz. the abominable Idol of Jupiter Olympius was set up therein, the Scriptures burnt, and a Decree published, that with whomsoever they should be found, or whosoever should approve them, should be put to death. Many yet were they that stood out, condemned the Kings Edict, and defiled not themselves, so that being enraged he caused divers to be brought before him to force them by Torments, but they stood out courageously, and enduring the pains sealed the truth with their blood; amongst whom are very notable the Mother and her seven Sons, from the eldest of them called Maccabæans. The rage of this persecution coming to Modin, a Town situate near to Diophtis found some opposition; for there Mattathias a Priest eminent in degree, especially for his five Sons, not only refused to sacrifice, but killed a Jew at the Altar that was so doing, and after that the Kings Officer who was sent to compel the people. Then exhorting all that were zealous for their Law to follow him, he fled with his Sons into the Mountains.

Mattathias maketh opposition.

46. Many went out after him, and lived with their Wives, Children, and Cattel, in Dens, and Caves, which coming to the knowledge of Philip the Governour of Jerusalem, the Garrison Soldiers were presently drawn out to pursue them, so that falling on them on the Sabbath, and they not at all resisting for the observance thereof, they cast in fire, and burnt them to the number of one thousand persons. Mattathias, and they that were with him hearing this, resolved for the time to come to repulse the Enemy on the Sabbath, and then the Asideans, a sort of religious men joining with him, with such as daily fled out of the Country, he made up a little Army, and therewith persecuted the wicked ones, and drove them to fly to the Nations about, pulled down the Altars, and Circumcised such Children as they found in the Coasts of Israel; then after he had been Captain of this wandering Company the space of a year, he died, leaving his son Simon for a Counsellor, and Judas firnamed Maccabæus for a Captain to them. This Mattathias was the Son of John, and Grand-son to Simeon, firnamed Asmonæus. * Jacobus Cap. 1. Pellus thinketh that this Simeon was Simon the second, son of Onias the second, and Grand-son to Simon the first, firnamed Jair. But Schinnerus thinketh this Simeon to have been the Son of Hysmonæus. From the * words of Josephus it should seem that Mattathias was the Great-grand-son of Asmonæus, so called, or Hysmon, from whom his posterity were named Hysmonæans. * David useth the word Hysmonim to express Ambassadors, Princes, or Great-men. It is also observed that the Jews in Italy call the Cardinals Hysmonim or Hysmonæans.

And Judas his son after him.

47. Judas being assisted by his brethren, and his Fathers followers, fell upon the Enemy, burnt divers of their Towns, and seized upon the Commodious places, coming usually upon them in the night, so as he forced many of them to quit the Land; Apolonius the Governour of Samaria coming against him, he overthrew, and slew him and getting his Sword, ever after used it in the Wars and after him he overthrew also Seron, who governed Cele-Syria. Antiochus in this mean while lying about Antioch, made there Magnificent Games and Shows, employing the money he had got in Egypt and out of the Temples he had rifled, to that end and purpose, and entertaining his Guests in a vile and sordid kind of observance. This being ended, an Ambassador from Rome arrived at his Court, sent on purpose to spy out his designs. Whom he received with such courtie, as overdoing in that point, he easily concealed the grudge he had conceived for his stop at Alexandria, and the bent of his mind which was sufficiently alienated from the Romans. But hearing of the success of of Maccabæus, and the loss of his Forces, he was exceedingly enraged, mulctured all his Army, to which he gave a years pay, and commanded they should be ready at all occasions.

Who intending to go against him, yet changed his mind and giveth order to Lysias to destroy the Jews.

He desired several Capains into Judaea.

48. He purposed to march against Maccabæus, but seeing his Treasury exhausted by the pay of the Army (for that the Jews now being revolted, he thereby lost his three hundred Talents of annual Tribute, and much also which he was wont to receive from other places, which being unwilling to quit their own religions as well as the other, were in combustions) and fearing he should not have to satisfy for his gifts, wherein he took a pride to exceed all his ancestors, he resolved to make a progress into Persia, and the upper Countries, to gather the Tributes thereof, and fill his Coffers. But before his departure, making Lysias his Kinsman Governour of the Regions betwixt Euphrates and Egypt, to whose care he also committed his young son, he gave to him half his forces, and this in charge, to blot out the Nation of the Jews utterly, and to give their Country to strangers to inhabit. Philip the Governor of Jerusalem seeing to what an height Maccabæus was grown, wrote to Proionius the son of Dorymenes the Governour of Celestria and Cilicia, who presently dispatched Nicanor one of his chiefest friends, and the son of Patroclus with twenty thousand men, joining Gorgias to him, a man of great experience; and not long after he himself was sent by Lysias with more aid, so that all three together made an Army of forty thousand Foot, and seven thousand Horse. Antiochus at this time was behind hand in his Tribute to the Romans two thousand Talents, therefore Nicanor resolved to raise this money out of Jewish slaves, and sent about for Chapmen for them, promising ninety persons for a Talent; so that one thousand Merchants came together with ready money into his Camp; more forces also from Syria and the Countrey of the Philistines came in to him.

But they are defeated.

And Lysias himself.

49. Judas having kept a fast at Morpab (because the Heathen now held Jerusalem, and the Temple was defiled) for his good success against so great an Army, having himself but six or seven thousand men, gave all the fearful, those that had built Houses, married Wives, or planted Vineyards leave to depart, according to the Law of Moses; then marched down to Emmans where the Enemy was intrenched. That night Gorgias, thinking to oppress the Jews, at unawares, came to their Tents with a party of five thousand Foot, and one thousand Horse; but Judas having notice thereof turned it to his own advantage, resolving to go and fall upon Nicanor in the absence of the other, whom he knew to be the more experienced Captain. Gorgias finding the Camp empty, thought the owners had fled for fear of him into the Mountains, and fought for them there, but they being got to Nicanor engaged with him in the morning, and routed his whole Army, laying above nine thousand dead upon the place; so that he and his men perceiving presently what was done by the smoke of their Camp now set on fire, fled amain, and the Jews coming to plunder the field found great Treasure, of which part being set aside for the infirm, Widows, and Orphans, the rest the Soldiers divided amongst them. After this, Judas overthrew Timotheus and Bacchides, both of the Kings party, killing above twenty thousand men, so that then they recovered many strong holds, at which Lysias was exceedingly troubled, things falling out so contrary to his expectations, and the next year invaded Judea with an army of sixty thousand choice foot, and five thousand horse, but being met by Judas with ten thousand men, he was received with such resolution that with the loss of five thousand he was glad to retreat to Antioch, intending greater preparations for his next expedition. Judas returning to Jerusalem cleansed the Temple, and offered sacrifice upon a new Altar, after the Heathen had held it just three years; then kept they a feast for eight days, and ordered it to be observed to posterity, which in the Gospel is called the Feast of the Dedication.

Antiochus in the mean time profreth in the upper Countreys.

50. Antiochus in the mean while waged War against Artaxias King of Armenia, and that with such success, as cutting off many of his men, he took him prisoner. Afterwards hearing that the City Elymais in Persia was exceeding rich, and therein a Temple (of Venus, or Diana, both being asserted) wherein were laid up very rich Arms left by Alexander the Great, he being greedy of this prey, attempted to rifle them both, but the Inhabitants taking Arms, repelled, and caused him shamefully to retreat. Being come to Ecbatane, he there heard of the overthrow of Nicanor and Timotheus, and then journeying towards Babylon, in the Borders of Persia, of the defeat given to that great Army of Lysias, the throwing down the Idol of Jupiter Olympius, and the fortification of the Sanctuary, whereupon he fell into a great rage, resolved to revenge himself upon the Jews for his shameful retreat, and com-commanded his Chariot driver to make speed, saying, he would make Jerusalem the common burying place of them when he should come thither. Scarce had he made an end of threatening, when he was suddenly struck with exceeding torment in his bowels, which yet reduced him not to any good constitution of mind, he still breathing fury and revenge against the Jews, and crying out to make haste, but the Chariot being driven very fast, he was shaken out of it, and by the fall fore bruised, that he was constrained to betake himself to his Litter, and then Worms crawled out of his body, the flesh whereof rotted, and fell from him yet alive. None could endure to carry him for the stench thereof, which also offended his Army, wherefore being forced to stay his journey, he stayed at Taba, a Town in Perfia. Before his death he confessed this to have fallen upon him for the injuries offered to the Jews, acknowledged the Sovereignty of God, and his own pride, vowed if God would restore him, to grant immunities to his people, to adorn his Temple, to turn Jew himself, and to travel through the habitable world to declare his strength and power. And when he perceived his end to draw near, he wrote most kind Letters to the Jews, desiring them to stand faithful to him, and his son after him, then constituting Philip, who had been brought up with him, the Protector and Guardian of his son, till he should come to age, he died, after he had reigned twelve years, A. M. 3841. after the beginning of Seleucus the 149. the first of the 154 Olympiad.

And dieth.

Antiochus Epiphanes.

51. Antiochus his Son, a Child of nine years old succeeded him, firmamed Epiphanes by the Syrians for his Fathers virtue. Him Lysias governed, who had brought him up; so that Philip his designed Guardian by his Father fled into Egypt, and Ptolemy the Son of Dorymenes, for that being convinced how the Jews were wronged, he went about to compose the difference with them, was forced to drink poison. Demetrius the son of Seleucus Philopater, whom we before said to have been sent Hostage to Rome, hearing there of his Uncles death, desired of the Senate that he might be restored to his Fathers Kingdom, so long unjustly detained from him, affirming he esteemed of Rome as his own Country, in which he had been brought up; of the sons of Senators as his Brethren, and themselves as so many Fathers; but they judging it more for their interest that the Kingdom of Syria should be under a child than one of mans Estate (such as he was, being now twenty three years old) resolved it should be secured to Antiochus, and presently ordered three Commissioners to be sent thither to settle the affairs thereof, according to instructions received from themselves, which might now be done easily enough, the King himself being so young, and his Courtiers thinking they were well enough dealt with all, so Demetrius was not restored; but especially they gave them in charge to burn all the Ships they should find there, not allowed to Antiochus by the League, and hough the Legs of all the Elephants, and diminish the Kings strength as much as possible. These things being executed, provoked one Leptinus so far as he flew C. Otharius the chief Commissioner (and who first brought the Consulship into his family, out of which Augustus Caesar issued) whom Lysias, though he was suspected to incense the People against the Romans, honourably buried, and dispatched quickly Ambassadors to Rome in the Kings name to disclaim any consciousness to the fact.

Gorgias fomenteth a War with the Jews.

52. Gorgias being Governour of the parts about Judea, fomented a continual War with the Jews, and with him joyned the Idumians, who received all runagates, and gave them entertainment. Against those therefore, Judas Maccabees marched, took divers places, and put twenty thousand to the Sword, after which turning upon the Ammonites, he overthrew them in divers engagements, and taking Jazer with the Territories thereto belonging, returned again into Judea. Timotheus the General of the Ammonites hereat enraged, and gathering many men out of Asia, came as if he would devour Judea; but Judas with his having humbled themselves, and called upon the name of God, gave him battle, in which twenty thousand five hundred Foot, and six hundred of his Horse being slain, he fled to Gazara, a strong Garrison kept by his brother, but that being taken he was pulled out of a Cave where he had hid himself, and slain, together with the other. After this the Nations about Galaad and Galilee afflicting for the Jews, Maccabees divided his Army into three parts, one of which (viz. threethousand men) he delivered to his brother Simon to relieve them of Galilee, the second to Joseph the Son of Zechariah, to defend Judea, giving it in charge not to fight with any Enemy till his return, with the other he marched himself to the succour of them in Galaad. Simon fought many battles with the Enemy, and killed many of them, brought his Countrymen men into Judea with great gladness, and Judas had the like success, taking many Towns, and putting many thousands to the Sword; but those that were left at home desiring also upon the report hereof to achieve some military glory, marched to Jamnia, whence Gorgias issuing out, put them to flight, and following the chase as far as the borders of Judea, killed about two thousand of them.

53. Lysias the Kings Protector and chief Minister of State, was displeased at the report of Judas's success, and taking eighty thousand Foot with all the Horse along with him, resolved to make Jerusalem an habitation for the Greeks, the Temple to pay tribute, and the Priesthood thereof to let to sale every year. He came and besieged Bethsura nigh to Jerusalem; but Maccabees then meeting with him killed eleven thousand of his Foot, with one thousand six hundred Horse-men, and forced him with the rest (many of them wounded and disarmed) to shift for themselves. Considering this defeat, and that God fought for the Jews, he went to them to treat of Peace, and according to his promise brought the Jews to yield to such reasonable conditions as were offered by Maccabees; but it was quickly broken by Timotheus, and other Captains, that governed the places adjoining to Judea, at which time they of Joppe also drawing two hundred Jews craftily on shipboard, drowned them in the Sea. Judas hearing this, went and burned all the Vessels in the Haven at Joppe, and understanding that the inhabitants of Jamnia had also intended such a thing against his Countrymen, he did as much for them; then marching against Timotheus, the Arabian Nomades set upon him, being five thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse, but were so entertained, as yielding themselves, with a promise of giving up their Cartel, and being at his beck for the time to come, they obtained Peace. After this he stormed the City Caspir (wherein was such a slaughter made of the Inhabitants, that a Lake thereto adjoining seemed to be full of blood) and then proceeding seven hundred and fifty Furlongs came to the Jews; called Tubien inhabiting the Land of Tob (concerning which mention is made in the Book of Judges) whence Timotheus was departed, but had left a strong Garrison, which being taken by Dositheus and Sospater two of Judas's Officers, they put to the sword above ten thousand men.

54. Timotheus gathered together from the Nations round about him and the Arabians a hundred and twenty thousand Foot, and two thousand five hundred Horse, where-with, putting up the women and children into a strong Fort called Carnion, he came and pitched his Tents against Raphon beyond the brook; but his great multitude was so surprized with fear upon the approaching of Judas, that every man fluted for himself, and what by their running upon one anothers Swords, and the pursue which Maccabees followed on with much earnestness, thirty thousand of them were slain, and he himself fell into the hands of Dositheus and Sospater, from whom he obtained his liberty; upon promise of dismissing such of their Countrymen as he had taken. Judas then proceeding took Carnion, wherein twenty five thousand were put to the Sword, after which he gathered all the Jews out of Galaad to bring them into Judea, and for that the City Ephron, through which they must needs pass, denied them entrance, they took it by force, and destroying the Inhabitants, went through, and came up to Jerusalem to the Feast of Pentecost. The Feast being ended, he taking three thousand Foot, and four hundred Horse along with him, went and fought with Gorgias, whom one Dositheus of Baccor his Company had once taken, but holding him by the Cloak, a certain Thracian came and cut off his shoulder, so that the Prisoner escaped. After the Victory the Jews coming to strip and bury such of their own party as had slain that day, found under their coats certain things dedicated to the idols of Jamnia, so that it appearing that this being forbidden them by the Law was the cause of their death, they betook themselves by Prayer to God, imprecating that it might not be charged upon them all. After this Judas subdued the Edomites, and the Philistines, their idols he burnt, and overthrew their altars, and then returning into Judea, for that he found the Kings Garrison Souldiers which yet kept the Castle to straiten and infect the Jews about the Sanctuary, with all the People, he besieged them close, but some of them with certain Jewish fugitives getting out, went straight to Antiochus, and persuaded him with all expedition to come and give a check to the growing power of the Jews.

55. Antiochus gathering together all his friends and Captains, and a great Army (concerning the number of which the two Books of Maccabees differ) in a great rage marched thither, intending to deal worse with them than his father had done before him, and to him Menelaus joyned himself, hoping by his means to regain the Priesthood. Passing through Idumea he came and fate down before Bethsura, where Judas by night with a choice party fell upon his Camp, and piercing as far as his own Tent slew four thousand men, and the prime Elephant, with those upon him, and giving an Alarm to the whole Army at break of the day, safely retreated, whereupon the King marched towards him the next day, and coming to an engagement lost six hundred men more; but the Jews seeing themselves overpowered, retreated. Then returned he to the siege, which Judas fore molested, cutting off many of his men, and relieving the besieged with provisions, who being not provided within themselves, because this was the Sabbatical year, yielded up the Town upon composition. Antiochus having herein placed a Garrison marched up to Jerusalem, and there made all provision possible for gaining it, all manner of engines being raised for the casting of fire and stones; which the besieged resisted as well as they might by others of their own, but as for provisions, were in no better condition than they of Bethsura had been, which gave opportunity enough to the King, but before he could perfect his work, came news that Philip, whom his Father had forced to be his guardian, being returned out of Egypt, was coming with the Forces which Epiphanes had left in Perfia and Media to recover his right usurped by Lysias. Hereupon both he and his Captains were presently perfwaded by Lysias (because their provisions began to fail, the place was strong, and the affairs of the Kingdom required it) to make Peace with the besieged upon such terms as they required.

56. Going to the Temple he offered sacrifice, and shewed civility and respect towards the place, but a little after considering the strength thereof, caused the wall round about to be demolished, contrary to his oath. Then returning to Ptolemais, the Inhabitants being great Enemies to the Jews, stickled hard to break the League, but Lysias by his defence quieted their minds, and confirmed the Peace. The King halting thence towards Antioch, Lysias accused Meneleus the High-priest to him, as an incendiary, and he that had been the cause of the War, so that being thrown into a Tower full of ashes, he there miserably ended his life, and in his room was substituted one Alcimus of Aron's line, but not of the family of the Priests, through Lysias his direction, which Onias the son of the last Onias the Priest understanding, went into Egypt, where insinuating himself into Ptolemy Philometor and Cleopatra, he obtained a Temple like that at Jerusalem to be built in the Province of Helopoli, and himself to be made Priest thereof. Antiochus coming to Alexandria, found Philip Master thereof, but setting upon it he took it by force, and taking him therein put him to death, and so quickly quieted these stirs, being reserved with his Guardian, though but a little time, for others more dangerous. His Ambassadors now, which Lysias had sent about the death of Onias, had been at Rome, where labouring to clear him of the fact, they were sent back without answer, whereto Demetrius the son of Seleucus being much startled, began to cast again in his head how to obtain his freedom, and the Kingdom, according to his title, which was clear and evident.

57. Consulting with Polybius the Achaean and Historian, whether he should not once more move the Senate in the business, he advised him not to dash himself twice against the same Rock, but attempt something of himself worthy of a Kingdom, hinting thereby what he would have him to do. But he being ruled by one Apollonius his intimate friend, but a young inexperienced man, requested the Fathers again, that at least he might not be constrained to stay there as an Hostage, seeing they had secured the Kingdom of his Cousin Antiochus. They yet remained in the same opinion, and resolved as formerly, so that then he consulted how to escape, first with Diodorus a cunning man, who was come from Syria, and had belonged to him, and then with Polybius, who procured Menethyllus the Egyptian Ambassador to hire a Carthaginian ship just then sailing for Tyre; so that Diodorus being first before to feel the Peoples mind, and seek for advantages, he taking a few friends along with him supped at a friends house, whither, for fear he should stay too long, Polybius sent him a secret hint, not to let slip this opportunity; whereupon making as though he was sick, he arose from the table, and came that night, to Ostia upon the mouth of Tyber. Menethyllus going before told the Master of the ship, that he had received orders from his Prince to reside still at Rome; but that he would send some young men of approved fidelity to him, to acquaint him with the affairs of his negotiation: So Demetrius and his followers going on shipboard, away they sailed by break of day. At Rome nothing was known of his escape till the fourth day. On the fifth the Senate met about it; yet did not make any provision vision for the pursuing of him, thinking it to be too late; but a few days after, they sent three Commissioners into Greece, who viewing the affairs there, were commanded thence to pass into Asia, and amongst other things have an eye to what he should attempt.

58. Landing in Lydia, he thence wrote to the Senate, that he had no intentions to disturb his Cousin Antiochus, but only revenge upon Lysias the death of Onias, then getting into his hands Tripolis, a Town of Phenicia, as sent by the Senate to possess the Kingdom, none gain-said him; so that he seized also upon Spartana. Thence, having gotten some forces together, he marched towards Antioch, out of which Antiochus, with Lysias his Governor (for that they thought he was sent by the Romans, and therefore feared to oppose him) coming out to meet him in a friendly manner, was presently made away, after he had reigned about two years. Demetrius having thus obtained the Kingdom, displaced Hercules, whom Epiphanes his Uncle had made Treasurer at Babylon, and his Brother Timarchus, whom he had also placed Governor there; for that he had badly behaved himself in his Office, whence from the Babylonians he got the surname of Soter, the next after Antiochus the son of Seleucus Nicator, as Aprian observeth. The Roman Commissioners being now come to Ariarathes into Cappadocia, he sent Menecharchus thither to them, to deal with them about his confirmation in the Kingdom; offered also to Ariarathes the Widow of Perseus of Macedonia, and his sister to wife; but he refused her for fear of giving offence to the Romans. After the return of Menecharchus and his report, thinking it his main interest to oblige these men, he cast off all other things, and labouring to please them, sent first to them into Pamphylia, then to Rhodes, offering to do any thing whereby to purchase his being acknowledged King by the Romans, and Tiberius one of the Commissioners stood him in great treat for the obtaining of this desire. He shortly after sent Menecharchus, and others in Ambassage to Rome, and with them Leptines the murderer of Onias (who offered himself to be sent) and a Crown of Gold in token of his thankfulness for his good usage all the time of his being an Hostage. The Senate long deliberating upon the business, resolved at length not to receive Leptines, lest they should seem to be satisfied for the public affront; but rather lay the blame upon all Syria, and reserve to themselves an occasion of revenge, when, and as often as they should see convenient: as for Demetrius himself, they bestowed their friendship upon him, with this condition, if he would give sufficient caution to be thenceforth as much in their power as formerly.

59. Alcimus, who had procured from Eupator to be made High-Priest, and now was not received nor owned by the people, because that in the days of Epiphanes he had defiled himself, came to Demetrius with other Apostates, and such like as himself, and accused his Country-men, especially the Hajimeans (i.e. Judas and his brethren) that they had cut off, and banished his friends; whereupon he sent one Bachides a truly friend with great Forces into Judas, confirming the Priesthood to Alcimus, whom he sent back with him. All their design, being arrived there, was to get Judas into their hands; divers Scribes going out to them to solicit for peace, being confident because the Priest was of the seed of Aaron, he most wickedly, and contrary to his Oath given, slew sixty of them in one day; then Bachides going from Jerusalem, sent about, and caused divers that had fled from him, and many of the people whom being slain he cast into a great pit, and so committing the Country to Alcimus (to the defence of which he left him some Forces) he returned unto his King. After his departure, Alcimus striving to confirm himself in the Priesthood, made great havock of the people, to restrain which Judas went throughout the Country, and compelled his party to thrust themselves up within their holds, and growing stronger, he restrained their invasions, so that Alcimus being afraid of him goes once more unto the King, carrying along with him a Crown of Gold, a Palm, and of the boughs which were used solemnly in the Temple; and seeing he could not have any more access to the Holy Altar, taking a fit opportunity when he was asked of the affairs of his Country, accused the Ajideans, and especially Judas, as seditious, of depriving him of the Priesthood (the honour as he said of his Ancestors) and plainly affirmed that as long as Macecharchus lived, the Kings affairs could not be secure. This being seconded by some ill-willers to the Jews, Demetrius was inflamed, and sending for Nicanor one of his chiefest Princes, and a bitter Enemy to the Israelites, made him Captain over Judas, and sent him forth with a Command to lay Judas, to scatter them that were with him, and make Alcimus High-Priest of the great Temple.

60. When he was come thither, and understood the courage and resolution of Judas, his brethren and companions, for the defence of their Country, he feared to try the chance of War, and sent to make peace with the people, who having agreed unto the Covenants, the two Captains came together to consult about the League. Nicanor was so taken with Judas that he continued with him, loved him in his heart, and persuaded him to marry, and beget Children; and so remained constant in his affection to him, till Alcimus perceiving it, and understanding the Covenants which were made betwixt them, took a third journey to the King, told him that Nicanor had taken strange matters in hand, and appointed Judas, a Traitor to the Realm, to be his Successor. Demetrius being hereat displeased, by Letters checked him for these things, and commanded him in all haste to send Maccabees bound in Chains unto Antioch, which grievously troubled him, that he, who had done no hurt, should be thus used, but conceiving it necessary for him to comply with the pleasure of the King, he waited for a convenient opportunity to accomplish it. Behaving himself thenceforth more roughly to him, the other suspected something by the great change of his demeanour, and therefore gathering a few of his men, withdrew himself from him, but he followed him with a strong power to Hierusalem, and drawing him out to talk with him, had prepared some to seize on him; yet he having notice hereof got away, and would see him no more. Seeing his design to be discovered, he went and fought with him near Capharsalama, in which he lost about five thousand of his men, and the rest fled into the City of David. After this he came up to Mount Sion, and some of the Priests with the Elders of the people went forth of the Sanctuary to salute him peaceably, and flew him the burnt-offering that was offered for the King; but he jeering hereat, demanded Judas to be delivered unto him, and they affirming with an Oath that they knew not where he was, he stretching out his hand against the Temple, swore that except Judas and his Forces were delivered up, he would when he should return in peace, let the sanctuary on fire, demolish the Altar, and build there a stately Temple to Bacchus. The Priests hearing this, went in, and standing before the Altar, with tears begged of God that he would frustrate the mans intentions, and be avenged upon him and his Host for his blasphemous words.

61. Hearing that Judas was gone from Jerusalem into Samaria, he went and pitched his Tents in Bethoron, where new supplies from Syria came to him, the Enemy being in Hadatha thirty Furlongs off, with no more than three thousand men. He would fain have fought on the Sabbath day, which the Jews, who were constrained to follow, friendly deterring him from, with great blasphemy uttered against God, he refused to hear them, demanding if there were a living Lord in Heaven, who commanded that seventh day to be kept, and saying, he himself was mighty upon earth to command them to Arm themselves, and to perform the Kings business. But coming to the engagement, he himself was slain first, which when his Army saw, they cast away their Arms and fled, and the Israelites following the chase slew thirty thousand, so that not one of the Army was left remaining. Coming to the plunder of the field they cut off Nicanor's head and hands, and carried them to Jerusalem, where they were hung up before the Temple; his tongue being cut in pieces, and cast unto the Fowls. Then they decreed, that the thirtieth day of the twelfth month Adar (as the Syrians call it) the day before Machabeus's day, should be observed every year, as the Author of the second book of Maccabees tells us, who with this story finisheth his work, being the Epitome of the five books of Jason, a Jew of Cyrene. After Nicanor's death, Judas was quiet for some time, and then Judas hearing of the power of the Romans, and their compassion of the distressed, and how much Demetrius stood in awe of them, sent Epistemon the son of John, and Jason the son of Eleazar on an Ambassage to the Senate, that entering into society with them, the people might be freed from the yoke of Demetrius and the Greeks. But Demetrius hearing of the mischance of Nicanor and his Forces, sent Bachides and Alcimus again into Judaea with the greater part of his Forces, who coming to Jerusalem to seek for Judas, marched thence with twenty thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse against him, who had but three thousand men in all. With these few he setting upon Bachides, all of them forsook him but eight hundred, with which yet he so charged him, as fighting from morning till night, he put to flight the right wing in which he stood, but they of the left perceiving this, followed him behind as he gave the charge, and compassing him in, slew him, all his men then shifting for themselves. This happened A.M. 3844. of the Greeks or Seleucide the 152. in the second of Demetrius Soter; and after he led the People, from his Fathers death, six years

62. A great Famine then raging, almost all the Country submitted to Bachides, that they might the more commodiously get bread, and he made such wicked persons Governors, as bringing to him the friends of Judas, he mocked them, and revenged himself upon them. But such of them as remained, and could do it, assembled themselves together, and chose Jonathan (Surnamed Apphus) their Captain in the room of Judas his brother, which Bachides hearing fought to kill him, but he understanding thereof, fled into the Desert Thecoa, having sent his brother John (Surnamed Gaddis) with a party to the Nabathian Arabs, to desire they might leave their baggage amongst them. He going down with it, was met in the way by the children of Ishmael from Medaba, who killing him and those with him, seized upon the prey; but no great joy had they of their booty; for Jonathan and his brother Simon hearing that they were about to make a great marriage, and bring the bride from Medaba with great pomp, being the Daughter of one of the noblest Princes of Canaan, they went, and hiding themselves under the covert of the Mountain, when the Bridegroom and his friends came forth with Timbrels and instruments of Musick, rose up out of the ambush, slew many of them, and took the spoil; so Musick having revenged the death of their brother, they returned again unto Jordan. When Bachides heard this, he marched down, and came thither with a great Army upon the Sabbath day, and Jonathan being beset behind and before with the Enemy, and on each side with the River and Marishes, encouraged yet his men to fight, and lifting up his hand struck at Bachides; but he declined the blow. Then seeing himself too weak for the Enemy he leaped into the River after he had slain one thousand of them, and from over with him to the further side. Bachides would not adventure to follow, but returning to Jerusalem, built up the strong Forts throughout the Land, and placed therein strong Garrisons, that thence making excursions, he might endanger the Jews. He fortified the Cities Bethsai and Gazara, with the Castle at Jerusalem, where he placed Soldiers with provisions, and taking the sons of the chief of the Country for Hostages, he secured them in the later.

63. The Ambassadors sent by Maccabees to the Romans were well received, and entered into a League and society with the Romans, which being written in Tables of brass, contained an engagement mutually to succour and relieve each other. The Senate also wrote to Demetrius, charging him no more to hurt or indamage the Jews, being their confederates, under pain of being prosecuted with War both at Land and Sea. Not long after Alcimus the High-priest commanded the wall in the Temple, which severed the Court of the People from that of the Gentiles, to be pulled down, which had been built by Zorobabel, and the Prophets, whose monuments he began to pull down and destroy; but at the same time he was so smitten that he could not open his mouth, being taken with a Palfie, so as he could not speak nor give order concerning his house, and died with great torment. When Bachides saw that he was dead, he returned unto the King. Two years then did the Land continue quiet, but at the end thereof, certain wicked persons sent for Bachides to return, telling him he might easily apprehend Jonathan and all his company in one night, at which message he arose with having notice of it, took fifty of these men, which had been the greatest ficklest, and slew them. Then Jonathan departing into the Wilderness, built up the walls of Bethsai, and fortified it; but such Bachides having notice of went down thither, and closely besieged it; but such was his entertainment from the besieged, (who getting out killed his men, and burnt his engines,) that having lain before the place a long time to no purpose, and seeing his journey to be frustrate, he eased his stomach against those that had been the cause of his Expedition, and putting to death many of them, resolved to retreat into his own Country. Jonathan having notice of this, sent to him to treat of Peace, and exchange the prisoners, which he gladly accepted of, and made an oath never more to disturb him. Returning then home he never brake it; so that the War being removed, Jonathan dwelt at Machabe (or Michmash) in the Tribe of Benjamin, began to govern the People, and destroy the Ungodly out of Israel.

64. Ariarathes (the fifth of that name) King of Cappadocia, married (as we said before) Antiochia the daughter of Antiochus the Great. She having no children by him at the first, introduced two supposititious boys, Ariarathes and Orophernes, he knowing nothing hereof, but a little after growing fruitful, he brought forth two daughters, and a son called Mithridates, and then acquainting her husband with what he had formerly done, procured the two Counterfeits to be sent, the one to Rome, and the other into Ionis, left they should disturb the true one in his succession, who, being named Ariarathes, and being brought up in the faiths and customs of the Greeks, obtained the Kingdom after his Fathers death. Orophernes afterwards resolving to venture for it, came to Demetrius, complaining he was injuriously deprived of the Kingdom by his younger brother, and craved his assistance for the recovery of it. He being offended at Ariarathes for the refusing the marriage of his sister the widow of Perseus, bargained with Orophernes for one thousand Talents, and expelled Ariarathes from Cappadocia, though he was helped by Eumenes King of Pergamus. Orophernes having thus invaded the Kingdom, behaved himself not like one who intended to secure it to himself in the love of his People, but raging against them with pillages and slaughters, and corrupting himself with the luxury of Ionis (where he had been brought up) pulled upon him the hatred of all his Subjects, which he perceiving, made only as an occasion further to prosecute his wicked and unseasonable designs. Ariarathes went straight to Rome to crave aid; and the Ambassadors both of Demetrius and the other, followed to excuse what was done, and recriminate him, which those of Orophernes performed so dexterously, that no body being present that could confute their lies, they seemed to gain credit, and Ariarathes because he had been the confederate of the Romans, was ordered to reign together with his brother. This was all he got at Rome; but shortly after Ariathes the brother and Successor of Eumenes expelled Orophernes and Demetrius quite out of Cappadocia, and restored him to the entire possession of his Kingdom.

Ariarathes true heir restored by Antiochus.

65. Not long after, Demetrius casting in his head how to enlarge his Dominions, offered Antiochus, the Governour of Cyprus for Ptolemy Philometor, five hundred Talents to betray the Island into his hands; which the man consented to, but being discovered and sentenced, prevented the execution by hanging himself. Being thus frustrated in this design, he thenceforth giving himself up to idleness, having built a Castle fortified with four Towers not far from Antioch, wherein he passeth away the time without any attendance of State affairs, out of the sight of his Subjects. Hereby he contracted such hatred, that the Antiochians revolted from him, and made choice of Orophernes, then living in exile at his Court, who so badly requited him for his former kindness, as to conspire with them to rob him of his Kingdom and life. He getting knowledge of this, feared his life, left he should free Ariarathes from the fear of a competitor, and caused him to be kept securely at Seleucia; but the Antiochians not at all terrified from their attempt, went on in their Rebellion, to which Antiochus of Asia, Ariarathes of Cappadocia, and Ptolemy lending their helping hand, they suborned a young man of the basest condition (by one (a) called Promachus, by others (b) Balas, and (c) Balles giving him the name of Alexander, and reporting him to be son of Antiochus Epiphanes, to recover as it were his Fathers Kingdom by force. This youth, together with Laodice Antiochus his daughter, did (d) Heraclides (whom Demetrius cast out, as we said, of the Office of Treasurer at Babylon) carry to Rome, where he brought him into the Senate, and caused him to desire that he might be helped in the recovery of the Kingdom, at least that he might not be hindered in his endeavour that way; then he seconding him inveighed against Demetrius, and heaped up the praises and merits of Antiochus so far, as though to all sober minded men his impudence was distasteful as well as his person, yet he bewitched the generality of the Fathers, that a Decree was made, whereby power was given to them to return, and aid ordered them for the recovery of the Kingdom (being the children of their late friend and ally) as they had required.

66. Heraclides having obtained this act of the Senate, presently hired Souldiers, and getting many eminent men to joyn with him, went to Ephefus, where he made all possible preparation for the War. Not long after Alexander got Ptolemy a City of Phoenicia, being betrayed to him by the Garrison Soldiers, which Demetrius hearing, gathered together his Forces to go and fight with him, but considering the uncertainty of the chance of War, sent away his two Sons Demetrius and Antiochus unto Unidas to be out of the danger, and he was referred to revenge his death or deprivation if need should require. He sent also unto Jonathan the Captain of the Jews, to renew Peace with him, giving him power to raise Forces against Alexander, and commanding the Hostages kept in the Castle of Hierusalem to be restored to him, which he using as a good opportunity, began to build Hierusalem anew, and repair the walls, but Alexander having notice of Demetrius his message, and the promises made by him, sent to him in like manner, and amongst many private ledges and immunities granted to the Nation appointed him to be the High-Priest, sending him Purple and a Crown of Gold. So, in the seventh month of the one hundred and sixtieth year of the Seleucide, Jonathan put on the Holy Robe, in the ninth after the death of his brother Judas (the Priesthood having been vacant seven years from the death of Alcimus) being the first of the Hajmonians that arrived at this dignity, and of the Priestly Family, but not of the Pontifical, to which Onias (who now was in Aegypt) was next heir. Demetrius hearing of the agreement his Enemy had made with the Jews, was fore troubled thereat, and laboured again by incredible promises to allure them to his own party; but they having had experience formerly how his affections stood towards them, refused to entertain his overtures. Balas gathering his Forces together, not onely those that revolted to him in Syria, but his Auxiliaries also sent from Jonathan, Ariarathes, Attalus, and especially from Ptolemy Philometor, gave battel to Demetrius, whose left wing put those to flight which fought against it, but the right having the contrary fortune was forced to run, which yet he would not do, though in it, but fighting manfully, light with his Horse into a bog, where he fought stoutly on his feet, till at last he was slain with many wounds, after he had reigned twelve years. 67. Alexander Balas obtained the Kingdom, and shortly after his possession of it, remembering how much he was beholding to Ptolemy Philometor for it, sent to him for his Daughter to Wife, which he willingly assenting to, brought her to Ptolemais, and married her to him with royal magnificence. Thither came down Jonathan from Hierusalem, bringing presents for both the Kings, but was followed by divers naughty persons to accuse him; Yet Alexander was so far from listening to any tales, that he caused him to be clothed in purple, to sit near him, and by proclamation commanded all his accusers to forbear, at which they being discouraged, went their ways. After this Alexander giving up himself to idleness and luxury, and minding nothing else, the affairs of the State were wholly managed by one Antiochus, who made slaughter of all his friends, and amongst the rest Leodice the Daughter of Epiphanes. Which being heard by Demetrius the eldest Son of Demetrius Soter, he hired Soldiers in Crete, and came into Cilicia, at which the other being affrighted, halted to Antioch to secure his estate before his coming; where he made Hirax, and Diadotus (or Tryphon) Governours. With Demetrius joyned Apollonius the Governour of Celestria, who being ordered to fight against the Jews, who still stood close to Alexander, with great pride provoked Jonathan to fight with him, and he accordingly marched from Hierusalem against him with ten thousand men. In his way he took Joppa, which Apollonius understanding marched to Aphodad, and left an Ambush in the way to intrap him, but he getting clear of the Ambush, put all his Forces to flight, whereof many men fled into the Temple of the Idol Dagon, which he set on fire, and what by this means and by the sword perished about eight thousand men. This coming to the ears of Alexander, he honoured Jonathan more than ever: he sent him a button of Gold, went to be given to the Kings kinsmen, and gave him Accaron a City of the Philistines with its Territories as an inheritance.

overthrew him at the River Oenopara, and then he flying to Abas, his head was cut off by Zabd the Prince of the place, and sent to Ptolemy, who though he received it with much joy, yet having in the fight received a great hurt in the head, upon the searhing of the wound he died also the third day after. Such end had the strange fortune of this counterfeited Alexander, after he had reigned about five years.

69. Demetrius then according to his right obtained his Father's Kingdom, and for that he had subdued this counterfeiter of his Family had (the next after Selenus the founder of the Race) the surname of Nicanor or Nicator. About this time Jonathan besieged the Castle at Hierusalem, and did all he could with his Egyptians to reduce it; but this being by some ill-willers made known to Demetrius, he wrote to him in anger, to raise his siege, and appear before him at Ptolemais, which he obeyed so far as to go to him; and partly by his presents and otherways to appeased him, as rejecting his accusers, he confirmed to him the Priesthood, and upon promise of three hundred Talents granted him immunity from tribute, with the Principality of three other places. After this seeing his Realm to be quiet on every side, Demetrius disbanded all his old Soldiers, retaining only some Cretians and other Islanders, which so enraged them, being wont by the former Kings to be kept in pay, as an encouragement to them for the future service, that they thenceforth became his Enemies, and shewed it upon occasion which he also himself presented them being wholly ruled by one Latheneus, who had helped him in the recovery of the Kingdom. By this man's advice, thinking himself secure enough of his estate, he cruelly raged against such as had been against him, and plunged himself into bad courses; which (together with the alienation of the minds of the Soldiers) one Diadotus an Apemanean, and one of Alexander Balas his Captains, considering, went to Elmalchides the Arabian, with whom Antiochus the youngson of that Alexander by Cleopatra was brought up, and acquainting him how things stood, at length obtained to have the boy delivered to him, to be restored to his Fathers Kingdom. Demetrius seeing his Soldiers alienated from him, desired of Jonathan a supply, with great promises of respect and succour. He sent him three thousand men, which found him in good stead, for he going about to disarm the Antiochians, they flatly refused it, and rising, came many thousands to Court to make an end of him, but these Jews lo repelled them, as slaying a great number they set the City on fire, whereupon the Inhabitants were glad to submit.

70. Diadotus, or Tryphon, took Antiochus the younger son of Balas, brought him out of Arabia into Syria, and there crowned him, giving him the surname of These. Hereupon all the disbanded Soldiers came over to him, so that Tryphon made open War against Demetrius, and overthrowing him in battle forced him to flee to Seleneia. Then sent Antiochus to Jonathan messengers with presents, and great promises, to draw him to his party, which he easily did, because Demetrius had falsified his word, and proved very ingrateful towards him, who now therefore gathering his mentogether, reduced the Country beyond Jordan as far as Damascus, and overthrow a party which there met him, killing to the number of three thousand men, after which he sent an Ambassage to the Romans, to renew the alliance made with them by Judas. Tryphon having brought his design thus far on, as to break the power of Demetrius, and having to that end desired the friendship of Jonathan, yet now desired his ruin above all things, as standing in his way for the accomplishment of his intended treason. He resolved to seize upon the Kingdom himself; but fearing Jonathan might stand fast to the interest of his young King, and oppose him, came down to Bethsan to see if he could apprehend him. Thither came Jonathan down with forty thousand men to meet him, who entertained him with exceeding great respect, and advised him to dismiss all his Army, and with a few go along with him to Ptolemais, which he promised to put into his hands. He consenting to this, sent all his men back but one thousand, which taking along with him, upon their entrance into the Town they were all cut off, he himself being kept prisoner. Then Tryphon invaded Judea with a great Army, which to oppose, Simon the brother of Jonathan was chosen General in his stead by the People; so that he seeing the Jews prepared for resistance, feigned as if Jonathan was onely detained for one hundred Talents of Silver which he was in arrear, which if they were sent, together with his two sons for hostages, he promised he should be released. Simon, though he distrusted him, yet left it should be said that he neglected any thing for his brothers safety, sent his Nephews with the money, which having received, he nevertheless slew Jonathan, and then returned into Syria.

71. He presently after made away young Antiochus, forgiving out he was troubled with the stone, under pretence of cutting him for it, he caused the Physicians to kill him. Then after he had gotten the Kingdom, he laboured to confirm himself therein by the approbation of his most powerful Neighbour, sending to Rome an Ambassador not empty-handed, but the Senate taking the present (a Golden Image of victory of great value) in stead of his name, aggravated that of his young King whom he had murdered. For all this he proceeded with great resolution, and coynd money with his own Effigies and name, having taken that of Tryphon upon him. Simon being disfigured, and accounting his acts to be but Robberies, sent a Crown of Gold to make his peace again with Demetrius, who considering the respect the Romans had shewed his Nation, promised to bury all things in Oblivion, and confirmed the immunities formerly granted; so that the Yoke of the Gentiles being removed, the people began to date their instruments according to the years of their High-Priests. The year after he had the Castle of Hierusalem surrendered to him, the Defendants being almost all consumed with famine, which cleansing and fortifying anew, together with the Hill of the Temple, he dwelt then in Hierusalem, and after he had been High-Priest about three years, by a publick instrument of the Priests, Nobles, and the People (after a recapitulation of his merits and services to his Nation, amongst which an Ambassage lately sent to Rome, and there well received, was a great inducement) he was made their Prince and High-Priest perpetually; till God should raise up the true Prophet, and all Ornaments and Prerogatives of Majesty were given to him. This being made in Brass, was fastened to the Wall that compassed the Sanctuary, in an open place, and a Copy thereof was laid up in the Treasury, that Simon and his sons might have it.

72. But the Cities all over revolting from Demetrius, who, we said, was driven to Seleneia, that he might shake off suspicion of laziness, he resolved to make War upon the Parthians, who had extended his Empire from the River Indus as far as Euphrates, and done no less things than the Great Asaces himself. The Macedonians and Greeks not well bearing the Pride of their new Masters, the Parthians sent to him often, with promise to revolt to him if he would but come up. He being tickled at this Message, made haste thither, not fearing but if he once were Master of these Provinces, with ease to drive Tryphon out of Syria; and being received with great alacrity, and strengthened with the Auxiliaries of the Persians, Babylonians, and Elymaeans, he overthrew the Parthians in several battles, but at length being circumvented by the cunning of one of their Princes (sent under colour of treating of peace, to entrap him) having lost his Army, he fell into their hands, and then being carried for a laughing stock up and down the revolted Countreys, was cast into Prison. Asaces having to soon recovered all, raged not against the Revolters, but carried it towards his people with humility and respect, and not long after sending Demetrius into Hyrcania, there maintained him with royal equilage, and not only so, but gave him his daughter in marriage, with promise also to restore him to his Kingdom. But whilst Demetrius lived thus in exile Tryphon's Soldiers being weary of his conditions revolted to Cleopatra his Wife, who then lived in Seleneia with her Children, and now taking it in great disdain that he had married Rhologuna the Parthians daughter, sent to his brother Antiochus (the second Son of Demetrius Soter, whose surname he also obtained from the Jews) offering him marriage, and the Kingdom. He willingly accepting of the offer, took the name of King upon him, sent into Judea to Simon, offering him great privileges to joyn with him in Alliance, and returning into Syria presently married Cleopatra.

the borders of Judea, or else to pay five hundred Talents for the Cities, and the harm he had done, and for the Tributes of the places other five hundred, upon pain of being prosecuted with War. To these things Simon answered, that he held no Towns belonging to any other, but had recovered his own by right of War; but as for Joppe and Gazara which had done great harm to his people, he offered to pay him one hundred Talents, at which the King was so displeased, that following at that time Tryphon to Orthofas, he left Cendebeus to oversee the Sea-Coasts, with order to build up Cedron, whence he might make war upon the Jews. He coming to Lamnia made inroads upon Judea, and built up that Town according to order, which John the Son of Simon then lying at Gazara understanding, gave notice thereof to his Father, who now being decrepit, committed the War to him and his Brother Judas. He taking with him twenty thousand Foot, and a party of Horse, marched straight down against Cendebeus, and then placing his Horse in the midst of the Foot, that it might protect and be protected against the Cavalry of the Enemy, which was exceeding strong, he overthrew him, and putting the whole Army to the rout, some betook themselves into the Fort newly built, and others flying away, he pursued them as far as the Towers of Azotus, which having set on fire, and slain two thousand men, he retreated safe into Judea.

74. This success of John sufficiently moved Antiochus to punish Simon, but it was done to his hand by one who of all others might least have done it. There was one Pholomy the Son of Abubus, Son-in-law to Simon, and by him set over the Province of Jericho. He entertaining his Father-in-law as he went his Circuit about the Country, to take care for the Government thereof, slew him treacherously after a feast, together with his two sons Mattathias and Judas, when he had governed the people eight years. His design was, being rich, to obtain the Principality of that Country where he lived, and therefore he presently certified Antiochus of his feat, desiring an Army of him, wherewith he might subdue the Cities of Judea. He also sent certain Cut-throats to murder John, Simon's sons; wrote to the Collones of the Army to draw them over to him, and sent others to seize upon Hierusalem and the Temple; But John having timely notice of his Treachery, prevented his death by that of the Messengers, and was made High-Priest in the room of his father; and here the Author of the first books of Maccabees concludes his work, having therein delivered the History of forty years. Antiochus taking the opportunity of Simon's death, came into Judea, which waiting round about, he drove up John (surnamed Hyrcaeus) into Hierusalem, to which he laid close siege, his Army being divided into seven parts. The besieged, being exceedingly helped by the strength of the Walls, stood out manfully, so that he raised an hundred Turrets, from which he endeavoured to scale the Walls, and compassed in the Town with a double Trench, that none might escape, but they still defending themselves, sometimes sallied out, and did him harm. Hyrcaeus seeing a great and useless multitude in the City, which consumed the Victuals, put the more infirm out of the Walls, whence being hindered from going any further by the siege, they wandered about the Walls almost famished, till at the feast of Tabernacles, out of pity, they were again admitted.

75. At this feast of Tabernacles, Hyrcaeus sent out to Antiochus to desire a Truce for seven days, because of the celebration thereof. He not only granted this, but sent in also Bulls with gilded horns, Golden, and Silver Cups, with all sorts of Spices, and beasts for Sacrifice, and made a feast to the Army, by which the other taking notice of his great humanity (whence he was surnamed Pinus, as also, uncertain for what other reason, Sidetes) withall, considering that the Sabbatical year being now at an end, and the people being hindered from sowing, a famine was likely to ensue, he sent out to him, desiring that the Jews might be suffered to live according to their own Laws. Many about the King advised him utterly to destroy the City, to blot out the very name of the Jews from under Heaven, at least to dissolve their Laws, and change their course of life, to diversify from, and disagreeable to other Nations; but he being moved by a principle of magnanimity and bounty, rejected this counsel, and approving of the piety of the Jews, commanded them to deliver up their Arms, pull down their Walls, pay Tribute for Joppe and other Towns without Judea, and receive a Garrison, upon which conditions he offered them peace. They yielded to all but the last, because they would not converse with the Gentiles, yet in Lieu of it chose to give Hostages (amongst others Hyrcaeus his own brother) and pay five hundred Talents, whereof three hundred at present; whereupon the siege was removed, and they were freed from any further incumbrance. Hyrcaeus canus opening the Sepulcher of David, who had been the richest of Kings; took out thence three thousand Talents, wherewith filling his Coffers, he first lifted strangers in his Militia, and entertained Antiochus and his Army in Hierusalem very plentifully.

76. Antiochus Sidetes in the eighth year of his reign, three years after his departure from Hierusalem, undertook an expedition against Phraates the Parthian, to fetch back his brother Demetrius full kept there in free custody, who had twice attempted an escape, but being retaken still was sent back to his Wife and Children, not to much out of any pity or respect of alliance, as because that King having an itching desire of getting Syria also into his power, preserved him to use against his brother, as time and opportunity should serve. Antiochus with a great (but extraordinarily effeminate) Army marched into Media, where many Eastern Princes met him, with all their hearts giving up themselves and Countreys to him, and cursing the pride of the Parthians, whereby he got such strength, as overthrowing the Enemy in three several battels, he reduced him within the bounds of his own Country. But what he thus suddenly got, he almost as quickly lost again; for upon the approach of Winter, quartering his Soldiers abroad in the Country, the people were so oppressed, what by the exaction of provisions, and their insolence, that they again revolted to the Parthian and upon agreement, at one and the same time, set upon them as they were severally disposed of in their quarters. Antiochus hearing this, with that party which lay with him came in to relieve the next to him, and there met with Phraates himself, against whom he fought most courageously; till being forsaken of his men he was slain, or else killed himself. Phraates had a little before this, to divert him from Parthia, sent back his brother Demetrius with a Guard of Parthian to seize upon Syria; but now repenting him of that, sent some to pursue him, and bring him back; but he fearing such a thing, had by his speed prevented it. Phraates finding a daughter of his, which her Uncle Antiochus had taken along with him in his expedition, fell so in love with her, that he married her out of hand.

77. Demetrius then recovered all the Kingdom of Syria, though not long likely to hold it, by reason of that malice he contracted both from Soldiers and People. Hyrcaeus the High-Priest and chief Magistrate of the Jews taking this occasion, leads down an Army to the Cities of Syria, supposing indeed as it was, that he should find them unmanned, took Medaba in the sixth month, then Samaga and Sicima the Metropolis of the Samaritans, and so to no King after Antiochus Sidetes were the Jews subject, but shook off the Yoke of the Syrian Kingdom. The Parthian King intended to make war upon him, but was hindered by the Scythians, whom having sent for to aid him against Antiochus, because they came something too late, he denied them their pay, for which they harried his borders, and he opposing them with the Greeks, whom he had taken before in the War, and cruelly used, was betrayed by them, and so slain with the rest of his Army. Demetrius being absent in Aegypt, the Antiochians first, then other Cities revolted, not enduring his pride as they pretended, which he had increased by his durance in Parthia, so that he was forced to return; but they sent to Ptolemy Physcon, desiring him to send them some one of the posterity of Seleucus to reign over them. He sent them a young man an Egyptian, the son of one Protarchus a Merchant. A fable was invented of his being adopted by Antiochus Balas, whereupon his name being Zabinas, (or Zabineus) he was surnamed Alexander, and the Syrians being willing to have any rather than Demetrius, readily received him. Being come into Syria, it happened that the reliques of Antiochus Sidetes were sent at the same time into Syria, which being received very solemnly by all the Cities, he also counterfeited a true mourner, and got himself thereby much favour from his new Subjects, not discovering his tears to be feigned. Not long after he fought with Demetrius near to Damascus, and overthrew him, who then fled to Cleopatra his Wife to Ptolemais; but being excluded by her and his sons, with a few servants he went to Tyre, hoping to save himself there by the Religion of the Temple, and was slain by the procurement of his Wife, or Zabinas, in the one hundred eighty ninth year of the Seleucide, A. M. three thousand eight hundred eighty one, the first of the one hundred sixty four Olympiads.

78. Alexander Zabinas then, a counterfeit, succeeded Demetrius, by the favour of the People, though he left two Sons by Cleopatra, Seleucus and Antiochus (surnamed Grypus from his hooked nose. he did it without permission, fearing perhaps he might revenge his Fathers death; or being carried out with that height of Spirit wherewith the ordered (and ruined) all things. Alexander entered into a League and alliance with Hyracanus of Judea. Three of his greatest Captains revolted from him, and seized upon Laudicea, but he reduced and yet pardoned them, being of a mild and pleasing deportment, whereby he got the affections of all men. But him he alienated from him whom it most concern'd him still to oblige, viz. Proton, who of late had let him up. He despised him, now grown insolent, as being able to stand on his own legs, which the other taking in great disdain, that a creature whom he had raised out of the dust should fo require him, laboured faster to pull him down than ever he had done for his advancement. He reconciled himself to his sister Cleopatra, and for that Antiochus whom he had by Demetrius was yet alive (on whom having bestowed the title of King she ruled all her self) he sent him great aid, and his daughter Tryphena for a Wife, which the People seeing, began to revolt apace from Alexander. At length they engaged in a battle, in which Alexander was overthrown, who then fled to Antioch, where wanting money to pay his Soldiers, he took out of the Temple of Jupiter an Image of Victory of massie Gold, jesting it out, that Jupiter had lent him Victory. But a little after attempting to remove secretly and take away Jupiters Image it self of an infinite weight, he was discovered, and forced to run away by the multitude, after which being opprest with a grievous Tempest, and forsaken by his followers, he was taken by thieves, and by them brought to Antiochus Grypus was killed (though some give other accounts of his death), after he had reigned four years.

79. The mother was foregrieved at her sons Victory, thinking her dignity was lessened by it, having an ambitious desire of reigning her self, with which she was so far driven as to offer him a cup of poison, as he once came in from exercise, which he having knowledge of beforehand, refused as it were in civility, desired her to do it her self, and then urging her to it, at length producing witness of her wicked intent, told her there was no way to clear her self but by drinking that which the had prepared for her son; so that being forced to do it, her wickedness fell upon her own head. Being thus rid of his unnatural mother, he reigned securely eight years, but then Antiochus his half brother, the son of Antiochus Sidetes (begot on his mother, and from Cyzicus the place where we was brought up under Craterus the Eunuch, called Cyzicus) began to be his emulator for the Kingdom, whom he then going about to poison, provoked him to a more speedy attempt of what he had but before designd. At this time it hapned that Cleopatra the sister and Wife of Proton Laburnus, being divorced from him by the means of that notable woman her mother, came into Syria, and married with this Cyzicus, and for that the would not seem utterly to come without a dowry, brought over to him the Army of Cyprus, whereby thinking himself sufficiently strengthened against his brother, he joynd battel with him, but was forced to retire unto Antioch. Cleopatra continuing here was besieged by Grypus and taken; and then Tryphena his Wife and her Sister required her to be delivered into her hands, that he might put her to death as her enemy and emulator, and though he refused it utterly, as being against the custom of Warriours to rage against the weaker Sex, especially when allied in blood to near as she was; and protected by the Religion of the Temple to which she fled; yet she being more hereat enflamed, as judging his answer to proceed from lover rather than pity, sent some Soldiers in, who murdered her embracing the Image of the Goddess. This was not left long unrevenge, for Cyzicus renewing the War, and giving battel again to his brother, now by the turning of the chance of War overthrew him, and taking Tryphena, with her blood appeared the ghost of his Wife, and expelling Grypus out of Syria seized on the Kingdom.

80. Antiochus Grypus fled to Aspendum, whence he got the surname of Aspendus; but the next year returning, ordered the matter so with his brother, that the Kingdom being divided, he made him be contented with Celestria. Both of them after this time gave up themselves to nothing but idleness and luxury, only preying upon each other as their opportunities served them, which difference of theirs mightily conduced to the settlement of the affairs of the Jews. Cyzicus procuring from Proton Laburnus six thousand men, went to relieve Samaria, which Hyracanus besieged, by wasting his Territories, but to no purpose. Afterwards it hapned that Laethurus being expelled Aegypt by his Mother, and the fearing that by the help of Cyzicus he might recover his Kingdom, sent great supplies to Grypus, with Selene for a Wife (whom he had taken from her son before his expulsion) to provoke him thereby against his brother, whence succeeded those civil Wars betwixt them, concerning which we have only the title left unto us in the Epitome of the sixty eight Book of Livius, who related the story. Grypus died first, being slain by the treachery of one Herscleon; after he had lived forty five years, and reigned twenty six, whereof fifteen were in conjunction with his Brother. He left five sons, whereof Selene his eldest and successor made War upon his Uncle Cyzicus for the Kingdom, and overthrew him in battel, after which the Horse of Cyzicus ran away with him into his Camp, wherein, when he was about to be taken, he killed himself, after he had reigned eighteen years. Selene after this, obtained Antioch, and the Kingdom, but against him arose Antiochus surnamed Eusebes, or Pius; the son of Cyzicus, who having avoided his snares by the help of a certain Courtizan that extremely loved him, went to Aradus, where taking a Diadem, he gathered forces, and in one battel clearly overthrew him. Selene then fled into Cilicia, where being received by the Mosusians (as they are called) when he began to exact money of them, they set fire to the house wherein he lay, and he was burned quick with those about him.

81. Two twin brothers of Selene, Antiochus and Philip, carried down forces to Mosusians, which having taken, in revenge for their brothers death, they levelled it with the ground; but Antiochus Pius coming presently upon them overthrew them in fight. Antiochus taking the River Orontes in his flight was drowned. Philip escaping carried the title of King, and gathering again considerable forces, struggled hard with Antiochus for the whole Realm, till such time as Proton Laburnus calling from Cnidus his fourth brother Demetrius, made him King at Damascus, so that they joyning their forces together; they both opposed Antiochus, who though he manfully resisted, was put to the worst, and glad at last to flee into Parthia; whence yet returning after two years he re-obtained Syria. Philip being thus deprived of that Kingdom, fell into contest with his other two brothers, Demetrius Eucerus and Antiochus surnamed Dionysus for the Kingdom of Damascus, and being driven into Berea, was there besieged by Demetrius. Straton the Governor of Berea being Philip's friend calls in Zeus the Arabian Captain, and Mithridates Sinax, who coming with a great power overthrew Demetrius; raised his siege, and taking him prisoner sent him into Parthia, where he was honourably treated till his death, and Philip marching to Antioch again, as it's said, obtained the Kingdom of Syria, or (as is most probable) part of it. Antiochus Dionysus the younger brother getting Damascus into his hands, made War against the Arabians, and was slain in a battel with their King Aretas, who then was chosen King by the inhabitants of Damascus, and thereby obtained the Kingdom of Celestria. The Histories which only give us hints of these things are so confounded, as no certain thing concerning the ends of Antiochus Pius or Philip can be asserted; yet this we find, that the Syrians taking occasion at these dissensions and Wars of the Seleucide amongst themselves, began to think of foreign aides, and cast their minds upon foreign Kings. At length they all agreed to make choice of Tigranes King of Armenia, who being called in, held Syria for the space of eighteen years, and by his dealing with them, made them know they had had no reason to rebel against their natural and rightful Princes.

82. Antiochus Pius being outed thus by Tigranes of all Syria, from Emphrates to the Sea, and also of part of Cilicia, lay hid in another corner of it, which neither the Armenians nor Romans as yet touched; and his Wife Selene with her two sons reigned (as it's termed) in Phoenicia, with some part of the lower Syria, till being besieged in Selucia a City of Mesopotamia, or Proton, the was therein taken by Tigranes and killed, for that the endeavoured to recover Syria, as justly the might, out of his hands. For fourteen years Tigranes governed the Country by one Magadates, till such time as siding with his Father-in-Law Mithridates the Great of Pontus, against the Romans, and overthrown by them, he was forced to recall him with his Army. Antiochus the son of Antiochus Pius, surnamed Asatius, taking this opportunity, insinuated himself into the Principality, the Syrians being not unwilling, out of respect to the dignity of his family; and Lucullus the Roman General (whose work it was to drive Tigranes out of his new acquired possessions) envying him not the inheritance of his Ancestors. Four years he kept it, till such time as Pompey the Great having finished the War against Tigranes, reduced Syria into the form of a Roman Province, though he challenged it as his inheritance; But it being casie to deal with him as he listed, who was utterly unarmed, he put it off, by affirming it to be unreasonable, that after the Romans had been at

CHAP. VI.

The Egyptian Kingdom.

From the death of Ptolomy the son of Lágus, to the death of Cleopatra, and the reducing of Ægypt into the form of a Roman Province :

Containing the space of two hundred fifty four years.

Ptolomy Philadelphus.

Ptolomy the son of Lágus had several sons by Eurydice his Wife, the daughter of Antipater, and by Berenice, which Woman was sent down by Antipater, onely to accompany her, with whom yet he fell so in Love, as marrying her he passionately affected her always, and a year or two before his death made one of her sons, called afterwards Ptolomy Philadelphus, his Copartner in the Kingdom, and more than that, served him sometimes as one of his attendants, saying it was more excellent than a Kingdom to be the son of a King. His eldest son by Eurydice seeing this, thought it was no staying for him in Ægypt, but fled to Selenus, by whom being honourably entertained, with some hopes of being settled in Ægypt after his fathers death, he so badly requited him, as he treacherously slew him, as we before shewed. Philadelphus, after his fathers death made away two of his brothers, the one as conspiring against his life, and the other as suspected to raise a Rebellion in Cyprus. In power and riches he surpassed his Father. Being learned himself above the common rate of Princes, he sought to promote knowledge, by rewarding the most eminent and industrious (of which flourished many in his time) and founding that his famous Library at Alexandria, consisting of two hundred thousand Volumes. Demetrius Phalerens that noble Philosopher, and sometime Prince of Athens, being he that was employed in the Collection, persuaded him to send to Elenazar the High-Priest of the (a) Jews to desire their Law, and that he might be the easier induced to send it, by the Council of Arifceas (who wrote the story) he purchased the liberty of all such Jews as were slaves in Ægypt, to the number of about one hundred thousand which cost him more then four hundred and sixty Talents. He also sent extraordinary rich gifts to the Temple; and the High-Priest chusing out seventy two men most eminent for birth, learning and experience, dispatched them into Ægypt with the Law to be translated by them into Greek. Being nobly entertained, and feasted by him for several days, they were set to their work in the Island Pharos right over against Alexandria, which in seventy two days with admirable agreement they were able to have finished, after which the King having exceedingly admired the wisdom of the Law-giver, and commanded the book carefully to be kept, dismissed them with great reward to themselves, and presents to him that sent them.

2. Here mentioning this Library of Ptolomy, and Alexandria where it was built, we cannot but now take further notice of this City, which by this time was grown to some perfection, though not near to that eminency at which it afterward arrived.

The Translation of the Septuagint.

Alexandria in three and co-dition.

wards arrived. Concerning it's Original we have already spoken, but with such brevity as fitted the celerity of Alexander's Conquest and passage. Ammianus Marcellinus it is who tells us, that being the chief of all Cities of that Country; it was ennobled by many things, particularly by the Magnificence of the greatest Founder, and the eminent skill of Dinocrates the Architect, who for want of Chalke when he went about to delineate the Tract of the Walls, made use of Meale; and this in the opinion of men predicted the plenty of all things necessary for humane sustentance. He adds, that here the Air was wholesome, quiet and milde; and that as experience for many ages together did demonstrate; scarcely any day passed wherein the inhabitants did not fee the Sun clear and Splendid. That the Sea-Coasts on which it stood, might not as formerly, by fallacious and treacherous Accesses, as he phraseth it, afflict Navigators with many miscarriages, Cleopatra invented in the Haven an high Tower, called Pharos from the place it self; whence lights by night should be exposed for direction to Saylor's; whereas in former times such as held their Voyages from the Partenian or Lybian Seas, having no tokens nor Markes from any Mountains, by reason of the Champian Country, wear too often choaked up, and miscarried in the Sands.

3. So Writes Ammianus who yet is not so to be credited, if he meant it, as if Cleopatra (the last Queen and Prince of this Race of Ptolomies) was the first Inventor or builder of the Pharos; for it was built long before her time, in the Reign of this our Ptolomy Philadelphus, by Softratus the Cnidian. But the Tower being demolished by Julius Cæsar, in the Alexandrian War, as he himself and Stra-bo relates; it was afterward reedified by Cleopatra. And so he repaired another work, which though Ammianus attributes to her invention, yet Cæsar ascribes to the former Kings; and this was that called the Heptastadium. The Island Pharos lay off at the distance of a mile from Alexandria, and thereby made a convenient Haven and refuge for Ships. But this did not satisfy, they thought it convenient to join the Island and the Continent whereon the City stood together; and for that purpose made a Mole of seven Stadia or Furlongs in length, which by the intervention of a Bridge accomplished their designe, and made thereby two Havens; one called the Great, and the other the Haven of Eusebius. This it seems Cleopatra repaired, when by age and walking of the Sea it was decayed, and upon this occasion if Ammianus was rightly informed. The Island Pharos where Homer Fabled, Phocæus with his Flocks of Sea Calves to lodge was obnoxious and tributary to the *Rhodian*s. Their Officers demanding excessive Tolls; this crafty Woman invited them to a solemn Feast, and entertained them so long till ineven dayes the caused a Mole to be made of so many Furlongs; and then passing upon it in her Chariot affirmed the *Rhodian*s were mistaken in asking of Tolls to be paid for Islands; for there were no such things to be found in those Quarters. Others write that this Queen when she saw she should have a War with Augustus, caused a Mole to be made betwixt Pharos and Alexandria, and so joined the Island to the Continent by the skill and industry of Dexiphaneus a Mechanical Mathematician.

4. But Ammianus proceeding in the description of this City, mentions the lost Temples therein to be seen, amongst which was eminent that called Serapeum, or of Serapis, which though it might be lessend with the flenderness of Expressions, yet was so illustrated by its Æria, adorned with most large Pillars and a multitude of other works; that after the Capitol, wherein venerable Rome for ever prided her self, the whole world saw nothing more lately. It was immense Libraries: and the faith of ancient Monuments unanimously speaks that seven hundred thousand Volumes having been carefully got together by the Industry of the Ptolomies, were burnt when the City was plundered under Cæsar the Dictator. As for the Libraries, Epiphanius writes of two which were publick at Alexandria, the first was this of Philadelphus in that part of the City called Bruchium, and the second made long after in the Serapeum, and called the filter of the former. This of Philadelphus contained an hundred thousand Books, as Eusebius writes in his Chronicon; and afterwards by the following Kings, it was enlarged, who in this matter of Collecting Books, contended with those of Pergamus; so that the number of Volumes rose to that of seven hundred thousand, as several Authors relate. Livie and Orosius wrote that four hundred thousand Books were burnt in the Alexandrian War; neither is it probable that all miscarried. But besides these, some speak of another Library, and that a publick one in the Castle of Alexandria; and others that Cleopatra repaired that which so miscarried by Fire.

5. Certain it is from Strabo's account he gives us of this City that by reason lib. 17. of its situation, it flowed with the abundance of all things, add though near to it P. 792. adjoined a Lake, yet, which was chiefest, it enjoyed an Air very healthful. It was washed with two Seas, the Egyptian from the North, and that from the South called the Lake of Marcia or Mareotis. The Lake was filled by the River Nile both from the upper Countries by Ditches and from other parts, through which many more things were imported than by Sea, whereby it came to pass that the Haven of the Lake was more rich and frequented. And any one might easily perceive that this way more Merchandize was exported from Alexandria, than was imported from Italy, if he had been both at Alexandria and Puteoli, and had taken notice of the ships of burthen which had egress and regress from and into both ports. Besides the wealth which flowed into it from both Havens, The clemency of the Air he thinks worthy to be mentioned, which thence happened because the place was on both sides watered, and the Nile conveniently had its Increases. For other Cities (in another place he excepts Ravenna) placed upon Lakes, in Summer heats have a thick heavy and Choking Air, and by reason of vapors excited by the Sun, abundance of mud and filth lies upon the edges, whence noxious steams arise which infect the Air and produce the pestilence. But at Alexandria, when Summer begins, the Nile being increased fills the Lake, and leaves no mud or filth from which any malignant vapor may exhale. Besides the Ethereal winds blow the from the North, and so great a Sea, that the Inhabitants with much ease pass the Summer.

6. In the days of our Geographer the Figure of the City represented that of a Chlamys or Soldiers Coat, the sides of which extending in length were compassed with water being about thirty furlongs in Diameter; The sides stretching forth in breadth were fringed with Isthm or Necks of Land of seven or eight furlongs being washed with the Sea and the Lake. It was also so divided into streets and passages, that both Horses and Chariots might be driven through them, but two were considerable for their largeness, and cut through each other at equal Angles. It had Temples and publick places most beautiful, and Royal Palaces which took up a fourth or a third part of its Circumference. For every one of the Kings had a mind to be adding to things Consecrated to their Gods, so some thing of his own to the Palaces built by his Predecessors. All of them were near together and joynted to the Haven. Part of the Palaces was the Museum which had a walk, an Exedra, and a large House wherein was the Refectory of those who being Fellows of the Museum applied themselves to the study of good Letters. This Colledge was maintained at the publick charge, and had a Priest for its Governor formerly nominated by the Kings, and in the time of Strabo by the Emperor.

The Museum or Colledge.

The Sons or place of Sepulture.

7. Another part of the Palaces was called Soma (or Body) being a place walled in, wherein were the Sepulchres of the Kings and of Alexander. For, Strabo writes that Ptolomy the son of Lagus took the body of Alexander from Perdiccas, as he carried it from Babylon, and turned off unto those parts moved by Avarice and the design of getting Egypt into his own power. He was killed by the Soldiers being surprized by Ptolomy in an Island, where they fell upon and murdered him with their Sarissæ. The body of Alexander, Ptolomy brought to Alexandria and there buried it; and there, faith he it still lies though not in the same chest or coffin. For now it is Glass whereas he had laid it in Gold; But the Golden Urn was taken away by Ptolomy surnamed Cocceus and Subditius coming thither from Syria; though he was presently overthrowen and received no benefit by his booty.

8. In the great Haven near the entrance at the right hand, was the Island and the Tower Pharos; at the left lay Rocks and Lochia the Promontory wherein there was also a Royal Palace. As one went further to the left were more houses of the Kings joynted to that in Lochia having many and various Apartments and Groves. To them joynted an Haven or Creek private and shut up which belonged also to the Kings. Also an Island lay before the artificial Haven, having moreover its Palace and its Creek, and called Anirrhodon, because it did, as it were emulate Rhodes. Above it was a Theatre, and a place called Possideum, because in it was a Temple of Neptune; there Antony made a further Mole into the great Haven and built a palace he called Timonium; and he did it at the last, when being forsaken by his Friends, after the defeat of Actium he had retired to Alexandria, and bidding ding farewell to all his Acquaintance, purposed to lead there a solitary life, after the example of Timon.

9. Next to them was the Cesareum Emporium or Exchange and the Apotifes or Absejtes; and then the Nevalia, or stations for ships; as far as the Heptastadium. Beyond the Heptastadium lay the Haven of Eumotus, and above it was digged another Port called Cibotus or the Arge wherein were other Nevalia. Within it was a Foss or Ditch reaching as far as the Lake of Maotis, and without lay a little part off the City. Then was to be seen Necropolis, or the City of dead bodies, and a Suburb wherein were many Gardens, Monuments, and places for Embalming the dead. Within the Ditch stood the Serapion and some other old Temples almost ruined, by reason of the building of the Temples at Nicopolis; for there was the Amphitheater and the Stadium, and the five years Games were there Celebrated: And such things as were of old instituted became of no repute. In a word, faith he, the City is full of consecrated and sacred things, hath a beautiful Gymnasium to which belongs Porticus longer than a furlong a Forum or place of Judicature, and Groves. There is also the Panion an high work raised with the hand, broad above, and small beneath, like a Top, to which they mount by Stairs and thence they have a fair prospect of the whole City.

Nicopolis.

10. From Necropolis ran one street by the Gymnasium as far as the Gate of Canopus; then the Cirque or Hippodrome, and others as far as the Ditch of it. Passing through the Hippodrome, one came to Nicopolis inhabited as far as the Sea, so as it ought not be esteemed to be less than the City, being thirty Furlongs distant from Alexandria. This place Augustus Cesar beautified, because here he overthrowed those that sided with Antony, and taking the City in his first attempt, Contrained him to kill himself, and got Cleopatra alive into his Power, who shortly after being in Custody secretly made away her self by the biting of an Asp, or as others deliver, by a poisoned ointment.

Famous men.

11. Ammianus tells you (that we may finish this short Account of this famous City) that Alexandria being increased, not by degrees as others, but growing up at its first beginnings through spacious compasses, and being long and sharply harraised with internal editions, at last after many years, in the Reign of the Emperor Archeian, Civil Contentts proceeding to deadly blows, lost its walls and with them the greatest of its Regions called Bruchion the long abiding place of Excellent men. Here lived Aristarchus the Excellent Grammarian; Herodian the most Minute inquirer into Arts; Saccas Ammonius the Master of Platonus, and many other writers of noble Learning; amongst whom Chalcidius Didymus was eminent, memorable for his Attempt of manifold knowledge, who, for the five Books wherein unskillfully he reprehends Tully, imitating the Sillographia and Malevolent Authors, is accused in the judgment of Learned ears, as a whelp or sneaking curr, barking and making a rotten noise about a roaring Lion.

Silli Gracidi
centur Masili et Sargitta
carmina.

12. And although he adds, many of the Ancients, besides these I have mentioned, there did flourish; yet at this present time various sorts of Learning are not silent in that City. For, the Masters of Studies there in a measure take their breath, and whatsoever lies hid, there is discovered by the frame of Geometry, neither hath Music amongst them quite decayed, nor harmony been put to silence; the consideration of the motion of the World and Stars grows warme in some men though they be rare; and not a few are learned in Numbers; besides, they are skilled in that Science which telleth Fortunes. Over and above, the Studies of Medicine, are daily so increased, that though the practice of it self do discover the skill sufficiently, yet it abundantly sufficeth for the Commendation of the Physicians Art if he say he learnt it at Alexandria. In Bruchion it was that Philadelphus made his Library, and credible it is that Learned men flocked to it, to whom he assigned Salaries and maintenance from the publick. For, this our Philadelphus first instituted a Colledge of Learned men called Museum or the Temple of the Muses, to whom he also instituted Games solemn and called Musei; The Museum was part of the Palace, which as we have seen took up the greatest part of the City, and was most Fortified, so that in Archeian siege it might very well make full resistance as it did. But this and all together concerning this City. Now to return to our Ptolomy.

13. He got the surname of Philadelphus, not for any love shewed to his brothers (two of whom he put to death) but to his sister Arinoe, whom after an incestuous (though Egyptian) fashion he married, having Children before by another Arinoe daughter to Ephimachus; by his sister he never had any, the dying before she was delivered livered, Demetrius Phalerus laboured to diffwade his father from leaving him his fucceffor, and counfeled him to beftow the Kingdom on fome of Eurydice's fons, for which he was now caft out of favour, and dyed by the biting of an Afp, which he put to his hand. He had a brother by his mother fide named Magas, whofe father was one Philip a Macedonian, but of bafe Original. Him he had procured to be made Governor of Cyrene, the Inhabitants of which he now raifed, and caufed them to revolt from him, and marched with an Army towards Egypt; and Ptolomy fecuring all the paffages, went out to encounter him. But news coming in the way that the Marmaride, a people of the Lybian Nomades had rebelled, Magas retreated in all haft back to Cyrene, and Ptolomy then intending to follow him, was hindered by the Galls in his Army, whom having hired amongst others, he found to have plotted to feize upon Egypt; but he brought them all to the number of four thoufand through the Nile to a defert Ifland, where with famine, and other ways, they were made away. Magas after this having married Apane the daughter of Antiochus Soter, perfwaded him to break the League betwixt him and his brother, and invade Egypt, which he prepared to do; but Ptolomy fent feveral parties abroad into Syria, and found him fo much work at home, that he could have no time to look abroad, and Magas before his death having a defire to be friends with his brother, betrothed his daughter to his fon. Betwixt this Ptolomy, and the next Antiochus firnamed Theos were continual Wars, till both being weary thereof entered into an Alliance, Ptolomy giving him in marriage his daughter Berenice, which proved but an occafion of greater trouble, and the deftruction of the Bridegroom he lived not to fee it. For he, notwithstanding all his learning, gave himfelf up to luxury, and fondly dreaming he fhould live always, and that by him alone was found out immortality, fuddenly died, after he had Reigned thirty eight years alone, and one (with fome odd months) together with his father, A. M. 3758. and the fecond of the 133th Olympiad.

14. Ptolomy his fon by Arfinoe, the daughter of Lysimachus, fucceeded him, in the twentieth year of Antiochus Theos, and was firnamed Euergetes. As foon as he came to the Kingdom, he had work enough made him in Syria; for there Antiochus, who had put away his former wife (upon the marriage of Berenice his fiter) now overcome with Love took her and her Children again into his Court, notwithstanding which the fearing yet his ficklenefs, and another difgrace, to prevent it, procured him to be poyfoned, and conveyed his Kingdom to Seleucus Callinicus her eldeft fon. Berenice the committed to two of the chief of Antioch to be made away, but the Lady, when fhe heard that fome were fent to kill her, flut up her felf in Daphne, where being befieged, the Cities of Affa, moved with the remembrance of the Dignity of her family, fent her aid, and Ptolomy her brother marched in all haft poffible to deliver her, but ere he could be relieved he was circumvented by thofe that with an Oath promifed her fecurity, and flain together with her young fon. Out of difdain at this unworthy act the Cities revolted to Ptolomy, who entering Syria killed Laodice; paffed to Babylon, and got almost all Affa into his hands, at which time he vifited Jerufalem alfo, where he offered many facrifices of praife to God, and dedicated gifts fuitable to fo great a victory. The Kingdom of Syria had become a Province to that of Egypt, in all probability at this time, had he not been recalled by domeftic troubles, which being very urgent, he left Cilicia to the Governance of Antiochus his great favourite, to Xanthippus another of his Captains the Provinces beyond Euphrates, and fo plundering Seleucus's Kingdom of forty thoufand Talents of filver, he carried down alfo many costly Veffels and Images of Idols to the number of two thoufand five hundred, amongst which were thofe which Cambyses had after his overthrow of Anufis, and Pfammiticus, conveyed out of Egypt: And therefore the Egyptians, becaufe after fo many years he had reforted to them their gods, honoured him with the firname of Euergetes.

15. Seleucus provided a Fleet for the recovery of the places revolted, but before he could come to ufe it, loft it all by a Tempeft, which yet proved the greateft gain for the Cities out of commiferation of his eftate, and as if he had already fufficiently finarted for his perdition, returned again to their obedience. Being exceedingly encouraged, and animated herewith (as richer by his lofs) he then made War upon Ptolomy; but as if he had been born for a laughing ftock to fortune, and not recovered the Kingdom for himfelf, he was overthrown again in battel, and as deftitute of followers, as after the thipwrack, fled to Antioch, when applying a remedy worfe than the difeafe, he fent to his brother Antiochus (from his ravenous difpofition firnamed Hierax) for aid; and fo Ptolomy fearing himfelf not to be able to grapple with both, made a Truce with him for ten years. Whilst he was abroad in Affa, his wife Berenice, daughter to his Uncle Magas, and betrothed to him, as we faid before, vowed to confecrate her hair to the gods, in cafe he returned fafe, and accordingly cutting it off, laid it up in a certain Chapel, whereupon Conon the Mathematician, who flourifhed at this time, out of flattery to them both, feigned it to be taken up into Heaven, and invented that conftellation which yet is known by the name of it. In his time a Phoenix is reported the third time after the days of Sefoftris, and the next after them of Anafis, to have flown (being a bird facred to the Sun) accompanied with a great number of other birds, admiring her new face, to the City Heliopolis, as Tacitus tells us, who reports that the fame thing hapned afterwards in the Reign of Tiberius; Paulus Fabius, and L. Vitellius being Confuls. To this Ptolomy fed Cleomenes the King of Sparta after his overthrow received from Antigonus Dofon of Macedonia, and the Acheans, who honourably receiving him, and prizing him very much for his worth, was much affamed that he had fuffered fuch a man to be defeated, and promifed to re-eftablifh him; but he dyed before he could bring it about, after he had Reigned twenty four years, in the 139th Olympiad, within which Polypius * obferves both Antigonus Dofon, and Seleucus Ceraunus, King of Macedonia, to have left the World, and their Kingdoms to their Succelfors.

16. His fon fucceeded him, being firnamed Philopator, ironically, if we believe Justin, who out of Trogus accufeth him of making away both father and mother. Certainly if we look at his general carriage and difpofition, he was like enough to do it, giving up himfelf to all luxury and effeminatenefs, and thereby neglecting his affairs, whence he obtained the name of Tryphon. Finding his brother Magas by his mothers means to be very great with the Army, he made them both away by the means of Sofibius, who was his greateft Counsellor, and manager of his publick bufinefs. His lazinefs, and neglect, encouraged Antiochus the Great to make War upon him for Celeftria, in which, though he got the better, yet can it not be afcribed to any thing of his, he thinking of nothing lefs than preparation for refiftance, and whereas he had opportunity enough after the battel to have outhed his Enemy of Syria, yet being overjoyed that he had recovered Celeftria only, he fent Sofibius to confirm the peace. In his return out of Syria he went to Jerufalem, and would needs fee the inward holy places of the Temple, but was fmiten fo with a blind horror, that he fell, and could fcarcely be recovered to himfelf, but departing home raged againft the Jews at Alexandria. Then with great earneftnefs returning to his little intermitted jollities he doted fo upon Agathocles his Concubine, that he killed his fiter and wife Eurydice, and forgetting all credit and Majesty, fpend the nights in filthinefs, and the days in feafting. Thefe things are firft privately acted within the Court Walls, but preftently thamed not at the publick view; the impudence of the Strumpet containing it felf in no bounds, being increafed by the favour of her brother Agathocles, one of as filthy a life as her felf, and the Conjunction of her mother Evanthe, who fpend high, and prefumed much on the fcore of her Childrens great grace with the King. Henceforth thefe women not contenting themfelves with the King, poffeffed the Kingdom alfo, and thamed not to appear in publick in great equipage to be revered. As for Agathocles, he reigned, and not Ptolomy, by the direction and advice of his two Affluants, Mother and Sifter, difpofing of Offices and Commands in the Army at his pleafure.

17. Yet, had Ptolomy the ftrange fortune to overcome all difficulties he met with, Cleomenes the Spartan entertained, as we faid, lovingly by his father, with promife to endeavour his reftitution, now finding things to make for it at home, by the death of Antigonus, and the Conjunction of the Ætolians with them of Sparta againft the Acheans, earnestly defired to be difpatched away; but he minding nothing but his pleafures, and buried in foftinefs, regarded him not at all. Sofibius indeed confidered of the thing, and called his friends to advife about it; but upon mature deliberation concluded it not wifdom to difmifs him provided of men and arms, left finding all clear abroad, his Enemies being now dead, or quiet, he, who knew fufficiently the ftate and condition of Egypt under fuch a Prince, might attempt fomething rather beneficial for himfelf, than fafe for it. Hereupon is relieved he fhall be retained ftill, and after fome time an occafion was found to confine him. For one Nicagoras a Meflemian, who ought him an injury, coming to Town, he not at all confidering to whom he fpake, jeered the King to him for his filthy manner of life; which he being glad of, as having an opportunity againft him, acquainted Sofibius with his words, and they two plot together that Nicagoras at his departure the Historian tells us) made satisfaction to all Greece, against which he was made Admiral of the Fleet by Philip of Macedonia, when he wickedly set upon the Islands Cyclades; and also to the gods, into whom as well as men he thought to strike a terror, for casting anchor in the Haven, he there erected two Altars, one to Iuppiter, and another to Iniquity, into which he sacrificed to them as gods. This conspiracy being thus suppressed, such Attilians as would, had leave to depart with they had, and then the Country betook themselves to prepare for the solemnity, constantly observed when any one was saluted King, termed Anacleteria; for though he was as yet something too young, yet they thought that when it was known he was his own Master, and at his own disposal, his Kingdom would be more quiet, and his affairs be more promoted.

22. He carried himself exceedingly well for some time, and with great commendation, but afterwards was undone by flatterers, and so far corrupted, as he poisoned Aristomenes, whom he had before constantly observed as a Father, and who had deserved well of him and the Commonwealth. After this he degenerated more and more, whence he contracted such hatred of his Subjects, as he well nigh had lost his Kingdom. Towards his latter end, having some high designs in his head, he sent Demetrius an Ambassador to the Achæans, to renew friendship and alliance with them, who gladly accepted of his offer, sent back to him Lycortas Father to Polybius the Historian, Theodoridas and Rhoistetes to confirm it by oath on their part, and to receive the like assurance from him, which they obtained with a great present of money and arms. Some six years after he sent other Ambassadors to them, now having well nigh fallen out with the Romans, offering them ten thousands of fifty acres, sufficiently manned and furnished for War, which as of concernment, amounting almost to ten Talents, they accepted of most gladly, and dispatched back to him Lycortas again with Polybius his son (though he was too young by the Laws for such an employment) and Aratus the son of famous Aratus the Sicyonian, to give him thanks for the former present, and fetch the ships into Peloponnesus; but he was dead ere they could get out of their own Country. For plotting now against Seleucus Philopator, who had succeeded Antiochus his Father in the Kingdom of Syria, and preparing an Army against him, when one of his Captains asked him where he would get money sufficient for such an enterprise, he answered, that his friends were riches to him, which being told abroad amongst the People, his Officers fearing he would fleece them to supply himself, took him away by poison, after he had lived twenty seven years, and Reigned twenty four thereof A. M. 3825, and the first of the 150 Olympiad.

23. He left two sons and one daughter, all very young, of which the eldest son succeeded him, being surnamed Philometor, in the eighth year of Seleucus Philopator King of Syria. After his Anacleteria, his mother Cleopatra the daughter of Antiochus the Great being lately dead, through the persuasion of Eumelus the Eumach and Lenæus his principal Counsellors, he began to cast his thoughts upon Celestria, which being given to his mother as a portion, was unjustly kept from him as he conceived, by his uncle Antiochus Epiphanes, who now had succeeded his elder brother in the Kingdom of Syria. Antiochus hearing of their preparations for the War at Alexandria, came down into Egypt to prevent them, and overthrew the King several times as hath been said, and got the whole Country, except that City, into his power; after which Ptolomy deliberating with Comanus and Cimon what was to be done, it was resolved, that a Council of the most expert Captains should be erected, by the advice whereof all things should be managed. The first resolve of this Council was, that such Græcians Ambassadors as were present, should be sent to Antiochus about an agreement, with whom Ptolomy joynded of his own two others. The first day after their arrival, they were entertained very nobly, and on the next had audience, wherein they laid all the blame upon Eumelus the Eumach, and urging the youth and kindred of the King to him, laboured to pacify him. He after he had assented to them in these things, and spoken more to the same purpose, laboured with much earnestness to demonstrate, that Celestria appertained to the Crown of Syria, alleging it to have belonged to Antigonus the first founder of that Kingdom, and he produced the conveyances of it to Seleucus after the death of the other, from the Macedonian Kings. Moreover calling to their remembrance, that Antiochus his Father had lately obtained it again by right of conquest, he flatly denied that ever he passed it over as a portion with his daughter, to the late King of Egypt, and so having discoursed on this subject to the satisfaction of all his hearers, he then departed to Naucratis, where friendly treating the Inhabitants, and giving a larggifts to such Greeks as dwelt there, he thence departed for Alexandria, deferring to give any answer to those that had been sent to him, till such time as Arifides and Theris were returned, saying, he would have all the publick ministers of Greece to be conscious to, and witnesses of, all his intentions.

24. But no satisfactory answer (if any) was given, or any thing done for Philometor by Antiochus, so that being thus outed of his Kingdom after twelve years reign, and giving up himself for all that to nothing but sluggishness and luxury, the Alexandrians took upon them to make his younger brother King, surnaming him Euergetes, (though the badness of his manners made them afterwards change it into Caceregetes) being also called Physcon from his extraordinary fat paunch. Philometor was forced at length to betake himself to the Alexandrians too, who receiving him, made him partake with his brother in the Kingdom, but shortly after again expelled him; which thing Antiochus made use of, and under pretence of retorting him, continued the War, and overthrowing young Ptolomy in a Sea-fight, besieged Alexandria; but seeing that to be to no purpose, arose and departed into Syria, leaving Philometor at Memphis, to whom he restored all Egypt, except Pelusiæ, which he kept as the key of the Country in his own hands, not doubting but when one of the brothers had ruined the other, to come, and with ease enough devour the Conqueror. But though his two Nephews were otherwise forth enough, yet in this they shewed prudence, to disappoint him, for the elder seriously considering how little he ought to trust himself, sent to Cleopatra his sister, and the seconding him to her brother, both of them by advice and entreaty, procured a peace to be made with consent of both their friends, the Citizens of Alexandria giving way more readily, because of the dearth, which troubled them, by reason of the War, as well when they were at liberty as besieged. This drew off the Vizard from Antiochus, who, whereas he ought to have rejoiced, if he really intended the restitution of Philometor, fretted exceedingly hereat, and nothing would serve him, but needs he must come down again into Egypt, and had laid siege to Alexandria the second time, had not the Roman Ambassadors terrified him from his purpose (as we shewed in its more proper place) and forced him to quit both Egypt and Cyprus.

25. The Roman Ambassadors took some pains by their Authority to make them two friends, not being thoroughly reconciled before, and so they continued for six years peaceably together. But then differences betwixt them arose so high, that the Senate at Rome wrote to their Ambassadors, sent into Syria after the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, by all means to reconcile them, of which mediation we yet hear of no fruit at all, for presently the younger expelled his elder brother. Philometor being thus spoiled of his Kingdom, with a very few attendants, and in a pitiful habit, came to Rome for help, making his Inn the house of an Alexandrian Painter; which when the Senate understood, they sent for him, and made as formal an excuse as possible, that they had neither sent a Questor to meet him (after the fashion of the receiving persons of his quality) nor entertained him at the publick charge, which hapned not by any neglect on their part, but by reason of his sudden and secret arrival. Then was he conducted from the Court to the publick House of entertainment, and desired, that laying off his unseemly habit, he would move for audience, and a Questor was appointed to make him presents every day. At length, according to his desire, Cameucius and Quintus were sent back with him to Alexandria, who restored him to the Kingdom, and made the two brothers assent to a division of it, whereby Philometor was to hold Egypt and Cyprus, and Euergetes possessed Cyrene, the Covenant being most solemnly confirmed. But Euergetes not being at all satisfied in his part, halted to Rome to reverse the agreement, alleging that he gave not his consent freely but out of necessity of yielding to the times; wherefore he desired of the Senate that Cyprus might be also adjudged to him, with the addition of which his part would yet be far inferior to his brothers. Menechylus being sent after him by Philometor, replied, that he ought not only Cyrene, but his life also to his brother, so great hatred had he contracted from their subjects, that with the wonder of all, and beyond his hopes was that Kingdom bestowed on him, and urged the agreement most religiously made and confirmed, with faith given on both sides. But Ptolomy denying stiffly all this, the Senate, for that it seemed to them that the parting of the Kingdom was not yet fully concluded, and especially thinking it to be for their interest that the division should be equal, assented to his request, and ordered T. Torquatus, and Cn. Mernia to go with him, and put Cyprus into his hands. For the Romans understanding now fully the strength of Egypt, and considering what it might aspire to if united, wisely made use of this difference, and gratified the two brothers one after the other in their ambitious (but imprudent) desires.

26. Departing out of Italy into Greece, he there hired a strong band of men, intending to lay with them for Cyprus; but the Roman Commissioners calling to mind the Decree of the Senate, which was, that they should reduce him without force, persuaded him again to dismiss them, and pass over to Cyrene, and they in the mean time going to Alexandria, would endeavour to persuade his brother to comply with the Senate, and bringing him along with them meet him in the Confiners of both Kingdoms. He accordingly went to Crete, where hiring nine thousand Souldiers, he passed over to Libya, where he expected to hear from Alexandria; but the Romans there treating with his brother about a reconciliation, and the yielding of Cyprus up to him, something he assented to, and put off others, on purpose drawing out the time in length. Forty days with extraordinary entertainment he detained them at Alexandria, during which time news came to Euergetes that the Cyrenians had revolted from him, who understanding well the mind of his brother from his present carriage, and seeing nothing suitable to royalty in Euergetes, he acting all things after a Tyrannical manner, could not bring themselves to submit any longer to his Government. Hearing this, he failed to Catagabazus, thence to make for Cyrene, in which place he found the Straights kept against him, but sending some about to come upon the Defendants on their backs, set upon them also himself, and cleared the passage, but coming to Cyrene, and engaging with the Natives, was worsted by them. Whether he recruited himself again, and recovered his Sovereignty here or no, we have nothing from History to speak expressly; but not long after he was in a capacity to attempt Cyprus (being encouraged by the Senators renouncing their friendship with his brother upon his account) where he was also overthrown by his brother, and then besieged, and taken in the City Laphias. Yet did Philometor spare him, what for his innate clemency and brotherly affection, and for fear of the Romans; and not only so, but made a Covenant Cities with a quantity of Corn yearly, and promised him his daughter in marriage, worse than this being not accounted meet in that Country.

27. Not long did they accord, for Euergetes, some two or three years after, being incouraged by his former success, made another journey to Rome, where in the Senate he made another loud complaint against his brother, accusing him of plotting against his life, for a witness of which design he shewed scars upon his body, and aggravating the thing with all his might, endeavoured to move the minds of all the beholders to compassion. Two Ambassadors were present from Philometor to answer to whatsoever he should accuse him of, but all mens ears were so filled with the accusation, that no place would be found for their defence; so that they were instantly commanded to be gone, and five Commissioners were appointed (furnished all with Gallies) to go, and bring him into possession of Cyprus; the Allies also, both in Greece and Asia, being written to, and leave given to as many as would to assist him in the recovery of it. What was done also to the recovery of it, through defect of History, we are ignorant, though some grounds we have to think he did not obtain the Island, and no more do we hear of him till his brothers death. In the days of this Philometor, Onias the son of Onias the third, High-Priest of the Jews, seeing the Priesthood to be alienated from his family into that of the Hasmoneans, living in Egypt, and having well deserved of the King in his Wars, that he might cherish his memory, petitioned him for leave to build a Temple in the Province of Chelops, after the fashion of that at Jerusalem, signifying that thereby would be better provided for the quiet of his Kingdom, now when the Jews badly agreed amongst themselves through the variety of their places of worship in that Country, and misapplied the Prophecy of Isaiah, concerning the spiritual Priesthood, and reign of Christ, to this his Ambitions and unlawful design. His Petition was granted, and in that Country built he a Temple resembling the true, and lawful one; one hundred eighty furlongs distant from Memphis; only he put therein no Candlestick, but hung up a Lamp in a Golden string, which cast a light about it like to the Sun-beams.

28. In the time of this Philometor, the Jews and Samaritans inhabiting Alexandria fell out about their way of Worship, they contending earnestly that the Temple of Jerusalem, those that at Gerizim was founded most according to the precept of Moses, and to earnest was the dispute, that both parties appealed to him and his Council Dissention betwixt the Jews and Samaritans.

Council for a decision of the controversy, who being to judge according to evidence produced out of the Law, was to put to death those pleaders that could not make good their cause. For the Jews appeared Andronicus the son of Messala, for the Samaritans Sabbas, and Theodosius, who being heard by Ptolemy in a full Assembly, all were so well satisfied in the proofs brought by Andronicus, as the King gave sentence on his side, and condemned Sabbas and Theodosius. Philometor about this time was deeply engaged in the affairs of Syria; for, Demetrius Soter having molested him much with War, together with Antiochus King of Asia, and Ariarathes of Cappadocia, all these agreed to furnish a young man of base condition, who counterfeiting himself the son of Antiochus Epiphanes, spoiled Demetrius both of his Kingdom and Life. This Alexander (as he is called) being especially beheld to Ptolemy for this change of his condition, desired of him his daughter in marriage; which he readily agreed to, and brought her (named Cleopatra) to him to Ptolemais, where the nuptials were solemnized with great state. Afterwards Alexander giving up himself to cruelty and luxury, Demetrius, the son of Demetrius Soter, having hired Souldiers in Crete, attempted the recovery of his Fathers Kingdom. Ptolemy with great Forces both by Land and Sea, came then into Syria, under pretence of helping his son-in-law; but getting a great part of the Country into his hands, as far as the River Orontes, and the City Seleucia, he had other intentions, having conceived great prejudice in his mind against Alexander, the special occasion of which was, that whereas one Ammonius, a great Officer of his had conspired against his life at Ptolemais, he refused to give him up to him upon his demand. Wherefore, though he went to Antioch, and there let two Diademons his head, the one for Syria, and the other for Egypt, yet persuaded he the Antiochians to receive Demetrius for their King, and taking away his daughter from Alexander, gave her to him; Alexander was overthrown, after which he fled into Arabia (as we said) and there was made away. But in the fight it hapned that Ptolemy his Horse being affrighted at the noise of an Elephant, threw him, which his Enemies perceiving came upon him, and gave him such a wound in his head, that for four days he lay senseless, and though coming to himself, on the next, he was mightily pleased with the sight of the head of Alexander Balas, which was sent him; yet proved it not such a Cordial, but the third day after, as his Physicians were busy in dressing his own he dyed, after he had reigned thirty four years, A. M. 3859. in the third of the 158 Olympiad.

Ptolemy fighting against Alexander King of Syria, whom he had formerly set up, received a wound and died.

27. After his death the order of succession was first changed in this Kingdom. For whereas hitherto the son had continually followed his Father, and now Cleopatra his wife with the help of the Princes, endeavoured to have it so, in his son and hers; yet his brother Euergetes the second, or Physcon, then reigning in Cyrene, withstood her purpose, and forced her, for to put an end to the controversy, to marry him. Coming to Alexandria, he first caused the favours of the Child to be slain, and then the boy himself in the arms of his mother on their wedding day, and amidst the solemnities; according to which beginning he proceeded, being nothing milder towards those that had sent for him. For, giving liberty to the outlandish Souldiers to kill, and rifle, he filled all places with slaughters; many being accused, as though they had plotted against him, were made away with cruel torments, others under some pretence or other banished, and their goods confiscated. Having a son born of this his sister, he named him Memphitis, after the place of his birth, but whilst he was keeping his birth-day, that he might also feed his cruel humour, he put to death divers Cyrenians, who brought him into Egypt, for taxing him somewhat liberally for his too much familiarity with Irene his Concubine. As his cruelty, so also his lust knew no bounds; for ravishing first his wives daughter, and his own Niece, both by Father and Mother, he put away his wife and married her; whereas the Inhabitants of Alexandria being affrighted, for fear of death quit their habitations, so that being left alone as a King of houlcs, and not of men, by Proclamation he called, and gave leave to strangers to inhabit them. It hapned that at such time as they flocked thither came also P. Scipio Africanus the younger, Sp. Mummius, and L. Metellus, sent from Rome to visit the Kingdoms and States of the East, and compose their differences. Scipio being landed, and having his face covered, the People flocked about him, and desired him to uncover himself, which he granting, they out of the great pleasure conceived at the sight of such a person, gave a shout. Physcon himself coming out to meet them, was exceedingly ridiculous to them, being a man otherwise sufficiently deformed, of a low stature, and such corpulence, as his belly resembled rather that of a beast than a man man. He provided magnificent entertainment, but they despising his dainties (as corrupting the manners of men) ate very sparingly, only minded that they came about, and travelled into the Country, where viewing the several places thereof, considering the populousness, strength, and convenience of their situation; they concluded Aegypt a convenient seat for the greatest Empire, if it had but Lords that knew how to make use of it, and so departed to Cyrene, and thence into Syria.

28. After some time he became so odious to the new-inhabitants also for his cruelty, that they set fire to his Palace, and he was driven with his wife and son to get away to Cyrene, after which they restored the Kingdom to Cleopatra his sister, whom he had put away. Hereupon he raised an Army, and made War 'upon her and them, and fearing that they might fend for his eldest son from Cyrene, and make him King, to prevent that, he murdered him; which being known, they call down his statues and images. He taking this to be done as well in favour of his sister Cleopatra, as in despite of himself, to be revenged sufficiently on her, commanded their son Memphis a comely and towardly child to be killed in his presence, and then his head, hands, and feet to be cut off, and being sent to Alexandria to be preferred her, as she was feasting at the celebration of her own birth day. This struck not only her but all the City into exceeding horror and amazement, and the sad spectacle was shewed to the People, to let them know what they might expect from such a King. He notwithstanding all this, yet went on in his own way; for considering how he was hated by his People, that he might reign more securely, as he thought in their weakness, he caused a place of publick meeting full of youth to be set on fire, and destroyed all therein either with fire or sword. Cleopatra having put an end to mourning for her son, and seeing her self pressed with War by her brother, sent to Demetrius Nicator King of Syria, and her son in Law, for aid, offering him the Kingdom for his pains in securing it. He gladly accepting the offer, came down, and waged War with Physcon for some time, but his People revolting from him at home, was forced to return, so that the being then in a manner destitute, was glad to follow him into Syria. Physcon then re-entering, and being seized anew of the Kingdom, the Antiochians knowing his prejudice against Demetrius, sent him for one of the posterity of Seleucus to reign over them, whereupon he surnamed a young man and son of a Merchant, to mend the matter, giving out, that Alexander Bala was his Father. The counterfeit by his help oured Demetrius of his Kingdom; but then not being able to bear so high a condition, for which he was never bred, grew proud, and despised him. Therefore to be revenged on him, being now reconciled to his sister, he pulled him down again, by sending aid, and his daughter for a wife to Antiochus Grypus the son of Demetrius. Nor long after Physcon died, after he had reigned (from his brothers death) twenty nine years. A. M. 3883, and the last of the 165 of Olympiad.

30. Lathurus made but an exchange with his brother, as it fell out, making him-<sup>Je</sup>self Master of Cyprus, whither yet his Mother followed him with her hatred, and th the War the effect thereof. Here he lay not idle, for Alexander Jannes at this time King of the Jews besieging Ptolemae, the inhabitants thereof sent to him for aid, and though they repented them of the bargain made with him, and sent to stop his journey, yet he came on, and at his approach the siege was raised. Then invaded he Judea, and overthrowing Jannes in a great and bloody battel, haraied the Country. Cleopatra his Mother was startled at this his power and prosperity, and relolved he was to be brought down, else her affairs were but in a tottering condition; therefore sending a good part of her treasure with her Nephews and resitant to the Island Cos, She came her self into Poenicia, besieged Ptolemae, and persecuted him into Celestria. He having some hopes to get Egypt into his hands in her absence, marched in all half down thither; but being disappointed, and purified by a party sent by her, he was forced to return and winter at Gaza. She in the mean time took Ptolemae, whither Jannes came to her, with whom a little after she renewed the League at Seythopolis, and then he prospering much in Celestria, Lathurus was forced to return to Cyprus, and his Mother seeing that, departed also into Egypt. During these Wars betwixt the Mother and son, it happened, that he was once taken by her General, but dismissed again, whereas she was so enraged, as she put to death her Commander. Her son Alexander being afraid, that at length her cruelty might extend to him also, withdrew himself from her, preferring a secure, though obscure estate, before a dangerous reign. She notwithstanding went on in her way, not neglecting her affairs, and fearing her elder son might be helped by Antiochus Zysicenus, sent great supplics to Cyprus his half brother and rival, with Seleno for a wife, taken formerly from Lathurus, and by messengers prevailed with Alexander to return. Divers years then they lived and reigned together, but at length she really plotted his destruction, and being caught in the manner, was according to her desires (though perhaps not his duty) put to death, after she had domineered over him, and expelled his brother eighteen years.

fellow both in marriage and the Kingdom; so that she was forced to withdraw into Syria, there to make provision for her re-establishment by force. Not long it was ere she returned, having furnished her self; which her brother being aware of, went, and pitched his Tents near to the Mountain Celcus, at the Pelagian mouth of the Nile; where lying incamped, Pompey being then beaten by Cæsar at Pharfalus, fled to him for defence and safeguard, chusing rather to venture upon Ægypt than any other place, both for its nearness and strength, and hoping upon the account of his Guardianship to be lovingly received. The King then a poor boy (about thirteen years old) gave no answer to his message; but those most potent about him consulting of it, were perverted by Theodotus his School-master to receive him; but then, that they might curry favour with Cæsar, to make him away; so that being received with small civility into a little boat, he was slain ere he got to the other side, as is more largely exprest in the Roman story. His head was reserved as a present for Cæsar, who coming to Alexandria, though at the first he was very welcome, and got much respect for his frequenting the public readings of Philosophers, yet exacting the debt owing by Anetes, and not obtaining from the Treasure of the Temples for the payment of his Army, he thereby incurred the great displeasure of the Town-men, all things being made worse by Pothinus, who to his utmost ability incended the superstitious multitude. Cæsar also accounting it to belong to himself as Consul, and shortly after, as Dictator, to compose the differences of the Confederates of the people of Rome, took upon him to judge the cause of the King and his Sister, which bred such disturbance, as thereupon ensued a troublesome War.

38. There were secret plots laid for his life, which he being aware of, was glad to spend whole nights in feasting to prevent them, and gave way to Cleopatra to come to him, who knowing he was no hater of Women, had sent him to complain and desire a conference. At the sight of her he became very loose, and returned from being her Judge to be her Advocate, which thing so enraged the King, perceiving her now to be got into the Palace, that he rushed out to the People, crying he was betrayed, and pulling his Diadem from his head, cast it on the ground. A great stir arising hereupon, he was caught by Cæsar's Souldiers, and brought back into the house, which the multitude thereat appeared now besieged, and Cæsar with promise to do whatsoever they would, scarce appeared the tumult; his men being unprovided for resistance, having not expected any such occasion from those they accounted their friends. Then taking Ptolomy and Cleopatra along with him, he read over their Fathers Will in public audience, which subjecting them to the tuition of the People of Rome (whose Supreme and absolute Magistrate he then was) in execution of the said Will he gave to them two as Husband and Wife the Kingdom of Ægypt, and to their younger brother and sister that of Cyprus, not leaving any thing to himself, but willing rather to add something of his own; such a fear at this time had seized on him. The people hereby was quieted for a time, until Pothinus, fearing he might be called to account for what had already passed, kindled a new flame to divert it. He first objected, as well he might, what an unworthy thing it was that the King should be called to answer, and then added, there was reason to suspect, that whatsoever Cæsar might pretend, yet at length he would put all into the hands of Cleopatra. He sent to Achillas General of all the Forces then lying at Pelagium, alluring him by great promises in the Kings name to draw down the army privily to Alexandria; and he, being not backward to close with him, marched down with twenty thousand foot, and two thousand horse. Cæsar had not strength enough to go out and meet him, and therefore contained himself in the City, yet commanded his men to be in readiness, and kept the King with him; whose name he knew to be of great force amongst his people, and that thereby this undertaking might appear rather to be the enterprize of a few dissolute, and factious persons, than any thing backed by his consent, or Warrant.

39. Achillas (2) despising the number of Cæsar's Soldiers, after he had entered the City, thought presently to have broken in upon him, but he prevented this by blocking up the ways, and fortifying his house. Then followed a sharp contention at the Haven, the Alexandrians endeavouring to become masters of the Fleet, and thereby to cut off all Provisions and supplies from coming to him; but he made a thief to burn all the Gallies, from which the fire seizing upon the houses adjoining, consumed to ashes most part of that famous (b) Library Collected by the care and diligence of the former Kings. first, he placed a Garrison in (c) Pharus and after a few skirmishes, sent about into Syria, Cilicia, and other places for aid. Antiochus the Kings younger sister got out to Achillas, and jointly with him managed the War; yet with such contention for the Chief command, as proved only beneficial to the Soldiers; whom both by gifts sought to oblige; for the contest at length arrived at such (d) height; that lying in wait for the life of each other, he was slain by the help of one Gany-medes, who having helped her in the escape, was now preferred to be their General. Pothinus all this while was not backward, but out of the Court sent Messengers to Achillas, to encourage him in his work, which being discovered cost him his life, and caused the King to be more nearly looked to. Ganymedes at his entrance upon the Generallship, stopped up the channels which brought fresh-water into that part of the City, where Cæsar lay, and with engines conveyed salt from the Sea into the room of it, thinking thereby to discourage the Enemy, and force him out of his hold; but Cæsar (though his Soldiers were at first daunted at it) prevented the design by sinking of Wells, which abundantly supplied their necessities, to the wonder of the Ægyptians, who had no such invention. By this time a legion shipped by Domitius Calpurnius, with provisions and arms from Syria, landed on the African shoar, a little above Alexandria; which Cæsar understanding, went with his Fleet unmann'd to fetch them, and the enemy having notice of it, drew out also against him. He receiving the men aboard, had no mind to engage, because it grew towards night; but a Rhodian Gally, not keeping up with the rest of the Fleet, was set upon, whereby he was constrained to go in to the rescue, and so carried himself, that day-light only was wanting to his completing of the Victory, by utterly destroying the whole Navy of the Alexandrians.

40. They notwithstanding this defeat, in which and other ways, of late, they had lost no fewer than one hundred and ten Vessels (yet being encouraged thereto by Ganymedes) set themselves to the rigging of another Fleet, which being in a readiness, Cæsar brought his about the Island Pharos, and set it in order against them. Both sides being ready to engage, yet a narrow passage lying betwixt them, each expected till the other should enter first, as then having a better advantage, until the Rhodians desired of Cæsar leave to enter the Strait. This once granted and done, they were presently set upon and then relieved, till a total engagement ensued, in which the Ægyptians were worsted (not a ship of Cæsar's receiving any hurt) and in their flight took into Pharos; where they were received by their friends, and kept off the Romans for some time, but at length were forced to quit the Island with great loss. This being joyned to the main by two Bridges, one of them in like manner was forsaken by the Town-men; but the Romans attempting to gain the other, through the rashness of some in their company, were beaten off, and forced tumultuously to betake themselves to their Ships. Cæsar himself in the hurry was glad to leap into the Sea, and the Enemy following, to dive under water, and take breath now and then as he could; till (having swum almost a quarter of a mile) he was taken up into a ship. He lost four hundred of his Legionary Soldiers in this skirmish, as many Ship-men and rowers, yet neither he nor his Army were discouraged at all, but were rather incited to redeem their loss by some other exploit, which the Alexandrians taking notice of, sent to him desiring he would dismiss their King, whom now they professed they were ready to obey, and if he should command them to be friends with him they would presently yield. He knew there was neither any trusting of him nor them; but considering that if he dismissed him, they would be nothing the stronger, and if he should become the head of their party, the War would be more honourable, he gravely admonished him to act nothing contrary to the interest of his People, or his confederacy with Rome, and then gave him leave to depart, though he pretended an unwillingness to leave him, and notably counterfeited sincere friendship with feigned tears.

41. Though the King being returned was very earnest for carrying on the War, yet they seeing themselves nothing amended by the accession of his name or presence (which the Romans despised) and that they profited nothing by any of their attempts, were greatly discouraged, yet understanding that great supplies of men and provisions were coming to Cæsar, they resolved once more to take the Sea, and cut them off; and they did much hurt to those that came by water, till he sent out his Fleet under the command of Tiberius Nero, and restrained them. But by Land came Mithridates of Pergamus from Syria, accompanied with Antipater the Governour of Judea, and Father to Herod the Great, bringing down with him a great of all his Offices, which alone was thought enough at this time, left once declared an Enemy to the State, others with him should have been included in the same capacity, of whom divers, being men of great influence, might have been driven through desperation, to act more vigorously for him. Hereby it was thought he would be sufficiently intangled, resolving not to forsake her on any terms whatsoever, and vulgarly accounted to be bewitched by her. And to littleless could these things practized by him amount to. He called her Queen, Lady, and Mistress, gave her Roman for her Guard (who had her name engraven on their Targets.) He went abroad, celebrated Games, sat in Judgement, and sometimes rode with her, and when the pleased to be drawn in her Chariot, ran by her side, amongst the Ladies. She was so confident she should be Mistress at length of the Mistress of the World, that if she would swear most religiously, it should be by that Law or Sentence, which she should pronounce in the Capitol.

47. For all this adoe, yet in the preparation for the War, Antony mistrusted her, and that so far, as to have his meat tasted for fear of poison. Shetaking notice of it, poisoned a Cup of drink, and giving him it, when he was about to let it to his mouth, interposed her hand, convincing him thereby how easy a matter it was for her to do that of which she was suspected to have an intention, and then sending for a Malefactor out of Prison, and giving him the liquor he died immediately. This made him bold and confident of her, and further enlaved his affections, in so much that she ruled him in the management of the War. For Canidius, whom she had bribed to get leave for her to continue with him, changing after his mind, or (at least his language) and advising him to fend her back into Egypt, and to go into Thrace or Macedonia, and there to decide the controversy in a pitch battel, she prevailed with him not onely to stay, but made Antony engage at Actium in a Sea-fight, yet providing rather for flight than victory. Ere it could justly be discerned which party would carry it, she being impatient of delay, with her Golden Prow and Purple Sails, giving a sign to her Egyptians, besook her self to flight, which Antony seeing made haste after her as fast as possible, and being received on board, neither saw, nor was seen by her; but fate him down in a sad and thoughtful posture, holding his head betwixt his hands; and for three or four dayes so continued, till arriving at Tamara (a Promontory of Laconia) the women there that were intimate with her brought them together. He passing over into Africa, the returned into Egypt, counterfeiting a triumph with her Ship curiously adorned, and melodious singing, that the might be received of her Subjects, the chiefest of which presently she put to death, whom she knew formerly to have born no good will towards her, and now to be elevated upon the report of the defeat received at Actium. Confiscating their Estates, and rising religious Houses, she heaped together a great Mass of Treasure, raising Forces therewith with all expedition, and that she might draw into Confederacy the King of Media, she sent him the head of Artavases (or Artabanus) the Armenian, his Emulator. Then, attempting a matter of greatest difficulty, she conveyed Ships over the Bosphorus, or Neck of Land (which parting the Egyptian (or Mediterranean) from the Red-Sea divideth Asia from Africa) into the Arabian Bay, intending to fly servitude, and seek out some Foreign seat, wherein to spend the remainder of her dayes. But Antony returning to her, who as yet had heard nothing of the loss of his Land-Army, they encouraged themselves, and she changed her purpose. Her Ships were burnt by the Inhabitants of Arabia Petraea, at the procurement of Q. Didius the President of Syria.

48. But Antony having notice that his Army had revolted to Cesar, withdrew himself in a sad and Melancholick posture from the sight of all men into the Island Pharos, and then again within a while, having disburthened himself of grief, returned to the Court, where they indulged their genius more than ever, those that were willing to die with them giving in their names, and passing away their time together in nothing but feasting and jollity. She gathered together divers sorts of poisons, which she tried upon Capital Offenders and Brutes, approving above all the biting of an Asp, which she observed without any convulsion to cast the party into an heavy stupefaction, with a moderate sweat upon the face, and so to kill with an easy kind of languishment. Before Cesar came down into Egypt against them she sent several times to him. She asked the Kingdom for her Children, and without Antony his knowledge sent him a Scepter, a Crown of Gold, and a Royal Throne, giving up her Kingdom to him, as it were with thofe, to gain respect. He received them as a good Omen, and returned to her openly-threatening language; yet underhand promised her impunity, and the entire possession of her Kingdom, if she would make away Antony. And fearing lest the might be brought to undertake some desperate design, he sent one Thyrcus his Freed-man, and a cunning fellow to her, to make her believe he was in Love with her, hoping that then, besides the favour of the Treasure, which she had threatened to burn, she having a great ambition to be loved by all great persons, would not stick at killing Antony. She desiring indeed that it might be so, and remembering how his Uncle, in time past, and since that Antony had been bewitched with her, easily fooled her self into a fond belief thereof, and promised her ambition, not onely pardom, and Egypt, but the Roman Empire it self. Antony seeing her kind to the Messenger above measure, suspected something, and soundly lashing him, sent him back to his Masters; and then she to wife off his jealousie most solemnly celebrated his birth-day (though suitably to her present condition she neglected her own) and fought all manner of wayes how to humour him. Yet did she betray Pulsinus in Cesar's hands, and when he drew down towards Alexandria secretly forbade the Town-men to go out against him, though openly she exhorted them to resistance. And when Antony had provided a Fleet, she caused it wholly to revolt, and in like manner the Horse, which Antony plainly seeing, after the overthrow of his Foot, returned into the City, crying out that he was betrayed by her into their hands, against whom, for her sake he had taken Arms.

She betrayeth Pulsinus, and causeth the Fleet and Horse to revolt to him.

Antony killt himself.

Cesar earnestly desired to lead her in Triumph, and doth all he can to deceive her.

40. She being afraid of him, went to her Monument, as intending to kill her self under pretence of being in feare of Cesar, and sent a Messenger to him to tell him she was dead. He giving credit to it, desired Eros his servant to kill him; but he preventing it with his own death, he wounded himself in the belly; but the frook not being such an one as could presently dispatch him, he intreated his friends to do it, who refusing, and running out of the room, a tumult ensued, and the perceiving what was done, sent for him up into her Monument. He understanding she was alive, arose, thinking he might also possibly live; but the blood issuing out in great abundance, he departed of it, and was born by his attendants to the door of the building, whence he was drawn up with Cords in a lamentable plight, all in goar blood, helping himself as it were, and stretching out his hands to her, and her women, who baled him up thus to the top. When he was got up the laid him on a bed, tore her flesh, wiped off his blood with her face, calling him Lord, Husband, and General, after which he presently expired. Cesar now desired to get her into his power by strong hand, having an extraordinary ambition to grace his Triumph with her, and not willing to promise any thing, and be counted a deceiver by falsifying his word. She continued still in the Monument, hoping at least to purchase her Kingdom by the Treasure she had in her power, and refused to come down, talking with the messengers from above. But presently some got in to her, removed all things out of the way wherewith the might hurt her self, and then bringing her into the Palace, detracted nothing from her former state, thereby to delude her with vain hope. Cesar now without any trouble entered Alexandria with Arius the Philosopher on his right hand, who formerly had read the Sciences to him; he permitted her to bury Antony as she pleased, which after she had done, being spent with sorrow, and her breast all exulcerated with troaks, she thereby contracted a Fever, and glad of that pretence to abstain from all sustenance, and so end her dayes, she consulted also with Olympus her Physician how to reduce her self into a Consumption. But Cesar smelling it out, so terrified her about her Children, that she was content to desist.

41. Shortly after, he coming to comfort her, she cast her self down at his feet, indeavouring with all the art she had to inveigle his affections, which though he perceived, yet fixing his Eyes on the ground, he onely said, Be of good cheer Woman, thou shalt have no harm; She being solicitous, not for life, but love, and a Kingdom. Then gave he in an Inventory of her Goods and Treasure, at which Seleucus one of her officers was so Maipert, as to accuse her of suppressing something, whereupon she flew in his face, and soundly buffeted him, Cesar smiling, and gently reprehending her for it. But she asked him whether it was not a hard case for her, whom he had deigned to visit, to be accused by one of her own slaves, if she had reserved any thing, not for her self, but wherewithal to present his Wife and Sister, that they might render him the more favourable to her. Hereat he exceedingly rejoiced, hoping she had a great desire to live, and promised her great matters, vainly supposing he therein deceived her. But she having notice by Dolabella, a young Gentleman amongst his followers, and one that bare her great good will, that after three days, she and her Children were to go for Italy, first obtained leave of him to celebrate the obsequies of Antony, which having performed with lamentations, and great shew of affliction, she commanded a Bath to be prepared, and sitting down to meat, sumptuously Dined. After Dinner she gave a Letter to her Keeper to carry to Cæsar (wherein she desired the might be buried by Antony) sealed, that he thinking the contents to be of consequence, might the more easily be removed out of the way. He being gone, with the help of her two women, she made fast the doors, most gorgeously apparelled her self, as upon some solemn day, with her Royal Ornaments, and then put an Asp which she had procured secretly to be brought in amongst Figs, Grapes, and Flowers) to her left Arm, with the biting of which, she fell presently as into a sleep, and so died. Cæsar having read the Letter presently perceived what was done, and endeavoured with all speed to recall her to life, though in vain, grieving fore that he was frustrated of a glorious Triumph, yet pitying and admiring the person, whom he cauted to be royally interred with Antony, according to her desire, and afterwards dealt very nobly with their Children. Adorned she was with all the endowments of nature above her Sex. Being learned her self, she was a great Lover and promoter of knowledge; which she testified in erecting another Library, in the room of that which had been burnt, supplied with Books from Pergamus at the procurement of Antony. She lived thirty nine years, reigned twenty two (counted from her Fathers death) fourteen whereof she spent with Antony. And with her perished her Kingdom, now reduced into the form of a Roman Province, and the Macedonian Empire was quite extinct, three hundred years after the death of Darius, and the Monarchy of Alexander, by whom it arose; two hundred and ninety three after Proton the son of Lagus had obtained Egypt; in the third of the one hundred and eighty seventh Olympiad, the year of the World three thousand nine hundred seventy five, and twenty eight before the birth of Christ. Octavius Cæsar the fourth time, and *M. After Antiochus had raised his siege and departed from Jerusalem, as was said before, he undertook an Expedition against the Parthians, wherein he was slain. John the Son of Simon who then was chief both Priest and Magistrate of the Jews accompanied him some way with a band of Auxiliaries, and got the surname of Hyrcanus from the overthrow of the Hyrcanians, A. M. 3870. as it's thought, and returned with great credit into his own Country. After Antiochus his death, he led down an Army into Syria, thinking, as indeed it fell out, that the Cities were left without defence, whereof he took Severus, Medaba, Samaga, Sicima, and Gerizim, where the Cuthæans had built a Temple resembling that at A. M. 3877. Jerusalem.

Chap. VII. Contemporary with the Empire of the Macedonians.

Jerusalem. In this Expedition he also subdued Idumæa, the inhabitants whereof he put to their choice, whether they should be circumcised or quit their habitations. They chose the former, and now began to be reckoned amongst the Jews, submitting to all their rites and ceremonies. After this he sent to Rome, desiring that the confederacy made with the Senate might be renewed; that Joppa, Gaza, &c. with other Cities and places taken from the Jews by Antiochus, contrary to their Decree, might be restored, that it might not be lawful for the King of Syria to pass through their Country with his Armies, that whatsoever Antiochus had attempted against them in War contrary to their will, might be made frustrate, and that the Senate would please to send their Ambassadors to procure those things, and to cause satisfaction to be given for the havock made of the Country. The Fathers renewed the confederacy with them, according to their desire, promised to take order they should be no more wronged, and dismissed the Ambassadors with money to bear their charges, and letters commendatory to those through whose Countreys they should pass. The many changes which then presently happened in the Syrian Kingdom so diverted the several Princes from meddling with the Jews, that they were glad of their friendship and this proved a sufficient opportunity for Hyrcanus to establish his affairs. For they destroying one another, with War, he securely enjoyed the Revenues of the Country, and got together a great Mass of money, so that despising them, he went and besieged Samarita, the Inhabitants of which he was displeased with for their injury offered to the Marisseni, though the King of Syria's Subjects, yet his friends and allies.

2. He cast a Trench about it, and committed the siege to the care of his two sons Antigonus and Aristobolus, who forely oppressed the defendants, hindering all importation of Victuals, so that they were constrained to beg aid of Antiochus Cynicus, then reigning in Syria. He came, but was overthrown by Aristobolus his Soldiers, and being pursued by the brothers as far as Scythopolis, hardly escaped, and the siege was renewed. The besieged reduced to their former necessities, sent once more to Cyzacenus, who then obtaining about six thousand men of Ptolomy Latirus (then expelled his Kingdom by his mother) made an inroad into Hyrcanus his Dominions, and made havock of all things, thereby hoping to constrain him to raise the siege. But having lost many of his men being intercepted by the Enemy, he himself went to Tripolis, and gave over the War to Callimander and Epicrates, two of his Captains. Callimander being more venturous than his wife was presently slain, and his fellow was corrupted to betray Scythopolis and other Towns to Hyrcanus, who then after a years lying before Samarita took it, razed it, and brought the water-courts through the Place, by the filth of which all appearance of a Town was taken away. After this, inviting the Pharisees on a time (whose Scholar he had been) to a feast, he laboured to approve his sincerity to them, and desired, if any of them knew any fault in him, to tell him plainly of it. All approved of his manners but one Eleazar a seditious and bad man, who told him, that if he would be accounted good, he must desist himself of the Priesthood, and be content with the Principality; for that he had heard say, that his mother was a captive in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. This being utterly false, Hyrcanus was grievously offended, and so were the Pharisees; but Jonathan a Saducee of the contrary fact, and one in great grace with him, took thence occasion to tell him, that this affront came from all the Pharisees together, and that he should perceive it by the punishment they would inflict upon him, if their opinion was demanded. They being mercifully inclined, thought it sufficient he should be imprisoned and beaten for no greater an offence: at which Hyrcanus was fore displeased, as then thinking they had raised that scandal of him. Wherefore being more incensed by Jonathan, he revolted to the Saducees, abrogated the constitutions of the Pharisees, and punished their followers, whence it came to pass, that neither he nor his sons were much beloved by the People. A seditious also arose hereupon, but he quieted all, and having governed thirty one years died, being honoured with three especial dignities, of the chief Government, High-Priesthood, and also Prophecy, as Josephus tells us, who relateth, that he foretold his two eldest sons should neither of them long enjoy his Principality. 3. Mention being here made of Pharisees, it is requisite to speak something of this Sect and others amongst the Jews, according to the nature of this work; Josephus first maketh mention of them in the ninth Chapter of his thirteenth Book of Antiquities, afterwards more diligently and largely * handling their matters. There is no question but these sects sprang up after the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity. It's probable that the difference amongst them arose after the building of the second Temple, about their worship and offerings. Some thought they were only to live by the precept of the Law, neither above nor below it. Others believed they were not only to act according to the bare letter of the Scriptures, but also according to such senses and consequences as might be made out from it, and accordingly they offered over and above what the Law required in the service of the Temple, even what they conceived was due according to their riches or other respects. Those that stood to the letter of the Law were called Karaim: Those that besides the precepts of the Law did works of supererogation, and voluntary service without any compulsion, were named Hafidim; that is Santi or Holy, and (after they grew into a body) Hafideans. As long as this voluntary and supererogatory service was free and spontaneous, there was no such schism; but when this doctrine of the Hafideans came to be digested into precepts, and the precepts of supererogation into Writings and Canons; many doubts, disputes, and controversies, daily arose, whence two dogmatical Sects had their original. One which only allowed of the Law itself, and another that embraced also the glosses and interpretations of it. From the latter, being that of the Hafideans, sprung up some who called themselves Peruschim or Separate, as those who by reason of their holiness were not only distinct and separated from the vulgar, but also from other Hafideans, for that they taught that those constitutions formerly accounted free, were to be observed out of necessity. These Peruschim in Syriack Pheruschim, came by Greek Writers to be called Pharisei: Now as out of the Hafideans arose the Pharisees, so from amongst the Karaim the Sadducees, so named from Sadoc, Antigonus the Master of this Sadoc, and Scholar to Simon the Just, amongst other heads of doctrine had taught, that they ought not to be like Servants, who served their Masters on condition to receive their Wages, meaning that we ought to serve God out of love, and not for our own gain or advantage. But Sadoc, or Sadduc, and Baitus interpreted this godly saying into a wicked sense, teaching, that there was no reward after this life; and therefore denied the future state, and framed their Heresie. The third sect was that of the Essai or Esseni, who as it's probable sprang from the Pharisees, though when it began it be uncertain. Philo Judaeus thinketh they were so called from their holiness Esseni, as though Esseni, though more probably from Hesi the Syriack, whence the Greek Ἠσῆ may be derived. The Hebrew signifieth such as live apart from noise, which agreeth much with those Esseni, who like the Pythagoreans kept silence, and lived in deserts or Villages by themselves, far from others. They had skill in Physick, and thence some would derive their name from the Hebrew Asa, which signifieth to heal. This Sect was later then that of the Pharisees, and some think it arose at this time when Hyrcanus turned Saducee, and persecuted the Sect of the Pharisees; for then might many of the Pharisees to shun persecution depart into the Wilderness and desert places, and afterwards be called Essai or Esseni, who were held more strict than the Pharisees themselves.

4. But, (to return to our matter) John surnamed Hyrcanus left five sons, whereof Aristobolus the eldest (surnamed Philellen for his love to, and familiarity with the Greeks) succeeded him, and first changed his Principality into a Kingdom, setting a Diadem on his head, four hundred and eighty one years after the return of the Jews from the Captivity of Babylon. His second brother he loved exceedingly, so as he made him his partner in the Kingdom; but that up the rest in prison, and with them his Mother, to whom his Father had left the Principality, and proceeded so far in unnatural cruelty, as to starve her to death. Not long after, he caused to be made away also his beloved brother, though against his will he did it. For he (Antigonus by name) returning victorious from the Wars, at the Feast of the Tabernacles, marched up with his Soldiers to the Temple, as intending to offer Sacrifice for his brother then lying sick. This was presently interpreted to Aristobolus as an effect of a bad intention towards him, and a sufficient sign of affecting the Kingdom, and it was represented to him, as if Antigonus would presently come down, and kill him, accounting it folly when he might Reign alone, to be content with a communicated honour. He having rejected tales heretofore, did not easily give credit to them now, but to provide for his own security, and yet shun suspicion, he commanded some of his Guard to stand in an obscure place where he was to come, and if he came armed, then to kill him, but if not, then not to molest him, and he sent also to him to come without any guard at all. But the Queen and the rest of the conspirators, persuaded the messenger to deliver his errand the clean contrary way, so that Antigonus thinking nothing; but coming to see his brother, was there murdered. After this was done, Aristobolus presently repented of the deed; though knowing nothing concerning the message, which so increased his disease, that he vomited blood for anguish of mind. The blood being carried out by one of his attendants, chanced to be spilt in that place where Antigonus was slain, which being judged by them that saw it, to be done of purpose, they cried out against the thing, and made such a noise, that the King hearing it, forced the matter out of them; after which his Agony increased so highly (crying out, that his blood was required for that of his Mothers and Brothers which he had spilt, and chiding as it were his body for retaining the Soul required of him by their Ghosts) that in great torment of conscience he presently breathed out his last, when he had scarcely reigned a whole year. He profited much his Country by his Government, and making War upon Iturea, laid a great part of it to his own Dominions, and frightened the Inhabitants by threatening banishment to them, into an imbracement of Circumcision, and the other Jewish Rites.

5. He being dead, his Wife Salome (called by the Greeks Alexandra) set his brothers at liberty, of which Jannæus (or Alexander) was made King, excelling the other, as in age so also in modesty. His Father is said to have hated him, and sent him out of his sight to be educated in Galilee presently after his birth, because being solicitous for his two eldest Sons, and desiring of God to know his Successor, his likeness was presented to him in his sleep. Being seized of the Kingdom, he put to death one of his Brothers that conspired against him, but the other who was contented with a private life he much honoured. Having settled his affairs at home, he went and besieged Ptolemais, which with Gaza only of the Sea-Towns remained unconquered, besides the Tower of Straton (since called Cesarea) and Dora, which Zoilus the Tyrant had got into his hands. At this time the two Brothers Antiochus Grypus (called by Josephus Philometor) and Antiochus Cyrenicus in Syria, attending nothing but the destruction of each other, the Defendants had little hope of any succour from either of them, only Zoilus, who gaped after the City himself, gave them a little relief. There remaining no help to be hoped for, but either from Aegypt, or Cyprus (whither Lathurus had been expelled by his Mother Cleopatra) they sent to him, desiring he would rescue them out of the hands of Alexander; giving him hopes, that he should not only have them, but the Inhabitants of Gaza also on his side, and that Zoilus, the Syrian and others would come and help him. He being puffed up with these promises made what haste he could, but Demanetrius one of their Citizens persuaded them for reasons formerly recited to refuse his help, notwithstanding which he came on, and pitching his Tents near the City, seeing he had no Message from them, began to be discouraged. But Zoilus and the Gazans came shortly to him, and desired his help against Alexander, who wasted their Territories, whereupon the siege was raised before Ptolemais, and Alexander departed home, wherein he attempted to overturn by policy the design of Ptolemy. He sent privily to Cleopatra, exciting her against him, but openly counterfeiting himself his Friend and Ally, promised him three hundred Talents of Silver to take off Zoilus the Tyrant, and lay his Territories to his Dominions. Atfirst he willingly embraced his friendship and took Zoilus, but then finding he had sent understand to his Mother, renounced it again, and went and besieged Ptolemais, which had shut the Gates on him, where leaving part of his Army Alexander, to continue the siege, he departed thence to invade Judea. Alexander also understanding his purpose, raised an Army of fifty thousand (some say eighty thousand) and went to meet him.

6. He took Aspechie a Town in Galilee, setting upon it at unawares on the Sabbath, and then attempted to do the like by Sephoris, a place not far distant from the other; but was received with such resolution, that he lost many of his men, and arose from thence to go to meet Alexander, whom having found to have reached the River Jordan, he pitched his Tents on this side over against him. Alexander suffered him quietly to pass foolishly supposing that the victory would be more easy if the Enemy had the River on his back, and so could not run away. For some time the Victory was doubtful, or seemed to incline to Alexander's party, till his Soldiers being beaten back by a reserve of fresh men, and having none to succour them, were put to flight, and the Enemy gave the chase as long as he could hold a sword for weariness, so that thirty thousand (some have affirmed fifty fifty thousand) were slain in this battle. Ptolemy ranging up and down the Country, fell at length into some Villages, which seeing full of Women and Children, he commanded his Soldiers to kill them promiscuously, and cutting off their limbs to cast them into hot Caldrons, that a report going that his Army ate mans flesh, the enemy might thereby be discouraged. But Cleopatra hearing that her son prospered in his undertakings, thought her self concerned therein, especially he being so near her, and therefore she came against him with Forces both by Land and Sea, over which she placed Checcias and Ananias, both Jews. Her son thinking he had her at advantage, being now out of Egypt, halted thither, but she had left it so provided, as he could not do anything according to his purpose, and was beaten back to Gaza by a party the sent after him. She having taken Ptolemais, Alexander thither came to her, where he was received as a person distressed by her adversary, and one who only had refuge in her self. Some advised her to seize his Country into her hands, and not to suffer so many good Jews to be at the command and pleasure of one man: but Ananias counting it wickedness for him to dispose a man received into friendship, and his own Kinsman besides, and withall thinking that thereby he should lose himself with the Jews in all places, he perswaded her to the contrary, and so she entered into a League with him at Scythopolis, a City of Celestria.

7. Hereby being freed from all danger, both from Mother and Son, he presently made another expedition into Celestria, took Gadara after he had layen ten months before it, and Amachus a strong Castle upon the River Jordan, where Theodoros the Son of Zenon had laid up his Treasure, who falling suddenly upon the Jews, cut off ten thousand of them, and plundered the Carriages. Yet he was not at all terrified herewith from setting upon Raphia and Antedoon (called afterwards Agrippias by Herod) which he took, and perceiving Ptolemy to begone to Cyprus, and his Mother into Egypt, being angry with them of Gaza, for calling him in to help them against him, he set upon the City, and wasted their grounds. In the mean time Apollodorus their General brake out into his Camp by night with twelve thousand men, and as long as night lasted had the better of it, but as soon as it was day the Jews uniting themselves, and encouraged after they saw Ptolemy was not come as they expected, charged the Town-men so fiercely that they slew a thousand men. For all this they would not yield, expecting the coming of Aretas the Arabian King; but the City was taken ere they could see his face, by the treachery of Lyfmacus the Brother of Apollodorus, whom he envying for being in so great grace with the People, murdered, and then getting a party close about him delivered up the place. Alexander upon his entry did no harm to the Inhabitants, but not long after gave commission to his Soldiers to kill and slay all they would, who ranging up and down with fury and Sword, as many of them lost their lives as they slew, the Defendants fighting courageously, and setting their houses on fire, lest they should become a prey to them; and some killed their Wives and Children with their own hands, rather than they should be led into Captivity. It happened that at the same time that Alexander was let in, the Senate was met, which consisting of five hundred men, he put them all to the Sword, and then razing the City, returned to Jerusalem a year after he first late down before Gaza.

8. He was not at all affected by his Subjects, which they clearly manifested when the Feast of Tabernacles came. For then as he was about to sacrifice they threw Oranges at him, and railed at him, upbraiding him with Captivity (that I suppose of his Grand-mother objected before to his Father) and crying out that he was not worthy of so high an Office: as the High Priest-hood. Being enraged hereat he flew about six thousand of them; made up the place about the Altar with boards to defend him for the time to come from the violence of the multitude, and furnished himself with Guards hired out of Pisidia and Cilicia. Then overthrew he the Arabians, and imposed Tribute upon the Moabites and Gadadites, and levelled Amathus with the ground, Theodoros not once daring to engage. But making another expedition against the Arabians, he was drawn into an Ambush by Obedas their King, and being thrust amongst the Craggy and precipitous Rocks by a multitude of Caimels, he hardly escaped by flight to Jerusalem, his whole Army being cut off. Then were his rebellious Subjects encouraged by this his overthrow to begin fresh fits, which continued six years, during which time they fought often, but he had the better, and destroyed no less than fifty thousand of them. This yet was no matter of joy to him thus to lose the strength of his own Kingdom; therefore he endeavoured endeavoured to make up the breach, and by fair means to be reconciled to them. But being asked by him wherewith he should appease them, they answered, if he would kill himself, for scarce could they pardon him being dead. Then sent they to Demetrius, surnamed Acerus, inducing him with great promises to come and aid them, so that joining with him they made up an Army of three thousand Horse, and forty thousand Foot, their King having twenty six thousand and two hundred men in his Army. Both at the first laboured to draw their Enemies to revolt, Demetrius those Greeks that were in pay with Alexander, and he the Jews which had called him in, but this succeeding on no part, they both resolved to end the controversy with dint of sword. Demetrius had the better of it (all Alexander's Auxiliaries being slain, though they behaved themselves most gallantly) but he was no whit better, but much worse for his victory. For the Jews taking pity of their King after this his defeat, about six thousand went over to him, which so discouraged Demetrius, that he thereupon retreated into his own Country.

9. They thenceforth waged War with him by themselves, but still had the worst of it, and many of them were slain. At length he forced the strongest up into a Town called Bethoma, which reducing, he took them in it, and brought them up to Jerusalem, where he caused eight hundred of them to be nailed to Crosses, and their Wives and Children to be slain in their sight, yet living, he beholding the Spectacle from an high place, banquetting, and dallying with his women. He was highly provoked with that stubborn people, who not only brought him often into extrem danger of life and estate, but not contenting themselves with what they could do by their own power, without calling in of foreign aid, had reduced him to that necessity, that he was glad to restore those places he had subdued in the Country of Moab and Gadala to the Arabians; and for animadversion upon them they nicknamed him Thracida. About eight thousand men got away by night, and passed all the time he lived, in Exile, and so ever after the Kingdom continued free from seditions. Antiochus Dyonysius King of Syria intending to make an invasion into Arabia through his Kingdom, he getting knowledge of it, drew a Ditch from Capsale (afterwards called Antipatri) as far as the Sea of Joppe, to hinder him, strengthening it with a Bulwark, and Forts built here and there upon it where he expected him. But he burning these Forts easily got over, and then invading Arabia, was there slain in battle by Aretas the King, who was made King of Celestria, and making an inroad into Judea, overthrew Alexander at Asida, and forcing him to subscribe to his own conditions, then departed. Afterwards Alexander gathering together his Forces, went and took divers Towns with all the Valley of Antiochus (as it was called) and the Castle Gamala, and returned to Jerusalem at the end of three years, now joyfully and honourably received by his people for his valour; and indeed at this time the Nation, what by his own, and the diligence of his predecessors, arrived at that height for dominion and glory abroad, that they enjoyed many Cities in Syria, Idumea, Phenicia, and other Countries; whereof a Catalogue of most Josephus hath left unto us, and amongst which Polla a Town of Moab was destroyed, because the Inhabitants refused to receive the Jewish Rites. Alexander towards his latter end fell to drunkenness, and thereby contracted a Quartan Ague, which held him three years; yet recovered he his ancient temper of mind, though not of body, and following on his Wars laid siege to Ragola beyond Jordan, in the Country of the Geraseni, where being spent with the force of his disease, he died before the Walls of that place, in the twenty seventh year of his reign, and of his age the forty ninth. A. M. 3927, and the third of the 173 Olympiads, some seventy six years before the birth of Christ.

10. His wife Alexandra seeing his end approaching, bewailed much the condition of her self and children, being destitute of succour, and about to enter upon the government of a People, likely enough to be untoward towards them, which bore him so much ill will. He advised her, that the might reign securely, first to keep close his death till that place should be gained, then going victoriously to Jerusalem to send for the chief of the Pharisees, whom both he and his Father had grievously offended, and thereby incurred the hatred of the People, and to gain their favour to shew them his body, and give them power of disposing of it as they would either as to bestow burial upon it, or cast it out without Sepulture, or otherwise to abuse it at their pleasure; and withal, to promise them to do nothing without their counsel and advice. The Castle being taken, she ordered her affairs according to his direction, whereby she purchased the love of the Pharisees, who going out and speaking to the People, related the great things done by Alexander, signified to them them the loss of a just King, and so stirred up the multitude to mourning and lamentation, that hereby he procured him (even as he foretold her) a more honourable burial than else he could have had, and as sumptuous a funeral as any of his Predecessors obtained. Alexander left two sons by this his wife, Hyrcanus and Arifobolus; but he left the management of the Kingdom. The elder of their sons was not at all made for government, but dull and heavy. She being in great grace with the People, because she ever had pretended to dislike the proceedings of her husband, made Hyrcanus the High-Priest, not so much out of respect to his birth-right as his laziness, keeping the title of Queen and Governess, though indeed all things were ordered at the will and pleasure of the Pharisees, whom the People were commanded to obey, and against whom all such constitutions as were made by Hyrcanus were taken away. Yet he took care for something her self, for he kept in pay a great number of foreigners, and so increased her power, that she became formidable abroad, and such a terror to the neighbouring petty Governors, that she constrained them to give Hostages.

fits between
sons.

11. Yet no great matters were done abroad, but fits sufficient hapned within the Kingdom; for the Pharisees knowing no moderation in the prosecution of their ambitious and envious desires, caused her to put to death those that had counselled her husband to deal cruelly with the eight hundred before mentioned, and they made away divers of them; till such time as those of most power and esteem being backed by Arifobolus (who complained of the too great power of his Mother) came to Court, and there laid before her how unworthy it was, that they should suffer so much for their faithfulness to Alexander, and how joyful news it would be to Aretas the Arabian and others, to hear that the Kingdom was deprived of such men, who had done good service against him. They besought her, that if their adversaries were not satisfied with what blood they had spilt already, to give them leave to depart, and provide for their own safety, or if that could not be granted, to distribute them into several places of strength, that there they might live quietly and meanly, with which condition they would be contented, seeing Fortune so frowned upon the favourers of Alexander. They setting these things off with all advantage possible to gain compassion, and calling on the ghost of Alexander, Arifobolus also soundly reprehended his Mother, but withal added, that they were justly punished for permitting the chief power to be in a woman, as if no posterity had been left by his Father. She not knowing what to do, delivered into their hands all her Castles, except three, in which she had hoarded up her choicest goods, and shortly after sent her younger Son against Ptolomy Mennæus, who troubled sorely Damascus, but he returned without having done any thing. A report went at the same time, that Tigranes the Armenian had invaded Syria with fifty thousand men, and would speedily come into Judea, which so terrified both Queen and People, that they sent Ambassadors to him then lying before Ptolemais; for Celene or Cleopatra then reigned in Syria, and had advised her Subjects to exclude him. He kindly received the Ambassadors, because come so far to tender him respect, and gave them encouraging words. And after he had taken Ptolemais, news being brought him, that Lucullus in his pursuit of Mithridates the Great, King of Pontus, was entered Armenia, and wasted the Country, he being Son in Law to that King, and therefore taking his part, departed home with all Expedition.

State of King.

12. After this, Alexandra falling grievously sick, Arifobolus judged that now or never was there a fit opportunity for him to do something, and left the Pharisees should get all into their hands, departed by night with one man in his company, and got the Castles within a short time into his power, which she had committed to their adversaries, even to the number of twenty two within little more than fifteen days. This being understood, she and all the People were struck with consternation, knowing that he would take the Supreme Power, and fearing they should dearly pay for what they had done to his familiar friends. They thought good then to secure his Wife and Children in the Castle adjoining to the Temple at Jerusalem. He increased in followers and in power daily, taking the state of a King upon him, and got an Army from the Mountain Libanus, Trachonitis, and the petty Princes thereto adjoining. The chief of the Jews therefore with Hyrcanus came to the Queen, beseeching her that some course might be entered into to prevent his attempts, who now had gotten so many convenient places. She with shortness of mind told them they might do whatsoever they thought meet and convenient for the Commonwealth; that they had liberty and strength enough both as to Souldiers, and money also also the nerves of War; but as for her self, she could look to nothing, her body being now spent; and shortly after she breathed her last, having reigned nine years, and lived seventy three. A woman of widom, courage, and industry above her sex, and who in the whole course of her Government could not be drawn (for the generality) from moderation, justice, and honesty. But whereas she looked more at the present than future times, seemed to side with the Enemies of her house, and to have made the Kingdom naked of fit Rulers, after her death the effects of her male administration was felt by her family, which came into such misfortunes, as it miscarried and fell from that power, wherein she had laboured and taken so much pains to establish it.

13. For Hyrcanus having entered upon the High-Priesthood in the third year of the 177 Olympiad, 2. Horonius, and 2. Maelus Creticus being Consuls, his brother Arifobolus now presently made War upon him. A battel being fought near Jericho, Arifobolus his Souldiers revolted to the other, whereby he was forced to betake himself into that Castle where Arifobolus his wife and children were kept, and he now made his conditions to be suffered to live quietly a private life, remitting to his brother the Kingdom and Principality and changing estates with him, he removing into Arifobolus his private house, and Arifobolus to the Court, which covenant was solemnly sworn to, and confirmed in the Temple. But not long did this agreement hold, being broken by the means of Antipater, who being Governor at that time of Idumea, feared the power of Arifobolus, and therefore endeavoured his destruction, both by stirring up Hyrcanus and the most powerful of the Jews against him. The fame of Herod Son of this Antipater, causeth his original to be more enquired into. Nicolaus Damascus to flatter the said Herod, derived his pedigree from the chief of the Jews, which returned from Babylon; but Josephus denyeth it, and reports him to have been an Idumean born. * Others have delivered, that this Antipater, or Antipas, was the Son of one Herod the Priest of Apollo's Temple at Acalon, which City being invaded by the Idumean thieves, he was taken with other spoils out of the Temple, and whereas his Father was not able to ransom him, was brought up after the manner of the Idumeans, and became very familiar with Hyrcanus the High-Priest. Josephus saith that he was constituted Governour of Idumea by Alexander the King, and his Wife, and then minding his own interest, entered into society with the Arabians, Gassari, and Acalonites, having purchased their friendship with great gifts. He professed to the Jews that it was unjust, that Arifobolus should be suffered to enjoy his usurped power, from which he had cast down his elder brother, and had deprived him of the prerogative of his age. The same things he often inculcated into Hyrcanus, adding withal, that his life was in danger, except he would in good time save himself by flight, for that the friends of his brother still consulted, how they might rid him out of the way, and establish the Kingdom upon the other.

a battel dispossessed his brother Hyrcanus.

Antipater stir-

to recover

And procureth him to flee to Arion King of Arabia.

Who besee-
th Josephus.

14. He being a plain and well-meaning man, gave no great credit to these slanders, but the other ceased not for all that to invent fresh accusations of Arifobolus, as if he lay in wait for his life, and at length hardly obtained of him to flee to Aretas King of the Arabians, because his Country was nigh to Judea. Antipater went first to the King, to get a promise from him not to betray him into the hands of his Enemies, which being obtained, he returned to Jerusalem, and thence not long after taking Hyrcanus out by night, by great journeys came to Petra, where Aretas kept his Court. Being very great with the Arabian, he laboured to persuade him to restore Hyrcanus, and with his importunity and gifts at length prevailed. Hyrcanus also promising, if by his means he should recover the Kingdom, to restore to that Country with the twelve Towns, which his Father Alexander had taken from him. Aretas being drawn in by these promises, undertook this Expedition with fifty thousand men, and overthrew Arifobolus, who being first forsaken of his followers, who now fled amain to his brother, retired to Jerusalem, where the Arabian and Hyrcanus besieged him in the Temple. The Feast of the Passover hapning during the siege, the Priests who only remained with Arifobolus, that the Sacrifices might not be omitted, bargained with the besiegers for beasts to be fold them for that service, but when they had let down the money from the walls, were derided by them. But this wickedness the Historian observeth to have been punished with great storms and tempests, which procured extraordinary scarcity of Corn. In this mean while Pompey the Great being diverted by the War with Tigranes in Armenia, sent Scarnus his Quæstor, as Appian calls him, into Syria, who coming straight to Damascus (taken then by Marcius and Lollius) halted without intermission into Judea.

15. Taking the money of Aristobolus he eafily raifed the fieve, denouncing to Arctas that he fhould depart, except he would be declared an Enemy of the People of Rome; and then returned to Damafcus. Aristobolus having gotten this advantage againft his Enemies, followed them with a great Army, and joyning battel overthrew them at a place called Papyron, about feven thoufand of them being flain, and amongst the reft Cephalio the brother of Antipater. But not long after Pompey came to Damafcus, and going about Caefaria, thither were fent to him Ambaffadors from feveral parts. Aristobolus fent him an excellent prefent, being a golden Urn of the value of five hundred Talents, which afterwards was dedicated by him amongst other things in the Capitol at Rome. Shortly after were fent fome to him from both the brothers; Antipater from Hyrcanus, and one Nicodemus from the other, to whom he answered, that coming to Damafcus he would hear the caufe. Thither was fent alfo an Ambaffage of the Jews themfelves, who declared they were unwilling to live under Kings, it being the cuftom of their Country to yield obedience to the Priefts of their God; and that though thefe two were of that race of Priefts, yet being defirous to change the Government into another form, they thereby intended to enslave them. Hyrcanus accused his brother of ambition and violence, in that he had gone about to deprive him of his birth-right, and the other excufed himfelf by the neceffity of the thing, left the Principality fhould have been transferred into another family by his heavy dulnefs, which rendered him incapable of employment. To Hyrcanus bare witnefs one thoufand Jews which Antipater had brought for that purpofe, but to Aristobolus a Company of effeminate Gallants, ridiculous to all for their fantaftick bravery. Pompey having heard them, and difapproved of Aristobolus his violence, difmiffed them both kindly at prefent, promifing he would come to them as foon as he had infpected the affairs of the Nabatheans, bidding them be quiet in the mean time, and using Aristobolus civilly, left he fhould flop up the paffages. But hereby he won nothing upon him, for not expecting his promifes, he went to Delium, and thence betook himfelf into Judea.

then (as they had done all the fieve) not neglecting to offer fuffices, and amongst the reft Afolam the Uncle, and father-in-law of Aristobolus was taken, being the youngest Son of Hyrcanus. Pompey with many followers entered the Temple, and looked on thofe things, which it was unlawful for any but the Priefts to behold; yet touched nothing he law, fo great was his abftinency. The Temple was taken as Josephus tells us, in the third month, and the falf day, which was kept in memory of Jehoiakim's burning the Roll, in the 179 Olympiad, C. Antonius and M. Tullius Cicero being Confuls, A. 17. Pompey refetred the Priefthood to Hyrcanus, with the Government of the Country, (forbidding him the wearing of the Diadem) becaufe amongst feveral other fervices he had done him during the fieve, he had alfo kept the Countrymen from taking up Arms for Aristobolus. Then putting to death the Authors of the Sedition, he made the Jews Tributaries to the people of Rome, the Cities they held in Caefaria he took away, and fubjected them to a Governor of their own, and the whole Nation much elevated then with fuccels abroad, he contracted with- in its own bounds; Aristobolus and his brother being the caufe of all thefe troubles, and of the lofing of the Countries liberty to the Romans, who within a fhort time exacted above ten thoufand Talents of it. Pompey having left Syria to the Govern- ment of Scarus, with two Legions halted to Rome, leading Aristobolus bound thither, with two Sons, and as many Daughters. One of his Sons efaped in the journey, and returned into Judea, where he got together a confiderable power, and awed his Uncle Hyrcanus unable to refift him, and who, when now he was about to repair the Walls of Jerufalem, demolished by Pompey, was forbidden to do it by the Romans. But within a while Gabinus was fent from Rome to Govern Syria. He undertook the War againft him, by this time having ten thoufand Foot, and one thoufand and five hundred Horfe at his Command, but notwithstanding he overthrew him not far from Jerufalem, killing and taking fix thoufand of them, and then befieged him in the Cattle Alexandrium whither he had fled. Leaving here fufficient ftrengh for carrying on the fieve, he went and vifited the Countrey, caufing divers Cities to be re-edified, and then returning, and more powerfully enforcing the fieve, Alexander yielded himfelf, and the Cattle, which by his Mothers advice to Gabinus were demolished, left they fhould nourifh another War. Gabinus then went to Jerufalem, and eftablifhed Hyrcanus in the Priefthood, but cantoned the Countrey into five parts, which he ordered to be Governed in an Aristocratical way. One divifion was to be Governed by an Affembly at Jerufalem, another by one at Gadara, a third at Anathus, a fourth at Jericho, and a fifth by one fitting at Siphora a Town of Samaria. The Jews very gladly embraced this Government. But Aristobolus not long after efaped from Rome, and coming into Judea miniftered occafion of further trouble.

18. Coming into his own Countrey, he prefently found fome who out of defire of innovation fided with him, amongst the which was Pitholus the Governor of Jerufalem, who revolted to him with one thoufand men. He firft feized upon A. There he thought to renew the War having fortified the place, but being befieged, and holding it out two days, he could no longer withftand, but was taken, and together with his Son Aristobolus, (who it feems got away with him) fent back to Rome, where he was more narrowly looked to, but his Sons; becaufe Gabinus had fo agreed with their Mother, in confideration of the delivering up of the Cattle formerly mentioned, were fent back by the Senate. ple to be quiet, and he effected it with many; but thirty thousand remaining still with Alexander, he came out and gave battle to the Romans, near the Mountain Itebrynis, wherein he lost ten thousand men. Gabinus victoriously thence marched to Jerusalem, where settling things according to the pleasure of Antipater, he went against the Nabateans whom he overthrew in one battle, and dismissed Mithridates and Orfanes, two noble Parthians who had fled unto him, pretending an escape. Then returning to Rome, he left his Province to Cassius his Successor.

punishment.

19. Cassius intending an expedition against the Parthians, came through that Country, and spoiled the Temple not only of those two thousand Talents which Pompey had spared, but of all the Gold found there besides, which amounted to the sum of eight thousand Talents more, though Eleazar the Treasurer had given him a beam of Gold weighing nine hundred pounds, and he had taken an Oath therewith to be satisfied, and abstain from the money. But going against the Parthians, he received the reward of his Sacrilege and Perjury, being slain. Cassius flying into Syria defended it from the incursions of the Enemy, and being come to Tyre visited also Judea, where at the first onset he took Taricheas, and therein thirty thousand Captives, which he led away and slew Pitholaus the favourer of Arifobulus at the desire of Antipater, who now grew very considerable, having entered into Confederacy and Alliance with several Princes, and especially with the Arabians, out of whose Country he had Married a Wife of noble extraction, by name Cypris, by whom he had four Sons, Phasaelus, Herod, Joseph, and Pheroras, and a Daughter named Salome, which Sons he also sent into Arabia, there to be kept whilst he was engaged in the War with Arifobulus. When Pompey was driven beyond the Ionian Sea, and Cesar had got Rome into his power, he set Arifobulus at liberty, and with two Legions sent him back into Syria, hoping that all that Country, and round about Judea, might be brought under by him; but he was prevented in his journey, being poisoned by those of Pompey's party, and lay in his own Country for some time unburied, being Embalmed, till by Antony he was sent to be buried in the Sepulchre of his Ancestors. This expedition proved fatal, not only to himself, but his Son Alexander also, who was beheaded by Scipio at Antioch, by order from Pompey, being first arraigned before the judgment seat for his offences committed against the Romans. His Brother Antigonus with his Sisters were sent for by Ptolomy, the Son of Mimneus (who held Chalcis under the Mountain Libanus) and courteously entertained. For Philippus his Son being his Messenger, fell in Love with one of the Sisters, named Alexandra, and Married her, but the passion of Ptolomy overcoming both reason and nature, he killed his Son, and took the Lady to himself. By this time Pompey was slain; and then Antipater betook himself to Cesar, as his interest led him, and by his great industry purchased his favour.

20. Cesar Warring with young Ptolomy in Egypt, after the death of Pompey, Antipater joyned with Mithridates of Pergamus, who went down thither with supplies; for whereas being hindered from coming to Pelufium, he was forced to slay about Afalon, he persuaded the Arabians to help him, brought a supply of three thousand Jews himself, and procured divers Princes in Syria, as Ptolomy of Libanus, Jamblickus, and others, to send their men. Then at Pelufium did he special service, being the first that broke down the wall and entered; and whereas the Jews inhabiting the Country of Onias hindered them from going any further, he prevailed with them not to oppose, and more than that to furnish the Army with Provisions. At Delta he recovered the battle almost lost by Mithridates, and afterwards behaved himself very gallantly for Cesar, having received many wounds as the tokens of his valour. Some have delivered that Hyrcanus himself went down into Egypt, and there deserved well of Cesar, but whether it was so or not he endeavoured to requite them both. For, Antigonus the Son of Arifobulus coming with a great complaint to him against them (whereas rather in policy he should have complained of the putting to death his Father and Brother through the procurement of Pompey and his faction) he declined his requests upon the reply of Antipater, confirmed Hyrcanus in the Priesthood, offered to Antipater what Government he would desire, and made him Procurator of Judea, gave him leave to rebuild the Walls of the City thrown down by Pompey, and caused their grants to be registered in the Capitol, and seconded them with divers decrees, both of himself and the Senate in favour of him and the Jews. Antipater then bringing Cesar on his journey as far as the borders of Syria, returned and built up the Walls, and going about the Country, by threatnings and other policy, contained the People in obedience, otherwise ready to rebel. And whereas he saw Hyrcanus heavy and dull, and and unfit to manage the affairs of Government, he made his Son Phasaelus (who also commanded the Army) Captain of Jerusalem, and the Country adjacent, and committed Galilee to the custody of his second Son Herod, being now extream young, as not exceeding fifteen years, as our Author telleth us, except, as is most probable, that number be mistaken for twenty five.

21. Herod at the very first gave testimony of what spirit and height of courage he would be, finding out presently occasion for the exercise of it. For at that time there being one Eusebius a notable Thief, who with a great company of followers used to infest the Country of Syria, he took and slew him with many others of that rout, which thing so endeared him to the Syrians, that his name was sung throughout the Towns and Villages, Peace being by his means restored, as it were, unto the Country, and the People unto their possessions; and thereby became he known to Sextus Cesar the President, and kinsman to the Ditator. Phasaelus his Brother was hereby much stirred up to emulation, and most courteously behaved himself to those of Jerusalem, so that their Father was honoured by the People like a King, and yet notwithstanding preserved his fidelity intire to Hyrcanus. But divers of the chief of the Jewish Nation, understanding how he flourished both upon his own account and that of his Sons, inwardly fretted thereat, and the rather, because he made use of Hyrcanus for his own ends, as they conceived, having contracted friendship with the great ones, and Rome, and persuaded him to send them money, yet procuring to himself the credit and profit of the gifts. But especially the forward and bold disposition of Herod affrighted them, whom they looked upon as a young and growing Tyrant, and therefore they grievously envied against Antipater to Hyrcanus, as one who carried away all the profit of the Kingdom, an empty name being only left to himself, and laboured to bring him into suspicion, hinting that ere long the vizard would be taken off, and he would dearly pay for the negligence of his own affairs. This they enforced by that bold act of Herod's killing Eusebius, and the rest, in contempt of the Laws, which suffer no man, how wicked soever, to be put to death, till he first be cast by the sentence of his Judges. Hyrcanus though slow enough to believe any thing, yet having these things often founding in his ears, together with the lamentations of the Mothers of those that were slain, grew something moved, and summoned Herod up to Jerusalem, to give an account of his actions before the Judges.

He is sum-

He appeared, but with a guard.

22. Herod having settled the affairs of Galilee, appeared, but with a guard, as his idem lib. 6. Father had written to him; yet with a moderate one, lest taking care for his own safety, he should affright Hyrcanus. Sextus Cesar hearing of it, with threats wrote to Hyrcanus to: quit him, which he was inclinable enough unto, loving him as his own Son; and when he appeared to answer, no body durst accuse him, except one Sameas bolder than the rest, who inveighed against him for the manner of his appearance, not suitable at all to humility or guilt. The meeting being encouraged by his words, had certainly condemned him; had not Hyrcanus foreseen it, and sent him out of the way on purpose, having put off the determination to the next day. Herod retired therefore to Damascus, and afterwards visiting Sextus Cesar, and settling his affairs, plainly gave out, that he would no more appear though he were cited, at which they at Jerusalem fretted, and fought to persuade Hyrcanus that all this tended to his ruin, and indeed he was convinced of it, yet could he do nothing, for that innate dulness which evermore accompanied him, though shortly after hearing that Herod had purchased of that Cesar the Government of Celestria, he feared he would employ his power against him. And indeed so it happened; for disdaining now that he had been commanded to come and plead his cause, he marched towards Jerusalem with an Army, and if his Father and Brother had not met him, and shewed him the uncertainty of the event of War, and that he was rather beholding to Hyrcanus for discharging him, than had reason to be angry with him, for being as it were forced by others to summon him up, he had made mischief enough: But being prevailed with by them, he thought it was sufficient for him to have made a shew of his power, and to retrace. About this time Cecilius Bassus in favour of Pompey made away Sextus Cesar, and got his Army to submit to him; but divers of Cesar's party resolved to revenge his kinsman's death, and a War ensued about Apamea, whither Antipater, mindful of the benefits received from Cesar, sent his Sons with aid unto his Captains. The War being drawn out in length, Marcius, (or rather L. Statius Marcius) was sent to succeed Sextus, and in the mean time Julius Cesar was slain in the Senate house, which as it bred disturbance and trouble to the whole Roman Empire, so neither did Judea escape without its portion thereof.

23. A civil War following and the chief Captains on both sides running up and down to provide themselves for it, Cassius one of the conspirators came into Syria, where raising the siege at Apamia, he drew both Marcus and Bassus to his own party, and then conquering the Country, levied men, and exacted grievous contributions: But especially he afflicted Judea, laying a tax of above seven hundred Talents of Silver upon it. Antipater committed the raising of the money to his two Sons and others, whereof Herod first of all raised that which was imposed upon Galilee, and brought it, thinking it good policy to purchase the favour of the Romans at the cost of others. Divers Cities with their Inhabitants were sold to make up the sum, amongst which the principal were, Gophna, Emau, Lydia, and Thamnia; and Cassius having done this, was further so enraged, that he had slain Malichus also one of the Collectors, had not Hyrcanus by the means of Antipater, stopped his mouth with one hundred Talents of his own money. But Antipater was badly rewarded by Malichus, for after the departure of Cassius he lay in wait for his life, thinking, that he being removed out of the way, the greater security would happen to the affairs of Hyrcanus. Antipater getting knowledge of his intention, passed over Jordan, to provide himself to revenge this treachery, but he being a most crafty dissembler, so denied the matter with Oaths to his two Sons, that they reconciled him to their Father, who by his intercession then saved him, when Marcus the President of Syria upon the report of his attempting new matters, had resolved his death. But he preserved him to his own destruction. For, his Son Herod for his good service being made Procurator of Syria by Cassius, with promise also of the Kingdom of Judea, if he got the better, Malichus then so feared him, that he resolved to make him away, which within a short time he effected, procuring him to be poisoned by Hyrcanus his Brother, and getting a Company of Soldiers to him, invaded the Government of the City. This was the end of Antipater, a right good man, a great States-man, and one who had preserved his fidelity to his Prince, and his care to his Country, before his own private or ambitious designs.

24. His Sons having knowledge of his death, Herod would have revenged it out of hand, and by open force, but Phasaelus thought good rather to circumvent the murderer by some way of his own, lest a Civil War should happen, and therefore seemed to be satisfied with Malichus his flat denial of the thing, and set himself about building of a monument for his Father. Herod visiting Samaria, and seeing it much out of order, laboured what he might to cherish it, and fate in Judgement, deciding the controversies of the People, and then presently came up to Jerusalem to the Feast with a Company of Soldiers at his heels. Malichus being exceedingly afraid of his coming, persuaded Hyrcanus not to permit him to enter, and he accordingly forbade him to approach so holy a solemnity with a prophane rout of strangers; but he notwithstanding this got in by night, and so affrighted Malichus that he betook him to his old trade of dissembling, weeping to him bitterly for the death of Antipater as his kind friend, yet in the mean time providing himself of a guard, so that for a time it was thought fit by Herod's friends, not to evince his deceit, but for the shunning of suspicion to treat him fairly; yet did he signify by Letters his Fathers death to Cassius, who willed him again to revenge it, and gave order to the Tribunes then lying at Tyre to assist him in his just encroavns. Cassius not long after having taken Laodicea, they went and carried him crowns and money, and then Herod thought to be even with him; but he suspecting something at Tyre, out of desperation cast higher matters than ever in his head. For his Son being kept hostage in that City, he resolved to go in, and carry him out by stealth into Judea, and then, when Cassius should be engaged in the War against Antony, to solicit that Country to revolt, and get to himself the Principality, and cast out Hyrcanus. But the cunning of Herod prevented him, who being aware of his project, invited him and Hyrcanus to supper, and then sent to the Tribunes to come out to meet him, who remembering the commands of Cassius, encountering him on the shoar, slew him there. Hyrcanus was so astonished with fear at the fact, that he was not himself, and scarcely recovering his sense, asked Herod who had slain Malichus; to whom one of the Tribunes answered, the command of Cassius, at which he replied, that Cassius had preserved both him and his Country; by cutting off him that had plotted the destruction of both. Whether he spake this seriously, or approved the thing out of fear, is uncertain; but thus Herod revenged his Fathers death upon Malichus.

25. Cassius being gone out of Syria, there hapned a great stir at Jerusalem by means means of Felix, who being left there Commander, the Soldiers attempted violence upon Phasaelus, intending by his death to revenge that of Malichus upon his Brother Herod. It hapned that at that time Herod living at Damascus with Fabius the Roman Captain, was sick, and unable to come and help his Brother, but he by himself was too hard for Felix, and forced him into a Tower, whence he let him go with his life, and then expostulated much with Hyrcanus, objecting ingratitude to him for taking Felix his part, and suffering the Brother of Malichus to seize upon divers Castles; for now he held many, and Maffada amongst the rest, the strongest of all. But Herod after his recovery regained them all from him, suffering him to depart quietly out of Maffada upon his desire. Antigonus the Son of Aristobolus about this time so bribed Fabius, that he suffered him to get himself an Army, and Protonius Minneus because of the former affinity betwixt them, made him his Son in Law, Marion also, who by Cassius his means had subjected Tyre, and divers places of Syria, came in to his help, having seized upon three Castles in Galilee, but Herod also going against them, had them all surrendered by the Tyrians whom he dismissed very graciously, out of respect to their City, and then marched against Antigonus, whom being scarcely entered the Coasts of Judea he overthrew. Returning to Jerusalem he was received very honourably, not only by the People, but Hyrcanus also, who had of late received him into his family, contracting him to Mariamne the Daughter of Alexander, the Son of Aristobolus, and his own niece by his Daughter; by which Wife he was made a Father of three Sons and two Daughters, having on a former Wife (and his own Country-woman) named Dork, begotten Antipater his eldest Son. But now within a while Cassius and Brutus were overthrown at Philippi by Cæsar and Antony, of whom the former returning into Italy, the other came over into Asia, which gave occasion to new firs in Judea.

26. Antony being come into Bithynia, Ambassadors were sent to him thither from all Countries, and amongst the rest came some from the chief of the Jews, to complain of Phasaelus and Herod, who usurped, as they said, all the power, an empty title being only left to Hyrcanus. Herod went to defend himself, and so prevailed with his Money, that his accusers were never heard. Antony having reached Ephesus, an Ambassie was dispatched to him in the name of Hyrcanus, and the whole Nation, desiring that all Captives which Cassius had carried away out of Judea, might be set at liberty by his Letters published throughout the Province, which he readily granted out, and as he was travelling into Syria, Cleopatra met him in Cilicia, to whose allurements wholly giving up himself, at the same time came one hundred of the most considerable of the Jews to complain again of the two Brothers, whom Messala defended, and Hyrcanus himself stood by to assist. Their cause being heard at Daphne, Antony demanded of Hyrcanus whether part was fitter to Govern, who answering in commendation of Herod, he, who formerly loved the young men for their Fathers sake with whom he had contracted familiarity when he served in Ægypt under Gabinus, constituted them both Tetrarchs, and committed to them the Government of the Jews. To this purpose he wrote Letters, and cast fifteen of their adversaries into prison, and had put them to death, had not Herod's intercession prevailed for them; and yet were they not discouraged so as to desist. For instead of one hundred, a thousand returned in Ambassage, and stayed for him at Tyre, but his favour being further purchased by the two Brothers, he commanded the Magistrate of that place to animadvert upon them, and assist Herod in obtaining the principality. Herod going to them as they stood before the City on the shoar, advised them to withdraw themselves, and Hyrcanus also laid before them in how great danger they were if they should go on in their purpose: But they contemning their advice were presently slain upon out of the Town by their own Country-men and the Inhabitants, and part of them being slain, and some taken, the rest returned. And the people clamouring exceedingly against Herod, Antony was so far incensed, as he caused those whom he had before committed to custody to be slain.

27. A year or two after, Pacorus Son to the King of Parthia, and Barsapharnes, one of his great Officers, seized upon Syria at such time as Protonius Minneus dying, Lysanias his Son succeeded him. Antigonus the Son of Aristobolus bargained with the Parthians for one thousand Talents, and five hundred women, to settle him in the Kingdom of Judea, and kill Herod with his friends, and though he could not perform the conditions, yet lead they down an Army to re-establish him. Pacorus came down to the Sea-Coasts, where he was excluded by the Tyrians; but they

they of Sidon and Ptolemais giving him entrance, he sent a party of Horse under the conduct of one Pacorus the Kings Butler into Judea to make discoveries, and if it could be, to help Antigonus, with whom the Jews inhabiting Carnet joining, he hoped by this force to seize upon a part of the Country called Dryme, and divers still coming in pierced to Jerusalem. The number still increasing, they attempted the Palace, but the two Brothers with their friends opposing themselves, beat them back into the Temple, and then sent some Souldiers into certain houses near adjoining to defend them, which the people taking notice of, set them on fire, and therein burnt them alive, being unable to shift for themselves; which injury Herod a little after revenged upon his adversaries, of whom he slew many upon a Sally. Daily skirmishes thence ensued, Antigonus his party staying for the feast of Pentecost, expecting then a great multitude of people to come up from all parts, and accordingly at the day many thousands being assembled, what with Arms, and what without, they overran all, except the Palace which still Herod and his Brother Phasaelus kept with a few Souldiers, with whom also issuing out into the Suburbs, having there fought most manfully, he put many thousands to flight. Shortly after, Antigonus procured Pacorus the Parthian with a few horse-men to enter Jerusalem, under pretence of composing the difference, but indeed to establish him in the power, who being kindly met by Phasaelus, and entertained, he persuaded him to go in Ambassage to Barzapharnes, thereby intending to entrap him. He suspecting nothing, went contrary to the mind of his Brother, who advised him rather to destroy the perfidious Barbarians, and with him went also Hyrcaus (an unheard-of employment for the Prince himself) under conduct of Pacorus.

28. As soon as they came into Gadite, they were met by the Governors of the Towns there, and Barzapharnes entertained them very civilly, and gave them gifts, but secretly sought how he might entrap them. Phasaelus was lodged with his Train near the Sea, where hearing that Antigonus had made such a bargain with the Parthians, as is above related, began to suspect them, and then he had also intelligence, that they would be laid in wait for by night, and be privately secured; and certainly they had been taken ere now, but that there was great expectation, that the Parthians which Pacorus had left at Jerusalem, should take Herod, and thereupon the thing was deferred, lest coming to his ears, he should have notice of their Treachery, and thereby escape it. Shortly after, his fears were confirmed when he saw a Guard coming to secure him, whereupon there were not wanting some that advised him to mount, and save himself by flight, especially one Opilius, who had the secret revealed to him by Saramella the most wealthy amongst the Syrians, who now also voluntarily offered him ships to save himself. But he refused to forsake Hyrcaus and his Brother, and going to Barzapharnes, blamed him for harbouring such designs, told him, if he wanted money, he might have more from him than Antigonus, and how base a thing it was to betray Ambassadors, innocent, and who had been drawn out upon the score of his own faith. The Parthians swore there was no such matter, and that he troubled himself with vain suspicions, and presently got him out to Pacorus; but he being gone, straightway hands were laid on Hyrcaus, and Phasaelus, in vain upbraiding the Barbarians with perjury. An Eunuch also was dispatched to Jerusalem to get Herod by some means or other out of the Walls, and apprehend him. Phasaelus had sent to make known his condition to him, but the Messengers were intercepted, which he having knowledge of, had a conference with the Chief of the Parthians then at Jerusalem, who by all means laboured to get him out of the Palace. But he suspecting them, and giving no credit at all to their words, presently heard for certain of his Brothers Captivity, and seeing them in doubt what to do against him, resolved to shift for himself, and taking the opportunity of the evening, departed with his relations that night, unknown to the Enemy.

29. He travelled towards Idumea, whither at length he came to Masfada the Castle; but as his departure was sad, so his journey was as dangerous, being pursued by the Parthians, whom following behind his Train he kept off, and was opposed also more violently by the Jews, over whom yet he got a victory, and afterwards in memorial of it built a sumptuous Palace in the same place. Once his Mothers Litter was overturned in the way, with which the being brought into danger of death, and he fearing the Enemy might overtake them, he drew out his sword to kill himself, and had done it, but that the next to him interposing themselves hindered it, shewing him how it was not the part of a valiant man to forsake others, by setting himself at liberty, as they termed it. dea, his Brother Joseph met him, and persuaded him to dismiss the most of his followers, because the Castle could not harbour them, which he did to the number of nine thousand and above, giving them money to bear their charges, and taking the ablest Souldiers, whom he had called out from amongst the rest, with his relations, to the number of eight hundred, he marched on to Masfada, and there placed them, where no sort of Provisions was wanting; but he himself held on for Petra in Arabia, hoping of that King, who was such a friend of his Fathers, to obtain help for the recovery of his Brothers liberty. But the Parthians after his departure from Jerusalem plundered the City and Palace, and wasted the Country, in which they destroyed Marisa a wealthy Town, and so reducing Antigonus into Judea, delivered up Hyrcaus and Phasaelus into his hands, who was grievously troubled that the women had escaped, which he intended together with the money to have given to the Parthians.

30. Then fearing that Hyrcaus by the favour of the people might again be restored to the Kingdom, he either cut or bit off his ears, making him thereby incapable of the Priesthood, which by the Law was not given, but to one of an entire body. But Phasaelus knowing he was destined to death, for that he could not otherwise kill himself for his bonds, dashed out his brains against a stone. It was reported, that being grievously wounded in his head, Antigonus caused poison to be put into it instead of salve; and that he hearing before his death that his brother Herod had escaped, underwent it cheerfully, as leaving behind him a revenger of it. And he certainly knowing nothing thereof, laboured exceedingly to prevent it, going to Malchus the Arabian, whom he knew to be obliged to his family, hoping of him to get money, either upon free gift or trust, and resolving to give three hundred Talents for his brothers Ransom, whose Son also a Child of seven years old he carried with him to leave as a pledge. But the Arabian being persuaded by his great ones to retain the money owing, with the goods which Antipater had deposited with him, sent some to meet him, and command him to depart from his borders, and after he was gone repented of what he had done, and sent after him, but too late. For he was now almost got into Egypt, hearing of his Brothers death in the way, where Cleopatra kindly entertained him, intending to use him in her Wars; but nothing could hinder him from hasting to Rome, though in the Winter season, and though great fairs were reported to be in Italy, whither also he came, though with great danger, for the difficulty of Navigation.

31. He came thither when not long before there had been an agreement made betwixt Antony and Cæsar the Triumvirs (the former having married Octavia sister to the later) and another betwixt them two and young Pompey, who then held Sicily, which was a time convenient enough for his affairs. He made his application to Antony, of whose favour he had formerly tasted, recounting to him the whole story of the Parthians overrunning Judea, of his brothers death, and the misery of his family now besieged in a Castle, and how through these Tempests both at Sea and Land, he had ventured to come to him as his only harbour and refuge; and withal he was not sparing in offering money to him, in case he could procure him to be declared King of Judea. Pity wrought something with Antony (being backed with the memory of that friendship which had passed betwixt Antipater and himself) the money more, and to these being superadded an hatred of Antigonus, whom he accounted a turbulent man, and one that bore a mind full of hatred towards the Romans, he was much inclined to favour him. Cæsar also, partly for that Antipater had done good service for his adoptive Father in Egypt, and because he was willing to gratify Antony, was ready to do him all good Offices, being also inclined to favour him out of a particular fancy he had to the man for his courage. The Senate therefore being called, first Messala, and then Aratinius commended him to them, relating his Fathers, and then his own merits towards the Commonwealth; and withal they accused Antigonus, and inveighed against him as an Enemy, for that he had not only born himself as such heretofore, but now of late in the calling in of the Parthians. Herewith the Senate being offended, Antony then declared to them that it would much conduce to the carrying on of the Parthian War, which was now depending, if Herod should be King; so that without any more to do, he was so declared by unanimous consent, and then being accompanied into the Capitol by Cæsar and Antony on each hand, the Consuls going before, there sacrificed, and according to the custom, laying up the decrees of the Senate, was feasted by Antony. Thus obtained he the Kingdom with the wonder of himself as well as others, through the especial friendship of Antony, having ever feared that the Romans would never consent he should have: that honour which was not wont to be bestowed, but upon a Royal race, and therefore he intended to have sued for it, not for himself but for Alexander, Brother to Mariamne his Wife; and this increased the wonder, that within seven days he should be dispatched and dismissed out of Italy. But thus obtained the Sovereignty of Judea, A. M. 3965, in the first of the 185 Olympiad, Domitius Calpurnius the second time, and C. Albinus Peltio being Consuls, some thirty seven years before the birth of Christ.

32. During his absence, Antigonius laid close siege to the Castle of Masada, where he left his relations, abounding with all sorts of provisions; only water was wanting; so that Joseph had thoughts of flying with two hundred men into Arabia, the King whereof he had now heard to have repented of the rejecting of his brother. But this was prevented by a shower which fell by night, as if sent on purpose from Heaven for their relief, whereupon they were so heartened, as to fall out upon the besiegers, whereof they cut off many. In the mean while Ventus the Roman General being sent into Syria to expel the Parthians thence, after their retreat, came into Judea, pretending to help Joseph, but indeed with intention to fleece Antigonius of a round sum of money; and this he did, pitching his tents nigh to Jerusalem, which being done, he drew off the greater part of his forces, and left Silo with a party behind him, lest the fraud should be understood, whom Antigonius was also to pacify till such time as the Parthians could come to help him. But in the mean time Herod landed at Ptolemais, and having got together no mean company, halted through Galilee against him. To Silo and Ventidius Antony had sent express orders by Gellius, to place him in the Kingdom. Ventidius was then busy in composing differences amongst the Cities, which the incursion of the Parthians had made: Silo was in Judea, but corrupted by Antigonius. Yet Herod's forces increasing, he marched towards Masada to relieve his friends, which he accomplished, having first taken Jappe in his way, notwithstanding the lying in wait against him by Antigonius, after which having taken in also the Castle Rafa, he went up to Jerusalem, accompanied by Silo's Souldiers, and many Citizens affrighted at his power. Laying siege to the City, both he and Antigonius laboured to draw over the contrary parties to themselves, and though Herod could not at all move the Townsmen, yet it appeared that Silo was corrupted; for he caused some of his Souldiers to begin a mutiny, requiring to be led into a place more plentyfull of provisions, which Antigonius had all cut off; but Herod took such care for the bringing in of new, that his plot was frustrated, and taking out a party of ten Companies (half Jews and half Romans) went and took Jericho, forsaken of its Inhabitants, which he left to be rifled by the Romans. Then returning, he sent down the rest of their Army into their Winter quarters, which he appointed in Idumæa, Galilee, and Samarita. Antigonius also obtained of Silo to have part of his men received into Lydda, thereby endeavouring to curry favour with Antony's so that the Romans lay idle all this season in places abounding with all necessities.

33. Herod was not idle, but sending his Brother Joseph into Idumæa with one thousand Foot and four hundred Horse, went down into Galilee to reduce some places there held by Antigonius; and within a short while brought all the Country into obedience, except those men that lurked in caves, and then dividing to his Souldiers one hundred and fifty drachmes a man, placed them also in their Winter quarters. Silo a little after came to him, being cast off by Antigonius, who had ordered the Inhabitants to take all necessities with them, and fling into the mountains, that for the Romans might be starved. Ventidius being now engaged in Syria against the Parthians, sent to Silo to come to him when he had with Herod finished the War; but Herod having no confidence in him, dismissed him beforehand, and went himself against the Thieves, who dwelling in caves with their families in craggy and inaccessible rocks, he was fain to invent certain cages, which being let down to the sides of the rocks full of Armed men, either flew them or tumbled them down headlong out of their holes, or else burnt them within, and by this means he subdued them all. Then placing Ptolemy over that Country, he marched into Samarita, but was presently forced to return, for Ptolemy being let upon by those who formerly had disturbed Galilee, was slain, and then they betook themselves into the fens and inaccessible places, and thence making excursions, robbed all the Coasts thereabouts; but Herod returning punished them, pulled down their places of strength, and fined the Cities one hundred Talents. In the mean while Ventidius having slain Pacorus, and cut the Parthians to flight, by Antonius his command sent Macherus to help Herod, with two Legions, and and one thousand Horse; but he being corrupted also by Antigonius, would needs go to him as a spy against Herod's will; Yet when he went could not be received, but was laid at with darts, so that repenting he had not followed Herod's advice, he went and secured himself in Emans, killing all the Jews that came in his way, without any difference of friend or Enemy, out of madness for what had happened unto him. Herod being hereat enraged, resolved to go and complain to Antony, but he entreated him to stay, or if he went, however to leave Joseph with him to carry on the War against Antigonius, which later he granted, yet charging his Brother not to venture all, nor contend with Macherus. Then halted he to Sanofata upon the River Euphrates, before which Antony then lay, leading Auxiliaries with him both Horse and Foot. At Antioch he met with many, that having a design to go thither, durst not for the Barbarians, who lying in the wayes, made great slaughters of travellers, but he taking the conduct of them upon him, stoutly defended them against the violence of the Robbers, and with great credit for his valour safely arrived at the Camp of Antony.

34. Antony to do him honour, sent out an Army to meet him, with great praises and embraces received him at the Camp, and gave him great respect, as a King of his own setting up. Shortly after his arrival Antiochus yielded up the place, and then Antony committing the Province to Sofus, and commending to him the affairs of Herod, went away back into Ægypt. In the mean while Joseph neglecting his Brothers Council, was slain in Judea, and great innovations followed in that place and in Galilee; which Herod understanding, being sent before by Sofus with two Legions, lying at Daphne the Suburb of Antioch, marched into Galilee, where he worsted the Enemy, and took the Castle they fled into, whence halting to Jericho, he there feasted the chief Inhabitants in a room, which upon his departure to his chamber presently fell down, and thereupon he was accounted to be especially owned by God, who had so wonderfully preserved him. Not long after he got five Towns into his hands, wherein he put to the sword two thousand of the Garrison Souldiers, and then went against Pappus, whom Antigonius had sent into Samarita in a vain ostentation, as able to wage War in both places. Pappus gave him battle very boldly, but he overthrew him, and in revenge of his Brothers death did great execution, whereby Antigonius's interest was clearly broken, and he thought of quitting the City, had the weather suffered the King to improve the Victory, and make an end of the War. At night Herod being weary, went to walk in a chamber, where one boy only was with him, and therein chanced to be divers armed men of the Enemy, who though they might have easily dispatched him then naked, yet were they too affrighted, as they gladly got out and saved themselves by flight. The extremity of the weather being over, he went up to Jerusalem and laid siege to it in the third year after he had been declared King at Rome, intending to use the same manner of opposition as Pompey had made formerly against the Temple. But during the siege he turned off to Samarita, and there married Mariamne Daughter to Alexander and niece of Arriobolus, formerly contracted to him. The marriage being over he returned, and Sofus came also through Phœnicia up to Jerusalem, so that both carried on the siege with an Army consisting of eleven Legions, and six thousand Horse. The defendants with great earnestness and courage made resistance, countermining, and sometimes fighting with the Enemy in the ground, though much straitened for provisions, it being the Sabatical year.

35. Force at length prevailed, joyned with skill, in both which the Romans excelled, so that after five months twenty of the stoutest Souldiers, and then Sofus his Centurion got over, and the outward part of the Temple with the lower side of the City were taken, and at length the other also, where all were full of slaughterers, the Romans being enraged by the tediousness of the War, and the Jews out of malice and particular grudges seeking to destroy all of the contrary Faction. Antigonius came and fell on his knees before Sofus, who received him with reviling speeches, calling him Antigona. Herod had much ado to keep the Souldiers from entering the secret places of the Temple, and to restrain them from slaughters, demanding of Sofus if the Romans intended to make him King of a desert, and adding, that he should think the price of all that blood which was spilt to be very little, though the Dominion of all the World should come into the bargain, and at length was fain to redeem the City from further trouble by his own money, wherewith he dismissed the Romans sufficiently enriched. This disaster befell Jerusalem in the Consulship of M. Agrippa, and Candianus Gallius, and the last of the one hundred eighty fifth Olympiad, the third month, in the fast, and on the same day day it had been taken by Pompey twenty seven years before. Sofus consecrating a crown of Gold to God, went away with Antigonus unto Antony. But Herod fearing that Antony carrying him to Rome, he should there obtain favour with the Senate, as being of the Royal race, and procure the Kingdom at their hands, if not for himself, yet for his children, who never had ill deserved of the People of Rome, he procured Antony to dispatch him out of the way, who pretending at least the unquietness of the Jews for his sake, caused him to be beheaded at Antioch. And so the Principality of the Afmonæans ceased after it had endured free from the yolk of Syria ninety eight years; and Herod a man of foreign and obscure birth was confirmed in the Sovereignty over Judea by the Romans, in the Empire of whom we shall hear further of him.

CHAP. VIII.

The affairs of Sicilie Contemporary with the Empire of the Macedonians.

From the death of Timoleon to the Sicilian or first Punic War, containing the space of seventy three years.

1. The constitutions of Timoleon being Popular, and tending to the loose liberty of the Vulgar, which was destitute of lawfully successive Princes, Sicilie continued not in peace many years, being of all other places, through want of lawful Monarchs, most subject to the ambition and tyranny of those, who, though private Citizens, through flattery and deceit enslaved their neighbours. Amongst the rest Agathocles is most eminent; none that ever in any time went before him, coming up to him, or, reaching him by far in cunning and cruelty. He was the Son of one Carcinus a Potter, and brought up by his Father in that trade of life, who being banished from Rhegium in Italy his native Soil, came into Sicilie, and placed himself at Therme at that time subject to the Carthaginians. Before he was born, and when his Mother was yet great with him, the Delphick Oracle foretold, that he should be the author of great calamities to the Carthaginians, and also to all Sicilie, and for that cause he was exposed by his Father, but preserved by his Mother, and reserved to such a time unknown to him, as he repenting of what he had done, gladly understood from her of his safety. Being then again received by his Father, he was brought up in the trade of a Potter, and was but young when Timoleon overthrew the Carthaginians at the River Cremissus, and made all free of Syracuse that would come thither. He was then with his Father admitted into that City, and not long after his Father dyed, but one Damas a chief Citizen, being extraordinarily affected towards him for his comeliness, gave him whereof sufficient to live, and afterwards being created the Captain of the Agrirentines, bestowed on him the place of a Colonel in the Army, for that he was wont formerly in matters to wear those arms which none else could bear for their bigness. But now being advanced to this degree, he rendered himself more popular by his bold adventures, and his making speeches often to the people, and Damas dying, he married his Widow, whereby he got abundance of wealth. Afterwards it hapning that Crotone being besieged by the Bruttii, they of Syracuse sent relief thither, which amongst other Captains was conducted by his Brother Autander, and he himself by decree of the people had also the Office of a Colonel. But the Chief command was committed to Heracleides and Sofistratus, the later of which out of envy defrauded him of the rewards of his valour, which he now abundantly thirsted, whereat he was so enraged, as to accuse him and his Companions to the people, of affecting the Tyranny, but they giving no credit to his words, Sofistratus after his return seized on the Principality. Agathocles then for some time continued in Italy, and endeavouring to get Crotone into his power, failed of his Enterprize, and withdrew himself to Larentium.

2. He was received into pay amongst the Mercenaries, but being suspected to attempt new matters, was not long after again cashiered, after which getting together a Company of Italian Fugitives, he relieved Rhegium, then set upon by Sofistratus and Heracleides, and then Sofistratus being banished Syracuse, together with his Authority, returned thither, where sometimes a private person, other-whiles an Officer, he valiantly behaved himself against the Tyrants faction, in which the Carthaginians, and a great number of the chiefest Citizens were engaged. Having once broke into the City Gela, and there being overmatched by Sofistratus and the Townsmen, so that he and his party were all of them in danger to be cut off, he sent his Trumpeters round about to the Walls, commanding them to sound an Alarm, whereby it came to pass (as he intended) that the Enemy thinking the besiegers had broken in from all quarters, retired from him to repulse them, and so he safely retreated this Sconce. This business of Sofistratus being over, and Acetorides the Carinian Created General of the Syracussians, Agathocles was suspected because of his politick head, to affect the Tyranny; yet Acetorides would not take him of publicly, for raising new firs, but commanding him to depart the City, sent some to lye in wait, and kill him in the way; which he suspecting, sent out a young man very like himself with his Cloaths, Horse, and Armour, and in a disguised habit travelled through by ways, so that he devolved the danger upon the head of another, and escaped. Afterwards the Exiles of Sofistratus his faction being received, and a peace made with the Carthaginians, he lived as an out-law within the Country, but gathering together considerable forces, proved so formidable to his own Citizens, and their new Allies, that they fought to him themselves to return, and having brought him into the Temple of Ceres, there took an Oath of him not to be against the popular Government. Making a shew then of Patronizing Democracie, he so inveigled the people by his fair speeches and cunning pretences, that he was constituted General, and keeper of the Peace, till such time as the differences then on foot, through the restitution of the Exiles, should be composed; and then having obtained his wished for opportunity, the Army being at his beck, and under pretence of opposing some, who at Brutia had lately revolted, sufficient occasion being taken to increase his strength, he marched out as against the Rebels, and united unto him three thousand men, some whereof had formerly served him against the Carthaginians, and were most addicted to himself, and adverse both to the people in general, and the six hundred who now had the power in their hands, after the Ariftheracie was taken away. With these, and certain Syracussians, who being poor themselves envied the wealth of others, he strengthened himself, and accusing the six hundred to the Souldiers as having plotted against him, procured them easily to be taken for Enemies, and causing an Alarm to be sounded, commanded the Army to march to the City, and there to kill the Malcontents, and take the spoil of them and all their party.

3. The Army marching presently to the City, every part thereof was filled with slaughters, there being no difference made betwixt friend and Enemy, but according to the riches or poverty of the persons, and many running out into the streets to know what the matter was, were slain as they asked the question: all the Gares were shut that none might escape, so that four thousand by this means in one day perished. Many leaped down the Walls, of which some perished in the fall, but others to the number of six thousand escaped, of which most fled to Agrirentum, where they were courteously received, but sufficiently tormented in this respect, that their Wives and Daughters at home were abused by the Souldiers in revenge for their escape. Agathocles being glutted with a two dayes slaughter, gathered together the multitude of his Captives, of which he only dimished Dinecrates for his former friendship, but the rest he presently put to death or banished, and then calling the people together, grievously inveighed against the six hundred, and at the Aristocratical Government, and then mentioning what he had done to purchase the liberty of his Country, very formally laid down his Office, knowing certainly he should be solicited to take it up again. For, his Souldiers now made rich by other mens goods, would not endure that he, or his authority, should forsake them, but cried out he must take care of them, so that with much ado, as it seemed, he took upon him the Office of Chief Captain, but without a Colleague, being unwilling, as he said, to be called to an account for others breaking the Laws, when as he acted according to them; to which the people consenting, he was Created Capitain General with full Authority by their suffrages.

4. He carried it with all sweetness and moderation towards all them at the first took great care for the Revenues, making of Arms, and increasing of the Fleet, and got several of the Inland Towns into his power. Having seized upon a Castle of the Messinians, he promised to restore it for thirty Talents, but after the receipt of the money, not only refused to surrender it, but also endeavoured to take Messene it self, part of the Wall being fallen down, and though he failed herein of his Enterprize, yet besieged he Myle, and had the place surrendered to him, but the Carthaginians sending their Ambassadors

Amatadors, expostulated with him his breaking the League, and constrained him to give the Castle up again into the hands of the Messinians. The year after, the Exiles that lived at Agrigentum exhorting their entertainers not to suffer him thus to go on in his Conquests, and make a prey of their Towns, for that it was better now to set upon him before he had confirmed his Tyranny, than when he should be grown too strong for them, and to be forced to War with him against their Wills. This appearing to be but reason, the people decreed the War, and having entered into a strict Alliance with them of Gela and Messina, sent some of the Exiles to Lacedæmon, thence to procure a General, suspecting the fidelity and moderation of their own Citizens, and calling to mind the worth of Timoleon. At that time was there in that City one Acrotatus Son to Cleomenes the King, labouring under the envy of most of the youth, because the Lacedæmonians having been overthrown by Antipater, who then Governed Macedonia (after the death of Alexander the Great) when such as returned from the defeat were acquitted by the people, he alone had opposed the decree. Being enraged hereat, they beat him, and laid in wait for his life, whereupon now desirous of some foreign command, he easily accepted of this employment, and without consent of the Ephori, with a few ships sailed to Agrigentum, yet did he nothing worthy, either of his family or Country, but proving more bloody and cruel than the Tyrants themselves, incurred the displeasure of the people. Giving himself up to all luxury, and therewith spending the publick revenue, he murdered Sosistratus the Chief of the Exiles having invited him to supper, for nothing but out of emulation, whereupon he was deprived of his command, and had been stoned, but that he withdrew himself into his own Country. After his departure a composition was made by the interposition of Amilcar the Carthaginian, upon these terms, that of the Greek Cities Hieraclea, Solinus, and Himera should continue under the power of the Carthaginians; but the rest, over which the Syracusanians had the Dominion, should be left to their own Laws.

5. The Island being hereby cleared of the Enemies Forces, he securely laid divers Towns to his Dominions, and with the accession of many places to his former strength sufficiently confirmed himself, having over and above his Syracusanians, and Confederates, ten thousand Foot, and three thousand five hundred Horse of Mercenaries in constant pay, and making provision of all sorts of Ammunition, for that he foresaw, that the Carthaginians disapproving of the peace made by Amilcar, for that he foresaw, that the Carthaginians disapproving of the peace made by Amilcar, would within a short while renew the War: The year after seeing himself sufficiently furnished, he resolved then not to expect them, but begin himself; yet desiring first to clear his way, by removing whatever might hinder him from the neighbouring Cities, he first attempted Messina whither the Exiles of Syracuse had fled; and he first prevailed with them to expel these, and then to admit him into the Town, where he killed six hundred of the chiefest of them, and most adverse to his power. Thence he went to Agrigentum, thinking to make also a prey of it; but sixty ships of the Carthaginians with Forces having lately come thither, he forbore to attempt any thing, and drew his Forces into the Territories of the Carthaginians, where he took sent in divers Castles. In the mean while Democrates the principal man amongst the Exiles sent to Carthage, desiring aid before Agathocles should reduce all Sicily into his power, and having gathered his Companions together, and raised a pretty Force, sent Nymphodorus to the Town of the Centoripini held then by Agathocles, but being promised to have it betrayed into his hands, under condition they should be left to their own liberty, he got by the night into the Town, but the Garrison having timely knowledge of it, cut him off, and all his followers which had entered, and Agathocles punished the Conspirators. But Democrates being called by the Inhabitants of Galaris, with three thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse marched thither, where Agathocles his faction being cast out, he pitched his Tents without the Town; but he sent two of his Captains against him with five thousand men, who at length put him, and his whole Army to flight, and recovering the place, advertised upon the Revolters, Agathocles being elevated with this success, hearing the Carthaginians were seized on an Hill, marched thither, intending to fight them with all the power he could make, but they declining an engagement, in a triumphant manner he returned unto Syracuse.

6. The year following, the Carthaginians shipped a great Army for Sicily under Conduct of Amilcar, a man of high Nobility; but such a Tempest seized on the Fleet, that two hundred and sixty Vessels loaded with men and Provisions miscarried, which made them cover their Wall with black; as it was the case from upon some great and publick disaster. But Amilcar being an industrious man, gathering together the Relicks of the shipwreck, listed more men after his arrival, and and made up a compleat Army of forty thousand Foot, and well nigh five thousand Horse. Agathocles perceiving himself too weak to encounter the Enemy at present, took care how to secure his Towns and Castles from revolting, and especially Gela, near to which the Enemy then lay. To fend in a great party at once, he thought might awaken the Townsmen too much, and put them upon some attempt disadvantageous to himself, so that he got some Soldiers in at several times, till they amounted to a number too strong for the other, and then going thither, accused the Inhabitants of Treachery, and took occasion to make a Massacre of four thousand of them, the goods of whom he seized, with all the Silver and Gold of those that remained. Then pitched he his Tents against the Carthaginians, encamped on an Hill where the Castle of Phalaris the Tyrant of old time was reported to be, whence it got the name of Enomus, i. e. wicked or unlawful. A River ran betwixt the two Camps, concerning which a rumour having been of old time spread, that a great multitude of men should perish near it, this hindered both the Armies from engaging, till such time as excursions being made on both sides, the Africans broke out of their Trenches to rescue the prey, which Agathocles foreseeing, had placed many men in ambush upon the River, who falling upon the Carthaginians, as they pursued their friends, drove them back, and with great laughter gave the chase unto their Camps. Agathocles judging this a fit season for animating, arose with his whole Army, and fell upon them in their Trenches, into which he brake, and there maintained for some time a hot dispute, till the Enemy repulsed him by help especially of Slingers, natives of the Island Baleares, who being exercised after the fashion of that Country in slinging of stones, forced back the Syracusanians, by throwing at them those of a pound weight. Yet he broke in in other places, and had almost done his work, when fresh supplies to the Enemy arrived out of Africa, which falling on him in his rear, turned the fate of the day clear against him, and put his men to flight, of which great execution was done by five thousand Africans that gave the chase, many also destroyed themselves by drinking over hastily, out of extremity of the heat which then raged through the influence of the Dog Star. So that he lost no fewer than seven thousand men, six hundred onely of the Carthaginians being slain.

7. Agathocles getting together his straglers betook himself to Gela, having given out, that he determined for Syracuse with all speed, so that three hundred Africans entering Gela, and fearing nothing, were all cut off by him. Then thus he himself up there, that the Carthaginians laying siege to the place, the Syracusanians might have time enough to victual their City, and indeed Amilcar thought first of all to besiege it, but afterwards understanding what force was in it, changed his purpose, and took in several Towns and Castles, and behaved himself so obligingly, as many within a short time revolted to him. Agathocles then withdrew to Syracuse, which he furnished with all sorts of Provisions for the enduring of a Siege, intending to leave a party for defence thereof, and remove the War into Africa, by passing all his Army over thither. For, considering that the Carthaginians had almost got Sicily, and his confederates generally revolted to them (who were most potent now both at Sea and Land) he judged it (though the most venturesome, yet) the safest way to invade the Enemy in his own Territories, which being a sudden and most unusual thing, he should daunt him therewith, and drive his Subjects into an open revolt, and force him to call back the Army out of Sicily. Communicating therefore this purpose to no man living, he left Syracuse to the Government of his brother Antander, and leaving all the relations of the City one from another, that no mutiny or sedition might arise in his absence (taking part of them along with him as hostages) he raised money by seizing the estates of Orphans into his hands (which he promised to restore when they should come to age) by borrowing money of Merchants, and robbing of Temples; but especially by calling the multitude together, and acquainting them, how he was most ready to endure any hardship, but it pained him for the People; therefore he advised all that feared themselves and estates to depart, which when the richest and most out of favour had done, he procured them to be cut off, and confiscated all their goods. Then manumitting all slaves that were fit for the Wars, he shipped his men in sixty Vessels, and getting out into the Main whilst the Carthaginians knew not his design, escaped them by the darkness of the night, and though they chased him all the way, yet arrived he in Africa with his Army in safety.

8. Once arrived he burnt his Ships, as well to take away from his Soldiers all hope of escape (thereby to heighten their valour) as also having no great Army, left for the defence of the Navy, left it should be divided. Then fell he upon two Cities immediately, which he took (the Soldiers being encouraged at the sight of so pleasant and rich a Country) but suffered none of his Army to lie there, but destroyed the places, left his men should rely upon them as a refuge. The Carthaginians were wonderfully daunted at the first report of his landing, concluding he durst not venture over, except he had first, by destroying their Army, made all rest for their associates, but must as many of their own Citizens as would make a shift, and so raising forty thousand Foot, and one thousand Horse, with two thousand Chariots, they encounter the Enemy. Agathocles his men, many of them, wanting Arms, he made them counterfeit ones, to be so esteemed a far off, and perceiving them to be discouraged at the number of the Carthaginian Horse, he procured many Owls to be let go in the Camp, which birds being taken to bringalwaies good luck with them, the Soldiers were therewith so cheered, that they resolutely set upon the Enemy, and brake presently the body of Horse. The Chariots they drove for the most part back amongst the Foot, which they charged also with such resolution, that the Wing where Hanno commanded was discomfited, and he himself slain. Bomilcar his Colleague understanding this, having formerly withed for some good opportunity to invade the Tyranny (which the most eminent men of Carthage were many times forced to do, for the avoiding of those censures and punishments constantly inflicted upon them for the least miscarriage of fortune, by the heady rabble) thinking now an occasion to be presented to him, as it were from Heaven, resolved to take hold of it. And for that he thought it most convenient for him, that the Enemy should not be overthrown, but an awe continued upon his Citizens, he retreated by little and little, suffering the Sicilians to prevail, and at length drew off his men to an Hill, whence they all fled as fast as they could to Carthage, having lost of their number one thousand men, and killed of the Greeks but two hundred.

9. The Carthaginians now shut up in their City, and besieged by Agathocles (though they had carried with them above twenty thousand pair of Manicles in their Chariots to bind the Greeks, over whom they promised themselves an easy Victory) were very much discouraged, and laying the blame of the misfortune upon the neglect of their superstition, sent great gifts to Hercules the god of the Tyrians, from whom they were issued, and for that they had redeemed their own Children of late (by others gotten elsewhere) from being sacrificed to Saturn, they presently offered up to him two hundred boyes of the chiefest amongst them for Nobility, being put into the hand of the Statue, and thence falling down into the hollow of it full of fire. They sent also to Amilcar into Sicily for aid, who receiving the news, caused it to be given out that all the Sicilian Army was cut off, and earnestly thereupon urged the besieged to a surrender of Syracuse, shewing them (to enforce the matter) the Iron-work of the Ships wherein the Army had passed over, which indeed the Carthaginians had taken up into their Vessels after the burning of the Fleet. But the chief men amongst the besieged stayed the rest from yielding, though Antander the brother of Agathocles was so faint-hearted, as to be for delivering up the City, and cast eight thousand of the contrary faction, and the friends of the exiles, out of the Town: But within a few days arrived a Gally from Agathocles, to give them knowledge of his success, which being pursued by the Carthaginians, and the People flocking to the Haven to gaze, the walls were so forsaken that Amilcar taking his opportunity, got some of his men over, but an Alarm being given, they were either slain, or forced headlong down the fortifications. Amilcar heretofore discouraged, raised his siege, and sent a supply of five thousand men over to Carthage.

10. Agathocles in this mean while took divers places in Africk, and fortifying his Camp before Tunis (wherein he also left a strong Garrison) marched further and besieged Adrymis, and drew into society with him Elymas the King of the Africans. The Carthaginians having notice of this, turned all their forces upon Tunis, which which they besieged, having first become Masters of his Camp; but he thereupon leaving a great part of his Army till before the Town, went with the rest to an high Hill, whence he might easily be seen both by the Carthaginians that lay before Tunis, and also by the Inhabitants of Adrymis, and there making abundance of fires, deceived them by this stratagem at both places. For the besiegers thought he was coming with a great Army to relieve Tunis, and therefore raised their siege out of hand, and departed to Carthage, the besieged of Adrymis out of a strong apprehension that new supplies were coming to the Enemy, yielded the Town. Then took he Thapsus by storm, and divers other places, and having now got into his hands about two hundred Towns, went higher up into Lilya. The Carthaginians took another occasion at his absence to besiege Tunis, but he thereupon returned as before, but overcame them by a stratagem of a clean contrary Nature with the former; for he commanded that no fires now should be made, and marching very fast fell upon them at unawares, and cutting off two thousand, took very many Prisoners, and forced the other to betake them to their heels, whereby he exceedingly advanced his affairs, giving the Carthaginians such a blow (who now by reason of their supplies arrived out of Sicily, were thought superior to him) that improving the Victory he went against Elymas, who had revolted from him, and killed him with a great number of his Subjects.

11. The year following, Amilcar in Sicily once more besieged Syracuse, and presently made great haste for storming of it after his arrival, because the Soothsayers had foretold him, that that day he should die in the City. A great number joyning themselves to him out of hope of plunder, they so stopped up the way with Carriages, that they hindered one another, and such a tumult arose, that the Syracusan having notice of it, sallied out upon them, and putting them to flight made great slaughter of them, and taking Amilcar alive, delivered him to the friends of those that had been slain, who most cruelly tortured him to death, having been formerly it is probable, condemned by his ingrateful Citizens themselves, though as then, he having the Army in his power, they durst not let it be known, but casting all their votes (written as the manner was) into a Vessel, they ordered it to be covered, and the thing not to be looked into, until his return, and the giving up of his command. But his Army which consisted of one hundred and twenty thousand Foot, and five thousand Horse, being thus strangely defeated, was divided then into two factions. The Exiles and Greeks chose them Democritus for their Captain, and the Carthaginians, him that had held the next place to Amilcar. The affairs of Sicily being thus in confusion, the Inhabitants of Agirgentum thinking a fit opportunity for gaining the Principality of the whole Island to be put into their hands, made Zenodorus their Captain, who went and took in divers Towns, many revolting to him (all which with the former he restored to their liberty) and restrained the excursions of the Syracusan, who were in great distress for want of provisions which had been cut off by the Carthaginians, the constant Masters at Sea. By this time Amilcar's head was sent over to Agathocles, who receiving it with joy, raised the contrary affection in the Enemy, to whose Camp he brought it, together with the message, that their forces were utterly cut off, whereupon they despaired forthwith of better fortune, adoring the head of their nominal King.

12. Agathocles was much puffed up at his prosperity, though he was not far from the waiting of his fortune, a preludium to which was made by Lycifus one of his Officers, who in a drunken fit exceedingly jeered him. He took it patiently, and made a jest of it, because the man was very servicable to him in his Wars; but Archagathus his Son taking it heignously, returned it to him in his own language with threats, which further so enraged him, that he threw in his Teeth (which was generally reported) his incestuous having to do with his step-mother. The young man heretofore was so transported, as he ran him through and slew him outright; which was followed by a mutiny of the whole Army, demanding justice against him; and this flew to that height, that the Soldiers chose themselves Captains, seized on Tunis, and besieged Agathocles; and his Son and many of the Officers upon promise of larger pay, revolted to the Carthaginians, who had not been wanting to add fuel to this flame. Agathocles seeing the danger he was in, put aside his Purple, and made a pitiful Oration to the Soldiers, wherein he told them he was willing to lay down his life if so they pleased, rather than end his days by some ignominious death, and drew out his Sword as intending to kill himself; but the Army hindered it, and compelling him to resume his Robes, were thoroughly reconciled.

Yet he quickly then now, and defeateth the Carthaginians.

conciled to him, except some two hundred which went over to the Enemy. He taking this opportunity marched presently against the Carthaginians; who full little thought of a battel, but expected presently a general revolt; so that taking them thus at unawares, he easily overthrew them with great slaughter.

Agathocles obtaineth another victory against the Carthaginians.

13. About this time the Numidians revolted from those of Carthage, who sent out an Army the next Spring to reduce them to obedience. Agathocles understanding that, left his son at Tunis, and marching after them with all expedition, at length overtakes them, then overthrows them, though with great difficulty, and lots to himself. The Numidians, whilst he was employed in the battel, having been intent upon the event of the fight, fell in, and plundered his Carriages, and getting away the greatest part of the goods, by reason of the darkness of the night, he was glad to divide the plunder of the field equally amongst his Soldiers, in way of recompence for the damage sustained by them. Such Greeks as he took Prisoners, and had assisted the Carthaginians, he put into a Castle, where they fearing to be put to death set upon the Garrison by night, but being too weak, betook themselves thence to a certain fortified place, which Agathocles hearing marched thither with his Army, and drawing them out under promise of impunity, contrary to his faith given, killed them all to the number of one thousand, of which half were Syracuzans. At this time there was one Opbellas, who having been an Officer under Alexander the Great, had seized upon Cyrene, and gaped still after larger Dominions. To him now sent Agathocles, inviting him to come and joyn with him against the Carthaginians, offering him all Africk for a reward, to which hepret ended he was constrained to pass over, assuring him he would content himself with Sicilie, or else, if he thought good, invade Italy more commodious for him than Africk, by far.

Sendsch for Opbellas out of Grece.

The man pushed up with great expectations, sent to Athens (whence he had married a Wife of the stock of famous Miltiades) to unite them to joyn with him in the expedition, which not only divers of that City readily embraced, but others of Greece now much flattered by Wars within it self, which were raised by Alexander his Successors. Opbellas then began his journey (with above ten thousand Foot, six hundred Horie, one hundred Chariots, besides ten thousand others, extraordinary, as they called them) of two months long, through a desert infested with wild Beasts and venomous Serpents, wherewith his Army was fore distressed, as also by want of necessities, till at length they arrived at Agathocles his Camp. There they were received with all manner of Provisions, but as the greatest part of them were gone out to gather Forrage, he set upon the rest with their Captain, who though he resisted, yet being overborn, was slain most treacherously, and Agathocles then forcing them to lay down their Arms, got into his power the whole Army, having aforehand stirred up his Soldiers against Opbellas, by feigning that he lay in wait for his life.

Whom he treacherously murdereth.

Remains seeketh to invade the Tyranny at Carthage, and miscarries.

14. Whilst Agathocles was in hand with this treacherous design, Bomilcar having long intended, but still out of fear deferred, the invasion of the Tyranny, communicated his intention to five hundred Citizens, and one thousand Mercenaries, and broke out into open Rebellion against his Country. Having seized on the new Citie, he thence invaded the old, which caused great consternation at first, whilst every one feared they had been betrayed into the Enemies hands; but understanding the matter, they presently made head against him, who going on in his way made slaughters of all he met; but what with opposing him in the Streets, and throwing down stones from the Houses, they drove him back again into the new Citie through the narrow wayes, and there befieged him. At length upon promise of pardon for what had passed, an agreement was made, and his followers by reason of the danger the Citie stood in, were all dismissed without any punishment; but he, notwithstanding the faith given to him, was most ignominiously, and with great Tortures put to death.

Agathocles taketh the title of King.

15. The Year after, Agathocles hearing that the Captains of Alexander had taken the Titles of Kings upon them: for that he thought himself neither inferior to them in power, Territories, nor for valiant Acts, called himself King in like manner: yet took he not the Diadem, being accustomed constantly to wear a Crown of Myrtles heretofore, either for the Ceremony of some Priesthood, or as Kings have conceived, by reason of baldness, which rendered him exceedingly uncomely about the head. Then to attempt something worthy of so great a Title, he fell upon Udris, near which taking three hundred of the Inhabitants, which upon his coming had been shut out, when he could not persuade them to yield, he framed an an Engine, to which he tied many of them, and drawing it along to that place where he intended to break into the Town, exposed them either to be shot to death by their friends, or else if they within out of affection should forbear, then could he easily enter. The defendants preferring their Countreys safety before that of a few private men, when they could do no less, repulled the Enemy with all possible endeavour; but for all this Agathocles broke in at another place, and filled the Citie with slaughter, no regard being had to any condition; and after he had overcome them also in a Sea-fight, placed a Garrison there, and subdued all the Maritime Towns under his power. Though he prospered thus in Africk, yet was he solicitous for Sicilie, where the Argentines had made some progress in freeing the Citie; but now of late had received so great a blow from his Captains, that broke in pieces their design. Just after the fight was over he arrived, and making a progress about the Island, recovered most of the Towns, onely he was repulled with great loss from Centorippa, and upon the same terms gained Apollonia. Henceforth his affairs began universally to decline. In Sicily, Democrat got to great an Army of Exiles together, that he durst not fight him; though continually dared, and dogged at the heels. In Africk his Son Archagathus prospered very much at the first through the good fortune of Eumachos, who subdued many places. But the Senate at Carthage dividing their Army into three parties, whereof one was to march for the Maritime parts, another for the Island, and the last for the upper Countreys, they thereby attained their ends, viz. to lessen their number in the Citie (which made all Provisions scarce, by sending out thirty thousand men) to contain their Allies in fidelity, by giving them hopes of relief, and (which was the chiefest) to force the Enemy also to divide his Army, and so draw him down from Carthage it self.

Returning into Sicily, his affairs go down the wind, both there and in Africk.

16. For Archagathus dividing his Army to oppose the Carthaginians in the several quarters, lost almost the two parts thereof, which he sent out under Conduct of two several Capaines, to the number of about nineteen thousand men; so that the Carthaginians reduced almost all places back to obedience, all the confederates revolted except a few, and Archagathus being distressed for want of all things, and the remainder of his Army in great terror, he sent to his Father into Sicily to acquaint him in what posture matters stood, and to desire speedy relief. He seeing his affairs to go down the wind in that Island was solicitous how to leave it, and three hundred Vessels of the Carthaginians blocked up the mouth of the Haven, so that he could not stir out. But eighteen Vessels coming in from Hetruria, he perswaded the Masters thereof being friends to put out, and then when the Carthaginians (as he expected) gave them the chase, he fell in upon their Rear, and beyond all hope got a Victory, boarding five of their Fleet, which he took together with the Defendants. Hereat encouraged, he sent Leptines against Argentum, knowing Xenodorus their General then to be out of favour with a great part of the Town, and he seeing himself unable to grapple with him stirred not out, but provoked by the Citizens, so that being worsted, for fear of condemnation he fled to Gela. Agathocles now feasted the people for joy, making himself common with all, and giving them Wine to excess, so that their wits being out, when that once was in, they might speak their minds, and he thereby know their inclinations; for he feared that after his departure they might call in Democrat and the Exiles, and restore again the popular Government. Having by this means got out who they were that distasted his power, he feasted them again by themselves, with other five hundred who bore the most noble minds, and compassing them in with his Mercenaries, slew them every man.

Being to return into Africk, he maketh a Massacre in Syracuse.

17. Then sayd he over into Africk, where he found his Army in a low and desolate condition for want of necessities. Therefore resolved he to fight, though far inferior to the Carthaginians, who sought rather to draw out the time in length, knowing the condition of the Enemy; but he leading down his men to their Trenches, forced them to come out and give battel, in which he fighting valiantly, yet was worsted with the loss of three thousand men. After this a sudden calamity seized upon both the Armies by reason of mistakes. For the Carthaginians offering the most beautiful of their Captives, as a sacrifice to their gods, it happened that the fire thence was driven to their Tents, which being covered with Reed and Straw easily caught in, and as easily were consumed, whence it came to pass, that all things were in great confusion. But the worst of it was, that the Africans which had fought with Agathocles coming now over to them, the Scouts seeing them,

gave an Alarm, as if all the Greeks taking their advantage of the fire were coming against them, so that flying in great confusion, they killed and trode down one another, mistaking one another for Enemies, and having thus dispatched five thousand of their Company, all ran away to Cartage, where they were received with great trembling by their friends, left that with them the Enemy should enter. The Africans which were coming over, being affrighted at the burning of the Camp, retreated, which being also seen by the Greeks, they gave notice to Agathocles that the Carthaginians were coming against him, so that he drew out his men in great fear and terror, who meeting the Africans, and they taking one another for Enemies, they killed, and slew all they could during the night season, till such time as four thousand being slain, the rest retreated to the Camp. Agathocles after this, seeing himself too weak now to grapple with the Carthaginians, and thereby his affairs to be desperate in Africa, resolved to return into Sicily, and considering that the Enemy having the command at Sea, would not suffer the Army to pass away quietly, he resolved with his younger Son Heraclides, and a few more, to pass over secretly, and leave Archagathus behind him, whom he was jealous of, because of the report raised of him that he had to do with his Step-mother.

18. But Archagathus having notice of his intention (which he took in marvellous evil part) communicated it to several of the Officers, who raising a mutiny presently in the Army, Agathocles was seized on, and made sure in Fetters. A little after it hapned that an Alarm was made in the Camp, as if the Enemy approached, which made all Arm themselves and run out, and amongst the rest the Keepers of Agathocles, whom then the multitude seeing in such a condition, cried out presently that he should be loosed; which being done, he forthwith took Boat with a few attendants, leaving both his Sons behind him. The Army understanding this killed them both, and then agreed with the Carthaginians for three hundred Talents to restore the Towns yet in their hands, and that such as would should receive pay in their service. And such as did so had the Terms performed; but those that out of hope of succour from Agathocles held out the places, being all forced to yield, their Captains were Crucified, and the common Soldiers being bound in Fetters, were forced with their hard labour to repair that Countrey which formerly they had helped to depopulate.

19. Thus the Carthaginians made peace after four years; Divine vengeance hurrying Agathocles to punishment, after that perfidious murder of Ophobus, his two sons being slain on the same day, and by the hands of his Soldiers. After his arrival in Sicily he went presently to Regesta, a Town confederate with him, whence wanting money he exacted much Treasure, but they grumbling, and complaining thereof, all the poorer sort he brought forth, and slew at the River Scamander, and then tortured the rest with all sorts of Torments to make them confess what they had. Some he broke upon the Wheel, others he flout of from Engines as Stones. Some had their Ancles cut off, and endured other such cruel torments. He invented a kind of punishment also, something resembling Phalaris his Bull being a bed of Iron, wherein one being put, was burnt or fric'd to death by fire put underneath. Rich Women had their Ancles broken with Iron Tongues, others their Breasts cut off. Some out of terror burnt themselves in their houses, and others hanged themselves, so that the whole flower of the People being absolutely destroyed, he sold the Children to the Brutii in Italy, and utterly to destroy the name of the City, called it Dicaopolis, and Peopled it with Fugitives. Hearing then that his Sons were slain in Africa, to be revenged on the Soldiers, he sent commands to Autander his Brother, to kill all their friends and kinsfolks at Syracuse, which he readily performing, no sex nor age was spared, but so horrid a Massacre committed, that as well old and decrepit men as young men were included in the slaughter. Such as were thus murdered lying on the Sea shore, none durst bury them, though never so nearly related, so that the Sea waishing them away was coloured with the blood, carrying along with it a note of this cruelty to other parts at a good distance. Agathocles continued his progress up and down the Island, strengthening Towns, and raising money; but Papophis his Captain despising him now for the lowliness of his fortune, fled over to Dinocrates, and withdrew the Army also from him. This cast him into such despair, that contrary to his former boldness, he sent to Dinocrates, offering to quit the Tyranny, and restore the Government to the People, so he might have but two Castles to maintain himself on, and earnestly pressed him to admit of the conditions. But being after the chief power himself, self, and unwilling to be reduced again to the estate of a private Citizen (being now (though but accounted Captain of the Exiles) as a King indeed, in regard of the great extent of his power and command) put him off with one pretence or other till all Agathocles finishing out his device, procured some to accuse him to the Army, and sending to Cartage made peace with them on these terms; to restore all the places to them they formerly had in Sicilie, and for this in way of requital, to receive five hundred Talents of Gold, and a great quantity of Corn.

20. Furnishing then himself with a small Army, he went against Dinocrates and his Exiles, who seeing the little number he brought with him (being but about five thousand Foot, and eight hundred Horse) in comparison of themselves, amounting to twenty five thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse, gave him battle. The dispute at first was very sharp; but shortly some two thousand of the Exiles revolting to the Tyrant, so encouraged his men, and discouraged those they had forsaken (who thought them to be more than indeed they were) that they were easily put to flight, though so far exceeding in number. All the Horse got away, and some of the Foot; but the greatest part falling upon an Hill, made peace with Agathocles, who had sent to them, inviting them now at length to lay down their enmity, and return home; but after he had got them into his power, contrary to his faith given (which he never observed) he slew some seven thousand of them. The remainder of the Army being gathered up he received, and Dinocrates himself to whose command he committed part of his Soldiers, and contrary to his own disposition, trusted them to the last. He betraying his companions, slew Papophis at Gela, and going about in subduing the Towns and Castles (in which work he spent two years) delivered them all up to Agathocles.

21. Not long after, Cassander the King of Macedonia besieging Corycia, Agathocles went and raised the siege, burning all his ships in the Havens. Returning to his Army, and understanding that certain Ligurians and Tyrrenians had joyned with those that slew his Son Archagathus, he got them into his power to the number of two thousand, and put them all to the sword. The Brutii (a People which issuing from the Lucanians, were grown mighty high, and at the very first fought against those from whom they had their original, and forced them to a Peace, on equal terms) being offended with him, he sailed over into Italy against them, and determined to besiege a Town belonging to them, but they setting upon him at unawares, forced him with the loss of four thousand men to return to Syracuse. Yet was he not discouraged from making another Expedition against Crotone, which purposing to besiege, he pretended he was about to send his Daughter to the King of Epirus with a Royal Fleet, and beguiling them herewith, laid close siege both by Sea and Land to the Town, when they full little thought it. Having undermined a great house, they being terrified thereat, opened their Gates and let him in, after which he plundered the Town, and committed great slaughters. Then entered he into society with the Japyges and Pactii notable Pyrates; whose furnishing with Vessels, he was to have part of the booty; and leaving a Garrison in Crotone, he returned to Syracuse.

22. Once more having prepared an Army of thirty thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse, he passed over into Italy, where being arrived, and committing the Navy to the care of Stilpo, he commanded him to make excursions into the Territories of the Brutii, but he coasting along and wasting the maritime parts, lost almost all his ships by a Tempest. He himself took by storm the City of the Hipponiates, at the report whereof the Brutii were so affrighted, that they sent him to treat, and delivered up six hundred Hostages. Yet after his departure they broke their oath, and expelling his Garrison, returned again to their own freedom. Agathocles being returned home, sent his Son of his own name to Detmetrius Poliaretus now King of Macedonia, to enter into society with him, who taking the message in good part, rewarded the Ambassador with royal gifts, and sent one back with him, who under colour of ratifying the League, might espie out the condition of Sicilie. Having now been a long time, as he thought, at Peace with the Carthaginians, he made all provision possible again for shipping, intending to make another Expedition into Africa, and hinder the exportation of Corn from Sicilie and Sardinia.

23. But while he busied himself with such thoughts, he was prevented by one A. M. 3760. Mennon, who being born at Regesta, had been taken captive there, and for his beauty was preferred to his service. For a time he dissembled the displeasure he conceived from the calamity of his Country, and his own ignominious and filthy condition

dition, till he might have an opportunity to be revenged upon the Tyrant. But now it happening, that Agathocles commending Agathocles his Son to the Syraculans as his Successor; and sending him to succeed Archagathus (his nephew by Archagathus his Son, and a man of great courage) in the command of the Army then quartering about Ætna; Archagathus seeing how things were likely to go, plotted the ruin of them both, and sending to Menon, desired him to make the old man away with poyson, while he in the mean while inviting the young one to a feast, made him drunk, and then killed him. Menon mindful of the message, when the King after meat called for a tooth-pick to cleanse his teeth, dipped one in poyson and gave him it, which he using, began by little and little to wax ill, and then his teeth putrifying in a horrid manner, this was succeeded by tormenting pains. Seeing himself near his end, he called the people together, and inveighing bitterly against Archagathus, stirred them up to revenge him on him, and restored the Democracy to the people. Afterwards his voice failing him, he was put upon the funeral fire yet breathing, by Oxythenius, who had been sent to him from Demetrius, and burnt. Julius from Trogus (who in the whole story of this Tyrant dissenteth from Diodorus) reporteth, that before his end, he sent back his Wife Theogene an Ægyptian by birth, with her two young Children, and great wealth, into her own Country, to be out of that danger which he forelaw must needs ensue. The story of his life is almost beyond parallel; but he dyed after he had lived seventy two years, and thereof Reigned twenty eight, as amongst other Historians cited by our Author, Antander his own Brother left recorded; A.M. 3718, and the second of the 123 Olympiad.

Menon who poysoned him laboured in vain to get the Tyranny.

The Mercenaries molest the Syraculans and the Roman Soldiers those of Æligium.

24. The Syraculans having again got the power into their own hands, put to sale Agathocles his goods, pulled down and tare in pieces all his pictures. Menon in the mean while who had poysoned him being in the Camp with Archagathus, and elevated with the thought of what he had done, made away also Archagathus by treachery, and with good words drawing the Army to himself, resolved to make War upon the Syraculans, and seize on the Principality. The Syraculans therefore having made Hicetas their Pretor, sent him out against him, but the Carthaginians joining with Menon, they were constrained to deliver them four hundred Hostages to let fall the War with them, and receive the Exiles. Afterwards the mercenary Souldiers being denied the right of Suffrage in the election of Magistrates, a great sedition arose thereupon, and both they and the People took arms, but the better sort interposed themselves, and prevailed with both parties to agree, the Souldiers consenting to depart the Island with their goods. These Mercenaries marching away, came to Messene, a Sea-town standing over against Italy, where being kindly entertained by the Inhabitants, they so well requited them, that in the night they massacred them all, and Marrying their Wives, seized upon the Town, which they called in their own Campanian Language Mamertina; Mars in that speech being named Mamers. Over against this Town stood Rhegium upon the promontory of Italy, which being in danger now in the War betwixt the Romans and the Tarentines, the Inhabitants desired of the Romans to have a party sent them for their defence, which being also Campanians, in imitation of what their Countrymen had done at Messene, and by their help, they also killed or expelled the Inhabitants, and seized upon their Town and Territories. Decius their chief Commander they banished for the unequal division of the prey, who going thence to Messene, fell ill afterwards of his eyes, and sent to Rhegium for an expert Physician in this kind, who coming to him, in revenge of what he had done to his Country, applied Cantharides to his eyes instead of salve, and utterly blinded him. And when the Romans were once disengaged from the War, having grievously repented the Treachery of their Souldiers, they besieged them in the Town, which taking, they brought three hundred of them to Rome, and in the market-place first whipped and then beheaded them, after the custom of their Ancestors, to vindicate their credit with their confederates.

25. In Sicilie were now many petty Tyrants: Hicetas at Syracuse, Phintias at Agiruntum, and several others at other places. These two fell out and Warred with each other, inasmuch that by reason of their mutual excursions and depredations their grounds lay untilld. Hicetas having still the upper hand of the other, was so elevated, that he ventured to fight with the Carthaginians at the River Toria, but as it proved to the great loss of his men. Ever since the death of Agathocles, had the Syraculans laboured with all their might to reduce that whole Island into their power, and now at this time rather doubling their diligence than at all slacking their endeavours, sent over into Italy to Pyrhus King of Epirus (who now was busied in War against the Romans, being called thither by the Tarentines) desiring aid of him for the expelling of the Africans, and to take upon him the protection of Sicilie. Hicetas having held the Dominion of Syracuse nine years, was then ejected by Thynio, who together with Sofistratus were vexed with the Carthaginian War, that they again called Pyrhus into Sicilie. The Mamertines entered into League with the Carthaginians, and resolved if possible to hinder his landing, the Romans were also by reason of their enmity with him easily drawn into the confederacy, so that the Straights of Sicilie were narrowly watched. He delaying his coming till the next year, the Carthaginians sent back thirty of their Ships upon other occasions, and besieged Syracuse. But then he (having been in Italy now two years and four months, without success) passed over without controul, and came directly to Syracuse, where the Carthaginians lying incamped with no less than fifty thousand men, having also one hundred Ships at anchor in the Haven, yet upon his approach raised their siege, not daring to try the hazard of a battle.

26. Pyrhus coming to the City, reconciled the Inhabitants to their Governments, for which getting great favour, and receiving messages from diverse Cities, which gave up themselves into his hands, he not only thought now of gaining Sicily (which he intended to give to his Son, begotten on Lanassa the daughter of Agathocles, as Italy to another) but of laying Africa itself also to his Dominions. Making a journey through the Island, he received the Cities to protection, and within a short space subdued all the places held by the Carthaginians, except, Lilybæum, a Town built upon the Sea by their Ancestors, after that Dionysius had taken Motya. After he had been some time before it, though a great supply had arrived, yet sent they also to him, offering him money to raise his siege; and he was inclined to accept of the offer; but his friends in Council perswaded him by all means to refuse it, and utterly expel the Africans out of Sicily. Then did he with all his might attempt the taking of the place by force, but it being strongly defended, he every time came off with loss, and finally after he had continued the siege for two months, rose up and departed. After this he had thoughts of becoming Master at Sea, and transporting his Army into Africa; but behaving himself too majestically in the preparation for this attempt he lost himself exceedingly, and then suspecting the fidelity of Themo and Sofistratus, the one he compelled by fear to revolt from him, and the latter he slew as guilty of the same intention. This so provoked the Cities, that some revolted back to the Carthaginians, and others to the Mamertines, so that perceiving a great defection, and a conspiracy also hatched against him, being now solicited also by the Samnites and Tarentines for more aid, he departed again into Italy, being opposed to in his passage by the Carthaginians on the Sea, and that he lost most of his Ships, and so much after he had landed by the Mamertines (who had before waived over one thousand men) that with much ado he got safe to Tarentum.

The Syraculans as Soldiers created two Magistrates, Artemidorus and Hiero.

Hiero being Gile Magistrate falls upon the Mamertines.

27. After the departure of Pyrhus, the Soldiers which quartered in the Towns near to Syracuse, beyond all example, created two Magistrates out of their own body, Artemidorus and Hiero, to the great indignation of the People, which took it in disdain that their privilege should be thus usurped by the Army. Yet afterwards did they confirm the honour unto Hiero for his great moderation and high abilities, who being the Son of Hierocles, had strange prefaces whilst yet a Child concerning his future Dignity. He perceiving how in the absence of the Pretor, the Syraculans were apt to be seditious, and attempt new matters, entered into affinity with Leptines (by marrying his daughter) whom he knew to be the most considerable man, and of great Authority amongst the vulgar, that he might supply his place as it were in his absence, and contain the people in obedience. After this marriage was over, taking notice of the loose Carriage of the old Mercenary Soldiers, and how they were ever inclining to mutines, he drew them out against the Mamertines, who being Barbarians (as the Greeks always termed all besides themselves) had seized upon Messene, and dividing them from the rest, which he kept with himself, exposed them against the Enemies, and suffered them every man to be cut off, so that being rid of them, he thenceforth Governed without any fear or trouble. Three or four years after he set upon the Mamertines in good earnest, who though they bare themselves high so long as their friends and associates continued Masters of Rhegium (created much trouble to the Carthaginians, and compelled divers Towns to pay Tribute) yet now since the defeat of them, and especially after that Hiero had got into his power two places near unto them, they were exceedingly strained.

28. Yet sent they out against him eight thousand Foot, and one thousand Horse under the Conduct of one Cios, who calling the Soothsayers to divine what the issue should be, they answered, that he was to spend the next night in the Enemies Camp, at which being much elevated, he set his men in order, and passed over the River. Hiero sent two thousand choice Messenians, and five hundred others, to get about the Hill Thorax, and come upon their backs, he in the mean time charging their front. Here was maintained a sharp dispute, till the seven hundred fresh men coming upon the backs of the Mamertines, did great execution upon them, so that being now compassed about, they betook themselves to flight. Cios the General fighting most valiantly, received fo many and great wounds that he swooned with too great expence of blood, and being taken alive, was brought into the Camp of the Syracusians, where all means possible were used for his recovery. But it happening that divers Horse being brought out of the Field, he espied that on which his Son rode amongst them; whereat taking an apprehension of the young mans death, in great trouble of mind he untied his wounds, and thereby caused his own end, as unwilling to outlive his son.

29. The Mamertines upon the news of this defeat were minded to give up themselves, and their City, into the hands of Hiero. But it hapning that Hannibal the Carthaginian General, being at that time in the Island Lipara, heard of the overthrow, and came over presently to congratulate Hiero, as he pretended, but indeed to circumvent him with his General craft in which he was well skilled; and Hiero was so wrought upon as to give credit to him, and lye still. Then went he to the Mamertines, and finding them ready to surrender, turned them clearly from it, and drew them to his own interest, by bringing them relief into the City. Hiero returning to Syracuse, was for a reward of his great service saluted King by the consent of all men, which title he held to his last, the space of fifty four years. Hannibal cunningly placed his Garrison in the Castle, and thereby awed the whole Town, so that the Mamertines then suspected him as much as Hiero, and they hindring thus each other from gaining the place, at length made an accord to carry on the War against it in common. This combination causing the other to bethink themselves of some foreign aid, they sent to the Romans, desiring them to take the patronage of them, their own Countrey-men, as being Originally Campanians.

30. The Message found no good entertainment with the Senate, for that the Fathers accounted it an absurd thing for them, who had punished the perfidiousness of those that had seized upon Regium so sharply, now to take upon them to protect those that were guilty, and patterns of the same Crime; and they could by no means be brought to consent unto it. But the people (who alone could do it) being perswaded by the Prætor that it was high time to stop the proceedings of the Carthaginians, who had almost swallowed up all Sicily, and would use that Island as a Bridge to pass over into Italy, and being also made to believe how profitable it would be to their particular interests to undertake the War, having suffered much by that late one with Pyrrhus, and the Tarentines, they decreed that aid should be sent them. The next year was Appius Claudius accordingly sent over with an Army, with which he put to the worst, both Hiero and Hannibal, and thereupon constrained the other to joyn himself to him against the Carthaginians. This is called the Sicilian, or the first Punic War, which for that it falls into the History of the Romans more especially, under whom thenceforth Sicily was ever subject, it must necessarily be referred thither, as to its proper place. It began A.M. 3741. the first of the 129 Olympiads, in the 19th of the Reign of Antiochus Soter, the second King of Syria, and the twenty first of Pholomey Philadelphus, the second also of Egypt, after the division of the Empire of Alexander the Great; twenty two years after the death of Agathocles, in the 49th year after the building of Rome, Appius Claudius Caudex, and M. Fulvius Flaccus, being Consuls.

SECT. I.

From the War of Privernum to the first Punic War, wherein the Romans first set foot out of Italy, Containing the space of sixty six years.

Was decreed against the Paleopolitans.

1. IN the year after the taking of Privernum was War decreed against the Paleopolitans. Paleopolis stood not far off from the place where Neapolis (now Napoli or Naples) is seated, and, as some think, there where at this day, is seen il borgo de Chiara. The same people inhabited two Cities, being descended from Cume, which was also a Colony of Eubæis in Eubæa, now called Negropont. For the Cumani having a good Fleet first passed to the Islands Menaria and Pitheculæ, and afterward ventured upon the Continent. The Paleopolitans trusting to their own strength, and counting of the treachery of the Sannites, and the plague which now had seized upon Rome, committed many Hostile actions against the Romans that inhabited the Countreys about Cume and Falerne. When L. Cornelius Lentulus, and Q. Publius Philo were both Consuls the second time, the Feciales were sent to demand restitution, who bringing from those Greeks (more valiant in tongue, saith Livy than in deeds) a fiery and resolute answer, it was resolved that War should be made upon them.

Alexandria in Egypt, when built.

2. Whilest this War depended, the year following was Alexandria in Egypt built, as Livy writeth, whereas the foundation of this City was laid, while Alexander was in Africk, the year before the death of Darius, and the fifth before this, wherein C. Petilius and L. Papirius Mægilanus were Consuls. This same year he maketh Alexander the King of Epirus to have been slain, who being Uncle by the Mothers side to Alexander the Great, is thought to have undertaken an expedition into Italy, out of emulation towards his Nephew, that as the one was now Conquering the East, so the other might endeavour to subdue the West, having no less matter to work upon in Italy, Africk, and Sicily, than the other found in Asia and Perfia. He was deceived by the Oracle of Jupiter of Dodona, which bidding him beware of Pandofia and Acheron, he knowing there was a City of the former name in Epirus, and a River of the later, thought himself to much the safer, as he could get farthest off from these. Being therefore sent for by the Tarentines, he came into Italy, and made War with the Bruttii and Lucani, from whom he took many Towns, and three hundred Familier, which he sent as Hostages into Epirus. He entered into a League with the Metapontini and Romani: But the Bruttii and Lucani recruiting themselves by the supplies of their neighbours, reinforced the War, and set upon him near Pandofia (a Town situate a little above Consuntia, the Metropolis of the Bruttii) near to which ran a River called Acheron. Taking this River with his Horse, he was therein slain by a Lucanian; and his dead body being carried down the stream into the Enemies quarters was mangled into pieces. A certain Woman whose Husband and Children were taken, prisoners by the Epirotes, got the pieces together, and in exchange for her relations sent his bones to Metapontus, whence they were conveyed into Epirus unto Cleopatra his Wife, and Olympius his Sister, whereof the one was Sister, and the other Mother to Alexander the Great.

3. The Paleopolitans though assisted by the Sannites and Tarentines, were over-matched so, as glad they were to yield up their City, and the Sannites lost three

Sect. 1. of their own Towns. The Tarentines yet proceeded, and drew both the Samnites and Neapolitans (the other part of this Greek Colony) afresh into the War, where in also the Inhabitants of Veſtini, together with their allies engaged themselves. Whilst this War was but beginning, great first happened in the City. There, one L. Papyrius had given up himself to one C. Publius as a slave, to work out his Father's debt. Being a young man of a beautiful body, Publius attempted filthily to abuse him, and when he would in no wise suffer this, most grievously beat and tore his body with rods. In this plight Papyrius got away, and running to the People, by declaring his condition, so affected them, that they procured the Fathers to decree, that the Consuls should propose to them in the Comitia these two Laws: the first, That no man should be detained in bonds, except for some misdemeanor, till the time of his punishment: the second, that the money and goods, not the body of the debtor should be responsible. Whereupon all Prisoners for debt were forthwith set at liberty. The year following the Veſtini were overthrown by Junius Brutus Scævus, the Consul, who also took from them two Towns. His Colleague L. Furius Caninius being sick in Samnium (or the Country of the Samnites) pronounced Dictator L. Papyrius Cursor, the most famous Captain by far of those times, who named Q. Fabius Rutilianus for his Master of Horse-men. Papyrius being in Camp against the Samnites, was forced to return to Rome, for the renewing of his auspices, and at his departure commanded his Master of Horse-men not to stir out of the Trenches to fight one stroke till he came back: but Fabius understanding that a notable advantage of doing something of consequence was presented from the Enemy, fell upon the Samnites, and made great slaughter of them. The Dictator hearing of this, in a great rage returned to the Camp, and had put him to death, but that he was rescued by the Army, from which flying to the City, Papyrius followed him, and pressing fore to the Senate the necessity of discipline and authority, would not at all give way to the entreaties of the Fathers. This forced M. Fabius the Father of the party to appeal to the People and their Tribunes, by which he hardly was drawn to pardon him, though his authority was tried together with the life of Fabius, through the intricacies of those who might justly have Commanded it, so was confuted by himself.

Desire Peace which is denied them.

The Samnites having the Roman Armies at this advantage, sent to Herennius the Father of Pontius their General, and a very wise man, for his advice what was to be done. He sent word they should dismiss the Romans without any injury at all, which answer not pleasing, they sent back for another, and then he counselled them to cut them off, and not leave a man alive. These two extremes being being alcribed to dotage, he came to the Camp, and offered his reasons. He said, he gave the first advice as such, which if followed, would by a great course have for ever obliged a most powerful People, and the second, as tending so far to the weakening of their power, as they could not for a long time either recruit themselves or renew the War, having lost two so considerable Armies; as for any third expedient he found none. Being asked concerning a middle way of dismissing the Romans in safety, but under the obligation of some conditions, he answered, that this course would not procure them friends, nor diminish their enemies; for such was the Roman Nation, that being disgraced or defeated, it could not rest, but would still retain the memory of what present necessity urged it to submit to; neither, such he, will they suffer you to rest till punished abundantly. But this wise counsel would not be heard; so that the Romans had these conditions set them: The Army was to march away only with their clothes, having first in token of slavery passed under the yugum: the Romans should quit wholly the Country of the Samnites, and thence remove their Colonies: and both Roman and Samnite live under the same terms of confederacy and alliance. The Armies were constrained to submit, and in great shame and consternation marched away disarmed. This disaster hapned in the four hundred thirty third year of the City, and the third after the death of Alexander the Great, when T. Veturius Calvinus the first, and Sp. Posthumus the second time were Consuls.

Make it disgracefully pass under the yugum, and march away disarmed.

The conditions were remonstrated at, and the Samnites again defeated.

The Priesthood and Augurship communicated to the Commons.

6. The City was most grievously afflicted with shame and anger at so disgraceful and unusual a thing. Posthumus perswaded the Senate to deliver himself and his Colleague into the hands of the Samnites, as being only obliged to the conditions, and not the State, which was unacquainted therewith. This being accordingly done, Pontius refused to receive them, exclaiming against the perfidiousness of the Romans. The Army then marching down again sufficiently revenged themselves, under the conduct of Papyrius. Several Towns which had revolted were recovered, and scarce could the Samnites obtain a Truce for two years. They brake this Truce ere the time was out, and thereby drew the War again upon them, which enduring for eleven years, they lost many thousands of men, with many Towns, which humbled them so, that upon their submission the usual confederacy was granted to them. Then were the Æqui chastized, who had helped them, and thereby were other Nations affrighted into subjection. In the second year after, began another War with the Hetruscans, wherein were fought divers bloody battles; but still the Romans had the better, who stormed divers Towns, and wasted the Country. Two years after, the Samnites rebelled again, and joined with the Hetruscans, but with the same success as formerly, being grievously slaughtered, especially under the conduct of Q. Fabius Maximus, and Decius Mus; the latter of whom, seeing his wing give ground, in a great and bloody battle fought with the Samnites and Gauls (for those now had joined with them) solemnly devoted himself and the Enemy to the Dix Mans, and rushing into the midst was killed, as his Father had been forty four years before. Still continued the miseries of the Samnites, and two years after their last Army (for this time it must be understood) was cut in pieces by L. Papyrius son to the former, who also took many Towns, and for his service obtained a most splendid Triumph. It is observed, that over the Samnites the Romans triumphed thirty times: viz. Consuls twenty six times; L. Papyrius the Dictator twice, Publius Philo once, who first of all others triumphed with Proconsular power, and once Q. Fabius another Proconsul. The Family of the Fabii obtained, of these thirty, four triumphs, and that of the Papirii five, as may be seen in the Capitoline Tables. This war having begun in the 410 year of the City, ended in the 481, and therefore continued 71 years, not fifty only, as L. Varro, according to his custom, falsely computeth; neither 81 as Appian, nor 49 only, as Entropius; nor yet only seventy, which number L. Varro assigns with tolerable difference. All Writers agree, that the Romans had no Enemy in Italy, who longer, or more pertinaciously, managed the grand quarrel with them, than the Samnites.

7. During these successes abroad, the People having got of late so many privileges, were remarkably quiet; yet their Tribunes having one occasion left to create trouble to the Fathers, stomached much that all the Priests and Augurs should be created out of the Nobility, and laboured to make the Commons partakers of these Offices. The Senate made no great resistance, as being now accustomed to yield; and that in things of far greater moment as the Comitia, Censures, Electures, Triumphs, and Triumphs. So, whereas as yet there were but four chief Priests, and as many Augurs,

Sect. 1.

The Law of Appeal renewed the third time.

Angus, to them were added four, and to those five out of the body of the Commons. And this same year did M. Valerius the Consul prefer a Law of Appeal more diligently enacted. Now was it the third time preferred since the banishment of the Kings, always by the same Family. The cause of renewing it, faith Livy, I suppose was no other, than that the power of a few prevailed above the liberty of the Commons. Which cannot be, if we consider, how for a long time the will of the multitude had got ground, and before this overturned the prerogative of the Patricians. The Lex Porcia, faith he, seemeth alone to be enacted for the backs of the Citizens, because it inflicted an heavy punishment upon him that should beat with rods or kill a Roman Citizen. The Lex Valeria having prohibited any to be killed or beaten who had appealed, if any did contrary, added no more than it was naughtily done, which (such was then the modesty of men) was I believe, a sufficient obligation for the Law. Now scarcely can any one threaten a Slave in that manner. Fabius Gurgus after this, being Consul, fought unpropertiously with the Samnites, whereupon the Senate consulted about removing him from the Army. Fabius Maximus his Father deprecating this ignominy, prevented it, by promising he would go to the War as Legatus or Lieutenant to his Son. He performed it, and so assisted the young man, that he procured him Victory, and a Triumph, wherein C. Pontius the Samnite being led was put to death. After this, L. Posthumus a man of Consular dignity, being set over the Army, used the help of the Soldiers in his own field, and for that was punished. The Samnites desiring Peace, the League was renewed with them the fourth time. But presently again, as it seemeth, they rebelled; for P. Cornelius Rufinus, and Manius Curtius (named Dentatus, because born with teeth, according to Plinie) overthrew them in several bloody battels, and took divers of their Towns. Livy in his eleventh Book (as appeareth from it's Epitome) wrote, that Curius Dentatus the Consul, having overthrown the Samnites and Sabinus, who had rebelled, triumphed twice the same year. After this were Colonies sent to Castrum, Sena, and Adria. The Triumviri for Capital matters were now also first made. The Centus being perfected, the Law Curia was made, and two hundred and seventy three thousand Polls of the Roman Citizens were cessed.

8. Presently after happened the third separation of the Commons from the Patricians. The cause was the great debts which the poorer sort had contracted. As a remedy for this the Tribunes of the Commons, those incendiaries, proposed new Tables in way of defalcation, which the Consuls in favour of the Creditors opposed. The contest came to that height, that the Plebeians departed into the Janiculum, for the reconciliation and redumption of whom, Q. Hortensius was made Dictator. He appeased them with good words, and persuaded them to return, by promising that for the time to come their Plebisfeta should have the force of Laws, and bind the whole polittick body. This accordingly, by a Law called Lex Hortensia, he enacted: though it appeareth out of Livy, that the same in effect had been granted twice before, viz. in the three hundred and fifth year of the City, by L. Valerius, and M. Horatius the Consuls, and again in the four hundred and sixteenth by Q. Publus Philo the Dictator, fifty years before this present, which having not been observed, might give the Commons as great distaste as the matter of debts, if we may judge from that which pacified them. * Florus telleth a story, that the business of Matrimony betwixt the Patricians and Plebeians caused this third separation of the Commons into the Janiculum, the tumult being raised by Cannuleius the Tribune. But students are to take notice, that none but he speak any thing of this Sedition in this place, and by the instigation of this person, for this cause of marriage. That great Contentions were raised betwixt the two orders about the taking away the Law made by the Decemviri, which forbade marriage betwixt them, is often attested by Livy. But that the Commons departed into the Janiculum for the burden of their debts, after great and long contentions in the four hundred and sixty eight year of the City, is by several Authors affirmed, and that thence they were reduced by Hortensius the Dictator, who preferred a Law in the Esquelineum, that what the Commons commanded should bind all Quirites: neither do Writers mention any other cause of the third Separation.

9. Hortensius died in the time of his Magistracy. After this there was action with the Volsinenses and Lucani, against whom assistance was given to the Thurini. Then the Roman Ambassadors being killed by the Galls Senones, War was decreed against them, and L. Cecilius the Prator was cut off by them with the Legions. The Tarentines being jealous of the growth of the Roman power, had hitherto privily privily favoured the Samnites, though openly they maintained a confederacy with the Lucanians. This People, being the offspring of the Parthenia, who were banished Lacedemon, for that being promiscuously begotten, they could not have any inheritance, and therefore plotted against the State as was shewn before, inhabited a Citie called Tarentum, from Tarus a certain Heroe; the Metropolis once of Calabria, Apulia, and all Lucania. It was situate in a Peninsula on the Bay of the Adriatick Sea, famous for its bigness, Walls, and Haven especially, which lay so convenient for laying into the Roman Coasts; Illyria, Illyricum, Epirus, Achaia, Africa, and Sicily, that Florus accounteth the situation admirable. The Tarentines affecting loose Democratical Government, obtained great power in those parts, having a more considerable Fleet than any of their neighbours, thirty thousand Foot, three thousand Horse, and one thousand persons fit to command them. They embraced the Philosophy of Pythagoras; especially one Archytas, who governed the Citie a long time. In aftertimes luxury was produced by prosperity to such excess, that if credit may be given to Strabo, the Tarentines had more publick Festivals yearly, than the year hath dayes; by reason whereof, the State of the Commons wealth under such a Government was rendered much worse. One of their bad customs was (as he judgeth it) to use the Conduct of Forcemen in their Wars; for against the Messapii and Lucani they employed Alexander the Molossian, and before that Archidamus the Son of Agellus, as afterward Cleonymus and Agathocles; and afterwards Pyrrhus against the Romans. They contended with the Messapii about Heraclea, and employed also against them the two Kings of the Darii and Pencetii. Neither would they obey the foreign Captains for whom they had sent, but fell to odds with them which procured no small inconvenience.

10. Near to the Haven, in the view of the Sea, was the Theatre of the City, which proved the cause of all its misery and calamities, faith Florus. They were therein beholding Games, when L. Valerius the Dumovir as he is called in Livy's Epitome or one of the Roman Admirals layed thither as to a confederate Citie. They taking the Romans for Enemies, faith Florus (who addeth what cannot be credited, that they scarce knew, who, or whence the Romans were) or so others think, having both knowledge and malice sufficient, set upon the Fleet, and either sunk, or at least rifled it, and slew the Admiral. The Senate sent L. Posthumus to complain of the injury, who delivering his message boldly was dismissed with a very dissatisfactory answer, at his coming in, having said * Urine thrown upon him, or one of his Companions. War therefore was decreed against the Tarentines, and committed to the management of L. Emilius the Consul, who first indeavoured by fair means to reclaim them, and when that could not do it, wasted their Territories with Fire and Sword, revenging their insolence with cruelty as Orosius writeth, for which service he triumphed the year after his Consulship, as appeareth out of an old inscription. The Tarentines finding themselves too weak for the encounter, sent to Pyrrhus King of Epirus for aid, whom they had formerly assisted against the Corcyraens. The multitude were of themselves rather inclined to peace, but a certain company of men, by Greek Authors called Demagogi (from their leading of the People) would not let them rest, till they had resolved upon the War; whereupon they sent Ambassadors to Pyrrhus, who not only in their name, but of other Italians also presented him with gifts, and signified that they stood in need of a General, Eminent both for abilities and reputation; Italy it self being able to furnish them with Forces out of the Countreys of the Lucanians, Messapians, and Samnites. The King being of a restless spirit, encouraging himself in vain hopes (whereby he grasped as it were the Empire of all the West) promised them to come over with an Army, and dispatched before him with three thousand men, One Cineas a Thessalian, an excellent Orator, and Scholar of Demosthenes. He afterwards took the Sea himself with twenty Elephants, three thousand Horse, and twenty two Foot, besides five hundred Archers and Slingers; but upon the Main was seized with such a Tempest, that his Fleet being fevered, many Vessels were lost, he was forced to leap out into the Water, and with great hazard got to Land, and only at present two Elephants, a very few Horse-men, and about two thousand Foot could be recovered from the Shipwrack by the Messapians; upon the Coasts of whom they were cast.

11. Pyrrhus did nothing without the consent of the Tarentines, till his Ships, and the greater part of his Army arrived; then taking notice how they minded nothing but bathing and feasting, he shut up the publick meeting places, restrained them

Sect. 1. War against the Romans, for which he had been called, or clearly quitting the Country of Tarentum, to leave the City in that condition wherein he found it: But returning them no pleasant answer, he bade them stay his time, and so departed, after he had carried on the War in Italy two years and four months. For the following year, P. Cornelius Rufinus, and C. Julius Brutus, both the second time, were Consuls. Rufinus was a man very expert in War, but extraordinarily covetous and scraping, insomuch that upon this account he was much hated by Fabius, formerly mentioned. Yet, when this year he stood for the Consulship, for that it was a very dangerous time, and his competitors were persons of no value, Fabius laboured earnestly to have him elected, and when every one wondered at it; either to his friends, or, as Cicero writeth, to Rufinus himself, giving him thanks, he answered: Admī compituri quam exire, I desired rather to be pilled than sold.

with difficulty.

15. Pyrrhus having found things in Sicily according to his mind, proceeded in his enterprize with as much satisfaction, till growing tyrannical, he incurred the hatred of those that employed him, part of whom revolted to the Carthaginians, and others brook themselves to the aid of the Mamertines. Perceiving at length that he was involved in the deep hatred of all, and nothing throughout the Island but revolts, new councils and a strong conspiracy against him, he received Letters from the Sammites and Tarentines, who being shut up in their Towns, which they hardly maintained, desired his assistance. He was glad of so specious a pretence, that he might not seem to be driven by desperation out of Sicily, which indeed as a perishing Vessel in so great a Tempest he was not able to govern, and so returned into Italy, after he had been absent near as long as formerly he had there continued. The Barbarians set upon him in his passage, and the Carthaginians so distressed him in the Straights, that he lost many of his Ships. The Mamertines having landed, to the number of ten thousand men before him, would not adventure to fight with him, but distressed his Army much in narrow and difficult places, killing two Elephants and many Men in the rear. He himself fighting in the front with a valiant and skilful Enemy, received a hurt in his head, whereupon he withdrew himself a little. This so animated the Mamertines, that one of them, great in bulk, and glittering with armour, came out far before the rest, and in a threatening manner bade Pyrrhus come forth if he were alive. Pyrrhus enraged with his guard, bloody as he was, and with a terrible countenance rushed through the midst, and coming up to the Barbarian, struck him with such fury upon the head, that the stroke through the Swords metal and the strength of the arm, pierced to the lower part of the body, so that in a moment it was chined down in the middle, and the two parts fell down on either side. The Barbarians astonished hereat, left off their attempts, and so without further interruption he marched with twenty thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse to Tarentum, where increasing his Forces by new levies, he proceeded into Samnium against the Romans, who there lay camped.

He is defeated by Corvus
the Consul.

16. Few of the Sammites joyned now with him, because being so often overthrown by the Romans, their courage was wholly broken, and for that they were displeased with him for his going into Sicily. He divided his Forces into two parts, whereof one he sent against L. Cornelius Lentulus into Lucania to hinder him from joyning with his Collague M. Curius Dentatus the other Consul, against whom he marched, then lying in a fortified place near Beneventum. Halting to set upon him ere the other could come to his relief, with the most valiant of his men, and fiercest of his Elephants picked out, he marched by night towards his Camp, but passing through Woods his lights failed him, and going out of his way he lost his time to much, that at break of day the Romans discovered him upon the Hills. Curius then in haste, as he could, drew out his Forces, and filling upon the vanguard of Pyrrhus put it to flight, killing many men, and taking home Elephants. Animated by this success, he descended into the Plain, and there joyned battle with the whole Army. In one wing he beat back the Enemy, in the other by the violence of the beasts was born back to his Camp, whence calling forth those who kept the guard, they from high places so plied the Elephants with darts, that they forced them back upon their own friends, whom bearing down, and breaking their ranks, they thereby procured Victory to the Romans. Florus and Orosius, contrary to what Plutarch reporteth of Beneventum (concerning which place Learned men are much doubt) make the battle to have been fought in Lucania in the Apulian Plains. Florus writeth, that the cause of the Victory was a young Elephants being wounded in the head, which turning back and roaring for the pain, the Dam hearing him, ran as to his relief, and so both of them disordered the battle, the overturning as Enemies all the met. Orosius saith, that the beasts were thus disordered by bundles of hemp besmeared with pitch, which having hooks in them and set on fire, the Romans cast upon their backs, and the Towers set thereon. Frontinus maketh the battle fought about Faventum, in the Arusinian Plains. Eutropius is silent concerning the place; but writeth, that Curius Dentatus beat Pyrrhus back to Tarentum, slew twenty three thousand of his men, and led the first of all others, Elephants (four in number) in triumph to Rome; which beasts the Romans called Luca boves, because they were first brought out of Lucania, where Pyrrhus was overthrown: This maketh much against that place which Plutarch assigneth for the battle, the original of whose error seemeth a mistaking of Beneventum for Faventum, or Statuentum, a City of Lucania.

16. This Victory, saith Plutarch, made way for the establishment of the Roman Empire: for the Romans got such courage and reputation by this success, that being counted invincible, they presently obtained all Italy, and not long after, Sicily also. As for Pyrrhus, he having spent six years, and fall'n from his hopes both in Italy and Sicily, returned into Epirus, yet with a mind nothing daunted. He was thought the Ablest Captain of all the Kings of that time, both for military skill, and personal valour; but what he had already obtained, he lost still by striving to grasp more. Therefore Antigonus compared him to a Gameller, who having lucky hits, knew not how to use them. (a) Having sent to the Kings of Asia, and Antigonus especially, for men and money, after he had received bare Letters, he called the Epirats and Tarentines together, and told them, that presently assistance would come, which report being carried unto the Roman Camp, the Consul durst not stir, and so taking this advantage, the night following, he passed over unmolested into Epirus (b) Curius the Consul having taken his Camp, touched nothing of the plunder; and whereas the Senate gave seven Acres of ground apiece to the people, and five hundred to him, he would not exceed the common proportion. This year, C. Fabricius Lusitinus and Q. Aemilius Papus, much (c) commended for their poverty, being Consors, (d) removed P. Cornelius Rufinus, who had been twice Consul and once Dictator, from the Senate, because they had found in his house of plate for the service of his table ten pounds; this being against a Law, as (e) Plutarch hinteth. At this Lustrum were censed two hundred seventy one thousand two hundred and twenty four polls of Roman Citizens, as appeareth from the Epitome of the fourteenth Book of Livius History.

17. The Roman name had begun to be famous before, but was terrible after the overthrow of Pyrrhus. In the second year after his flight, (a) Philo Philadelphus sent Ambassadors to congratulate with the Romans about their success, and to enter into confederacy with them. They sent, to do him honour, Ambassadors also to Alexandria, where he received them most courteously, and sent them back loaded with gifts. At their return they brought the gifts, though given to themselves in particular, into the Treasury; but the Senate commanded them to be restored. In the third year after the departure of Pyrrhus, the (b) Tarentines, being neither able to drive out the Garrison he had there left under Milo, nor procure Peace of the Romans, desired aid of the Carthaginians, whereby giving the Romans battle, they were overthrown. Milo sensible how badly he was able to resist, by leave from the Consul Papirius, departed with his men, and left the Castle, which the Romans having got into their hands, easily mastered the City, the walls whereof they demolished. Peace and liberty was granted to the Citizens, and the two Consuls L. Papirius Cursor, and Sp. Cornelius Maximus (both Consuls the second time) triumphed, having finished both the Tarentine War and that of the Sammites in the four hundred and eighty first (or the four hundred and eighty second) year of the City, as the Capitoline tables do shew. The greatest part of Italy was now conquered, an accession being made not only of the Tarentines and Sammites, but the Lucanians also, and a little before of the Etruscans. After this, the (c) Campanian Legion, which without command had seized upon Rhegium was belleged, and upon surrender was put to death. The Inhabitants of Apollonia in Illyricum sending Ambassadors to Rome, the two Ædiles Q. Fabius and Cn. Apronius beat them; and for that they delivered up to the Apollonians. The Picentes were overcome and had peace given them. Colonies were sent forth to

About the same time was silver Coin first stamped at Rome, brass being used altogether till now, the State having got much silver in a Cattle of the Samnites, as Xenaras writeth. This hapned five years before the first Punic War, as (2) Pliny computeth, C. Fabius Pictor, and Q. O-gulnius Gallus being Consuls, in the fourteenth year of Antiochus Soter, and the thirteenth of Pholomy Philadelphus, A. M. 3736, two hundred and sixty seven years before the birth of Christ.

SECT. II.

From the First Punic War, to that with Antiochus the Great, in which the Romans first invaded Asia, the space of thirty seven years.

1. The Umbri and Sallentini being newly subdued, and the number of Que-stors being increased to eight, the Romans took occasion to transfer their Armies over the Sea into Sicily, and begun that, which from the Island (that gave both occasion to, and was the seat of, it) is by Greek Writers called the Sicilian War. There had the Mamertines most perfidiously seized on Messana, as is already related, and thereupon were become Enemies to Hieron King of Syracuse, who befieged them justly as thieves and murderers, and had taken the City, but that Antibal the Carthaginian cunningly diverted him, with an intention to get it into his own hands, as it came to pass; for pretending fair things to the Mamertines, as before to Hiero, and fending them in provisions, he possessed himself of the Castle. They being thus cheated by him, and now straightened by both, who had joyned together against them, betook themselves to the Romans for relief. The Senate began to be very sensible of the power of the Carthaginians, who had now almost the whole Island in their hands, and was jealous of their approach so near to Italy; so that a just quarrel with them seemed very acceptable. But so bad was the cause of the Mamertines, as they could not in conscience undertake the patronage of it, and gave them a denial. From the Senate the thing was brought to the People, which besides it's antient use to debate matters concerning War, had by the Hortensian Law obtained power by it's Plébiscite to bind the whole State. The Pretors shewed what great profit would redound to the Commonwealth in general, and particularly to private Citizens (who having suffered much by the late Indian Wars, were desirous by a new one to recruit their fortunes) and therefore by a Plébiscite they decreed aid to be sent to the Mamertines, in the fourth hundred and eighty ninth year of the City, Q. Fabius Maximus Gurgus the third time, and L. Vilius Vitellus being Consuls.

2. In the year following, and the Consulship of Appius Claudius Caudex, and M. Fulvius Flaccus, Appius was sent over with an Army to Messana, to execute the commands of the People. He first defeated Hiero, then the Carthaginians, and so raised the siege. The succeeding Consuls Manius Oflacilius and M. Valerius Maximus, were ordered both, and with all the Legions, to pass into Sicily, wherewith Hiero was affrighted into obedience, perceiving that the Romans were most likely to remain Victors, and made his Peace upon these terms, To restore all their prisoners without ransom, and pay one hundred Talents of Silver. The Romans embraced his friendship the more readily, for that the Carthaginians being masters at Sea, they could not well send over provisions, which they hoped might be supplied by him in good measure. They also by this alliance thought themselves eased of the burden of War, and therefore the next year they sent over but two Legions. Valerius the Consul from Messana had the surname of Messala, who also having taken Catana, carried thence a new Sun-Dial to Rome, Papirius Cursor having thirty years before set up the first that ever was in that City. This though not perfect, the People used ninety nine years, till M. Philippus their Consul set up a perfect one by it, and about the same time Scipio Nasica being Consul, first divided the equal division of the day into hours, by water dropping out of one vessel into another. This Pliny relateth out of Varro, who also reported, that out of Sicily the first Barbers were brought to Rome by P. Ticinius Mens, about the four hundred and fifty fourth year of the City, before which time the Romans never cut their hair. The first that that was thaven every day was Scipio Africanus, whom Augustus imitated therein; none more using the Razor than he.

3. The next year was Aggrigentum taken after a long siege; Hannibal who came to raise it being overthrown by L. Posthumius and Q. Mamilius the Consuls. The news whereof filled Rome with excessive joy, and the Citizens now elevated in mind, would not acquiesce in former Councils. It seemed not sufficient to them, that they had saved the Mamertines, nor enriched themselves with great booty; but conceiving good hope that they might be able to call the Carthaginians out of Sicily, and much thereby promote their affairs, they thitherto directed their thoughts and consultations. On Land indeed they seemed sufficiently to prosper, for L. Valerius and T. Oflacilius the succeeding Consuls, managed the War very well; but the Carthaginians without controversy being Masters at Sea, thereby procured the Maritime Towns to revolt to them, so that the War was poised betwixt the two interests, now inclining to one side, and then presently to the other. Moreover Italy was often molested by the Carthaginian Fleet; but Africa out of all danger. Wherefore they concluded, there was necessity of betaking themselves also to Sea matters. Having never as much as thought of the Sea before, they now set upon building of one hundred Quinquereemes and twenty Triemes, a thing most difficult, because the Carpenters were utterly to seek how to make the former sort of Gallies, their use being utterly unknown to the Italians. But before they had made tryal, when they first transported their Forces to Messana, they ventured to fight with the Carthaginians, who had received the Dominion of the Sea, without any competition from their Ancestors; which boldness and confidence Polybius esteemeth no less than miraculous. First of all Cn. Cornelius the Consul and Admiral, going with seven Vessels to reduce a Town of the Lipareans, was taken in the Haven by one sent from Hannibal. But Dulius his Collegue presently after gave the Carthaginians a great overthrow, the Souldiers having provided iron hooks, by the help of which they could board them and fight as on Land. The Romans hereby extraordinarily animated, relieved the Aggrigens, and took Macella a certain Town by storm. But Amilcar Captain of the Carthaginian Land-Forces then lying at Pen-norum, understanding that in the Roman Camp there was a mutiny, for that the Auxiliaries and Legions contended who should have the first place in battel; and that the former had separated themselves, he suddenly fell upon them in their removal, and killed almost four thousand men. Hannibal after this loss at Sea departed to Carthage, where recruiting his Naval Forces he went into Sardinia, and being blocked up in a port by the Romans, lost many ships, and for that was crucified by the Souldiers, who overlied the defeat. The punishment which he feared for the former overthrow he craftily evaded; for, before the thing was heard at Carthage, he sent one of his friends thither, who coming to the Court, told the Senate that the Roman Admiral was come with a great Fleet, and therefore he was come to ask their advice whether he should fight him. All the Senate answered, there was no doubt but he ought, to which the messenger replied, he hath fought and is overthrown. By this means he hindered them from condemning that fact, which before they had judged that it ought to be done.

4. Now had the Romans passed both into Sardinia and Corfica; Divine Providence as Cassiodorus noteth upon Polybius, so ordering it, that present success should dispose their minds for such future undertakings, as made way for their decreed Empire. (2) Hanno, the year following, being in Sardinia was slain, and his Army cut off by L. Cornelius Scipio the Consul. The next, many Towns were lost and taken in Sicily on both sides. But (2) Calpurnius Flenma a Roman Tribune (or Leader of a Legion) gave a great demonstration of his valour. For A. Attilius Calatinus the Consul, having rashly brought the Army into such straits, out of which there was no possibility to extricate himself, he with three hundred men took an hill near adjoining, and drew thereby the Carthaginians to himself, till the Army could pass through without opposition. All the three hundred were slain, yet he barely wounded and covered with dead bodies survived, being by Roman Writers compared, for this act, to Leonidas the Spartan. This story is twice told by Julius Frontinus, who acquainteth us with the uncertainty of the mans name, some calling him Lutarius, others Q. C. Aditus, but most Calpurnius Flenma. The following year, C. Attilius Regulus the Consul subdued the Islands Lipara and Melita, whereof the late is ennobled by the ship-wreck of St. Paul, lying betwixt Sicily and Africa. Polybius writeth, that first Regulus was worsted at Sea, and then he defeated the Carthaginians. Now the Romans resolved to change the seat of the War

SECT. 2. War into Africk, and the next year sent a Fleet under command of the Consuls M. Attilius Regulus (who was substituted in the place of Cæditi) and P. Manlius, containing three hundred and thirty long and covered ships. The Carthaginians sensible enough how concerned they were to keep the War from their own doors, opposed them with three hundred and fifty Vessels, and a threefold battle was fought, on the same day, in which the Romans remained Victors, having taken sixty four ships with the defendants, and sunk thirty, and of their own lost twenty four, but not with the men; for the Carthaginians fearing their Corvi or Iron hooks, were afraid to come near them. Repairing then the ships they had taken, they passed over into Africk, and had surrendered to them Clupea a City seated upon the Promontory Hernæa. This done, they sent to the Senate for further orders, employing themselves, till the return of the messengers, in wasting the Country, which they did without interruption. At length they received the resolution of the Senate, which was, that one of them should continue in Africk, with a convenient Army, and the other return to Rome with the remaining Forces.

5. (a) M. Attilius Regulus remained in Africk with forty ships, fifteen thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse. Pitching his Camp upon the River Bragada, or Bagrada, he was forced to make (b) War with a Serpent of miraculous bigness, which with the great trouble of his whole Army, and use of Engines for battery, at length he slew, and sent its skin, one hundred and twenty Foot long, to Rome.

The History hereof was curiously and elegantly related by Livæ, as (c) Valerius telleth us. After this, (d) the Consul gave the Carthaginians a defeat, fighting in such a place where their Horse and Elephants could do them no service, and then took Tunetum or Tunis. But not long after he was overthrown himself, taken prisoner, and almost his whole Army lost; this Victory being got for the Carthaginians by Xanthippus, the Lacedæmonian, whom afterwards sending honourably home as they pretended, they commanded those that carried him to drown him and his in the Sea, left to great a Victory should be ascribed to the Lacedæmonians, as Appian writeth. Of thirty thousand but a few escaped into the City Aphis (called also Clupea) where they were besieged, till their Enemies perceiving they profited nothing, rose up and made provision for resisting the succours which the Senate sent the following year, under command of M. Fimilius Paulus and Ser. Fabius Nobilior, the Consuls. They taking the Sea with three hundred and fifty ships were opposed by the Carthaginians, whom they defeated, and took one hundred and fourteen of their Vessels with the men in them, as Polybius writeth, or took thirty and sank one hundred and four, as Entropius and Orosius, the later whereof addeth, that of the Carthaginians were slain thirty five thousand, and that the Romans lost nine Gallies and one thousand and one hundred men. The Consuls then went to Clupea, but, taking in the relics of the Army, presently set sail again for Sicily. The Pilots told them they must take heed of the outward part of that Island, which was full of shelves and very dangerous, especially at that time betwixt the rising of Orion and the Dog. But they gave no heed to the Seamen, out of a desire, by the showing of their fresh Victory and Plunder, to procure certain Towns upon the Coasts to yield. They had safely passed the middle of the Sea, and drew near to the Coasts of Camarina, when such a tempest and so great calamities fell upon them, as cannot be expressed, saith Polybius, for the greatness thereof. For, of four hundred and sixty four ships, eighty scarcely were saved, and the rest were swallowed up, or cast upon Rocks, so that the Shoar was filled with dead bodies, and broken pieces of Ships. Both the Consuls perished. Those few that escaped Hiero kindly received, and furnishing them with Cloaths and other necessities, conveyed them safe to Messana. Karbal the Carthaginian taking advantage of this disaster, besieged, conquered, and burnt Agrigentum, the Walls whereof he also demolished.

6. The Romans nothing at all discouraged by the greatest loss that ever a tempest procured, gave order for the making of two hundred and twenty Gallies, which was prosecuted with such alacrity, that in three months time they were both made and launched. Adrubal the Carthaginian with all the old Army, new levies, and one hundred and forty Elephants, came into Sicily, and of old and new Vessels made up a Fleet of two hundred sail. The Consuls A. Attilius and Cn. Cornelius being commanded to pass into Sicily, therein, this year, took several Towns, and returned. Their successors C. Servilius Cæpio and C. Sempronius Blaesus, in the beginning of the next Spring with all the Fleet, passed into Sicily, and thence into Africk, where coasting about they landed in many places, but did nothing memorable.

Defeateth the Carthaginians, and not long after is defeated and taken himself.

SECT. 2. At length they came to the Island of the Lotophagi called Meninx, not far distant from the lesser Syria. Here they fell upon some quicks in the low water and were in great danger, being utterly ignorant of the Coasts, but the Tide returning, when they had lightened the ships, cleared them off the shelves, and they returned in a kind of flight to Panormus in Sicily. Then passing hence towards Rome through the Straights very undauntedly, such a Tempest fell upon them, as above one hundred and fifty ships were lost. Though the Senate and People were marvellously pricked forward to all attempts by desire of glory, yet so many and great were their losses at Sea, that they were constrained to omit naval preparations, and place all their hope in the land Forces. They sent L. Cælius Metellus and Cn. Furius Paullus the Consuls into Sicily with the Legions, and sixty ships only, for the conveying of necessaries to the Army. And not only did they plainly yield the Dominion of the Sea to the Carthaginians, but feared them also on Land, because of their Elephants, which had oftentimes done them great damage. Adrubal the Punic General understanding their fears, and how one of the Consuls was returned back into Italy with half of the Army, in great confidence waited the grounds about Panormus, and the more carefully, because Metellus kept himself within the Walls. But the Consul taking an opportunity, so placed his men in respect of the Elephants, that when the Carthaginians came against the Town, he overthrew them, slew twenty thousand, and took twenty six Elephants, according to Entropius. But Orosius writeth, that twenty six were slain, and one hundred and four taken; and Livæ related, as appeareth by the Epitome of his nineteenth Book, that one hundred and twenty Elephants were led in triumph, with thirteen Captains of the Enemy. Diodorus Siculus maketh the occasion of the overthrow to have been given by the Celte, in Adrubal's Army, who meeting with Wine brought thither by Merchants, so inorginated themselves therein, that being not themselves, they broke the ranks and turned all into disorder, which opportunity Metellus instantly improved.

7. This defeat caused the Carthaginians to desire Peace, and offered to send to the Senate about it. Amongst the Messengers was Attilius Regulus whom they had overthrown, and taken prisoner, five years before, and now bound with an Oath to return to Carthage, in case neither Peace nor exchange of prisoners could be procured. He when he came to Rome, according to what he thought of the interest of the Commonwealth, dissuaded the Senate from Peace; and yet to keep his Oath returned to Carthage, where he was cruelly tormented to death; and as Cicero * De Finib. lib. 1. c. 13. writeth, by hunger and watching having his eye-lids cut off. The year following, because the Land-Forces were very fearful of the Carthaginian Elephants, and very uncheerfully went about their work, the Romans provided another Fleet, and besieged Lilybæum, a Town standing upon the Southern Promontory of Sicily, over against Africk, but without success; within a while the Navy was brought to nothing, and Amilcar Barca being sent from Carthage troubled Italy with his inroads and depredations. For seven years then did they abstain from the Sea; but being forely disturbed by Amilcar, they resolved once more to try their fortune that way, and a Fleet was provided, and furnished out of their private purses, the Treasury being now exhausted. With this they gave such a blow to the Carthaginians near the Islands Hegates, under conduct of C. Lutatius Catulus the Consul, as made them give commission to Amilcar to conclude a Peace, if he found it requisite. Though he was, as to his own disposition, much averse to it, yet seeing it necessary for his Countries welfare, he made an agreement with Lutatius upon these terms, if the Romans would approve them; viz. That the Carthaginians should wholly quit Sicily; make no War upon the Syraculans or their allies; release without ransom all Prisoners, and pay within the space of twenty years two thousand two hundred Talents of Silver. This pleased not the People; and therefore ten men were sent into Sicily, with full authority to conclude the Peace, who shortened the time of payment, added one thousand Talents to the former sum, and further cautioned that the Carthaginians should not only quit Sicily; but all the Islands also betwixt it and Italy. Thus ended the first Punic War, after it had continued twenty four years, and Lilybæum had been besieged ten; in the five hundred and thirtieth year of the City, the fourth of the one hundred and thirty fourth Olympiad, the sixth of Seleucus Callinicus, and the sixth of Properius Evagoras, A. M. 3764, two hundred and thirty nine years before the birth of Christ, A. Manlius Torquatus the second time, and Q. Lutatius Cævo being Consuls.

cruit themselves by a cessation; but the Peace procured them greater danger than the War could well have done. For, Amilcar Barca, after the ratification, drew down the Forces to Lilybæum, and giving them up into the hands of Gefco, to be transported, laid down his Office. Gefco wisely considering what danger there was of such a multitude of Mercenaries it's falling into sedition (especially because they wanted their pay, which the publick Treasury already exhausted could not afford them) conveyed them into Africk by small companies together. But his Superiors, either through inadvertency, or for want of money, dismissed them not as they arrived; but stayed them till all should come together, with intention to prevail for an abatement of their wages. The City growing full, many outrages were committed by the Souldiers, which caused the Townsmen to procure their Captains to lead them out to Sicca a Town not far off, and when they left their baggage behind them, as intending shortly to return to Carthage, they fearing their unwillingness to depart, or their speedy return, because of their Wives and Children, in the carriages, forced them to take all away. When they were come to Sicca, they fell into greater licentiousness through want of employment, and demanded larger pay than formerly they had pretended to, expecting all great rewards promised them by their Captains in dangerous adventures. As soon as they were all come thither, Hanno the Carthaginian Pretor was sent to them, who was so far from curing, that he heightened the distemper.

2. He not only brought none of those things with him which they expected, but complaining of the emptiness of the Treasury, talked of abating something of their constant wages. This put the multitude into a rage, into which having once fallen, it was hard to be appeased, as upon other accounts, so through the diversity of their speech, things being either misrepresented by unskilful interpreters, or misunderstood by them who were willing enough to be mistaken. Breathing nothing but fury and violence, they took Arms, and in despite of Hanno and the other Officers marched toward Carthage, and encamped at Tunis, fifteen miles from the City, to the number of twenty thousand. The Carthaginians affrighted at the multitude resolved to satisfy them; but then the Mercenaries perceiving how they were feared, every day invented what to add to their demands, requiring besides their pay the price of their Horses lost in the War; and, after this was granted, Provision for several years, which they said was behind. Their late Matters not daring to deny them any thing, prevailed that some one who had commanded them in Sicily should be chosen as Moderator, and the whole matter left to him.

10. The Souldiers made choice of Gefco, as one who had best deserved of them. And he laboured to pacify them all he might, and was about to pay them their Arrears. But there being in the Army one Spendius, a Campanian of Italy by birth, but by condition a Roman slave, who having ran away from his Master, wanted neither strength nor courage; and one Matho an African; the former fearing to be tortured to death if his Master caught him, as the Roman manner was, and the latter though free, fearing to be called to an account for his too great forwardness in the late stir, fought how to drive all things into extremity, that they might procure a War, inveighing grievously against Gefco and the Carthaginians, as having a design as soon as the rest were dispersed and gone home, to spend their rage against the Africans. The multitude herewith were strangely incensed, so that who ever attempted to speak, before they could be heard what they would say, were all stoned to death except these two. Gefco yet would not cease to do his duty, but went from one Nation to another, labouring to pacify them; but when the Africans demanded allowance for their Provisions, he bade them ask it of Matho their Captain. This so transported them, that they plundered the goods of the Carthaginians, with all the money he had brought for the discharge of the Army, and binding him and his followers in a contumelious manner cast them into prison.

11. By the advice of Matho they rebelled against the Carthaginians, and so began the War called Libyanum and Africanum, as also Carthagenum. Their numbers being increased to seventy thousand. Matho and Spendius now created Generals, divided their Forces, and besieged Utica and Hippacra. Hanno was sent from Carthage to the relief of the Uticans, and at the first onset drove away the besiegers; but entering the Town, and loitering there, they set upon his Camp without, and killing many, took all his Engines, and other things prepared for the War. His Superiors troubled heretofore, created Captain Amilcar Barca, and sent him into the field with seventy seventy Elephants, and ten thousand men. There he was encompassed by the Africans on his Front, the Numidians on his Rear, and Spendius on his Flank, where Naravasius a Numidian with two thousand of his followers revolted to him. Encouraged by this addition he engaged with his Enemies, causing his men to face combat as the Front became the Rear, whereby (seeming to be in confusion, the Mercenaries thought they ran, and breaking their Ranks to pursue them he took this opportunity, and setting on them out of order obtained the Victory, having slain ten thousand, and taken four thousand Prisoners.

12. He gave Arms to all such Prisoners as would serve under him, and having exhorted the rest to fight no more against the Carthaginians, dismissed them freely. Spendius and Matho, together with Antarius Captain of the Galls, hearing this, doubted how far his clemency, especially the offer of indemnity, might prevail with the Africans and others, and consulted how to obviate this his design by sowing the multitude at irreconcilable enmity with the Carthaginians. To this purpose they feigned Letters to be sent out of Sardinia from their friends, giving them to understand, that certain amongst them held intelligence with the Enemy, and advising them to keep close Gefco, and the other with him. Spendius taking heretofore occasion, earnestly advised them not to trust to the pretended clemency of Amilcar, and by no means to permit Gefco to escape; for thereby they should incur the contempt of their Enemies, and by strengthening them through the assistance of so great a Captain, not a little damage their own affairs. Whilst he yet spoke another pretended messenger brought Letters as from Tunis of the same Contents with the former; and then Antarius openly protested, that whosoever had any regard to the kindness of the Carthaginians could not be faithful, and therefore such were to be heard as perwaded the most bitter things against Carthage, all others being Traitors and Enemies. Then did he perwade them to Torture Gefco to death, with such as were now with him, and all that hereafter should be taken. There were many which spoke against this cruelty, especially as Gefco was concerned in it; but for some time they were not understood, speaking in their own Languages, and when what they aimed at was fully known, some one cried out Strike them, which so provoked the multitude, that they forthwith stoned them. After this, bringing forth Gefco, and the other Carthaginians to the number of seven hundred, they cruelly tormented them to death; and made a decree, that whomsoever of them for the time to come they should take, he should be used in the same manner, and if any of their Allies were taken, his hands being cut off, he should be sent back to Carthage. This they very carefully afterwards observed, having also refused to deliver the dead bodies to the Messengers that came for them, and threatened, if any more came, to deal with them as they had used Gefco.

13. Amilcar seeing into what straits he was cast by this boldness of the Mercenaries, sent for Hanno, judging that an end might sooner be put to the War if the Forces of the State were all United. Such of the Enemies as he took in the heat of the fight he killed, as he might by the Law of War, or taking them alive, cast them to wild beasts. When he thought that he had brought matters into a fair way of recovery, they presently relapsed into a far worse condition than ever. For, the ships that brought Provisions miscarried by force of Tempest; Sardinia at the same time revolted from them; which was wont to supply them with large Provisions; and Hippacra and Utica which hitherto had remained faithful, now revolted without any manifest cause. Matho and Spendius herewith elevated, resolved to lay siege to Carthage it self, and shortly after performed it. The Carthaginians in this their distress betook themselves to their neighbours, whereof the Romans, and Etiro King of Syracuse in Sicily, being sensible of the savineness of their Enemies, were ready to do them all good Offices. Herewith better enabled, they held out, and Amilcar lying abroad, so cut off all Provisions from the Mercenaries, that being no other than besetged themselves, they were forced at length to rise up and depart, resolving to observe Amilcar's motions, and ly in wait for him on the sides of the Mountains; for they would not venture to take the plain, being afraid of his Elephants, and the Horde of Naravasius; and otherwise they were much inferior to the Carthaginians, who far surpassed them in Military skill, though but equal to them in valour.

14. But Amilcar singling them out by parties, killed many of them, and when they ingaged with their whole Force cut them off by stratagems; sometimes by day, otherwhilves by night he would fall upon them on a sudden with great Terror; and such of them as he took he cast to the beasts. At length he compassed them

Sec. 2. them about in such a place, as, though they were afraid to fight they could not escape, and being shut up within a Ditch and Rampire, they were forced to devour one another. Though they now could expect no mercy, yet they lent to devour a Parley, and having obtained leave, Antarolus, Zarxas, Spendius, and other Captains were ordered to manage it. It was agreed that the Carthaginians should pick out ten men whom they pleased, and the other be dismissed in their Coats. The Covenants being finished, Amilcar declared that he made choice of those who were present, and so got the most eminent Leaders into his power. The Africans understanding that their Officers were seized, took Arms in great haste, but Amilcar with his Elephants and his Army compassing them in on every side, put them to the Sword. For the improvement of this success, he and Amibal went and besieged Mathos in Tunis, before the Walls whereof he nailed Spendius to a Cross with the rest of the Captives. Amibal pitching his Camp on that side of the Town towards Carthage, carefully demeaned himself, which Mathos considering, made a Sally, and killing many, took much plunder, and amongst other Prisoners Amibal himself, whom bringing to Spendius his Cross, after he had taken down his Colleague's body, he nailed him to it, and killed thirty more of the most Noble Carthaginians.

15. It was long ere Amilcar knew of this disaster, and when he did, for the distance of place, and difficulty of passage, he could give no relief. Marching therefore from Tunis, he fare down by the mouth of the River Macaris, and his Superiors at Carthage making new Levies joyned Hanno in Commission with him. These two, after several passages, at length agreed to fight one set battel with the Enemy, who consenting, a bloody contest ensued, wherein at length the Carthaginians had the better. A great part of the Africans were slain, and the rest fled to a neighbouring City, where not long after they yielded themselves, and Mathos was taken alive. The Subjects of Carthage now all returned to obedience, except they of Hippacitis and Utica, who being past hope of mercy from their enraged Lords, seemed resolved to stand out; but Hanno and Amilcar bringing their Forces, constrained them to submit to such conditions as the Carthaginians would lay upon them. Mathos, and those that were with him being carried to the City, were handled with all sorts of contumely and torment, and so this Libyan War ended, having lasted three years, and almost four months, being, faith Polybius, the most cruel and wicked that ever we heard of. But it gave the Carthaginians occasion to repent of two great errors, viz. Trusting to great a multitude of Mercenaries together when they were idle; and the cruel, and tyrannical usage of their Subjects.

16. The Romans, (that we may return to them the History of whom is our proper subject) though they observed the League during these troubles, at and length, as was said, gave the Carthaginians also reason to like well of their friendship, yet thought they had more cause to be angry with them. For such of their Subjects as layled from Italy into Africa, they seized on, left they should carry Provisions to their Enemies, and had at Carthage almost five hundred of such kind of men in Prison. Yet when Ambassadors were sent to complain hereof, they kindly dismissed all those in custody, which so affected the Romans, that they kindly sent all their Prisoners, gave them all they asked, and permitted their Merchants to carry them necessities, forbidding them to Traffic with their Enemies: they also refused to hearken to such of the Carthaginian Mercenaries as having betrayed their trust, invited them into Sardinia. But though Polybius telleth us that this they did; yet it appeareth from him also that this modesty continued but for a time. For, allured, as it seemeth, by this invitation, they layled thither, which much offended the Carthaginians, who thought that the place by far more right belonged to them; so that they prepared to send Forces into the Island. The Romans took occasion hereat to decree War against them, complaining that these Forces were not designed so much against the Sardinians as themselves, which forced the other, who found themselves in no good case to manage the War with them, to give way to the time, and quit not only Sardinia, but pay further to the Romans one thousand and two hundred Talents. This, though submitted to at present, bred such grudges and malice, as at length brake out into another War, a more dangerous and bloody than the former.

17. In the (2) year after the ending of the first Punic War, the five hundred and fourteenth of the City, C. Claudius Cento, and M. Sempronius Tuditanus being Consuls, the year preceding the birth of Ennius, the first Comedies and Tragedies were were made by Livius Andronicus the Poet. This man being a Græcian born, was rightly called Andronicus, and named Livius from his Master Livius Salinator, whose Children he taught, and for his learning was manumitted by him. (1) Gellius faith, that he now first at Rome taught plays about one hundred and sixty years after the death of Sophocles and Euripides, and fifty two after that of Menander. But whereas he is said by Gellius first to have made or taught plays at Rome, it is to be understood of these two sorts of Poetry now mentioned, (2) Valerius Maximus telling us, that he drew the minds of the spectators to those shews from the use of Satires, which by little and little succeeded that most antient and plain Roman sort of the Hibrones brought out of Etruria, (as we shewed before) for the stopping of the Pettulence, through the command of the Oracle. These Ludi Scævini were first managed with rude gestures, and incompofed Songs, called Vogus Fejsejnni from Fejsejnnum a City of Etruria. From these jocular speeches, which at random were wont to be uttered at the Roman Solemnities, came the Satire, as later in time so more elaborate, and as for metre a perfect Poeme containing ridiculous things digested into Verse, which they were wont to utter amongst themselves, after the antient custom. It differed as much from that of the Greeks, as from the rest differeth Dramatick Poetry, whereof the Romans at this time knew not so much as the name. A Satire being afterwards variously handled by the Romans, at length was reduced to two sorts, which Fabius only acknowledged. The former was found out by Lucilius, and the later ennobled by Varro. Horace mentioneth two kinds of most antient Poetry; one whereof they used in the praise of their gods, as when they appealed Tellus with a Sow-pig, and Sylvanus with milk: the other, when in jest and sport they jeered one another, being the same with the Fejsejnni Verses, whence came the Satires, to which Livius Andronicus added the plays of Comedies and Tragedies, as was observed.

18. Four years after, were celebrated at Rome the third time the Secular Games, concerning which it is convenient to speak in this place, that beginners may know the differences of Roman exercises. These were called Ludi Magni, as others were, (in opposition to the Scævici, and games made by private men) and Ludi Terentini (not Terentini, whereof Students are to beware) from Terentius a place in the Campus Martius where they were celebrated. But there were other games called also Terentini Ludi (which some not considering have run into confusion) and that more properly than these Secular ones were, and therefore the rise of them all is to be related. There was one Valesius a man of prime note, amongst the Sabines, who living near Eretus, and not far from Tiber, in a great Plague, had two Sons and a daughter which fell dangerously sick. Amongst his prayers for them, he heard a voice that they should recover, if carrying them to Terentus, he would fetch them some warm water of Tiber from the Altar of Pluto and Proserpina. He thought the City Tarentum was meant, and doubted how he should come by any Tiberine water in that remote part of Italy; but resolving to be obedient, he sailed down the River towards Ostia, and late at night arrived at the Campus Martius, where he understood there was a place called Terentus. Landing here, he gave his Children some warm water, wherewith refreshed they fully recovered, and told their Father, how in a dream they had seen a certain god, who commanded, that at the Altar of Pluto and Proserpina black coloured Sacrifices, (furvæ bovis) should be offered, as also that Leſſiternes (Beds made for the cause of Sacrifice, as whereon to lye down after the Roman fashion at a solemn feast) and night-games should be made. Valesius seeing no Altar in the place, thought of making one, when, as his slaves were digging for that purpose, they found one in the earth dedicated to Pluto and Proserpina. Here then he Sacrificed, and three nights together, because of the number of his Children, made Leſſiternes and Games, being afterwards from this thing named Marius Valesius Terentinus. Zozimus writeth, that the Romans one hundred years before being to fight with the Albani, were admonished to this altar in the Earth, and that having sacrificed they covered it. But this passage concerning Valesius hapned about the twelfth year of Servius Tullius, wherein he founded the Lustrum; in the one hundred eighty and eight of the City; and the same wherein the Panathænae were instituted (or rather reduced to the course of five years, being formerly instituted by Theseus) at Athens, this being the third year of the 53 Olympiad.

19. This was the Original of Terentine Games, which some have confounded with the Secular. For, the next that were celebrated were made by Valerius Poplicola in the year following the banishment of Tarquinius, which Zozimus calleth thing remained beyond the River Iberus that was considerable, and unsubdued, besides the Saguntines. They being confederate with Rome gave them there intelligence how things went, who sent some into Spain to see how matters stood, and what was intended by the Carthaginians. These Commissioners having audience of Hannibal, religiously admonished him not to meddle with the Saguntines, and (according to the League made with Asdrubal) not to pass over the River Iberus. His answers did not conceal his inward hatred, which caused the Romans to expect no better than a War; but they hoped to have Saguntus the seat thereof, and endeavoured to clear themselves of Ilyricum ere it hapned. Hannibal was not ignorant of what they designed, and therefore resolved by taking that Town to cut off all hope of Warring in Spain. He doubted not by that example to terrify others, so as to reduce to obedience those that yet stood out, and confirm therein such as he had already brought under; and this especially he aimed at by reducing this place, to leave no Enemy at his back, by the plunder of which also he intended to gratify his Soldiers. With all his force then he set upon it, and provoking his men by his own example to all manner of diligence, took it in the eighth month. The Inhabitants retained their fidelity unto the Romans to the last, and when almost spent with hunger, Fire, Sword, and Engines, they that remained, in a fire made in the Forum consumed themselves with all their Riches, as Florus writeth, though Polybius speaketh of much money found in the Town, besides rich stuff, which Hannibal sent to Carthage.

He taketh Saguntus a Town in Spain, confederate with Rome.

Satisfaction is demanded by the Romans.

And none being given, War is denounced and accepted of.

The second Punic or Carthaginian War begins.

Hannibal having conquered all Spain as far as the Pyrenean hills,

32. When first the Romans heard that Saguntus was taken, they sent Ambassadors to Carthage to require that Hannibal should be delivered up as the breaker of the League, or else to denounce War. Upon their arrival the Carthaginians deputed Hanno to treat with them, who slighted the matter of the League made with Asdrubal, pretending there was none; and if there was, it was made by his mere pleasure without the consent of the Senate. Besides, therein, he said, was no mention made of the River Iberus; that a regard was to be had of the Allies of both the States he confessed, but this nothing concerned the Saguntines, who at the time of the ratification were not confederates with Rome. The Ambassadors perceiving the Carthaginians backward to what they propounded, spake no more; but the Senior of them holding out the lap of his Gown to the Senate, Here, saith he, we bring you both War and Peace; whether you will have I shall bring forth. The Carthaginian King bade them bring forth which they pleased; then the Roman, saying, he would take out War, many of the Senators answered, that they accepted of it. This fell out in the Consulship of M. Livius, afterward called Salinator (from his bringing up the Impost upon Salt) and L. Æmilius Paulus. In their time foreign Ceremonies begun to be brought into Rome, which displeasing the more sober sort of them, the Senate thought fit that the Chappels of Isis and Serapis should be pulled down. When no Artificers would venture to touch them, Æmilius the Consul put of his pretexts, or long Robe edged with purple Silk, and taking an Hatchet struck it into the door.

33. In the year following, being the five hundred and thirty sixth of the City, the sixth of Antiochus the Great, and the fifth of Ptolemy Philopater in the Consulship of Pub. Cornelius Scipio, and Tib. Sempronius Longus, three and twenty years after the ending of the first Punic War, the second began, which we have described by Polybius, and after him by T. Livius, who hath transcribed the twenty first Book of his History almost word for word. Hannibal now twenty six years of age, in the Spring moved from his Winter quarters with ninety thousand Foot, and twelve thousand Horse, and passing over the River Iberus, subdued all the Towns as far as the Pyrenean hills. Then leaving Hanno with a sufficient force to keep the Country, and sending as many of the Spanish Soldiers home, he marched with the rest, in number fifty thousand Foot, and nine thousand Horse, over the Pyrenean hills, and through Gall unto the Alpes. Having marched one hundred miles in ten days from the River Rhodanus, he came to the foot of these Mountains, which when he ascended, he encountered with great difficulties being opposed by the Allobroges (inhabiting the Country now called Sevogy) who possessed themselves of the places through which he must necessarily pass. On the ninth day he arrived at the top, whence his Soldiers had a prospect of Italy. Proceeding after a little rest, he lost as many men here in the depth of the Snow, as formerly by the incursions of Enemies, and at length came to a place which would afford no passage for Horse, or Elephants. The place of itself was precipitous, but lately by a falling of earth it was become so, to the depth of one thousand foot. He laboured then to bring his men through other ways never before trodden, but at length the Snow making them impassable, he was forced to betake himself to the levelling of the Rocks. They made a great fire, wherewith the Rocks being heated, they petrified it with Vinegar, then did they cleave it, and so diminished the descent by moderate turnings, that not only the beasts of burthen, but the Elephants also might safely pass. Four dayes were spent about the Rocks: and by this time almost all the beasts were wasted; for on the top was little grass, and that covered with Snow. Coming lower, certain Valleys afforded pasture, whereto the Cattel were refreshed, and rest was given to the weary Soldiers. Thence descended Hannibal into the Plain, in the fifth month after he had parted from new Carthage (built by Asdrubal, and now called Cartagena) in Spain, having passed over the Alpes in fourteen dayes. In the passage he lost a great part of his Army, bringing into the Country of the Insabres, but ten thousand, and two hundred African Foot, eight thousand of the Spanish, and six thousand Horse.

34. Scipio the Consul having Spain for his Province, was by Sea going thither, when he understood that Hannibal was near the River Rhodanus. There he intended to have given him a stop; but missing of him, he returned on shipboard and halted to Italy, there to meet him, before his men had yet refreshed themselves. They met and joyned battel, wherein the Consul had the worst, being wounded, and preserved alive by the valour of his young son afterwards named Africanus. The Roman Senate, when first they received intelligence that Hannibal had passed the Alpes, sent for the other Consul Sempronius out of Sicily to the aid of his Collegue. According to order he brought over his Army, and united it with Scipio's at the River Trebia. Having had the better in some skirmishes with certain parties of Hannibal, he desired to make trial of a battel, that his Collegue being sick, he might have all the glory of the Victory, and though Scipio alleged, that by delaying to fight the Galls might be farther drawn in, and their own Soldiers better exercised, yet left the battel should be deferred till the coming of the next Consul, he resolved to fight alone. Hannibal feared nothing more, than that they should refuse to fight, because as yet the Galls continued his, and he knew the best of the Roman Captains to be unable to act, and his own Army fresh and cheerful. In the battel, which shortly followed, the Romans were overthrown, being drawn out by a party that Hannibal sent to provoke them, ere they had armed their bodies against the extremity of the mid-winter season, either by meat or other provision; so that ingaging with cold and hunger, and beset with their Enemies (whereof as in the former battel, the Numidians, to their great terror fell upon their rear) they were defeated though with great slaughter of the Enemy, through whose ranks ten thousand broke and escaped to Placentia, the rest being either slain, taken, or drowned in the River. The Carthaginians having pursued them to the River Trebia, returned to their Camp so stupified with cold, that they were scarcely sensible of the Victory. For, rain mixed with snow, and intolerable cold, killed many men, and almost all the Beasts and Elephants.

35. At this time things went better with the Romans in Spain and Sicily. In the former Cneus Scipio (being sent thither by his Brother the Consul upon his return into Italy) overthrew Hanno the Carthaginian, and took in a good part of the Country, wherein was also new Carthage. For the following year C. Flaminius (who being Tribune had preferred the Agrian Law) was the second time made Consul, together with Cn. Servilius Geminus. He had a good gift in speaking, but no skill in War, being yet heady and impatient of advice. Hannibal having all this while made the Country of the Galls the seat of the War, resolved to change it, and after some consultation about his way into Etruria, resolved upon that of the Fens, as short and unexpected to the Enemy, though more troublesome to pass. Being forced to march three or four whole dayes through water, this sorely distressed all his men, except the Galls, many of the beasts were left in the mud, and the Hoofs of the Horses came off. He himself riding on an Elephant that was once left, escaped with his life, but was sorely pained in his eyes, one whereof he lost utterly. Being arrived at dry ground, he hoped by some means or other to entrap the Consul, understanding what his disposition was: He passed by the Camp and went further into the Country, which enraged Flaminius, who thought himself slighted by the Enemy. When amongst the Romans some told him that he must not rashly pursue, but use great caution, especially by reason of the Horse; but above all things they for his Collegue, and not hazard a battel without the conjunction of both Armies, he was so far from following their advice, that he could

SECT. 2. This year M. Valerius Leuinus, who had done good service against Philip of Macedonia, was the second time, in his absence, created Consul, together with Marcellus the fourth time. Leuinus went into Sicily, where taking the City Agri-gen-tum, he thereby brought the whole Island under the Roman Jurisdiction. The year following being the tenth of the War, Tarentum was betrayed into the hands of Fabius Maximus, now Consul the fifth time, with Q. Fulvius Flaccus, who the fourth time bore this Office. Marcellus for this year sometimes winning and sometimes losing with Annibal, for that following being created Consul (though he scarcely seemeth rightly created according to the Roman superstition) though otherwise wary enough, was cut off in an Ambush, whilst with his Collegue T. Quintius Crispinus, accompanied only with two hundred and twenty Horse, he went to view a place where he had a great desire to fight Hannibal. Crispinus also received a wound whereof he died, after he had named a Dictator for creation of the next Consuls.

47. The year following, Asdrubal was ordered to go out of Spain into Italy, to the assistance of his Brother Annibal. This caused great carefulefs in Rome, by reason they knew not well whom to oppose against him. At length M. Claudius Nero and M. Livius Salinator (who lately had returned to the City, after that being publicly disgraced he had absented himself for several years) were created Consuls, having been at great odds, and now reconciled through the interposition of the Senate. Livius was ordered to meet Asdrubal, and Nero appointed to attend the motions of Annibal. But the later having some success against his Enemy, picked out of the flower of his Army six thousand Foot, and one thousand Horse, and with great secrecy, and as much speed, marched toward his Collegue, that he might reach him ere he joyined with Asdrubal. Being joyined, they incompassed him, who was by a deceitful guide led into a dangerous place, and cut him with his whole Army in pieces: then marched Nero back to his own Army, and ere Hannibal knew of his departure, cast his Brothers head into his Camp, whereby to his grief he knew of the defeat. The year following did P. Scipio after many Victories obtained, finish the War in Spain; all the Carthaginian Captains being either taken or driven away. This happened five years after his undertaking the charge, and thirteen after the beginning of the War.

48. Scipio coming to Rome, and being made Consul, greatly desired to be sent into Africa, urging it to the Senate as necessary for finishing the War, and undertaking to manage his affairs, as to force the Carthaginians to recall Hannibal for the defence of his own Country. Fabius Maximus most earnestly, and with some heat opposed this, and a considerable difference hereupon arose; but at length Sicily was granted him for his Province, and leave given him to pass over into Africa, if he saw it convenient for the Commonwealth. All this year he spent in the Island, in providing necessaries for his Expedition, and the next, with a brave Fleet landed in Africa, where Masaniissa King of Numidia (who in Spain had joyined with him) came in to his aid. Within a while he killed Hanno with three thousand men, and besieged Utica; but Syphax King of Numidia, the enemy and competitor of Masaniissa (who formerly had entered into league with Scipio, but again upon a marriage with Annibal's niece revolted) coming with the Carthaginians to raise the siege, he having attempted in vain to storm the Town, rose up and departed to his winter quarters.

49. In winter he was not idle, but again besieged Utica, and entered into a Treaty with Syphax and Asdrubal about a Peace, in the mean time sending his ablest Soldiers in the habit of Slaves with his Commissioners, to view the Enemies Camps. This being sufficiently done, he brake off the Treaty, and set fire upon the Camps, which the other not suspecting, but thinking it came by accident, were cut in pieces when they were busied in quenching the fire, to the number of forty thousand men, and six thousand were taken Prisoners. Not long after he gave them another great overthrow, which so affected the Carthaginians with fear, that they called him Hannibal. Presently after they sent a Fleet to relieve Utica, which worsted the Roman Navy; and they might have done more than this had not fear made them loiter. But shortly after this, Scipio again routed Syphax, who had got together an unexperienced company of strangers, and taking him Prisoner, gave his Kingdom to Masaniissa. In July about this time Mago was overthrown, and wounded in an engagement with Quintilius Varus the Pretor, and M. Cornelius the Proconsul: he also was recalled as well as his Brother Annibal, and died on the Sea of his wounds. The Carthaginians sent an Ambassage to Rome, with a design to obtain a cessation till Hannibal could could arrive out of Italy. But their aim being sufficiently understood, the message was lighted; and to witness their perfidiousness, they brake the Law of Nations, by offering to violate Messengers sent from Scipio.

50. Annibal being recalled by his superiors, with very much reluctance quitted Italy, after he had therein spent sixteen years. He complained much of the Senate and of himself. Of the Senate, because fighting so long a time in an Enemies Country, they had so little supplied him with money and other things necessary for War. Of himself, for that having so often overthrown and put to flight the Roman Legions, he had still delayed and given them time to breathe. It reported also, that ere he took Ship, he built an Arch near the Temple of Juno Lacinia, wherein, in Punic and Greek letters, he wrote the sum of his great achievements. Taking the Sea, he landed in a few days at Leptis, whence he marched to Adrumetum, and thence to Zama. Considering now the weak estate of his Country, he desired a meeting with Scipio to treat of Peace, which being granted, the two greatest Captains in the World came to an interview betwixt their Armies. But receiving mutually no satisfaction, they returned to decide the controversy by the Sword. Hannibal in the battle behaved himself most gallantly, and like so expert a Warriour amongst his Soldiers, consisting of so many Nations and languages. But providence ordained the Victory to Scipio, who slew twenty thousand, and took as many Prisoners, yet not without great loss of his own men, whereof two thousand fell. After this, Annibal perswaded his Country-men to ask Peace, and Ambassadors were dispatched away accordingly.

51. Scipio was not averse to a closure, as loth to part with the glory of concluding the War, which the year before was in danger of being taken from him by T. Claudius Nero the Consul, and now by C. Cornelius Lentulus, who both had procured Africa for their Province, and to be joyined in equal authority with him. The power of concluding the Peace was by the People decreed to Scipio, with ten others, which was at length agreed to on these terms. That the Carthaginians being free, should enjoy all their Territories in Africa; but the Romans hold Spain with all the Islands of the Mediterranean any time in question betwixt the two States. That all Rebels and Fugitives should be given up to the Romans. That the Carthaginians should deliver up all their beaked Ships, except ten Triremes, with all their tamed Elephants, and tame no more. It was made unlawful for them to make War in Africa or elsewhere, without Licence from the People of Rome. They were to restore all to Masaniissa, and enter into confederacy with him. To give money and Corn to the Roman Auxiliaries, till the Ambassadors should be returned. To pay ten thousand Talents of Silver in the space of fifty years, and give one hundred Hostages for performance of these things. Thus ended the second Punic War, in the eighteenth year, and Scipio obtained the honourable surname of Africanus, being the first General (if Livy observeth rightly) who was ennobled by the name of a Country he had overcome.

52. The Romans had little or no rest after this War; for immediately begun, or rather went on the Macedonian, or that with Philip, the occasion being given, as was said, ten years before, upon his entrance into confederacy with Annibal. The Aetolians being also invaded by him, and was sent them, by which he was worsted, and after seven years a Peace was made. But now the Romans having nothing to do, and being not without provocation, as well by his breaking of his faith with the Aetolians and others of their friends in those parts, as by his supply of men and money not long before sent to Hannibal, and at the earnest request of the Athenians (the Territories of whom he had wasted) they decreed War anew against him, being also complained of by Attalus King of Pergamus, and the *Rhodian*s, for molesting the Cities in Asia. Ser. Sulpicius Galba the Consul obtaining Macedonia for his Province, by himself and his Lieutenant, put him to the worst divers times, and had almost taken him. Together with Attalus and the *Rhodian*s he caused him to raise his siege from Athens, whereupon the Aetolians before backward enough, by reason of their Magistrate, and the Athenians now encouraged invaded his Dominions, but being idle and careless were easily repelled by him. This year, did M. Furius the Pretor get a great Victory over the Galls, which besieged Cremona in Italy, killing thirty thousand, and with them Amilcar the Carthaginian Captain. For this, after much dispute in the Senate, he triumphed, though against the Custom, and without precedent, for any one to receive this honour, that had obtained Victory with the Army of another, as he had done with the Soldiers of C. Aretius Cotta the Consul.

Sect. 2. Consul in his absence, who took it most hainously. The year following, C. C. C. Belius the Pretor entering unadvisedly into the Territories of the Galls Infules, was incommoded and lost above six thousand, and six hundred men.

53. Nothing considerable was this year done in Macedonia by P. Villius Tappulus the Consul; but his successor T. Quintius Flamininus (not Flamininus as Plutarch * and Livy now hath him; for the Flaminii Patritius must not be confounded with the Flamini who were Plebeians) using great expedition, beat Philip out of the Straights, wherein securely he had encamped, and by Sea his Brother Lucius (with Atalus) took several Towns of the Confederates, and besieged Corinth, though in vain. The time coming for the election of new Consuls; and it being usual for them to take the Provinces from their Predecessors, the Tribunes rightly objected, that this course hindered the progress of the Wars, and procured Quintius his Government to be continued to him, who being about taking the Cattle of Opus, Messengers came from Philip about a Treaty. Several times they met (which before they had also done at the Straights) and the Ambassadors of Atalus, the Rhodiens and Acheans were present; but the effect was nothing, and Philip gave up Argos into the hands of Nabis Tyrant of Lacedemon, who used the Inhabitants with great cruelty and incredible exaction. But Quintius following Philip into Theffaly, gave him such a blow at Cynosephale, as forced him to ask Peace, which was granted upon terms moderate enough. All the Cities of Greece which he had got in his hands, were hereby, beyond all expectation, and to the wonder of themselves and others, set at liberty, and left to their own Laws. The year preceding this conclusion, did the Galls receive a great overthrow from Cornelius the Consul. But in Spain, C. Sempromius Tuditanus was totally defeated. The same year wherein the Macedonian War ended, the slaves in Tuscan made a dangerous Rebellion, but were chastized, and quieted, by Attilius the Pretor. And about the same time was another victory obtained over the Galls.

54. The year after the ratification of the peace, some bickering there was in the City about the Women. Twenty years before, there had been a Law preferred by Oppius, Tribune of the People, presently after the defeat at Cannæ, forbidding women the wearing of Gold or Purple, and the use of any other kind of Pomp. This now did two of the present Tribunes labour to abrogate, the face of things being changed, and the occasion removed. M. Porcius Cato the Consul stood stiffly for preserving the Law, inveighing much against the Females; but partly through the apposite reply of L. Valerius the Tribune unto the Consul, out of his own book, called Origines, and especially through the importunity of the Women themselves (who with liberty of behaviour sufficient filled the streets, came to the Assembly, and constrained two of the Tribunes to let fall their interposition) it was abrogated. Cato then betook himself into Spain his Province, where using levity towards himself as well as his Soldiers, he restored the Roman interest by good Discipline. Having led his Army upon the back of the Spaniards, and thereby necessitated them to fight, he overthrew them in a great battle, and took their Camp; after which, notwithstanding the fickleness of the Natives, he reduced the Province to obedience. The same Summer did L. Valerius Flaccus his Collegue give another overthrow to the Galls in Italy.

55. In Greece, Nabis the Tyrant of Sparta, still held it, and Argos, in slavery; wherefore the freedom of them still was wanting to the universal liberty of Greece, resolved to be vindicated from the oppression of the Macedonian party. Quintius, upon Nabis his refusal to quit Argos, besieged them both, and took in Gythium a Port Town, which drove Nabis to ask peace. Quintius was not against it, urging to the Grecian Allies the length, which was likely to be of the siege of Sparta, the unseasonableness of the Winter season, and the War that threatened from Antiochus King of Asia; but indeed fearing lest one of the new Consuls taking Macedonia for his Province, might rob him of the glory of ending the whole controversy in these parts. Yet the Greeks being earnest for suppressing the Tyrant, he seemed to yield to it, and afterwards put them off by demanding such supplies as they could not furnish him with. Notwithstanding this, the peace could not be made; for, Nabis accepted not of the terms, especially of parting with his Ships. Hereupon Sparta was set upon round about, and had been taken, but that Pythagoras Son-in-law to the Tyrant set the out-houses on fire, which drove away the Inhabitants. Though the onset succeeded not, yet the danger put Nabis into such a fright, that he now accepted of the former conditions, and had peace granted granted him; the Argives having ere this taken heart at the absence of Pythagoras their Governour, and freed themselves. The following year T. Sempromius the Consul killed many of the Galls, who had set upon his Camp, but with great loss of his own men. Several times had the Romans now the better against these people, and the Ligurians. Then came they flatly to fall out with Antiochus the Great, King of Syria, and began a War with him five years after the ending of the Macedonian, in the 563 year of the City, the second of the 147 Olympiad, the three and thirtieth of Antiochus, and the thirteenth of Ptolemy Epiphanes, A.M. 3814. P. Corn. Scipio Nasica, and Mamius Atilius Glabrio being Consuls.

S E C T. III.

From the War with Antiochus, and the invasion of Asia, to the destruction of Carthage, after which the Romans degenerated through security.

Containing the space of forty five years.

1. Antiochus had invaded the Territories of Atalus; but being then the friend of the Romans, gave over his Enterprize at their desire. After this, having an hungry desire after Aegypt; upon application of the Egyptians to Rome, he was commanded to desist, which breeding in him discontent, it was heightened by reason of his setting upon several Cities in Greece. He said that they once had belonged (though not of a long time) to his Predecessors; but the Romans being ambitious to set all Greece at liberty, plainly told him that these Towns must not be excepted. When he was thus enough incensed, and by Hannibal (who had fled to him) spurred on, the Seleucians importuned him to joyn with them against their late friends and benefactors. This they did, being an inconstant people, and very covetous, having taken offence at the small quantity of booty, as they accounted it, allotted to them in the War against Philip, by T. Quintius.

2. The Seleucians first of all attempted to get into their hands Lacedemon, and other Towns, before held as cautionary by Quintius; but mislaid of their design, though they brake into the former, and killed Nabis the Tyrant; for, they were afterwards cut in pieces by the Inhabitants themselves. Antiochus having through the cunning insinuations of Thos the Seleucian, changed his purpose of sending Antiochus into Africa, and thence into Italy, landed in Greece, with an intention to make it the Seat of War. He brought an inconsiderable Army with him; but seemed to have made a good beginning, having got Chalcis into his hands, and by that means easily brought under the whole Island of Euboea. After this, he sent and buried the dead bodies of the Macedonians slain at Cynosephale, thinking thereby to oblige Philip, who taking it as tending to his reproach, because he had not done it before, it proved but an effectual means to make him his Enemy, the Theffalians being no better affected, because he had taken some of their Towns. Then winning at Chalcis, he fell in Love with, and married an obscure maid; his Army which before was indifferently good, falling with him into all idleness and excess.

3. M. Atilius the Consul, to whom Greece fell by lot, easily recovered the places of Theffaly, and afterwards beat Antiochus out of the Straights of Thermopylae, whither, being deserted by his confederates, he had retired, as is shewn in the History of his Kingdom. Then the Consul received the Boeotians, chiding them only for their ingratitude, and the Gates of Chalcis being set open to him, he presently recovered Euboea. This done, he went against the Seleucians, from whom after he had taken one or two Towns they offered to submit, but being offended with the hard conditions he propounded, and for that large things were promised by Antiochus, they flew back. Hereupon he besieged Naupactus (now Lepanto) and had utterly ruined them, but for the intercession of T. Quintius. For he having then received the Island of Zacynthus from the Athenians, came to the Camp, and though they had ill deserved at his hands by detracting from his worth, yet thinking it dishonourable for him, being the deliverer of Greece, that any one people

For this respect, and at their humble sute he gave them Truce, that they might send to the Senate at Rome, and broke up his siege. Whilst Acilius did these things in Greece, his Colleague Scipio Nasica got a notable victory over the Boii in Italy, which utterly broke their power in pieces.

L. Cornelius Scipio the Consul claims each Greece for his Province with leave to pass into Asia.

4. Lucius Cornelius Scipio, and C. Lælius Nepos, being Consuls for the following year, came, according to the custom, to divide the Provinces by lot. Both were extremely desirous to have Greece, and Lælius being a man in great favour, offered that the thing might be left to the discretion of the Senate. Scipio at first knew not what to do, but his Brother Africanus persuaded him by all means to assent to it. The thing was new, and the Senate expected many words on both sides, when Africanus standing up, told the Fathers, that if they would decree Greece to his Brother, he would go his Legatus or Lieutenant, wherupon there was no need any more should be said; for it was presently voted with universal consent, and power given to the Consul to pass into Asia, if he saw it convenient. Coming into Greece he found Acilius fall'n upon the Ætolians again, because the Senate had given them no positive answer, either as to peace or War; only two things were proposed: To call themselves wholly upon the Senate, or pay down one thousand Talents, and have the same Friends and Enemies with the Romans. When they desired an exposition of the former, no answer would be given, but a command to their Ambassadors to depart: The Consul prosecuted what his Predecessor had begun, and with much ado, through the intercession of the Athenians by Africanus, another Truce was granted that they might have time once more to send to Rome. There their Ambassadors instead of confitting their faults, and asking pardon, boasted what friends and assistants they had been to the Roman State, which gave such offence, that they were commanded out of the City, as before.

5. Antiochus having with his Son Selenus besieged Pergamus the chief City of Eumenes, the friend of the Romans, was forced to raise his siege. He sent to Emilius the Roman Admiral now on those Coasts about peace, who disowned any power of concluding it without the Consul. Then did the Rhodians at Sea defeat his Admiral, which was Hannibal, a man out of his proper Element, and afterward in a battle fought with Emilius, Eumenes, and the Rhodians, he fully lost the command of the Sea. Affrighted hereat, he foolishly left Lyfymachia, which this year might have kept the Consul in action, and adding one folly to another suffered Scipio to pass the Hellefpont without interruption. Now he offered to quit all places in Europe, and such in Asia as were the friends of Rome, to discharge half of the costs sustained by the Romans in the War, and rather than not be quiet, he was content to part with a portion of his own Kingdom. These seemed but small things to the Consul, who thought it just that he, who had been the cause of the War, should bear all the charges of it, and not only quit Ionis and Æolis, but leave all the Greek Cities to their liberty, which could not be, except he parted with all Asia on this side the Mountain Taurus. The Ambassador had in charge to procure the favour of Africanus, to whom was offered the restitution of his Son taken prisoner, and all that could be expected on this side the Title of King, if he would live with him. But all private Offices of kindness only would Africanus promise, desiring him by all means to procure peace, and, when he had received his Son, not to fight till he should (being now sick) return to the Camp. This caused Antiochus to delay fighting, but the Consul followed, and provoked him to give battle, wherein his own Chariots Armed with Sides, being driven back upon his own men, procured his overthrow. After this, peace was granted on the same terms as it had been offered to him before the battle. And thus this War ended in a short time, and less trouble than was expected, the second Consul putting a period to it, who in imitation of his Brother took on him the surname of Africanus.

He is overthrown, and last peace granted upon former demands.

6. The year following, wherein M. Fulvius Nobilior, and Cn. Manlius were Consuls, the former going into Greece fell upon the Ætolians, who now had taken from Philip Dolopia, and Amphibolia with Athamania; and besieging Ambrosia, drove them once more to sue for peace. They were referred by the Consul to Rome, where the Ambassadors of Philip made great complaints against them upon the former account. But the Rhodians and Athenians interceding once more for them, their sute was granted, on condition to pay five hundred Eubœan Talents at several Peace granted to the Ætolians. Several payments, to restore all prisoners, and have the same Friends and Enemies with the People of Rome.

7. Cn. Manlius the other Consul was now in Asia, where of that part taken from Antiochus, much he conferred upon Eumenes, and the Rhodians, according to the result of the Senate. This done, he undertook an Expedition against the Gallogrecians, or Galatians, a People which having followed Brennus into Greece, after his death, had ninety years before passed into Asia, where they were so terrible, as none denied them tribute before Attalus King of Pergamus. They inhabited vast and high Mountains, and in that respect were with difficulty to be come at; but the Consul by throwing Darts, especially at their huge bodies, made great slaughter and subdued them. Returning home through Thrace, he had well-nigh lost his booty by the Inhabitants that lay in wait for it in the woody passages, and hardly got leave to triumph, because he had undertaken the War on his own head. It is observed, that luxury and idleness were first brought to Rome by his Army, out of Asia, through the provocations to effeminateness there found, and his loose and neglected Government.

8. In the third year after the ending of the War with Antiochus, and the same wherein he dyed, envy procured the fall of those by whom the Victory was obtained. For Scipio Africanus was accused of having defrauded the Treasury of the booty taken in the War, and had a day set him by the Tribunes to answer it before the People. It is not certain who was his accuser, some mentioning M. Nevius, and others the two Patilii Tribunes, set on, as some delivered, by M. Porcius Cato the Enemy of Scipio. The day of hearing being come, and the Tribunes having taken their places in the Rostra, the party entered the Assembly with a great train of Friends and Clients. Silence being made, he put on his triumphal Crown, and told the People, how as that day he had overthrown Hannibal and the Carthaginians; wherefore thinking it convenient for that time not to meddle with any brawling business, he would go and salute the gods in the Capitol, and give them thanks, that as well that day, as at other times, they had given him both will and power to do eminent service for his Country. Then he wished that such of them there present as thought it convenient, would accompany him, and pray that they might have such principal Officers (Principes) as he had been.

9. Going up to the Capitol, the whole Assembly followed him, as also to all the Temples in the City, inasmuch that the very Vestors and Clerks left the Tribunes alone, who also followed, and from accusers turned admirers, (as appeareth from Valerius Maximus) out of very frame. The Tribunes accused him also grievously in the Senate, and desired he might be brought to his answer. He rising up, produced the Books of accounts, wherein was punctually set down all the particulars, but he tore it in pieces before them all, disclaiming to give account for so small a matter in comparison of those vast sums he himself had brought into the Treasury. The next day of appearance he absented himself, and his Brother pretending his indisposition, he was excused, and another day appointed, before which he withdrew himself to Luturnum (or Luternum) a Sea Town of Campania. For he clearly perceived under what envy he laboured, it being also objected against him, that he had spent in idleness all that Summer he lay in Sicily, and his power with Antiochus, who having discharged his Son without ransom, honoured him above all others, which he willingly took upon him, as one, who alone late at the helm, and could steer matters concerning Rome according to his pleasure. In his absence the Tribunes were very fierce against him, yet through the interposition of Tiberius Gracchus (formerly accounted his Enemy) he was not condemned.

10. Lucius Scipio Africanus his Brother was also called to an account, and escaped not condemnation, the money supposed to be retained to his own use, being charged upon his estate; and he was kept from imprisonment merely by the power of Gracchus. The following year was discovered the abominable practice of certain women at the feasts of Bacchus, which being kept in the night, all manner of filthiness and continual murders were committed. At first these festivals were observed but three days in a year, but now five in every month, and men were admitted, whereas they were begun by women. All who being present and drawn in, would not consent to such abominations, were sacrificed as Beasts, a vast number being bewitched with this folly. The matter being revealed to Sp. Posthumus Albinus the Consul, he acquainted the Senate with it, by which, order

11. In the second or third year after this discovery, and the fourth of his exile, died P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus, whether at Linternum, or Rome, is unknown, the place of his burial being also uncertain. That he dyed this year, Livy gathereth, because having been Prince or chief of the Senate at the former Lustrum, this year he was left out, (which none used to be as long as he lived) by L. Valerius Flaccus, and M. Porcius Cato the Censors, the former whereof was chosen into the place. Valerius Maximus telleth us, that he commanded this to be engraven on his Tomb, Ingrata Patria nō ulla quidem mea habes, which sheweth that he was not buried at Rome. He had that hap which usually accompanieth the best men, to find their Country ingrateful, being of excellent parts, and of a kingly spirit, which he ascribed to himself in Spain, when the Natives saluted him by, and would have had him take upon him, the title it self. And upon this account he might be hated by Cato, who though a virtuous man, was morose and fowre. Livy joyneth with his (in the same year) the death of Philopemen, and of Hannibal; so that the three great Captains of the World at that time, left it desolate it were by agreement. Philopemen Captain of the Acheans was through the fall off his Horse, taken in an engagement with the Messenians, and compelled to drink poyson, having done great service for his Country. Hannibal having notice that the Romans would demand him from Antiochus, fled into Creta to the Gortynians. Having great Treasure with him, and knowing himself to be in much danger, because of the Avarice of the Cretans, he filled many barrels with Lead, which covering on the top with Gold, he deposited in the Temple of Diana, trusting the Gortynians with his wealth. Then put he his money into brazen Statues, which he was wont to carry about with him, and cast them before the gate. They then watching the Temple diligently from none so much as him, he got away secretly, and went to Prusias King of Bithynia, who used him in the War against Eumenes. But T. Quintius being sent to Prusias, whether by the Senate on purpose, or upon other occasions, demanded him as the grand enemy of Rome, to be delivered into his hands. He had provided in his house several places for hiding out upon such an occasion; but being better, and no way left to escape, he took poyson, which it's said he carried about him in his ring. So this renowned Captain ended his life in his seventieth year; for which thing Quintius was by many hardly thought of, and got the esteem of an importune and cruel man, as Plutarch writeth.

12. After these things, the Ligurians were often defeated by the Consuls and other Commanders; many a thousand of them being slain, as also of the Celtiberians and other Nations in Spain who were continually rebelling. The Syrians beat the Romans out of their camp, and put them to the rout; Marcius the Consul in vain opposing it; but shortly after they were discomfited by the said Marcius, and afterward fully subdued by Claudius the Consul, who quelled also the Ligurians, as his Colleague Tib. Sempronius Gracchus did the rebellion of Sardinia, with the loss of one thousand and five hundred of the revolvers. About this time Corsica also was subdued. The year following, Cornelius one of the Consuls died at the bath at Cume, into whose place C. Valerius Leucinus was elected. Petilius Spurius the other Consul fighting against the Ligurians, laboured to take a certain Mountain called Letus, concerning which in his speech to his Soldiers he saying, that that day he would take Letus (Hodie ego Letum nique capiam) by rash fighting confirmed what he had said in another sense (cū, wherein Letum signifieth death) than he had meant it. These actions abroad were shortly after followed by the second Macedonian War, or that with Persus, in the five hundred eighty and third year of the City, twenty four after the Peace made with his Father, and seventeen after the conclusion with Antiochus.

13. Persus in a manner succeeded to this War as well as the Kingdom, his Father having intended and made great preparations for it. Puffed up by these preparations, he sought to draw away the Allies of the Romans from their friendship, and abused several of their friends. Their Ambassadors he slighted, refusing to give them audience, which made the Senate resolve upon the War; but it was to be committed to one of the following Consuls; only for the present, Cn. Scipio the Prator of the City was commanded to raise men, and transport them into E-

pirus, there to seize on the Sea-towns; that the Consul might more freely land his Army. Some were sent also into Greece to confirm the States in their friendship and alliance, who also demanding audience of Persus, after long waiting, he renounced the league made with the Romans, as entered into at the beginning of his Reign merely for security. Hereupon the Ambassadors renounced also the confederacy made with him, and after that the Consuls P. Licinius Crassus and C. Cassius Longinus had assumed their Office, the War was propounded to, and decreed by the People.

14. Quintus Martius and others being sent into Greece to establish the confederates in their fidelity, Persus began to bethink himself, and was affrighted, hearing of the motions of the Enemy. He applied himself to Martius about a Treaty for Peace, trusting to that friendship which had passed betwixt their two families. The Ambassadors were glad of this address, and to divert him granted him Truce, that he might send to Rome, for he had all things in a readiness, and might have begun the War, as with great advantage to himself, so too speedily to the Romans; who as yet had neither Army nor Leader arrived. Peace was denied him by the Senate, and A. Attilius was sent to seize upon Larissa the chief City of Thessaly. Whereupon he drew together his Forces, having got a greater Army than any of his predecessors were Masters of since Alexander the Great. He took in some Towns upon his borders, and Licinius the Consul led foraw and unexperienced an Army into Macedonia, and through such difficult and almost unpassable places, as had Persus taken his opportunity, he might easily have destroyed it, as also if he had not too soon retreated in a battel fought shortly after. After this he sent to Licinius, offering to embrace the conditions submitted to by his Father, in paying the tribute, and leaving the Cities to their liberty; which yet would not be granted. Then were Thebes and Alatiars taken in by Laetinius the Prator, and the Consul having had the better in another skirmish, received some Towns, and took up his Winter quarters; whilst Apollonius Claudius in Illyricum lost many men.

15. The year following C. Hostilius the Consul did nothing of moment; yet this he did in reference to the Army; he reduced the Soldiers to that ancient discipline which his predecessor had left fall. Q. Marcius Philippus succeeding him at his first entrance into his Province might easily have been defeated, had he met with a prudent enemy, the ways being so difficult and dangerous, that the Soldiers could scarcely for weariness hold their weapons. And after he had got into the plains he might easily have been shut up on every side, and famished, but that Persus besotted with fear ran away to Pydna, and left the Straights open to him: Yet Martius did nothing of consequence, leaving all to be performed by his Successor L. Æmilius Paulus, who had been Consul seventeen years before. He caused the Eclipse of the Moon to be foretold to his Soldiers, lest they should be discouraged by it, which brought great terror to the Enemy, that knew nothing of the natural cause. He kept them from fighting when they were weary, though the Officers much desired to engage. But the Armies lying incamped on each side of the River Enipeus, it hapned that a Beast passing over from the Roman side, was seized on, and being rescued by degrees drew both the Armies into an engagement, wherein Persus lost the day, and with it his Kingdom. Flying into the file of Crete, when all forsook him, he delivered up himself into the hands of Cn. Octavius. Æmilius severely chastized the Epirots, who had joyned with Persus, plundering and demolishing about seventy of their Towns, whereby so much booty was got, as each Foot-man had two hundred Denarii, and every Horse-man as much more. But the Soldiers having got little or no plunder in Macedonia, nor any of the Kings Treasure, denied their General a Triumph, which yet he obtained; and that very splendid. Of his four Sons, the second eldest he granted to be adopted to Fabius Maximus, and Publius Scipio the Son of Africanus, and of his two youngest, the one dyed five days before his Triumph, and the other three days after, which loss he sustained with great courage. Before his Triumphal Chariot was led Persus with his two Sons, and this same year Triumphed Cn. Octavius King of the Illyrians, whom being the Confederate of Persus he had subdued, and forced to yield himself. This hapned to Macedonia and Illyricum, in the five hundred and eighty sixth year of the City, the said Æmilius, and L. Licinius Crassus being Consuls.

16. In the late War, Eumenes King of Pergamus, and the Rhodiens, being wrought upon by Persus, stood Neuters, whereupon Eumenes coming towards Rome

Sect. 3. Rome, the Senate being unwilling either to declare him friend or foe, made a decree, in General, that no King should come into the City: the Rhodiens with much ado, and after much seeking, were hardly received as friends and confederates. The same year that Perseus was overthrown, Antiochus Epiphanes besieging Ptolemy in Alexandria, upon the desire of the besieged, C. Popilius Lenas an austere man, with C. Decimus, were sent from the Senate to command him to desist, which he obeyed. After this the Romans fought in Liguria and Corfica with various fortune, the Dalmatians who had wasted the Borders of Illyricum and had overcome, and were overcome by C. Marcius, were subdued by Scipio Nasica. But in Spain things went so badly, and such losses were received, that the City was abashed, none being found who would either go Lieutenant to the Consul, or take place of a Tribune upon him, till Scipio Æmilianus (the Son of Paulus Æmilius), but adopted by Scipio the Son of the Æmilian (standing up offered himself, and by his example drew on others. He went Lieutenant to Lucullus the Consul, and behaving himself most gallantly in the War, killed an Enemy in a Duel which had challenged out any one in the Army, and first mounted the Walls of Interetia.

17. Lucullus subdued several Nations in Spain, though Sulpicius Galba unfortunately fought against the Lusitanians. About the same time one Antiochus, an obscure man in Macedonia, but something resembling Philip, counterfeited himself the base Son of Perseus. He was once sent to Rome by Demetrius the King of Syria, but making thence an escape returned, and renewed his claim to Macedonia, which partly by fair means, and partly by constraint, he got into his hands. Juventius the Pretor was first sent against him; but he having strengthened himself with the Thracians, cut him off and all his Army, and invaded Thessaly, whence he was ejected by the help of the Acheans. After this, Q. Metellus the Pretor sufficiently revenged the Commonwealth upon him, for he overthrew him in a great battle, whence he fled to Byzantium, a petty King of Thrace, who delivering him up, he led him in Triumph. Metellus (accounted most fortunate) reduced Macedonia in this third Macedonian War into the form of Province, which shortly after also happened to Africus. For, even now was prosecuting with all earnestness the third and last Punic, or Carthaginian War, and the ruin of the City Carthage it self.

18. Their opinion is not faulty, who profess not to be able to find any Meritorious cause of this War in the Carthaginians, and theirs, who affirm that Carthage was more abated for its competition of Empire, than for any fault it had committed in those times. But there wanted no pretences. For, divers times had Masaniissa King of Numidia, and the Carthaginians, quarrelled about grounds upon the Borders, and often had the Romans sent to take up the quarrel, but especially of late not with indifference had they judged, for that the fault lay in Masaniissa, who being a great friend of theirs, presumed too much upon their affection to himself, and the jealousy wherewith he knew them prejudiced against the other. The Ambassadors also that were sent to Carthage, finding the City full, and flourishing, from that peace they had now enjoyed about fifty years, and provided also for war as well as peace, spake much of the danger which threatened Rome from it; especially Cato, who never came into the Senate, but after that he had spoken his mind to any business, added, This I think, and that Carthage is to be destroyed. He was earnestly contradicted by Scipio Nasica, who feared, that this rival for Empire once being removed, security would breed the destruction of the Commonwealth, as it too truly proved, this security being strengthened by luxury and avarice, which the Æmilian Triumphs had brought in. But Cato's reasons drawn from present danger, so, in the apprehension of the Senate, over-ruled Scipio's forecast, that they resolved upon a War, and kept the resolution close till they could catch at a convenient opportunity and pretence.

19. There being at this time three factions in Carthage, one affected towards the Romans, another standing for the true interest of the State it self, and the third for Masaniissa, this later was expelled by the second, and a Law made that they should never be again received. Those men flying to Masaniissa, he sent Gulussa his Son to intercede for them, who being laid in wait for by Amilcar Samnis, although he escaped, yet thereupon the King besieged Florocopa, a Town he most desired; which act was expressly against the Articles of the League. Adribal went with a great Army to raise the siege, and a bloody battle was fought, wherein the Carthaginians were overthrown; but more dyed of the Plague, being incompassed near a Lake, which by its noysom vapours corrupted the air. Hereby the remnant were forced to yield, and consent to a great Tribute, with the receiving back of their Exiles, and yet were they almost all slain by a party of Horfe sent against them, out of revenge by Gulussa. The Carthaginians therefore had now had an Army in the Field, and that against a confederate of Rome, which was against the tenour of the last League. This advantage the Romans took, and ordered the Consuls to undertake the War, though the other condemned those that had broken the League, and most humbly offered any reasonable satisfaction. M. Manilius Nepos, and L. Marcius Censorinus being now on their journey, it was answered, that they should enjoy all as formerly, if within thirty days they would send three hundred Hostages, (all Sons of Senators, or the principal Citizens) to Lilybeum, and do what the Consuls should further command them. The Carthaginians desirous to give satisfaction within the time limited sent the Children, and when now the Consuls were landed at Utica (which being a Sea-Town convenient for their purpose had been seized on before-hand) thither they sent their Commissioners to wait on them, and know their pleasure. Censorinus the Senior Consul commending their diligence, demanded all their Arms, which without any deceit were delivered up. Now with tears imploring mercy they desired to know their last doom, and were commanded to leave their City (which the Consuls had order to level with the ground) and build another any where in their own Territories, so it were but ten miles from the Sea. This they received with great horror and rage, and all resolved rather to die than forsake, or give way to the ruin of their ancient seat and habitation.

20. The Consuls delayed to begin the War, as not doubting in the least but to take the City thus disarmed and naked at their pleasure. But they found it not so for the Inhabitants acted by indignation and fury, though at first scarce themselves, setled their minds to resistance, men and women worked night and day in making of Arms. Where iron and brass were wanting, they made use of Gold and Silver; and the women gave the hair of their heads to supply the defect of Tow, or Flax. They made also Adribal (whom before for fear of the Romans they had condemned) their General in the field, where he had already a good Army. When the Consuls came against the City, they found such resistance that they were discouraged, and the resolution of the besieged increased hereby. They engaged several times to their disadvantage, and might have suffered much, had not the Army been secured and brought off, through the great wisdom and courage of Scipio Æmilianus, who drew off also Pharaces, the Master of the Carthaginian Horsemen, to his own party; which things procured him an exceeding great name. This year dyed Masaniissa ninety years old, leaving a Son but of four years behind him; and trusting his Kingdom with Scipio, to beat his discretion disposed of to his Children. This same year also dyed Cato, being about eighty five years of age, and lived not to see the too much desired ruin of Carthage.

21. The year following, Calpurnius Piso the Consul, and Manlius the Admiral had no great matters, besieging Clepea, and Hippo (a Town situate betwixt Carthage and Utica) to no purpose. Within Carthage, Adribal Grand-Son to Masaniissa by his Daughter, being joyed in commission with the other Adribal without, was accused by him as intending to betray the City to his Uncle Gulussa, and having nothing to say for himself, or being too flow in it, was knocked on the head by a Form in the Council-house. Now at Rome were all mens eyes upon Scipio Æmilianus, looking on him as destined to end the War; and whereas he fought but the Edileship, and it was against the Law for him to be chosen Consul so young (being but thirty six, whereas the Law required forty three) it was dispensed with for this time, and then was he made Consul, who to ordered the matter, though not wholly during his Consulship, as he demonstrated the people not to have conceived vain hopes concerning him.

22. For, restoring discipline, which had gone much to wrack through the neglect of Piso, he soon after took that part of Carthage, called Megara, and drove the Inhabitants into the Citadel or Burja. Then securing the Ithome leading to the City, he cut off all Provisions from out of the Country, and blocked up the Havens; but the Citizens with incredible industry cut out another passage into the Sea, whereby at certain times they could receive necessities from the Army without. Scipio therefore in the beginning of Winter set upon their Forces lying abroad, whereof he slew seventy thousand, and took ten thousand, so that now no relief could be obtained from without. In the beginning of Spring, he first took the Six days the siege of the Citadel continued. On the seventh it was desired by some that all who would come forth should have their lives, which being granted to all but revolvers, some fifty thousand yielded, and afterward Africanus himself, who was reviled for it by the revolvers (who set fire to the Temple, and therewith burnt themselves) as also by his wife, which threw her self with her two Children into the flames.

23. Then was the City destroyed, being twenty two miles in compass, and so big, that the burning of it continued seventeen days. The Senate at Rome receiving the news joyfully, sent ten of their own Rank whom they joined with Scipio for disposing of the Country. They ordered none of Carthage to be left, and that it should never be rebuilt, laying heavy curses on those that should do it. All the Cities which assisted it in the War were to be razed, and the grounds given to the friends of the People of Rome: the rest of the Towns were to be tributaries, and governed yearly by a Pretor. All the Captives were sold, except some of the chief. And such was the destruction of this renowned City, so famous once for command and Empire, and rival to Rome it self, after it had stood about seven hundred years, in the fourth after the beginning of the War, the six hundred and eighth of Rome, the third of the one hundred and fifty eighth Olympiad, and the fifth of Ptolemy Physcon. From the destruction of Carthage to the War with Mithridates King of Pontus, which afforded the occasion to the first Civil War.

Containing the space of fifty eight years.

The Achaean war, and the destruction of Corinth.

1. This year was fatal, not only to the greatest City of Africa, but of Greece also; Corinth that famous Mart-town being levelled with the ground. The occasion was given by the Achaean themselves, who violated the Roman Ambassadors (though whether by word or deed is uncertain) who were sent to dissolve their Communality, and leave the Cities to their own peculiar Laws, which because of this union and fellowship had been too formidable. They had also in conjunction with the Boeotians and Thrace, made War against the Lacedaemonians, their friends and allies of Rome, because they would not be subject to them. Upon these grounds the Senate decreed the War, which Metellus as yet in Macedonia first undertook; who drawing down his Army through Thessaly into Boeotia, there overthrew Critolaus, then took Thibes, with Megara, and coming to the Athens was there treating of Peace, when Li. Mummius the Consul came into this his Province. He overthrew Diogenes the Achaean General, after which he entered Corinth and razed it, because there the Ambassadors had been abused. The men were slain, and the women and children sold, with all such slaves as the Achaean Ol. 158. ann. 3. had manumitted for the Wats. As Scipio, who destroyed Carthage (as his Grand-Father before him for conquering it) had the surname of Africanus, and Metellus for his reducing Macedonia, that of Macedonicus; so this year Mummius for this success obtained the Surname of Achaicus, and according to the custom, having others joined with him, reduced those parts and all Greece with Epirus into the form of a Province, called afterwards Achaia, not Greece, because the Greeks were subdued when the Achaean had the chief command, as Pausanias writeth.

Varius up in Spain.

2. Now was it seventy four years since the Romans, in the second year of the second Punic War, entered Spain in an hostile manner, and since that time, especially since the departure of Scipio Africanus the elder, many had the risings and struglings of that People been, of all others most impatient of the yoke. Now was Varius up in Arms, who of a shepherd became a robber, and of a robber a General over such-like as himself, and made the Romans work sufficient for the space of fourteen years, in which time he defeated many Armies. Q. Fabius Maximus Sempronius (or rather Sempronius, being Brother to Scipio Sempronius, and adopted by Fabius Maximus) after some success was yet by him brought to such straits, as glad he was to ask Peace upon equal terms, which Capis the Consul of the following year, refusing to stand to; received Orders from the Senate accordingly to prosecute the War. Capis attempted at unawares to destroy him; but he eluded, and sending Ambassadors to treat of Peace, Capis lay in wait on them, that returning they murdered him, to their own shame, and the Consul's small credit, in his bed.

3. But, a more dangerous War than this threatened from Vannantia, a Town of no great bigness, yet peopled with most valiant, though but few Inhabitants. Before Vannantia his death they had foiled Q. Pompeius the Consul several times, and forced him to condescend to a dishonourable Peace, which though he denied, was sufficiently proved, and by favour only he escaped that punishment which fell on Mancinus, who being constrained to accept of the same terms, was delivered up to the Enemy; but (as the Sannites formerly did by another after the defeat at Caudinum) they refused to receive him. After this Brutus defeated many thousands of the Lusitanians, and overthrew the Gallacians; but Lepidus the Proconsul set upon the Vasces, a harmless People of the highestmost Spain, or Hispania Terracensis, (for in the 559 year of the City, Spain was divided into Citerior or Terracensis, and Ulterior or Betia, and Lusitania, two Provinciae being yearly sent thither, the number of which Officers was therefore upon this occasion increased to six) by whom he was utterly defeated. These things so afflicted the Roman Soldier, that he almost quaked at the sight of a Spaniard, and at Rome Men were seized with great fear and shame. Therefore Scipio Aemilianus Africanus must be created Consul the second time, as the only refuge and hope of his Country.

4. At the first he restored discipline, the want of which had spoiled all, but then coming to engage, found the courage of the Enemy such, that he resolved to fight no more, but lay close siege to Vannantia, and govern himself according to the comportment of Affairs. At length the Besieged, greatly frightened, offered to yield upon reasonable Conditions, or fight if they might have Barrel given them, which being denied, having drunk strong drink on purpose, they assailed the Beliegers so fiercely, that the Romans had run, but that Scipio was the General. At last they fired the City over their own heads, and scarcely one of them remained to be led in triumph. This famous City was seated in the highestmost Spain, in the head of Gallacia, and the confines of the Cultherians. It had with four thousand Men, for the space of fourteen years, slain Florus, or twenty according to Strabo, born the brute of forty thousand Romans, and many times put them to shameful flight, with great slaughter. Scipio destroyed it, after he had for a year and three months continued the Siege, fourteen years after he had to deal with Carthage, in the 624 of the City, A. M. 3871. P. Minius Strophus and L. Calpurnius Piso Prages (both learned Men) being Consuls. At this time a servile War was raised in Sicily by one Ennus a Syracusan, the Slave of Anigens of Enna. It was followed by Calpurnius Piso the Consul, and finished by P. Rutilius Nepos his Successor. Twenty thousand Slaves were by him slain in Battle: Ennus being cast in Prison died (in his said, of the lowlie distate) at Margantia.

5. Ever since the beginning of the Tarentine War to this time, for the space of almost 150 years was there much modesty, abstinence, self-denial, valour and virtue amongst the Romans in general, of which yet especially the Fabii, Fabritii, Marcelli, Curii, Metelli, the Scipios and Emilii have left Examples admirable to be commended to all Posterity, such were their cautious and politic, yet just and noble carriage, both at home and abroad. But now the Athen Expeditions and Triumphs having brought in excess and riot, and the ruins of Carthage having taken away fear, idleness with security by degrees stole in upon them, and the infirmity of the Government (after that fear, which hitherto had preserved it safe, was removed) again effectually shewed it self. For though after this time many a People was subdued and brought under, and much glory gotten abroad, yet was it stained by emulations, jealousies, and contentions at home; and even by shedding the Blood of one another in an open, though civil, feud, which first came to pass while the former things were performed in Spain by Scipio.

6. Thiberius Sempronius Gracchus, Son to one of the same name; (who had been twice Consul, and once Censor) by Cornelia an excellent Woman, Daughter of Africanus the elder, being Quaestor to Mancinus the second in Spain, had in hand in the dishonourable Peace made by him, for which, being re-elected on by the Senate, or at least thinking himself so to be, acted now by shame and fear, in distast of the Nobility, as it's said, he cast in his head how to become gracious and popular with the Commons. Procuring himself to be chosen Tribune, he preferred a Law, forbidding any Man to possess above five hundred Acres of the publick Grounds, and ordering the overplus to be divided to the poor. For, such Grounds as the People of Rome took from their Enemies, they were wont, if tilled, to divide to their own Citizens; if not arable, they then let them out to farm by the Censors to Italians, or the ordinary sort of Romans, on condition, that if they plowed them, they should pay the tenth part of the Corn, and the fifth of other Fruits: and if they bred up Cattel, they were charged with a certain Rent. But it came to pass, that by incredible impudence and licentiousness of the Rich, the Husband-men were outed of their ancient Possessions, which by Purchasing, and other ways, they got wholly into their hands, so that the Publick was defrauded of its Revenue, and the Poor of their Livelihoods. For restraining the avarice of the Rich, the Lex Licinia and Sempronia were enacted. Gracchus increased the former by adding that, left the Law should be wrested, half should be given to the Children, and the rest divided to such Poor as had nothing. And if any went about to enlarge their Portion by Purchase, Triumviri or three Men should be yearly appointed to judge what Ground was publick, and what private.

7. This nettled the Nobility exceedingly, who, by virtue of this Law, were to part with their Inheritances; and one of his Collegues, Oscavus by name, opposed it, for which he so handled him, as glad he was to quit his place, into which Gracchus chose Q. Mammia, one of his own Faction. This severity being without precedent, much alienated even the minds of the multitude from Gracchus, who also perceiving there was not ground enough to quiet them all, (the expectation of whom he had now raised) he offered a Law for distributing the Money which Attalus King of Pergamus had left, together with his Kingdom, to the People of Rome. The Senate being assembled to consult what was to be done, and all being of opinion that P. Murius Scaevola the Consul should defend the Common-wealth by Arms, he refused to do any thing by force. Hereupon Scipio Nasica taking up his Gown under his left Arm, held up his right Hand, and bad every one that loved the State to follow him. Up he went into the Capitol, being accompanied with most of the Senate, many Equestes, and some Commoners, where Gracchus was speaking to the People, and endeavouring to be chosen Tribune for the following year. They fell upon him and his hearers, whereof they killed three hundred, and amongst them himself, with a piece of a Seat as he ran down from the Capitol. Thus he fell by the means of his own Kinman, being a most excellently accomplished Man, though too violent in a manner honest enough. And this was the first Blood which in a sedition was the Romans first drew from one another, observed by Cicero to have been at the same time that the other Scipio destroyed Namantia.

8. At this time there were some Rumors at Athens, and in Delos, being as sparks of that fire formerly kindled by Ennus in Sicily, which with some trouble were extinguished; neither was Italy altogether free from them. But a more noble War infused about the Kingdom of Asia. For, Attalus King of Pergamus or Asia, (for so he is called, because of a good part of Asia given to Eumenes his Father) by his last Will left the People of Rome his Heir: But after his death Arifonius his base Brother seized on the Kingdom as his Inheritance. First was Licinius Crassus the Consul sent against him, but was overthrown, and being taken, struck one of the Soldiers on the Eye, on purpose to provoke him to kill him, which he did. He having thus miscarried, (though he was assisted in his enterprise by several Kings) his Successor M. Perperna hastening into Asia, set upon Arifonius at unawares, when he was not yet recovered of the security contracted by his Victory, and overthrowing him in Battle, besieged him in Stratonice, where he forced him by famine to yield, and shortly after the Consul died at Pergamus. The remainder of the War was finished by M. Aquilius the next years Consul, who poisoned Fountains for taking in some Cities, and having together with those joined with him, (according to the Custom) seized the Province with sufficient oppression of the People, he led Arifonius in Triumph, though taken by another Man's labour; who by order of the Senate was strangled in Prison, in the 65 year of the City, the said M. Aquilius Nepos, and C. Sempronius Tuditanus being Consuls.

9. The civil diffentions died not with Gracchus, (who perished four years before) his Law for division of the grounds being still in force, and the people being sensible of the equity thereof, as they accounted it; for that the rich had got all into their hands, and those that underwent all the toil in Conquering the Land, were ready to starve, being also exhauisted by the Wars, and almost none but slaves left in Italy for ordering of the grounds. Gracchus had a younger Brother called Caius, whom together with Fulvius Flaccus, and Papirius Carbo, he had made Triumviri for division of the grounds. He with his Collegues undertook the patronage of the Law, and prosecuting his Enterprise with all earnestness, such trouble arose about the division, in accounting and removing, that the Italians finding themselves griev'd betook themselves to Scipio Africanus. He refused not to undertake their Patronage, yet in the Senate spoke nothing against the Law; only thought fit that the executive power thereof should be taken from the Triumviri, and given to some others. The Senate most willingly did this, and conferred it on Sempronius Tuditanus the Consul, who finding the work troublesome, went his way under pretence of the War in Illyricum. There being now none to fly to in this Case, the People conceived great indignation against Scipio, as ingrateful, and favouring the Italians more than themselves, from which his Enemies took occasion to raise further jealousies. Indeed hearing of Gracchus his death at Namantia by repeating a verse in Horace he liked well of what was done to him, and being at his return asked concerning his death, he approved of it before all the People, which being offered at him for it, he rebuked the multitude with contumelious language. But at night going to his Chamber, he meditated of something he intended to speak to the People the day following, and in the morning was found dead in his Bed; it's uncertain by what means. Cornelia the Mother of the Gracchi was suspected to have joynd with her Daughter, his Wife (who being not overhandsome, neither loved him much, nor was over much loved) in practising something upon him. No inquisition was made after his death, and he was buried privately, though so great a man, and one that had been the Pillar of the Common-wealth.

10. The Possessors of the grounds still made delays in the division, and some thought that they to whom they were to be divided should in way of recompence be made free of the City, which however pleasing to others, was highly displeasing to the Senate. While men muttered much of these things, Calpurnius procured the Tribuneship, and then bearing a grudge to the Senate effectually shewed it. He preferred a Law for dividing of the publick Corn to every man monthly, and getting his Office continued to him for another year, that he might gratify the Equestes, brought down the Office of judging corrupt Officers from the Senators unto them. Romulus, as we said, instituted three Centuries of Equestes; or Horse-men, whereof one from himself was named Romulus, another from Titus Tatius, Tatienus; and the third from Lucius (or Lucius) Lucerius under Romulus, and the Kings, they were also called Celeres, Fleximanes, and Trojillii. Afterwards Tarquinius Priscus added three hundred more, and so there continued to be six hundred Equestes. But though they were in the Common-wealth from the beginning, yet had they no peculiar order, authority, or rank, till this Law of Gracchus, by which it was enacted, that their judgements should be peculiar to them. Their reputation thence forward increased with various success along the Publicans till Cicero's time, who boasting himself of this order, procured it such honour, that from his Consulship it came to be as a peculiar order by way of service, being added to the Senators and Plebeians; out of which respect it was written after them both. Thus in several times were there several Ranks and Distinctions; the first distinction was betwixt Patrians and Plebeians; then Plebeians swelling from the other a Communion in the greatest Offices and places, though Patrians might still be distinguished in relation to Families, yet all Dignities being common to the rest with them, such Plebeians as could rise to be Senators, constituted with the other the Senator or rank (which included the Patrians, though the Patrians not it) the second distinct from the Plebeians which still contained the Equestes. Then, as we said, the Equestes by the means of Gracchus and Cicero, brake out from amongst the Plebeians into a rank of their own.

How the Senators lost in the translation of the judicial power to the Equites by Caio.

It destroyed with his party.

11. By this Law (saith Florus) Gracchus divided the People of Rome, that he made it double headed (bicipitem, which expression Varro also used, as appeared from N. nius) and the Equites having the lives, and fortunes of Senators and Nobles in their hands, by seizing on the Revenue, with authority piled the Commonwealth. He took the best time that could be devised for the making of the Law, because the Senators having had hitherto the power of judging, were become odious of late, in that for many they had acquired Aurelius Cotta, Salinator, and M. Agrippa, persons Capitally guilty of corruption. It's said, he boasted, that by this Law he had cur'd the sickness of the Senatorial rank. And so he did; for by the authority of judicature they passed sentence upon Roman Citizens, Italians and Senators, noting them with ignominy, banishing, or putting them to death at pleasure, till such time as their power was abated, as will be seen. For in the Comitia, or Assemblies, they conspired with the Tribunes, and obtaining thereby what they pleased, had all things in their power, and flourished with riches, whereas nothing remained to Senators, but a vain shew of Dignity. The Senators prevailed with Servilius Cæpio when Consul, to make themselves partakers of the power of judging, by a Law which he got preferred; yet still had the Equites the better, for three hundred Senators only were added to them, who were in number six hundred. By the Laws of Levius Drusus, Sylla and Cotta their power was abated, Drusus making it but equal in judgement with that of Senators: Sylla transferred it wholly to the Senators, and Aurelius Cotta communicated the power of judging to three sorts; viz. Senators, Equites, and the Tribuni Aerarii. But the Equites alone were wont to farm the customs of the Centors for five years, and thence from their farming the Public Revenue had the name of Publicans. These were the principal of the Equitarian Order. The Ornament of the City, and the strength of the State, who made so many Companies as there were Provinces subject to the payment of Toll, Tribute, Custom, or Impost.

12. But C. Gracchus, further than this, to gratify the Commons, repaired the high-ways throughout Italy, sent forth Colonies, bade the Italians sue for their freedom, and gave power of suffrages to other Friends and Allies, contrary to the custom; whom the Senate forbade to come near the City, at such time as they knew his Laws would be offered, and to please the people, they gave way to the sending out of twelve Colonies. Gracchus thus frustrated, departed into Africk with Flaccus his Collegue, intending to plant a Colony where Carthage stood; but was disappointed therein also. Wolves, it's said, removing the bounds of the intended City by night, as they were laid by day, whereupon the South-layers pronounced the design unlawful. Having been twice Tribune, he stood for it the third time, and had many voices; but his Collegues offended by his vehement carriage, got Mimmius Rex chosen into his place, who rescinded many of his Laws. Gracchus insraged heretofore when the Assembly was met, went up to the Capitol, accompanied with Flaccus and his Friends privily Armed. There Attilius the Crier of Optimus the Consul taking him by the hand, and desiring him to spare his own Country, was slain. He then went about to excuse the fact to the People, but could not be heard, and so together with Flaccus, and his other Confederates got them home; the Consul keeping strict watch all night in the City. After this they were cited by the Senate to come and give an account of their actions, but they betook themselves to the Aventine Mount, where fortifying themselves, they offered in vain liberty to all slaves that would come in to them. But the Consul sending a party against them, Gracchus fled into a Grove beyond Tiber, and procured his slave to kill him, who instantly after he had cut off his Head, run himself through with the bloody Sword. Flaccus flying to a Friends house was betrayed and slain: and of their party, through the severe inquisition of the Consul, were put to death three thousand persons, 11 years after the death of the elder Gracchus. In the Consulship of this Optimus was there such a temper of the air called Cochinus; that Wine being congealed through the heat of the Sun into a consistency of Honey, kept good for near 200 years, and from him had the name of Vinum Optimianum; being still preserved in Plinius (a) his time, though (b) Patriculus denieth there was any in his, which was long before.

13. The death of Gracchus (whose Head was not Sacrofanct, as Florus imagineth, being out of the Office of Tribune) for the present allayed the distempers of the Commonwealth. For, presently after was a Law made, that one might sell his Land, which the elder Gracchus had forbidden, whereby the poor, partly by purchase, and partly by constraint, were again dispossessed. Afterward the Law for division was fully abrogated by Sp. Borus, and the grounds left to their ancient Owners, with this condition, that a Tribute out of them should be paid to the people, and this divided man by man. But not long after another Tribune abrogated the Tribute it self, and so nothing was left remaining to the poor.

14. During these Domestick troubles the Sardinians rebelled, and were reduced by L. Aurelius, and the Fregellans were punished with the loss of their City by L. Optinus the Prator. Upon Africk fell such a Pestilence, as for its Original, and effects, was strange and wonderful. It arose from an infinite number of Locusts, which having overpread the ground, and destroyed not only Corn and other Fruits, but even Trees and dry things themselves, at length by a wind were driven into the Mediterranean Sea, and there purifying corrupted the Air. Hence ensued a most fearful Plague, both of Men, Cattle and Fowls. In Numidia, where Micipsa was now King, eight hundred thousand died; upon the Sea-Coasts about Carthage and Utica two hundred thousand; and in Utica it self thirty thousand Soldiers there lying in Garrison, fifteen hundred being reported to have been carried out in one day through one Gate alone. Two years after, Q. Metellus the Consul subdued the Islands Baleares, and refrained Piracy there maintained, and at the same time was carried on the War, called Bellum Allobrogicum; which hence arose. The Salies in Gall beyond the Alps invaded the Nasibians, the friends of the People of Rome, and for this were chastized by Fulvius, and subdued by C. Sextus Calpurnius. Tentomalus their King flying out of the battle, was received, and protected by the Allobroges, who also invaded the Ædii, friends of Rome, and drew into Confederacy the Arverni. First, Cn. Domitius Enobarbus overthrew them, and (by the use of Elephants especially) slew twenty thousand, and took three thousand Prisoners. After him Q. Fabius Maximus (Grandson of Paulus Æmilius, by his Son adopted into the Fabian family) defeated them, with the Arverni and Ruteni, in a bloody battle, wherein one hundred and twenty thousand are reported to have been slain, and taking Bituitus (or Betulus) King of the Arverni Prisoner, obtained the surname of Allobrogicus. These Allobroges inhabited about the Countries now called Dauphine and Savoy: the Ruteni nearer to the Sea; the Arverni more toward the North; the Ædii in Burgundy, the Salii or Sylles in Piemont. Now was Gallia Narbonensis reduced into a Gallia lib. 1.

15. But the Scordisci, a People of Gallia Original, inhabiting Thrace, defeated the Roman Army under Caro the Consul, yet were afterwards driven back into their own Country by Didius the Prator, and the Consul Drusus; and after this gave occasion of a glorious Triumph to Mimmius, of which honour Metellus also had partaken. These translations of Thrace are of all others most unknown; either because they are confounded with those of Ilyricum, Pannonia, Mylia, or Macedonia; or because what has been written of that subject in particular, hath miscarried. Now we arrive at two Wars both together, and carrying noise sufficient with them through the variety of events, and fullness of History: viz. that with Jugurtha, and the other with the Cimbri and Tentones. Now to know the Original of the former, it's necessary to fetch thence a little higher.

16. Masaniassa King of Mumidia, that old and constant friend of the Romans, left three sons: Gulussa, Masanabal, and Micipsa, of whom the last (his Brothers being dead) obtained the Kingdom alone. He had two sons, Himempsal and Adherbal, with whom he brought up Jugurtha his brother Masanabal's son in the same condition, and receiving Letters from Scipio out of Spain, who gave him large commendations (and under whom he served with his Uncle's Auxiliary forces) he adopted him. When Micipsa was dead, Jugurtha murdered Himempsal, and attempted to do as much for Adherbal, who fled to the Romans for succour. By this time avarice and injustice had so much possessed the City, that Jugurtha sensible of it, sent Ambassadors to Rome with full hands, who so wrought upon the Senate, that might overcame right, and it was decreed, that ten Commissioners should be sent to divide the Kingdom between them. The Commissioners thinking they might lawfully imitate those that sent them, were bribed to bestow the richest and best Peopled part upon Jugurtha, who therewith not satisfied, after their departure, fell suddenly upon Adherbal, besieged him in Cirtiba; and at length getting him into his hands made him away. For this War was at length decreed against him by the Senate, and committed to the management of L. Calpurnius Bestia the Consul, in the 642<sup>d</sup>. year of <sup>A.M. 3899.</sup> the City, the second of the 167th Olympiad, the seventh of <sup>P.C. 642.</sup> Job. Hyrcanus, P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, and the said Calpurnius being Consuls.

Calpurnius invaded Numidia with great fierceness, and took in some Towns, but was presently stopped in his career, being allured with the golden balls of Jugurtha; so that a Treaty of Peace was set on foot. The Senate was moved hereat, and at the power of M. Scæurus, who accompanying the Consul as his Friend and Counsellor, was guilty of the same crime. The People were persuaded to send L. Cassius Longinus the Prætor to fetch Jugurtha to Rome upon a publick Faith, to discover his Complices, whereof he had by Gold procured many in the Senate it self. Cassius persuaded him to cast himself upon the Peoples mercy, and he came to the City in a mourning habit. But coming into the Assembly to do as he was Commanded, Belus the Tribune bade him hold his Peace, being also bribed to put off the business, and delude the People. At this time there was one Maffius the Son of Gullus his Cousin-German at Rome, who when he had murdered Adherbal escaped out of Africa. Him Albinus the Consul, (who gladly would have had to do with Numidia) persuaded to beg the Kingdom of the Senate: but Jugurtha having some notice hereof, procured him to be killed, and conveyed away the murderer into Numidia. Hereupon within a few days he was commanded to be gone, and being out of the City, he looked back upon it, and uttered these words, O City that wouldst be sold if there was but a Chapman for thee. This he said, as having himself experience of the corruption of its Inhabitants; so horribly were they now degenerated from the fidelity and abstinence of the preceding age.

Albinus followed him with an Army, and at first seemed to be very ambitious of finishing the War, before the creation of new Consuls. But upon some account he prolonged it, and his Brother, by virtue of some compact, withdrew from Suthul, where the treasure of the Kingdom lay, when he was about to besiege it. The Centurions also were so corrupted, as Jugurtha was suffered to break into the Camp, whence beating out the Army, he either forced, or by former agreement, brought Albinus to submit unto most dishonourable terms. In this condition Metellus the following Consul found affairs and the Army spoiled for want of discipline. But bringing the Soldiers into good order, within the space of two years he overthrew Jugurtha several times, outed him of several Towns, and chased him further than his own borders, which constrained him to submit and beg Peace; but the conditions thereof he brake, and the former hostility returned. Now was there one C. Marius, Legatus or Lieutenant to Metellus, whose by his good demeanour won much upon the Soldiers, for being desirous of the Consulship, he took all ways to purchase their favour. He calumniated Metellus privately to the Merchants at Utica, avowing that he was able with half of the Army, and that within a few days, to take Jugurtha. By these Speeches he procured many complaints to be written to Rome against Metellus, and getting leave to go thither, obtained his desire, being created Consul, and had the management of the War committed to him, which now was even ended. Notwithstanding, the People was so grateful to Metellus, that at his return, being certified what he had done, they both granted him a Triumph, and bestowed on him the surname of Numidicus.

Several of the Metelli continued firmness from Countries conquered.

19. This was the fourth Metellus, who from the Nation subdued, obtained a surname. The first was Q. Cassius Metellus surnamed Macedonicus, of whom we have formerly spoken. Much is said of this mans felicity, whereof this is chief, that when he died, he had, of four Sons, seen three Consuls, and the fourth Prætor. Of these, the first was Q. Metellus surnamed Baleares from his subduing the Baleares, who was Consul in the 631st year of the City: the second L. Metellus, who was Consul in the 635th year: the third M. Metellus, Consul in the 639th year, the same wherein his Father died; and the fourth C. Metellus of Prætorian rank. But the third of this name who obtained a surname was L. Cassius Metellus, surnamed first Diadematus, because having an Ulcer in his forehead, he kept it bound a long time, and afterwards Dalmaticus, from the Dalmatians whom he subdued to get him a Triumph; this People having nothing offended. He was Son to L. Cassius Metellus Calvus, who was Consul in the 612th year. Lastly, the fourth thus surnamed was this Q. Cassius Metellus Numi-

Numidicus, who was Consul, together with M. Junius Silanus in the 645 year of the City.

Marius, after some time, took the City Capsa, a place very rich and strong, and after this another called Mulucha. Jugurtha finding himself too weak, drew in to his assistance Boochus King of Mauritania his Father in Law, by the help of whose Horse he very much weakened the Roman Army. Coming to raise the Siege at Cirta, before which Marius was laid down, what by the number of the Horse reported to be sixty thousand, and what by heat and dust, the Romans were sorely distressed, and the fight continued dangerous and terrible to them for three days: Then a Tempest of Rain fell, which spoiled their Enemies Weapons, and relieved Marius his Men, almost killed with thirst; and the course of fortune changing, the two Kings were defeated and fled. In another Battle Marius, as he's said, killed ninety thousand, after which Boochus began to repent of his enterprize, and sent to Rome to enter into a League, which he could not procure, but obtained pardon of his fault. Not long after, Marius took Jugurtha in an Ambush, whither he had drawn him by specious pretences, and delivered him up to Sylla his Quæstor, who had brought over some Forces gathered in Italy. Sylla having little or no skill in matters of War before, under him got that skill, which afterwards he used against his General. Jugurtha being led in Triumph by Marius with his two Sons, was after, by order of the Senate, put to death, and so the War ended, after about seven years continuance. Numidia was not now made a Province, as some have thought; for we find other four Kings, on which it was bestowed, viz. Hiempsal, Hiarbas, and Juba, concerning whom we may have occasion to speak hereafter. Now is to be described the War with the Cimbri.

21. The Cimbri inhabited the Chersonesus, from them named Cimbria, (now Holsatia) and were a vagabond People. With a sort of Germans called Teutones (from Tento or Tuisco the Patriarch, or reputed god of that Nation) they brake into Ilyricum in the 641 year of the City, and there put to flight Cn. Carbo the Consul, to whom the Province had fallen by lot. Some three years after they made an irruption into Gall and Spain, but being repelled, sent to Silanus the Consul, desiring some ground wherein to plant and settle themselves. This being denied by the Senate, they betook themselves from intreaties to force, and setting upon the Consul, put him to flight, entertaining M. Scæurus sent against them into Gall in the same manner. Scæurus was succeeded by the Consul L. Cassius Longinus, who pursuing the Tigurini (now Swissers) to the Ocean, was circumvented by them, and slain, with L. Piso, a Man of Consular Dignity, his Lieutenant. After him Cæpio the Consul made War upon the Tectosages or Tolosani, whose chief City Tolose (now in Gascogne) he took, and therein a great Treasure, which some said was taken out of the Temple at Delphos by the Galls. His command was continued to him for the following year, as Proconsul, in conjunction with Manilius (or Mallius) his Successor. These two could not agree, but divided the Army, and parted the Province betwixt them. At length they were overthrown in a bloody Battle by the Cimbri, to whom the Teutons, Tigurini, and Ambrones, another People of Gall joyned themselves: eighty thousand Men were slain, and forty thousand Lackies and Drudges, as also both the Camps taken. Cæpio for this was cast into Prison, where he died, these great defeats being charged upon his sacrilege, of which those Galls that were guilty, were still followed and consumed by one plague after another. After this, the Cimbri made another Expedition into Spain; but being thence repelled by the Celtiberians, returned into Gall, whence, with the Teutons and Ambrones, they relolved to pass over the Alpes into Italy.

22. C. Marius having vanquished Jugurtha, was in his absence made Consul the second time, to manage the War against the Cimbri. Whilst they continued in Spain, he waged War against their friends the Tolosani, whose King Copilius was taken by Sylla his Lieutenant. Being created Consul again the following year, he neglected to fight till their fury was abated. In his fourth Consulship they were ready in three Bands to pass over the Alpes, which he considering, attended their Motions. His Army was almost oppressed with thirst, the Teutons and Ambrones lying betwixt it and the water, which made him desirous to engage with them, and coming to fight, in two days he utterly destroyed them, taking Prisoner Theobocchus their King. The Cimbri escaped him, and got over into Italy, though

Marius overthrew Jugurtha and Boochus.

To Catalus did Marius join himself now the fifth time Consul, for carrying on the War, and being challenged to give Battle, flew one hundred and forty thousand, and took sixty thousand. Their Wives retired, fighting from the Chariots, and when they saw all desperate, killed first their Children, and then themselves. The third Band of the Ligurians came to nothing; and so an end was put to this War, on the third of the month Septilis, as Plutarch writeth, after it had continued twelve years, in the 653 year of the City, C. Marius the fifth time, and M. Aquilius Nepos being Consuls, the former whereof was counted the preserver of his Country, and contented himself with one Triumph. And his Colleague put an end to the second Servile War in Sicily, which now had lasted almost four years.

of Saturninus

23. These dangers abroad did not suppress domestic troubles. There was one L. Alpinus Saturninus, who having been Questor at Ostia during a dearth, was put out of his place by the Senate, for which he conceived great displeasure against it, and to shew it, procured the Tribuneship. By his help especially Marius obtained the fourth Consulship. But after his year was out, Metellus Numidicus being Censor, would have removed him from the Senate, but he was hindered by his Colleague; and to revenge this, he stood to be Tribune the second time. Now was Marius Consul the fifth time, and there being nine of the ten Tribunes chosen, and A. Nonius standing in competition with him, by the assistance of Marius he murdered him, and got the place. Now being again in power, he preferred a Law for dividing of such Lands as Marius had recovered in Gall, and compelled the Senate to swear to it, which Metellus refusing to do, he set him a day to answer it before the People; but for fear of him and Marius, Metellus fled to Smyrna. Saturninus being Tribune the third time, and finding C. Memmius to stand for the Consulship; he also made him away to prefer Glaucius the Prator, a Man most addicted to his own Party. At these things the Senate being startled, took up resolution, and Marius now the sixth time Consul, seeing him in a falling condition, withdrew himself from his friendship. The Consuls were, as dangerous times, impowered by the Senate to see that the Common-wealth received no damage. Marius therefore with his Colleague L. Valerius Flaccus, set upon Saturninus in the public meeting-place, and drove him and his followers into the Capitol, where for want of water (Marius having cut the Pipes) they were forced to yield. This they did upon his faith given for their safety; for Saturninus and Glaucius much relied upon him, not sticking to give out, that they were but the actors of his designs. Notwithstanding, they were killed in the Court-house by the Equires, which brake in amongst them; and Metellus, through the labour of his Son especially, was re-called, with the general applause of the People.

24. For the space of about eight years after, there was not any open Sedition; yet great dissatisfaction amongst those of the Senatorian Order. For, it lay under great grievances, by reason of the Power of Judicature, which was by Gracchus his Law brought down to the Equires, by whom they were cruelly, and despitefully used, their Lives, Liberties, and Estates being wholly in their Power. The Common-wealth was even bought and sold, the Publicans, who farmed the Customs, and publick Revenues, being, as Equires, both Judges and Parties. It hapned, that thirty years after Gracchus his Law, M. Livius Drusus the Tribune cast in his mind how to restore the Fathers to their ancient Power, and yet not offend the Equires. He preferred therefore a Law, that because the Senators were reduced to a small number, as many Equires should be added to them, and the Power of Judicature committed to this Body. But herewith neither Party was satisfied. Not the Senators, because they disdained that the other should be equal to them, and neither the Equires; for that they feared the Power would at length be wholly removed from them. Cepio also, one of Drusus his Colleagues, (not that Cepio, as some mistake, who had been formerly Consul, had proposed such a Law, which took note, he himself being condemned, and dying in Prison as was said) opposed him, and coming into the Senate, there accused some of the chief of unlawful seeking for Offices. Drusus to withstand his endeavours; by the favour of the People proposed again the Agrian Law, and that the Allies and Confederates of Italy, now Possessors of the Lands, might not be aggrieved; he gave them hopes to make them free of the City. Great concourse there was, and as great great contention. Q. Marcus Philippus the Consul opposed the Law for division of Lands, and for that was soundly buffeted by a Traveller. Drusus in this particular disappointed, still bent his mind how to make good what he had offered to the Italians; but going home, accompanied with a great multitude, he was stabbed in the Court of his own house, it's unknown by whom, the Knife being left in his body, and died within a few hours. He was a Man excellently accomplished, both with understanding and morals, whose good intentions had not the fortune to be rightly understood by the great ones, but to dissatisfie all Parties. And still more unfortunate he was in that great and dangerous War, which by his means (though not intentions) was kindled, and which being foreseen or feared, might perhaps have no small influence into his death.

25. This War is called by divers names. Sometimes Bellum Sociale, because of the Associates of the People of Rome, who managed it: sometimes Bellum Mariscum, from the Marfi, who began it: and otherwhiles Bellum Italicum, from Italy the Seat of it, Corfinium a City of the Peligni, being before all others chosen for the place of the Conspiracy. The occasion of it was the disdain conceived by the Italians, because they were not admitted to the freedom of the City, which had been partly promised them thirty six years before by Flaccus the Consul, who being earnest for it, was diverted into Gall by the Senate, and afterwards joyning himself in the Tribuneship with the younger Gracchus, to no purpose endeavouring with him the passing of it; with whom also, as is formerly shewn, he lost his life. Now again, their expectation was heightened by Drusus; but then was he murdered, and all the great ones banished who stood for them, by a Law which the Equires by force of Arms obtained, who hoped that having the Power of Judicature in themselves, the profit would be great which would arise in ridding away their Enemies. They also thought they had reason enough to expect this Privilege from that City, which was maintained both in its subsistence and Empire by their valour, they ever sending out Forces double in number to those of the Romans. Upon these grounds they resolved to procure by force what could not be by fair means obtained, sending Messengers to and fro, and for the performance of what was agreed on, receiving Hostages from one another.

26. This being known late enough at Rome, so busied with its private seditious contests, Spies were sent out into the several quarters. One of them seeing a young Man of Asculum carried into another City as a Hostage, therewith acquainted Servilius the Proconsul, who going to Asculum, and chiding the Citizens, was set upon and slain, together with all the Romans. After this, the Conspiracy being quite discovered, all broke out into open Rebellion: The Marfi, Peligni, Vestini, Marrucini, Ferentani, Hirpini, Picentes, Pompeiani, Venustini, Apulians, Lucanians, and the old Enemies of the Romans, the Samnites. They thought good first to send to Rome to complain; but the Messengers could not be admitted without repentance for what was already done. Hereupon the War was committed to both the Consuls, L. Julius Caesar, and P. Rutilius Lupus, to whom were added Cn. Pompeius Strabo (Father to Pompey the Great) C. Marius, who had been six times Consul, L. Sylla Licinius Crassus, C. Perperna, Q. Cepio, Q. Metellus Pius, (Son to the Numidian) M. Marcellus, Val. Messala, and T. Didius, who were all sent with Proconsular Power. The Forces on either side amounted to one hundred thousand fighting Men. Rutilius the Consul quickly lost his life, falling into an Ambush laid for him by the Marfi, and many other blows did the Romans receive; so that they were forced to lift such as once had been Slaves. The Bodies of the Consul, and those of several others being carried into the City, the sight of them so discouraged the People, that the Senate made a Decree, that thereonforth the slain should be buried where they died, which as a prudent example was followed by the Enemy.

27. None succeeded Rutilius all the year, for that Cesar could not come to a new Election, but his Army was committed to Marius his Lieutenant, and Q. Cepio. Cepio was killed not long after, being intrapped by Popeianus, one of the Italian Generals. Marius now alone commanding the Forces, did good Service, as did also Sylla. For the following year, Cn. Pompeius Strabo, and L. Porcius Cato were made Consuls. Now the Senate thought fit to make such Italians free of the City as had not revolted, which thing established those, who something wavering in their minds, and took off the courage of the other already engaged; yet they chose them not into any of the thirty five Tribes, but placed them by them-

Having long besieged Asculum, he defeated the Enemy which fellied forth, killed eighteen thousand of the Marfi, took three thousand, and being got into Asculum, caused all the Officers and Principal Men to be beaten with Rods, and then beheaded. Sylla his Successor in the Confesship overthrew the Samnites, and stormed two of their Camps, by which success elevated. He went, stood for, and carried that greatest Office. This War was ended by him, after it had endured above two years, in the 666 year of the City, he the said L. Cornelius Sylla, and Q. Pompeius Rufus being Consuls.

After which freedom of the City is given to the conquered Italian, having been before this denied to them.

28. What the Italians could not get with armed hand, was given them Conquered; at first to all, except the Lucanians and Samnites, and shortly after to them also, but ranked by themselves in the same manner as the former. Not long after this, which was a kind of Civil War, there were stir in the City about Usury, which being rigorously exacted by the Creditors, Albius the Pretor, who withstood it, was murdered by them. Yet hitherto these Seditions in the City were managed but by private Persons, or in a private manner, but now came it to that pass, that the Heads of the Factions got whole Armies to themselves, and carried on their interests in open War one against another, their own Country being as the prize and reward of the Victory, such were the manners and behaviour of those who, through the infirmity of the Government, were not able to bear that greatness of fortune, which from the temperance and moderation of their Fathers had descended upon them. But an occasion to the first Civil War was minitired by that with Mithridates, which began ere the Social or Italian ended.

His vast designs, and great attempts.

1. Mithridates was King of Pontus, (a Country of Asia, so called because it lieth upon the Euxine Sea) thought by some to have been defended from one of the seven Persians, who conspired against the Magi that had usurped after the death of Cambyses. He was surnamed Eupator and Diomysus, being a Man of a vast mind and ambitious spirit. Succeeding his Father, who was a friend of the People of Rome, at thirteen years of age, within two years he made away his Mother, who was left Partner with him in the Kingdom, and after her his Brother also, and in his youth he subdued the Kings about Phasis beyond Caucasus. Thirty years after his coming to the Kingdom, he thought of no less than the Empire of Asia, the Romans, as he fancied, being now sufficiently employed in the Cimbrian and Italian Wars. He began with Paphlagonia, parting it betwixt himself and Nicomedes King of Bithynia, and being checked for this by the Romans, and commanded to desist, he pretended it was his Fathers Inheritance, and to amend the matter he seized on Galatia too. Then casting his Eye upon Cappadocia, he caused to be murdered Ariarathes King thereof, and his Sisters Husband, and when he married to Nicomedes, he drove out his Forces, and pretended to seize upon it for the use of her Son, whom then he murdered also, and bestowed it on one of his own Sons. The Cappadocians refused to obey him, and called out of Asia Ariarathes one of their former Kings Sons; but him did Mithridates drive away, and he shortly after died. Nicomedes afterwards procured one to counterfeit himself the Brother of Ariarathes, and beg the Kingdom of the People

People of Rome; and he sent his Wife thither to aver that she had three Sons by Ariarathes. Mithridates hereupon sent one to the Senate to affirm, that he whom he had placed in Cappadocia was also the Son of Ariarathes.

2 The Senate knowing well the aim of both, took from Mithridates Cappadocia; and Paphlagonia from Nicomedes, who had got it into his hands, and left these two Kingdoms to their own liberty. But the Cappadocians protested that they could not live without a King, and being therefore allowed to chuse one from amongst themselves, made choice of one Ariobarzanes. Mithridates sorely repining to be thus overruled, procured Tigranes the King of Armenia and his Son in Law to be an Enemy to the Romans, and persuaded him to expel Ariobarzanes, whilst he did as much by young Nicomedes, who now had succeeded his dead Father. Both of these Princes fled to Rome for relief, which was decreed them, and Commissioners were appointed to re-establish them, whereof Manius Aquilius was chief. This being performed, they persuaded both the Kings to invade Mithridates. Nicomedes did it, though unwillingly, whilst Mithridates opposed him not, that he might have an advantage against him; only he sent Pelopidas to the Commissioners to complain of him. They considering that Mithridates was a powerful Prince, returned this Answer, That they did neither like that he should molest Nicomedes, nor Nicomedes him; for the former was not convenient for the Roman Common-wealth. He nothing moved with this Answer, re-invaded Cappadocia, sending Pelopidas back with a bold expostulation. They hereupon raised a considerable Army against him on their own heads, without any decree of Senate or People. Nicomedes engaging first of all with him was put to flight, though Mithridates his main Body never engaged, and next after him Manius was discomfited. Then seized Mithridates upon Bithynia, Phrygia, Mysia, Lycia, Pamphylia, and other Provinces, as far as Ionia. He took also Q. Oppius and Aquilius, the later whereof he killed by melted Gold poured into his mouth, being ever wont to upbraid the Romans with avarice and corruption.

3. The Romans hereupon decreed a War against him, though they were now employed in the Italian; and L. Cornelius Sylla, and Q. Pompeius Rufus being Consuls, it fell by lot unto the former. But whilst he was yet employed in finishing the Italian War about Nola, C. Marcius, who had been fix times Consul, either moved by a desire of profit, or of glory, persuaded P. Sulpitius, Tribune of the People, to prefer a Law for transferring the command against Mithridates to himself. He drew the People of Italy to his Party, by promising them that had been of late made free of the City, equal Privilege with the rest, which were distributed into thirty five Tribes; so that the thing was carried on by strong hand, and Pompey's Son, Son in Law of Sylla, was killed in the heat of contention. Sylla hearing of this, hasted to the City, easily persuading his Army to any thing, for that his Soldiers were unwilling that any other should go that Expedition, from which they promised themselves so great matters. To him his Colleague Pompey joyned, and though Marinus and the Tribune made all opposition possible, with some difficulty they entered the City, and Marinus with his complies betook themselves to their heels. Sylla suffered no harm to be done to the Citizens, but reverted what Sulpitius had done, regulated the Senate, and procured Marinus, with Sulpitius, and ten others, to be declared Enemies to their Country, whom it might be lawful for any to kill, and unlawful to harbour; their Goods also being set to sale.

4. Sulpitius was found and put to death. Marinus hid himself in the Fens of Musternum, and being discovered, a Gall was sent to kill him, but could not do it, he was so dashed at his preference; so that being conveyed out of that place, he escaped into Africk. To him Cerobas and others, who had fled into Namidia, joyned themselves, expecting an opportunity to invade their own Country. Pompey the Consul, to secure Italy, was appointed to receive the Army of Cn. Pompey, who had done such good Service in the Musian War; but the Soldiers unwilling to leave their old General, who also took it heavily, made away the Consul. For the year following L. Cornelius Cinna and C. Octavius were Consuls, whereas Cinna, as some think, corrupted, was altogether for the new Denitions, and recalled Marinus, with the rest of the Exiles; but he was driven away by his Colleague, and L. Mernus was put in his place. He then going about to the Italian Cities, by giving them fresh hopes of equal Privilege, and pretending that he suffered these things for their sakes, got much Money. Marinus also coming over to him, they raised a considerable Army, wherewith Cinna far down before the City. Marius took Hofia by force, and Cinna being not able to do any thing at Hofia retired to Arpinum. The Consul, for that they could not reach Sylla, sent for M. Brutus then King of Samnium, but he differing with them about some conditions, had them granted by Marius who he joynd himself. In the mean while the City it self was near being betrayed to Marius by Appius Claudius a tribune of the Army, who being intrusted with the Janiculum, thus requir'd him for former kindness.

5. Though he and Cinna broke in, they were repelled by Offavins, and C. Pompey the Prorexell, who shortly after was killed with a Thunder-bolt. Marius after this took in several Towns about Rome where Provisions lay, and Cinna, by promise of liberty, drew many Slaves out of the City, which the Senate understanding, left the People should make disturbance within, sent to him about an agreement. He refused to admit of any address made to him as a private Man, so that they were forced to treat with him as Consul, and desired he would swear to abstain from Blood. This he flatly refused to do; but promised, that wittingly and willingly he would not be the cause of any Mans death; so he was received, and the Law abrogated for banishing Marius, and his Associates. Upon their entrance began plundering and slaughters in all places. Offavins, though having the Oath both of Cinna and Marius, refusing to fy from his charge, was killed, and his Head set upon the Regist, to which was afterwards added that of Antonius, (Grand-father to the Triumvir) an excellent Orator, who for a good space defended himself by his eloquence from the Soldiers, and several others. None were spared, either for dignity, worth, or age. The dead bodies, being mangled and abused otherwise, were left to be torn in pieces by Dogs and Fowls, none daring to bury them. All Sylla's Friends were killed, his Houfe defaced, and his Goods put to sale, he being judged and declared an Enemy. Mercula, though he never fought the Confusion, but had it put upon him, and Carulus, having their days set for them to answer, destroyed themselves.

6. Thus cruel were Cinna and Marius; but however they raged against their Country-men, the common People flew much Abstinence and Justice at this time. For when they had exposed the Wealthy Houses of the proscribed Persons to be plundered by them, none were found that they might bring their own fortunes, or take a share out of the publick calamity. They abtained now from other Mens Goods, how indigent soever they were; although when accustomed to such Tragical fights, the People of Rome, as it happens, grew more hard-hearted. For it carried not its self with the same moderation afterwards, in the Proscription made by Sylla, when many were found that bought the Goods of the Proscribed Persons. And yet in that made by the Triumvirs, few would be inticed to make such Purchases; and afterward when Cremona was taken, and the Citizens were exposed to sale by the Soldiers; the Italians bravely disdain'd to make Slaves of their Country-men, born as free as themselves were.

7. Cinna and Marius having thus satisfied their bloody minds, made themselves Confuls for the following year : But Marius died e're the month end, having been this Office now eleven times : A Man more profitable to his Country in the time of War than of Peace. To him succeeded Valerius Flaccus, whom Cinna sent into Asia, to supply the room of Sylla there. But he by this time had done the work, and was coming home to revenge the former injuries, having subdued Mithridates in less than three years, killed one hundred and fixty thousand of his Men, recovered Greece, Macedonia, Ionis, Asia, and other Countries, which he had got into his hands, taken his Navy from him, and forced him to be content with his own Inheritance. These things are to be declared in order.

8. After Mithridates had taken Aquilus with the rest, and seized upon Asia, and other Countries, (whilst Sylla was at Rome, feeling things there against Marinus and his Faction, as is before shewed) he sent his Legions abroad into all the Cities of Asia, willing them at one day prefixed, to kill all Italians and Romans; with their Wives and Children, and cast them out unburied; thus he seized on their Estates, taking one part to themselves, and reserving the other for his use. This was accordingly done, and eighty thousand according to fame, according to others one hundred and fifty thousand perished in one day. Then went he into the Island Cos, where getting great Treasure into his Hands, there laid up by one of the Cleopatraes, he departed to Rhodes, and all manner of ways attempted to take the Civ- though without success; such was the constancy and fidelity of the Rhodians towards the Romans, amongst other Confederates which universally revolted. Then sent he Archelaus his General into Greece, leaving Pelopidas in Lycia to carry on the War there, he himself providing Forces, and punishing such as he found inclinable towards the Romans.

made Archelaus first covered Delos, which from the Athenians had revolted to the Ionians, then joyed he to himself the Abians, Lacedaemonians, and Beotians. After this he was fought by Britius, who had put to flight Metaphanes sent also into Greece from the King; but having fresh Supplies, Britius withdrew himself to the Piraeus, or Haven of Athens, which shortly after Archelaus took in with his Fleet. Now Sylla arrived in Greece with five Legions, and some Companies of Horse, and having furnished himself with Money and Provisions in Ætolia and Thessaly, marched into Attica against Archelaus, almost whole Boeotia, with Thebes, the chief City, revolting to him in his passage. He besieged Archelaus in the Piræus, a very strong Place, as fenced with a Wall almost forty Cubits high, consisting of square Stones, and built by Pericles during the first motions of the Peloponnesian War. Having also besieged Athens it self, he spent the whole Summer in the Siege, and at length took it: the Inhabitants being unable to make any more resistance, through famine, which so far prevailed, as they made meat of fodder, Leather, and fed upon the Bodies of dead Men. The Piræus was also shortly after taken, and the Walls thereof demolished, with the Arsenal, and all the Rarities therein destroyed. Then Sylla followed Archelaus through Boeotia, and fought with him through Cheronea, in a Place so straight, that no way being open for flight, he slew so many, that of one hundred and twenty thousand not many more than ten thousand remained this being an Army sent over by the King out of his new Provinces.

to Mithridates put divers Princes of his newly conquered Provinces to death, for fear they should kill or betray him, by which cruelty he lost all Gallagracia, Ephesus also, and other Towns revolted from him, whereof such as he recovered he used cruelly, and afterwards fearing a general defection, to purchase favour he set the Greek Cities at liberty. Some that conspired his death were discovered, and upon suspicion were sixteen hundred Men made away. Then sent he another Supply to Archelaus of eighty thousand Men, which with the other ten thousand remaining of the former Army, were routed by Sylla near Orchomenos, and about fifteen thousand being slain, the rest betaking themselves to their Camp were also killed or taken, a vast slaughter having been made. Archelaus having lost his Son Diogenes hid himself in a Pen, and thence fled to Chalcis once more. After this Sylla chastized the Beotians for their fickleness (for they would stand to neither Party long) and took up his Winter Quarters in Thessaly, providing himself of Shipping, because he heard nothing of Lucullus, whom he had sent into Egypt to procure a Navy. Now at this time was Flaccus, who had succeeded Marius, sent into Asia by Cinna to succeed Sylla. Him Fimbria his Questor killed in a quarrel about lodging, being hated by his Soldiers, and he headed his Army, with which he several times fought, and that prosperously, against Mithridates his Son, and drove the King himself into Pergamus, and thence to Pitane, where he took Ship and fled to Mitylene, and might have been taken if Lucullus would. Then did Fimbria harrase Cappadocia, and burnt Ilum the Daughter of Troy, for that the Inhabitants had given up themselves to Sylla, and used them well; so that though a Roman and so akin to them, he is said to have used them worse than did Agamemnon himself. This hapned to Ilum in the latter end of the 173 Olympiad, about one thousand and fifty years after the first taking it by the Greeks.

II. Mithridates receiving intelligence of the blow he had received at Orchomenus, wrote to Archelaus, to procure his peace on as good terms as he could. To a Peace Sylla was not now averse, being in great want of Money, and receiving no recruits from the City, where he was declared an Enemy, and defiding above all things to carry back a good Army into Italy to revenge himself. He offered Peace therefore on these conditions : That he should deliver up all his Navy, all Fugitives and Captives, restore the Inhabitants of Chios, and others whom he had carried into Pontus, remove his Garrisons from all places whither he had brought them since the breach of the Peace, pay all the Charges of the War, and be content with his Fathers Kingdom. All these Conditions were agreed to save parting with Paphlagonia, but the Ambassadors saying they could have had better terms of Fimbria, drove Sylla into a great displeasure, with a comparison so odious to him. Shortly after Mithridates himself met him, and found him so resolute, as he gladly accepted

Sect. 5. ended all the terms. So ended the first War with Mithridates, being concluded by Sylla three years after his coming into Greece.

12. Sylla required of Fimbria the Army to be delivered up to him, as held by no Authority; but was answered, as having as little himself. Yet the Army denied to fight against that of Sylla, and forsook Fimbria, who thereupon sent a slave to murder Sylla, which was discovered. He begged pardon, and it was granted him, so he would take Ship and depart out of Asia; but he said he had a better way, and going to Perinthus, there destroyed himself. Sylla gave him to be buried, saying, he would not imitate the barbarism of Marius and Cinna towards his friends at Rome, whom they deprived both of Life and Burial; yet he kept in this mind but a while after his arrival there, whither he now hasted, having fined Asia grievously for its revolt, and settled Affairs according to present occasions. He took Albens in his way, whence he carried with him the Library of Apellicon the Teian (in which were most of the Books of Aristotle and Theophrastus, then not vulgarly known) bought by him of the Posterity of Nelcus, to whom Theophrastus had given it. He wrote to the Senate, to which he recounted all the great Services he had done, and then how he had been rewarded by the Party of Marius, telling them plainly, he would come and revenge both himself and the Publick, by punishing the Authors of the injuries, not medling with any other, either old or new Citizens. The Senate hereat affrighted, sent to treat with him, offering their endeavour for his satisfaction, if he would presently make known his mind. Cinna they ordered to stop his Leavies; but he only returned them a plausible Answer, and proceeded, designing himself and his Colleague Carbo Consuls again for the following year, that there might be no need of going to Rome to a new creation. He passed over some of his Forces into Dalmatia, there to fight Sylla; but the hindermost were driven back by a Tempest, and they refused absolutely to fight against their Country-men; so that those, who as yet had not passed the Sea, refused to go aboard. Hereupon he going to speak with them, an Officer who made way before him struck one of them, who struck him again, for which offence he commanding him to be laid hold on, a Tumult arose, wherein he himself was ran through, and so perished in his fourth Consulship, and the 670 year of the City, a Man worthier to have dyed by command of the Conqueror, than the fury of the Soldiers. Carbo then continued Consul alone all the remaining part of the year.

13. Cinna and Carbo had by a Law abrogated Sylla's command, and procured War to be decreed against him, before the Senate was affrighted into the offer of a mediation. He answered, that he would never be reconciled to such wicked Persons, as they desired he should; but if the People of Rome would give them indemnity, he should not oppose it; yet he thought those that would come to him might be more safe, seeing he had at his devotion such an Army. Hereby declaring sufficiently what his intentions were, he also demanded restitution of his Estate, his ancient Dignity and Honours; but the Messengers coming to Brundisium, and there hearing of Cinna's death, and the diffurance of the Common-wealth, returned back to him. Then crossed he the Sea to Brundisium with a Fleet of sixteen hundred Ships, and sixty thousand Men. Being landed, Metellus Pius, who had absented himself from Rome for fear of Marius and Cinna, came to him, as also Pompey, afterwards firnamed the Great, who though his Father was no friend to Sylla, yet coming now to him with some Forces, became afterwards his greatest favourite. Besides these came Catagagus, who having joyned with Cinna, now begged pardon. C. Norbanus and L. Scipio the Consuls, with Carbo, made all preparation for resistance. The first trial at Arms was at Clusium, where Norbanus lost six thousand Men, and fled to Capua. Scipio, through the treachery of his Army, came with his Son into the Power of Sylla, who dismissed them both. After this Sylla sent to Norbanus to treat of Peace; but (perhaps) being not thought serious, had no Answer returned back.

14. He then passed on in Italy, making havock of all things, as Carbo did, who getting into Rome, procured Metellus, and the rest that joyned with Sylla, to be declared Enemies to the State. Both Parties sent up and down the Italian Cities, labouring both by fair means and foul to procure Forces; and so all this Summer was spent, wherein the Capitol was burnt none knoweth how. For the following year Papirius Carbo the third time, and Marius, Son (but adoptive as most probable) to the old one, were Consuls; the latter being but twenty seven years old. In the Spring was Carinas the Lieutenant of Carbo overthrown by Metellus, and Marius himself by Sylla, and beaten into Præneste, where being closely beleaged, and despairing of his own safety, he wrote to Brutus, then Prætor at Rome, that he should under some pretext call together the Senate, and kill those his Enemies; P. Antisthius, another Carbo, L. Domitius, and Mucius Scaevola the High-Priest, which was with as cruelly enough performed. Metellus by this time having overthrown another Army of Carbo's, Pompey defeated Marius, another of that Party, Sylla marched to Rome, which he easily entered, many of the opposite Faction being fled. Their Goods he set to sale, and willing the People to be of good cheer, for that he was necessitated thus to act, he left a sufficient Garrison, and departed to Clusium, where he and his Officers several times overthrew Carbo's Armies. Carbo sent to Præneste to relieve Marius his Colleague eight Legions, which Pompey meeting in a straight place, slew many of them, and most of those that escaped, departed to their own homes. After this, Carbo and Norbanus in a Fight with Metellus had ten thousand of their Men slain, and six thousand fallen off, whereupon many fell off to Sylla's Party, as also all Gaul within the Alps. Norbanus fled to Rhodes, where fearing to be given up, he killed himself; Carbo into Africk, though he had thirty thousand Men at Clusium, and other Forces, which were then broken in pieces by Pompey. Carinus, with other Commanders, attempted to break through, by the help of the Samnites; and relieve Marius; but this being with no effect, they then made for Rome it self.

15. A bloody Battel was fought at the Gares, where many thousands were slain on both sides. Yet Sylla had the better. Carinus and Marius were taken, and their Heads sent to Præneste to be shewed to the Inhabitants, at which sight, understanding how things had passed, they yielded up the Town to Laelius, and Marius killed himself, whose Head was set up in the Pleading Place at Rome. All his Faction in Præneste were put to death, and all the Natives with the Samnites; the Romans only with the Women and Children were spared, who lost all they had, the Town (the richest at that time of all others) being plundered. Norba a little after was taken, and burnt to the ground by a Fire which the Inhabitants kindled over their own heads, some one way, and some another, destroying themselves. So came Italy into the Power of Sylla, who in the improvement of his Victory, shewed what fury and revenge, backed with Power, are able to do.

16. Having sent Pompey into Africk against Carbo, and given him a charge thence to pass into Sicily against others of that Party, he called the People together, and told them that he would put them into a better condition if they would obey his commands, but he was resolved to prosecute his Enemies with all sorts of calamities. So he did in a larger measure than any before him. He put to death eight thousand together in the Villa publica, a large house in the Campus Martius, made for the reception of the Ambassadors of Enemies; and liberty was given to his Soldiers to kill all they met, till Furcius putting him in mind that he ought to leave some to Reign over; he then first of any Man published Tables of Proscription, wherein were proscribed first of all eighty Senators, and sixteen hundred Equites, to which he afterwards added more, promising two Talents to those that should discover them, and threatened such as by whom they were harboured or concealed. Of those out-lawed Persons some were slain in their Houses, others killed in the Streets, and others prostrate at his feet; those that fled, their Goods were seized on. Marius, a Man of Consular Dignity, and Brother to Sylla's great Enemy, had at the Sepulcher of Catulus his Eyes first pulled out of his Head, and then his Hands and Legs cut off at several times, that he might die by degrees. But not only against private Persons, but Cities also did he rage, whereof some, after the Inhabitants were fold, he caused to be demolished. Many were turned out of their Possessions, which were given to his Creatures. Pompey drove Carbo into Sicily, and thence into Corsica, where being taken and brought to him, after he had inveighed against him in an Assembly, he caused his Head to be cut off, and sent it to Sylla.

17. Both the Consuls being now destroyed, Sylla withdrew himself out of the City, and willed the Senate to create an Inter-rex, which they willingly did, hoping they should have a new election of Consuls, and named Valerius Flaccus. He

Sect. 5. He then wrote to him to ask the People, that seeing the necessity of Affairs required for great an Officer, a Dictator might be created, and that not for any limited time, but till all evils should be redressed: and now he spared not to mention himself. This the People was forced to yield to, as being in his Power, and so this Office, which for the space of one hundred and twenty years (ever since the years after Hannibal's quitting of Italy) had been intermitted, was conferred on him without any limitation of time. A gilded Statue on horse-back was erected to his memory near the Roftra, with this Inscription, To L. Cornelius Sylla the happy General; for he would be called Felix, and sometime Aphrodisius or Beautiful. This happened in the third year of the 174 Olympiad, the 672 year of the City, 80 before the Birth of Christ.

18. That a shew of the Common-wealth might remain, he permitted Consuls to be made, which were M. Tullius Decula, and Cn. Cornelius Dolabella; yet did he plainly Reign alone, having twenty four Axes carried before, as the Kings in old time, with a great Guard continually at his heels, abrogating old Laws, and enacting new at his pleasure. He regulated the Consulship, ordering that none should be capable of it without passing first through other Offices. He overthrew the Tribunship, by making those that bore it incapable of any other trust. To the Senate he added three hundred out of the Equites, to the People ten thousand out of the Slaves of the proscribed, making them free, and calling them after himself Cornelii; and to twenty three Legions he assigned much Land in Italy to oblige them to him. For the following year he gave way to have Consuls also, but joyined himself with Q. Caecilius Metellus, which course the Emperours afterwards imitated. The year after, when the People, to please him, designed him Consul again, he waved it, and created Servilius Isauricus, and Appius Claudius Pulcher; and then, to the astonishment of all Men, laid down his Dictatorship, and though he had done such, and so many horrid things, yet offered to give an account of his actions.

19. None accused him except one young Man, whose reviling language made him say, that this for the time to come would keep any one from laying down such Supream Power; which Cesar indeed seemeth to have been aware of. Not long after he went into the Country, where minding nothing but his Pleasure, he not long after died at Puteoli of the Lowfie disease, his Body being putrified, and all turned into Lice, as Plutarch writeth. And this was the end of L. Cornelius Sylla, a Man born of the Noble Family of the Cornelii, (which of late had been Eclipsed, through the laziness of his Ancestors) being the sixth in descent from Cornelius Rufinus, one of the most eminent Captains in the War with Pyrrhus. As his life was pernicious to his Country; so his death brought also trouble to it, the two Consuls and their Factions falling out about the Honour which was to be given to him at his Funeral. Catulus prevailed against Lepidus, and he was carried in great State through the City, and first of any of his Family was burned, being fearful, as Cicero thought, left he himself should be dealt with as he had used Marius, whose Bones he had caused to be digged up, and thrown away. After the Funeral, the Consuls fell into a greater dissension. Lepidus would restore the Grounds given away by Sylla, and abolish his Laws. The Senate was fearful of another War, and caused them both to swear, that they would not decide the Controversie by the Sword; but Lepidus was resolved not to return out of his Province, till the new creation was over, and when he should be out of his Office begin a War, as then discharged from his Oath. Hereupon the Senate sent for him, and when he came, he would have brought his Forces into the City, but being opposed by Catulus and Pompey, a fight ensued, wherein he had the worst, and then fled into Sardinia, where he died the same year with Sylla.

20. The Civil dissensions did not with him; for, though Pompey had suppressed Carbo in Sicily, M. Brutus in Gall, Cn. Domitius, and Hierba King of Numidia in Africa, who were preparing for War, (and for this triumphed, being neither Consul nor Prætor, and scarcely twenty six years of age) yet a more dangerous War was now depending, raised in Spain by Q. Sertorius. This Man being one of Cinna's Faction, joyined with Carbo against Sylla, and having taken Suessa, thence passed into Spain, which fell to him by lot as Prætor. Thence he drove out such as were for Sylla, and joyining the Celtiberians to himself, still resisted Metellus, who was sent against him, whereby obtaining a great name, he chose three hundred of his friends, whom he called a Senate, in opposition and despite to that at Rome. And now being made stronger by part of Lepidus his Army, which Perpenna had led thither, he designed no less than the invasion of Italy. The Senate afraid of this sent Pompey against him, a young man, but of great esteem, who passing the Alps in imitation of Annibal, but another way, at first received some loss, and in the Spring following had no success, (though Perpenna and Herculeus were several times beaten by Metellus) but was reduced into great straits, and wrote to Rome for a supply. Lucullus Consul for the following year procured it to benefit him, left the War that was renewed with Mithridates should be committed to him if he came back into Italy, which he affirmed else he would. Being now supplied with men and money, he, and his assistants fell upon the places subject to Sertorius, yet did they this year no great matters. But many of Sertorius his Army came over to them, being aggrieved that he made the Celtiberians his Guard, as discharging themselves, and upon suspicion of the alienation of their minds, being cruelly used by him.

Is murdered by Perpenna.

The War with Mithridates renewed.

Upon what occasion.

21. The year following Pompey and Metellus being more bold, made excursions into several places, and with more success; yet no considerable battle was there fought. Indeed it needed not. For, Sertorius now grown lazie, spent his time with Women, and falling into an humour of cruelty had put many to death, whereby he wrought his destruction from his own party. Perpenna fearing it might fall to his lot to be made away amongst the rest, resolved to prevent it, and so inviting him to a Feast, murdered him after he had bestowed him and his attendants with Wine. This was the end of this great Captain, who for some ten years had stoutly resisted such as had been sent against him, being rather Superior to them all, and admired by the Spaniards as another Hannibal. Perpenna with much ado was won as his Successor, and not long after was overthrown, and taken in battle by Pompey. He offered, if his life might be spared, to disclose certain things of consequence in private unto Pompey; but he to his great commendation, commanded him to be killed, left accusing any man he should bring the State into further trouble. So ended this War in the 681 year of the City. M. Tarentius Varro that vast Scholar (being the most learned of any, either Greek or Roman) and Caius Cæsius Varus being Consuls. Appianus Claudius in Thrace, and after him Scribonius Cærio fought prosperously against the Scordisci and Dardanians at this time: so did Servilius against the Pirates of Cilicia expelling them the Seas, and taking several of their Towns; as also Colconius against the Dalmatians. But these were inconsiderable matters in comparison of that War which now was renewed with Mithridates.

22. Sylla, upon this departure for Italy, had left Murena behind him in Asia, to settle such things as were not yet composed, with the two Legions that belonged to Fimbria. Murena being ambitious of a Triumph, had caught at all occasions to renew the War, and had one presented to him after this manner. Mithridates waging War with them of Colches and Bosphorians, who had revolted from him; the former desired and obtained his Son for their King. This proved the destruction of the young man, for his Father thinking it to have been procured by his seeking, put him to death, having sent for and bound him with Iron Chains, though he had done him especial service against Fimbria. Against the Bosphorians he made then great preparations, inasmuch that every one thought he designed another War against the Romans. Archelaus was now at this time out of favour, for that he was thought to have granted too much unto Sylla in the Treaty of Peace, and therefore fled to Murena, and stirred him up to invade Mithridates, who neither had restored the intire possession of Cappadocia to Ariobarzanes. Murena did so, lighting the mention of Peace, which was objected to him. Mithridates sent to Rome, to complain of Sylla, and expecting the return of his Ambassadors, stirred not, though the other passing over the River Hæly fired three hundred of his Villages. Afterwards came Callidius from Rome, who thought he shewed no Decree of the Senate, yet said, it was the pleasure of the Fathers, that all acts of hostility should be forboren, and afterwards he talked with Murena alone. Yet did not Murena forbear, so that the King judging that War indeed was intended, resolved to look to himself, and passing over the River overthrew Murena in battle, who fled into Phrygia. This Victory brought many over to the Kings party, and hereupon he drove all Murena's Garrisons out of Cappadocia. Sylla now dictator, was not well pleased he should be thus disturbed, and therefore sent A. Gabinius to command Murena in good earnest to forbear, and reconcile the King to Ariobarzanes. Mithridates gave him his Son of four years of age for an Hostage, and received part of Cappadocia.

So

SECT. 5. So things were settled again, and the second War, as Aspian faith, ended in the third year. But some seven years after another was begun.

23. Presently after the last conclusion, he sent to Rome to have the conditions of the League recorded, but the thing was neglected. Ariobarzanes sent also to complain, that he kept the greater part of Cappadocia from him, whereupon Sylla commanded him to quit it, which accordingly he did. Afterward he sent again to desire that the League might be recorded; but Sylla being now dead, the matter was not as much as reported to the Senate. Hereupon he underhand procured Tigranes King of Armenia his Son-in-law to invade Cappadocia, whence he led away three hundred thousand persons, and there built a City, to be the Metropolis of the Kingdom, which from himself he named Tigranocerta, i. e. the City of Tigranes. L. Magius, and L. Fannius, who had fled to him from Fimbria's Army, persuaded him to send into Spain, and join in league with Sertorius, which he did, and had granted to him Bithynia and Cappadocia, receiving from him as a Captain M. Varus (or Marius) one of his Officers. Being now without hope of pardon, he made all preparations possible, and got together an Army out of divers Countries, consisting of one hundred and forty thousand Foot, and sixteen thousand Horse, where- with the following Spring he invaded Bithynia, which Country, Nicomedes being dead without issue, had a little before given by testament to the People of Rome, which thing enraged him. Cotta the Governor, a man of little courage, fled to Chalcedon, and he got it all into his hands.

24. In the 680 year of the City, L. Licinius Lucullus and M. Arelus Cotta being Consuls, the former of them was sent against Mithridates with one Legion out of the City, to which were joined those two that belonged to Fimbria, and two more, so that in all he had an Army of thirty thousand Foot, and one thousand five hundred Horse. He found the King before Cyzicus a City of Propontis, and presently besieged the besieger. He drove him to such straits by the help of L. Manius (who now again revolted) that though having a great desire to the place, he laboured much to take it, yet through extreme famine he was forced first to send away the Horse, and sick Footmen, into Bithynia, whereof fifteen thousand were intercepted, and then to fly himself with the rest that could escape the great slaughter made of them in their flight. During this double siege, Eumachus one of Mithridates's Captains made incursions into Phrygia, subdued the Piside, and Isauri, and endeavoured to do the same by Cilicia, till he was repelled by Deiotarus one of the Tetrarchs of Gallioecia. But Lucullus improved his success on land by several Victories at Sea, wherein he took divers of Mithridates's Commanders, and hastened into Bithynia to overtake him. He, flying with all speed for fear of this, suffered most grievous shipwreck, and had been cast away, but that he was received into a Pirate's Vessel, to which he was glad to commit himself in so great a danger, and at length, after many difficulties, got into his own Kingdom, whither now Lucullus pursued him, having in his way taken in Bithynia and Paphlagonia. He made all possible preparations for resistance, sending for aid to Tigranes his Son-in-law, and to his own son reigning in Bosphorus; and he sent Diocles with great gifts to the Seythians; but he ran away to Lucullus. In the space of a year he got together forty thousand Foot, and four thousand Horse, with which force he once or twice repelled the Romans, and struck some terror into them. But Lucullus sending out some Horse for provisions, he also sent a party to interrupt them, which fighting in a disadvantageous place was worsted. Being now destitute of Horse, he thought of removing from Cabira, where he had wintered; and communicated his intention to his friends. They not expecting the sign began to pack up, and send their baggage out of the Camp before day, which the Army taking notice of, thought much they should fly without any warning given, and in great fear and disorder breaking out of the Trenches ran away. The King went about to hinder them, but not taking notice of him, he was born down in the crowd, and being got on Horseback betook himself also to flight, and might have been taken, but that the Romans were too busy in plundering the Camp, though warned by their General to forbear.

25. Mithridates first fled to Comana, and thence into Armenia to Tigranes, who admitted him not to his presence, but caused him to be entertained like a King, though in fenny and unwholesome places. All Pontus, except a few places, yielded to Lucullus, to whom also Macchares King of Bosphorus sent a Crown of Gold, and purchased the Title of his Friend and Ally. After this Lucullus pursued Mithridates into Armenia, intending to fall on Tigranes King thereof, if he gave him him occasion by defending his Enemy. Tigranes at this time was a very potent Prince, having conquered several Nations. He wrested Alta from the Parthians, transported many thousands of Greeks out of Cilicia and Cappadocia, into a City built by him near Euphrates, and called Tigranocerta; he obtained Syria and Palestine, displacing the Kings thereof, as was acknowledged by Lucullus. This made him intolerably proud, so that when he rode, he would have four of those Kings he had subdued to run beside him like Lackies, and stand before him with their hands folded in token of subjection, when he sat on his Throne. Lucullus sent to him Appius Claudius his Wives Brother, to demand Mithridates; but he was then busied in Phenicia, in reducing some places, which the Messenger made an opportunity in his absence, secretly to withdraw from him many, whom his intolerable pride had rendered impatient. At his return he gave a negative answer, and therefore Lucullus with two Legions and scarcely three thousand Horse, passed over Euphrates, being not acknowledged a General, because he had not given him the title of King of Kings.

26. Tigranes had no good intelligence of his coming, for he hanged him that first brought the news, as a disturber of the Peace; but when he perceived it was so indeed, he sent Mithrobarzanes with two thousand Horse to interrupt his passage, left Manaces to guard Tigranocerta, and went himself up and down levying Forces. Whilst he was bringing two hundred and fifty thousand Foot, and fifty thousand Horse, the former was beaten back, and the latter could not defend the City. Mithridates advised him not to hazard all in a battle, but rather starve the Romans, as they had done him at Cyzicus, but he slighted the motion, and jeered at the smallness of their number, saying, that if they were Ambassadors they were very many, and if Soldiers, very few. But Lucullus pitching upon an Hill, sent his Horse to provoke and draw out the Enemy, that he might break his ranks, and then setting upon the carriage beats, caused them to drive the Foot amongst the Horse, whereby a great confusion was made, and great execution continued all the day. Tigranocerta was taken by the means of certain Greeks, who being out of jealousy disarmed by Manaces, took Clubs, and setting upon him and his men, got the better, and received the Romans within the Walls. After this, another great Army was raised, and committed to the conduct of Mithridates. They then endeavoured to encompass Lucullus, but were crossed in their expectation, and both parties continued without any great matter performed, till want of victuals forced them to depart. Then went Tigranes further into his Kingdom, and Mithridates marched away into his own, being pursued by Lucullus.

27. Mithridates overthrew Fabius, who had been left in Pontus by Lucullus, and after him Triarius, who being sent with a new supply, out of a desire of glory ventured to fight ere the General came. Helost in one engagement twenty four Tribunes, and one hundred and fifty Centurions (which numbers were seldom heard of in an overthrow of the Roman Armies) and seven thousand in all were slain near the Mountain Scotus, about three miles distant from Zela a City of Pontus. Lucullus having heard of the Kings intention to set upon Triarius, procured the Soldiers of Fimbria to march, who through the procurement of P. Clodius mutined against him, as formerly against Flaccus by the means of Fimbria. But Mithridates taking away all the necessities he could carry, and destroying the rest, departed in an end to the War, but that now by the procurement of A. Gabinius the Tribune, made for disbanding of Fimbria's Soldiers. This being known, Lucullus was slighted by his Army so much, that hardly could his men be drawn to stay, though they and Tigranes waited Mithridates; so that the King began to recruit himself, sent about to give notice, that the Senate was displeased with Lucullus for prolonging the War, disbanded his Army, and would confiscate the estates of such as should disobey it's order. Hereupon all the Army footed him, except some few poor men, who had no cause to regard the threatenings; and Lucullus being outed of his command, Mithridates recovered almost his whole Kingdom, and did much hurt to Cappadocia; Glabrio not as much as coming to the Army, but loitering in Bithynia. This happened in the eighth year after Lucullus had undertaken the War; the six hundred and eighty seventh of the City, C. Calpurnius Piso and the said M. C. Cilius Glabrio being Consuls. The year following the War was committed to Cn. Pompey (afterward surnamed the Great) by means of C. Manilius the Tribune, who

him occasion by defending his Enemy. Tigranes at this time was a very potent Prince, having conquered several Nations. He wrested Alta from the Parthians, transported many thousands of Greeks out of Cilicia and Cappadocia, into a City built by him near Euphrates, and called Tigranocerta; he obtained Syria and Palestine, displacing the Kings thereof, as was acknowledged by Lucullus. This being known, Lucullus was slighted by his Army so much, that hardly could his men be drawn to stay, though they and Tigranes waited Mithridates; so that the King began to recruit himself, sent about to give notice, that the Senate was displeased with Lucullus for prolonging the War, disbanded his Army, and would confiscate the estates of such as should disobey it's order. Hereupon all the Army footed him, except some few poor men, who had no cause to regard the threatenings; and Lucullus being outed of his command, Mithridates recovered almost his whole Kingdom, and did much hurt to Cappadocia; Glabrio not as much as coming to the Army, but loitering in Bithynia. This happened in the eighth year after Lucullus had undertaken the War; the six hundred and eighty seventh of the City, C. Calpurnius Piso and the said M. C. Cilius Glabrio being Consuls. The year following the War was committed to Cn. Pompey (afterward surnamed the Great) by means of C. Manilius the Tribune, who

Sec. 5. having offended the Senate by a Law, which gave the same right of suffrages to Liberi or Freemen (once slaves) as to their Patrons, or such as manumitted them, L. Iulius procured this Law also to pass to carry favour with him, who now had a very great name and power, having scarcely finished the Piratic War, which for his famous and speedy Expedition, must be described, after we have first spoken something of the War with Spartacus, that was managed whilst Lucullus was busy in Pontus.

28. Spartacus a Thracian born, was a Fencer in the house of Lentulus at Capua, where he perfwading about seventy of his condition, rather to fight for their own liberty than the pleasure of spectators, they broke the house and fled to Jeferius the hill in Campania, where receiving to them all fugitives, they fell down upon the parts adjacent, and robbed them. By making equal division of the booty, he got together a great power of men, over whom he set as Captains two Fencers that were Galls by birth, called Oenomaus and Crixus. Clodius the Prator, who was sent against them from the City, they routed and put to flight, as also P. Varinus, whose Lictors and Horse they took. Spartacus now having got together seventy thousand men, and making great preparations, began to be formidable to the Romans, who therefore sent against him L. Gellius Poplicola, and Cn. Cornelius Lentulus the Consuls with two Legions. Crixus was at the Hill Garganus defeated and slain. Spartacus making for Gallia, was beset before and behind by the Consuls; but one after the other he overthrew, and putting them both to flight, killed three hundred Prisoners to appease the Ghost of Crixus. Marching then towards the Alps he was opposed by Calpurnius the Prator, whom he also overthrew, and who hardly escaped from the engagement.

29. Spartacus puffed up by such success, now consulted of no less than setting upon Rome it self. At the Comitia for Prators, when the Candidates appeared, M. Licinius Crassus, a person of great Nobility, and exceeding rich, undertook the Office, and was sent against Spartacus with six Legions. He ordered Mummius his Lieutenant with two Legions to attend the Enemies motions, but not to fight, which doing, he was worsted, and many being taken, many also cast away their Arms and fled. Crassus to terrify others, used great severity against such as forsook their Colours, decimating five hundred who had first begun to fly; which ancient kind of Discipline being of a long time disused, he hereby revived. Spartacus having by this time passed to the Sea, thought of going over into Sicily; but failing of his design upon some Cicilian Rovers, he late down in the Peninsula of Rhegium, where Crassus as it were besieged him, having drawn a line through the Lisimus from Sea to Sea, to cut off all Provisions. Spartacus in a tempestuous night made a shift to fill up the Ditch, and get over the third part of his Army, then engaging with Crassus lost twelve thousand men. After this defeat he went toward the Petiline Mountains, and the Lieutenant and Quæstor of Crassus pursuing him, he faced about and put them to flight, whereby his men being encouraged, refused not to give the Romans battle. Crassus now desired also to fight, because Pompey, who was lately returned out of Spain was reported as coming to end this War. Pitching then one against another, Spartacus engaged with all his forces, and made at Crassus through the midst of Weapons and Wounds, whom yet he missed, whilst he stood his ground manfully he was slain, and the rest were disordered and put to flight. Some that escaped from the battle, and made head again Pompey suppressed, three years before he undertook the War against the Pirates.

30. The Pirates who had been a little repressed by Servilius Isauricus (as we said before) were now grown so numerous and powerful, that there was no passing of the Seas, nor any dwelling upon the Coasts; for they not only took and robbed Ships on the Sea, but also whole Provinces on the Land; the chief place of their Rendezvous being Cilicia the Rough. Mithridates first set them on work, by which finding profitable they ceased not when he left off, but continued their Robberies many thousands of several Nations, as Syrians, Cypriots, Pamphylians, the Natives of Pontus, and almost all others of that part of the World journeying together. For, seeing that the War continued, they thought it more wisdom to damoise themselves, than lose their own Estates. Because they made choice of Cilicia, as most commodious in the Mountainy and Craggy places thereof to secure themselves, they all went under the name of Cilices. They had defeated several Roman Prators, Murena did little good against them, and Servilius but a little repressed their violence; for so impudent were they now grown, that besides their incursions into

Sicily and other places, which made the Inhabitants of the Coasts forsake their habitations, they landed in Italy near Brundisium, whence they took away several women of quality; and more than that, two Armies with their Ensigns.

31. The People of Rome being very sensible of these disgraceful losses, a Law was preferred by A. Gabinius the Tribune, (his uncertain himself with him; for being none of Pompey, or from his own desire to ingratiate himself with him; for being none of the best men, he little valued the good of the Commonwealth) that some one from amongst those of Consular dignity should be Created General with full power for three years against the Pirates, to whom also should be granted large forces, and many Lieutenants for carrying on the War. This Law little pleased the Fathers, who now began to be jealous of Pompey's power; but to him was business committed, having equal authority with Proconsuls any where within fifty miles distance from the Sea, and full power over all persons within that compass; whether Kings or others, that they might assist him in the work. The Senate permitted him to chuse out of their body fifteen Lieutenants, to whom he might commit several Provinces to take up as much money out of the Treasury and from the Publicans as he pleased; to raise what force he would, and take two hundred Ships. But he obtained greater things of the People, and doubled his preparations, getting five hundred Ships, one hundred and twenty thousand Foot, and some five thousand Horse. He had also out of the Senate about twenty five Vicegerents, two Quæstors, and took up six thousand Attick Talents; so difficult a thing it seem'd to destroy so many Fleets as the Pirates had, in such a Sea, where there was so many places of retreat and refuge.

32. He distributed to his Lieutenants the Mediterranean Sea, including all the Bayes, Havens, Promontories, Straights, Peninsulas, and windings whatsoever, furnishing them with convenient Shipping, forces, and authority; so that the Pirates, being rouzed out of their lurking holes by some, might be received by the next; and chased by others, and none might need to say too far. He himself like a King, of so many Kings layd up and down, and visiting, giving directions, and overseeing, took care that not one Pirate escaped. By this course prosecuted with singular industry, in forty days he scoured all the Seas about Africa, Sardinia, Corfica, and Sicily; and the Pirates that escaped flock'd into Cilicia, as the common receptacle. He coming to Rome about some necessary occasions, quickly after followed them with sixty Gallies; but though they prepared to give him battle at Sea, yet when they saw his Fleet at hand, submitted to mercy. Then in the space of forty days he reduced Cilicia unto Roman obedience; for though he had provided Engines of all sorts to batter their Walls, it need not, the greatness of his name, and preparation for the War had so terrified them, that one after another they all yielded themselves with the furniture for their trade. Such as remained of them being above twenty thousand he was unwilling to kill, and to let them return to their old habitations was not safe: therefore he removed them into another place at a good distance from the Sea, where he gave them Houses and Land; and furnished their Seats with new habitations. Thus having taken well nigh four hundred Ships, killed ten thousand men, and taken one hundred and twenty Forts, he finished this War in three Months, using the Conquered with more clemency than did Q. Metellus in Crete, which being the other nest of these Pirates, and glorying that it never underwent the yoke of any, he subdued, and obtained with a Triumph the surname of Creticus. Having succeeded Antonius (who died in the action, and had as large authority there as Pompey) he used the Pirates very roughly, and so much the more, because hearing of Pompey's mercy, they had by a Melage given up themselves into his hands.

33. Whilst he was putting an end to this Piratic War, did Manilius prefer a Law as we said before, that all the Armies the Romans had any where, with the Government of all Asia, and the War against Mithridates and Tigranes, might be committed to him. The Nobility conceived great indignation against this Law, as which did manifest injury to Lucullus, Glabrio, and Marcus; but especially out of an high jealousy of Pompey's greatness, to whom now even all the Roman Empire was subject, having these Provinces laid to his former, with the same power of Peace and War, and making what friends and enemies he pleased, and chiefly for that he had Jurisdiction over all Armies whatsoever, which things had never before been conferred upon any single person. But the Commons with great alacrity embraced the Law; Cicero the Prator pressing it exceedingly, who having formerly set himself to defend the Nobility, now had betaken himself to the

34. It being now the 688 year of the City, the sixty fourth before the birth of Christ, the fourth of Aristobolus King of Judea, M. Æmilius Lepidus, and L. Volumnius Tullus being Consuls, Pompey undertook the expedition. He first sent to Mithridates, offering him good terms; but he slighted them, because he hoped to have Phraates the Parthian on his side; yet when he heard that he had first made a League with him, on the same conditions as were offered to Sylla and Lucullus, he himself then sent and asked peace. Pompey commanded him to lay down Arms, and deliver up all Fugitives; who fearing they should be given up, and the other Soldiers mutining for being about to be deprived of their help, a great trouble infused, which he evaded, by saying that he only sent to make an appeal, and by swearing that he would never be reconciled to the Romans, because of their insatiable avarice. Then marched Pompey into Galatia, where meeting with Lucullus, much ado there was betwixt them. Lucullus said the War was finished, and that the Commissioners sent from Rome were to decide the business, and when Pompey would not hear of this, he reviled him with an immoderate thirst after power; Pompey again objecting covetousness to him, so that the accusations could on neither side be denied. Lucullus gave out commands as yet in power, but Pompey by his Edicts forbade them, nullified all his Acts, and at length drew away most of his men. But at his return he was received with great honour by the Senate, carrying with him amongst his booty gotten in Pontus, many books, wherever he furnished his Library, which ever stood open to Greeks especially. He also first brought the Cherry-Tree out of Pontus (from a City of which Religion it was called Cerasus) into Italy.

35. Mithridates had now got together a considerable Army; but coming to engage with Pompey was inferior to him in all skirmishes. Pompey considering how the King had waited all the Country on purpose to straighten him for Provisions, went into Armenia the less, subject to Mithridates, who fearing he might get that Country into his hands, followed him thither. First here Mithridates had hopes to starve him; but was disappointed with considerable loss, and was himself encompassed with a Trench one hundred and fifty furlongs about. Hearing that Marcius was joyned to Pompey, who had Provisions at will, he fled away, having first killed all such as were sick, and useless, about him. But Pompey pursued, and prevented him from passing over Euphrates; then forced him to fight in the night, being surprized, and at unawares. The Moon being low, and on the backs of the Romans, lengthened their shadows, that his Soldiers thinking him nearer than they were, shot most of their Arrows without doing any execution. He lost many thousands; but he himself brake out with eight hundred Horse, whereof but three hundred stayed with him. Then wandering through the Woods with his Horse in his hand, he lighted of some Mercenaries, and about three thousand Foot, by which he was conveyed into a Castle where he had laid up much Treasure. Hence he sent to Tigranes, who refused to receive him, laying to his charge, that by his means Tigranes his son (by the daughter of Mithridates) had rebelled against him, and offered one hundred Talents for his head. He fled therefore to Cholcus, which formerly he had subdued.

36. Pompey followed him to Cholcus, thinking he would not have stirred thence; but he passed into Scythia, where partly by force, and partly by persuasion, he made the Princes thereof of his party, bestowing his daughters in marriage upon them. For he had now vast designs in his head, though out of his Kingdom, even no less than of passing through Thrace, Macedonia, and Pannonia, and so over the Alpes into Italy. Pompey departing from Cholcus, and escaping the ambushes laid for him by the Albanians and Iberians, marched into Armenia against Tigranes, who was resolved now not to fight, for that having had three sons by Mithridates, his daughter, two of them upon provocation he had already killed, and he that remained rebelling also, was now after an overthrow received from his Father, fled to Pompey. This son prevailed that his Ambassadors were not heard, who came to ask Peace. But Pompey marching against the City Artaxa, Tigranes yielded it up to him, and afterwards, without sending any before-hand, came into his Camp, offering up himself with all he had into his hand, made him umpire betwixt him and his son, who would not so much as rise up to him, when any reproach Pompey used him; very civilly. Pompey left him his inheritance of Armenia, with a great part also also of Mesopotamia (allowing the Son to reign in Gordana and Sophena, and except the rest after his Father's death) but deprived him of all the Provinces he had subdued, and fined him six thousand Talents of Silver for the charge he had put the People of Rome to in the War. So, he not only quitted part of Cappadocia and Cilicia, but also all Syria and Phœnicia from Euphrates to the Sea, which he had got into his hands, with part of Cilicia, after he had ejected Antiochus Pius, as it is said before in the reign of this unfortunate King. Tigranes the Son was very refractory, unwilling his Father should have the treasure adjudged to him by Pompey, that he might be able to pay his fine. Being minded to make away his Father, and for that cast into Prison; where therein also he solicited the Parthians against the Romans, he was reserved for a Triumph, and after that killed in Prison. The old King payed more than his fine, and gave something to every Officer and Soldier, after which he was accounted a Friend and Allie of the People of Rome.

37. Pompey restored Cappadocia to Ariobarzanes, gave him also Sophene and Gordene, with Cabala a City of Cilicia, and others. After this with some adoe he forced the Albanians and Iberians to beg Peace, and then passing over the Mountain Taurus, made War upon Antiochus Comagenus, and also Darius the Median, either for that he had helped Antiochus, or made War against Tigranes, or Artax King of the Nabathean Arabs. Then Phraates the Parthian affrighted at this great achievements begged Peace, which he granted not, but sent Afranius into Gordene, to drive out his forces, and restore it to Tigranes, who about it had warred with the Persian. Phraates hereupon invaded Armenia, and Tigranes sent to Pompey for aid, who being unwilling to begin a War with Phraates without an order from Rome, sent three Commissioners to agree them. Antiochus son of Antiochus Pius, to whom Lucullus granted Syria his inheritance, thought first of betaking himself to the Parthians; yet upon second thoughts, resolved to cast himself upon the good nature of Pompey. But he having obtained it without a stroke, put him beside it, commanding him to content himself with Comagena, though he had never ill deserved of the People of Rome: for knowing he was not able to right himself, he excused the matter, saying, it was not fit that Syria, whence Tigranes had banished the posterity of Selenus, should now rather fall to it being conquered, than to the Romans, who were Conquerors. He refused flatly to give Antiochus what before he could not keep (for he had layn in a corner of Cilicia fourteen years, all the time that Tigranes enjoyed it) lest he should again render it liable to the incursions of the Jews and Arabians. Therefore having overcome the Isaurians and Arabians, he reduced Syria into the form of a Province.

38. Mithridates, in the mean time had sent to Pompey to ask Peace, offering to pay tribute; but being willing to come to him, he flatly refused, and made great preparations to renew the War. After this Caesar his Governor of Phanagoria a Port Town of Pontus revolted, and calling the People to their liberty, took the Castle held by Mithridates his Sons, whereof four he sent to Roman Garrisons. Hereupon several places fell off, which made him put many persons to death, amongst whom were divers of his own friends, and one of his Sons. Seeing also that many revolted, and his new Army had no heart to the service, he sent to the Princes of Scythia to hasten their supplies, sending his daughters to them with a convoy of five hundred Horse; but these men killing the Eunuchs who had molested them about the King, carried away the Women upon Pompey. Yet such a courage still he had, as to think of passing through Scythia and Iberia, and joyning with the Galls of Europe to invade Italy, hoping there to find many enemies of the Romans; though Pompey coming out of Syria had through ambition done what he condemned in Lucullus, having reduced his Kingdom into the form of a Province, whilst he was yet alive, and provided for new opposition. But his Army was startled at the news of his intentions, hating the tediousness of the journey, and having small hope to conquer those in Italy, whom at their own doors they could not withstand. Yet such was his authority, as for a while they were quiet, till his own Son whom he had most loved, and destined his successor, became the procurer of their defection and his death.

39. This was Pharnaces, who either out of apprehension that this attempt upon Italy would cut off all pardon from his Family, or upon other grounds, conspired against him. The Plot was discovered, and though his Complices were tortured and put to death, yet was he pardoned, and betook himself to the fugitive Romans, shewing them their danger in case Italy were invaded, and then to the Army, which with small trouble he drew to his party. Mithridates coming to speak to them, Mithridates seeing this from a high room, sent divers to ask leave to depart, who not returning, he himself offered it of his son, but in vain, who bidding him dye, he cried out, and prayed, that he might hear one day the same words from his own Children. Then came he down to his Wives, Daughters, and Concubines, to whom when he had given poison, fearing he should be delivered up to the Romans, he took some himself; but having used much his body to Antidotes (such as yet are named from him) it would not work, though he walked much for that purpose, whereupon he wounded himself, but this not dispatching him soon enough, he called one Bithos (or Bithocus) a Gall, who, the wall being broken, had got in, by whose hand partly; and partly by his own, he dispatched himself. A man, as one faith, neither without good heed, to be omitted nor spoken of; in War most eager and fierce, and always of notable valour. Sometimes in fortune, all times in courage of highest rank; in direction a good Captain, in execution a good Soldier, in hatred to the Romans another Hannibal; finally, the greatest King after Alexander in the judgment of Cicero. This end came he to, after the War had first commenced just twenty years; for it began when Cn. Pompeius Strabo, and L. Porcius Cato, and ended now when M. Tullius Cicero the Orator, and C. Antonius Nepos were Consuls, in the 691 year of the City, the second of the 179 Olympiad, and the first of the reign of Hyrcanus, 61 years before the birth of Christ. A. M. 3942.

40. Pompey, when the first tidings of his death came to him, was near Jericho, marching towards Jerusalem against Aristobolus King of Judea, who had displaced his elder Brother Hyrcanus and usurped the Kingdom. Hyrcanus complained of his Brother to Pompey at Damascus, who came thither to answer for himself. Pompey used them both kindly, telling them, that as soon as he had dispatched some affairs he would come into their Country, which after he had settled Syria, subdued the Arabians with the Iturians, and reduced Pontus into a Province, (all in a short time) he now performed, being much incensed by Hyrcanus against the other. He sent to Aristobolus to come to him, and deliver up all his Holds, which he did with much regret, and afterwards withdrew himself to Jerusalem to prepare for War. Pompey suspecting some such matter, delayed not to follow him, who then came out to meet him; but though the City was entered without opposition, his Soldiers fortified the Temple and stood out, which made him be delivered into custody. The Temple being very strong by it's situation, was after much labour taken in the third month, Faustus the Son of Sylla having first mounted the Walls. Twelve thousand Jews were slain, of the Romans very few. Pompey entered the Holy of Holies, but medled with nothing, restored Hyrcanus to the Priesthood and Government (yet with command not to wear a Diadem) and took Aristobolus along with him, making Judea tributary to Rome, as is more largely related in it's proper place. After this, leaving Syria with two Legions to Scaurus his Quæstor, he fully subdued Cilicia, and thence returning into Pontus, settled things there, bestowing the Kingdom of Bosphorus upon Pharnaces. At his return he wintered at Ephesus, whence having subdued many Princes, and joynted others as Allies to the State of Rome, having taken one thousand Castles, nine hundred Cities, and restored thirty nine; having planted Colonies in eight Cities and Countries, and ordered the policy of such as through the Continent of Asia belonged to the Romans; and having magnificently rewarded his Soldiers he returned into Italy, and at Rome triumphed two dayes together very gloriously, leading amongst other Captives Aristobolus King of Judea, after he had spent five years in his Eastern Expedition.

41. The same year wherein Mithridates died, and the Temple of Jerusalem was taken, happened a most dangerous conspiracy at Rome, by the means of L. Sergius Catilina, a Patrician by degree, but one of a debauch and infamous life. Some years before he had been accused of incest with Fabia a Vestal Nun; but by the means of Catulus was acquitted; suspected also to have murdered his Son for the love of Aurelia, who would not marry one that had Children. Having contracted by this looseness of life a vast debt, he grew desperate, and sought for power and command, that he might if possible obtain the Sovereignty over all; but being also suspected hereof, he twice received a repulse in standing for the Consulship. The latter time it was carried from him by Cicero, whom he would have killed in the Comitia, and railed at as a foreigner and upstart, because he was born but of an Equestrian family at Arpinum.

Hereby driven into extrem d disdain and rage, he fell into that course wherein formerly he had been engaged with Piso for the destruction of his Country, to whom also L. Aurelius Cotta and L. Cethegus, and others. This Lentulus had been Consul seven years before, and now was Pretor (as also Cethegus) being driven on by a vain confidence he had in the Books of Sibylla, which he would often say did portend that the Sovereign power, should be in the hands of three Cornelii, viz. Sylla, Cinna, and himself.

42. The plot was discovered by Fulvia a Courtisan, to whom Q. Curius one of the Conspirators (a man that for his debaucheries had by the Centors been removed out of the Senate) blabbed it out, while he boasted to her, that shortly he should be a very considerable man. She gave intelligence to Cicero, who out of them two got the whole matter, how, and where they had met, and what designs they had in hand, particularly for his own destruction to be brought about by L. Valerius a Senator, and C. Cornelius of Equestrian rank, under pretence of a kind visit. He appointed guards to the several parts of the City, and on the eighth of November (as the year then went) called the Senate together, whither came Cataline amongst the rest; but none of the Senators would come near him, so as that part of the bench whereon he fate, was wholly void. Cicero, whether fearing him, or angry to see him there, made his first Oration against him, wherein he commanded him to depart the City. He went away late in the night with three hundred Armed men, and Licitors carrying Axes and Rods before him as a Magistrate, into Etruria, gathering Soldiers all along, intending to return and make prey of the City, which upon his departure he had given order to burn, as also to kill Cicero, which Lentulus and Cethegus took upon them to do, as soon as he should come to Fesula. In the mean time the Ambassadors of the Allobroges, who were come to Town to accuse their Magistrates, were also drawn in, to stir up the Galls against the Commonwealth; but declaring it to Fabius Sanga their Patron (it was the custom for each Nation or State to have one in the City) it came to Tullius' ear, and so was prevented.

Cicero makes his first Oration against him.

43. The day after Cataline's departure, the Consul made his second Oration, wherein he congratulates the People, and Commonwealth, concerning his absence. The Senate judged Cataline an Enemy, and Manlius, with whom in Etruria he had joynted; they deprived Lentulus of his Office, by whom the Ambassadors had been drawn in, who confessed they had often heard from him what he idly conjectured out of Sibylla's Books. Cicero's third Oration declares what was done in the Senate. The times being very dangerous, he propounded to the Fathers to consider what course was to be taken with Lentulus, Cethegus, Statius, and Cassius, all whom he having secured, this bred a great disturbance; for the Slaves and Dependents of the two former got together a great company of Artificers, and endeavoured to break in upon the back-side of the Pretor's house, and rescue their Lords. This being known, the Consul halted out of the Senate-house, and appointed a watch to be set, then returning, asked the opinions of the Senators. Silvanus designed Consul for the ensuing year, being first asked his opinion, according to the custom, was for putting them to death, and so were divers others, till Nero dissuaded it, judging it better to secure them till Cataline were suppressed, and the thing better fitted out. Of this opinion was C. Julius Cæsar, something suspected to be privy to the design. He would have them dispersed in several Towns in Italy by the Consuls appointment, afterwards to be tried, and not put to death altogether unheard. This seemed very plausible, till Cato (great Grand-Son to M. Porcius Cato the Centor) very earnestly pressed the contrary, falling foul upon Cæsar as a suspicious person. Then the Consul made his fourth Oration, wherein he so dispatch of the two contrary opinions, as he evidently inclineth to severity, as fearing what the guilty party might do the night following out of necessity and desperation. Hereby the Senate was induced to put them to death as surprized in the fact, which Cicero saw done accordingly ere the house arose. After this Cataline was overtaken by C. Antonius, the other Consul, near the Arde, as he was going into Gall to perfect his Levies, and there fighting most valiantly was slain. His men also fought it out to the last, scarcely one being taken. So was qualt this most dangerous conspiracy, by the vigilan-

44. Now began C. Julius Caesar to be very eminent, two and was years after these first sent as Praetor into the further Spain. He was born in the six hundred and fifty fourth year of the City, C. Marius the sixth time, and L. Valerius Flaccus being Consuls, the same that the Sedition about Saturninus hapned, on the twelfth day of the Month Quindilis, afterward from him named July by Antonius his Law. His Father was C. Julius Caesar, who never arose higher than the Pretorship, and dyed suddenly at Pise, as his shoes were drawing on in the morning: his Mother was Aurelia, the Daughter of C. Cotta; and Julia the Wife of Marius was his Aunt. In his youth having Married Cinna's Daughter (by which he had Julia) refusing to put her away, he was in great danger, being with much adde inspired by Sylla, who as it were foretelling what trouble he would bring to the State, said, that in Caesar were many Marii. The foundation of his Military skill he laid in Asia, under M. Thermus the Praetor, by whom being sent into Bithynia to fetch away the Navy, he stayed with Nicomedes the King, to whom it was suspected that he prostituted himself. Afterwards in the taking of Mitylene he deserved well, and served under Servilius Iulianus in Cilicia; but not long. For, hearing of Sylla's death, and hoping to make his fortune out of the dissensions raised by Lepidus, home he came; but not finding a convenient opportunity, and having to no purpose accused Dolobella, to shun the Envy thereby contracted, he went to Rhodes to hear Apollonius, whence saying in Winter; he fell into the hands of Pirates, and was forced to purchase his freedom with fifty Talents; to revenge which, he procured some ships, and took some of them, whom he nailed to Crosses, though without leave from the Praetor, who would have sold them. After this he gave a stop to Mithridates his Lieutenant, and saved divers Cities in Asia. He assisted Pompey the Consul, and others, in restoring the Triumphship which Sylla had broken. Shortly after he was made Quæstor, and sent into further Spain, where going about to administer Justice, he came to Gades, and saw Alexanders image in the Temple of Hercules. It troubled him exceedingly, to consider that he himself had done no memorable thing at that age where Alexander had conquered the World, and thereupon he earnestly desired to be recalled, that being in the City, he might catch at some opportunity for his own advancement.

45. Having got leave to return ere his time was out, he joyned presently with the Latine Colonies in demanding the freedom of the City, and had incited them to some desperate design, but that the Senate for fear of the worst, retained the Legions some time, which were raised for Cilicia. He was suspected to have been of the party of M. Crassus, of P. Sulla also, and Antonius (who having been designed Consuls, were found to have indirectly fought for the Office, and so according to Law forfeited their places to the discoverers) in the beginning of the year to set upon the Senate, and kill whom they pleased. Crassus being made Dilector, he was to have been Master of the Horse-men under him, and all things being ordered according to their pleasure, the Consulship was to have been re-ferred to the other two. Some have affirmed (whom Sextonius citeth) that he also conspired with Cn. Piso, that the one in the City, and the other abroad, should rise, which was prevented by Piso's death. Being after this Ædilis, he so managed the business of publick buildings, and shows, that all was ascribed to him, and nothing to his Collegue; by which means, and others, he procured the favour of the People, and essayed by the Tribunes to get Ægypt assigned to him, which, now having expelled the King, he thought would afford him an opportunity of an extraordinary command. But he was crossed by the great ones, whom that he might vex, he restored the Trophies erected by Marius over the Cimbri, which Sulla had caused to be pulled down, and suborned those who accused Rabirius. By his means especially the Senate had suppressed Saturninus the seditious Tribune, and now being brought before Caesar as his Judge, he was so severe against him, that nothing so much helped the man in his appeal from him to the People.

46. After his repulse as to Ægypt he stood for the High-Priesthood, and by large sums (such corruption were those times arrived at) bought so many voices as he carried it from two most powerful men and his Seniors, having more suffrages out out of their two Tribes, than they had out of all the rest besides. Then being Praetor, he stood for the complices of Catiline so earnestly, as he drew to his party the Brother of Cicero the Consul, and divers others. After this he assisted Cælius Metellus the Tribune in preferring turbulent Laws, till both of them by a decree of the Senate were displaced, and yet then would he fit, and execute his Office still, till forced to withdraw; then, out of policy he restrained the multitude which flocked to him, and offered to restore him by strong hand, of which the Senate taking notice, gave him thanks with great commendations, and re-invested him in his Office. After this, he fell into another danger, being accused by Peltius and Carinus, as a partner of Catiline; yet, appealing to Cicero that he had discovered something to him, he came off, and revenged himself upon his accusers. Then obtained he by lot, as we said, the Government of Spain, and having contracted a vast debt, put off his Creditors for that time, by the interposition of surerries. Coming into his Province he spent not his time in administering Justice, but pierced farther into the Country, and subdued certain people before this untouched, that seeking matter for a Triumph, which then to obtain he hasted to Rome. But it being now the time for the Consular Comitia, he had an extraordinary desire to that Office, and begged of the Senate, that he might stand for it by proxy, for that he could not himself be present, it being against the custom for any that was to Triumph to enter the City ere that day came; for which as yet he was not provided. This, though against the Laws, was not without precedent, but could not now be granted. Therefore he resolved rather to lose his Triumph than miss of the Consulship, and coming to Town, stood for it himself.

49. Great contents hapned about this Office, and he had not carryed it, but that Pompey at this time stood in need of it. For, the great ones envying his fame, refused to confirm those conditions which he had granted to the Kings, Governors, and Cities of Asia. Lucullus his Predecessor in the War with Mithridates, who since his return had given up himself wholly to idleness and luxury (for he first brought into Rome the extravagancy of buildings and feasting) they stirred up, by his authority to promote their opposition, and he presently fell upon him, together with Metellus Creticus, who bore him malice also ever since the Piræick War. Lucullus bade him report his matters singly, and not as a Sovereign Lord expect they should all be confirmed without any consideration: and whereas he had relinced several of Lucullus his acts, he desired of the Senate that this might be considered, whether justly done or otherwise. Cato, Metellus Celer, the Consul, and Crassus, defended Lucullus, who boasted that the victory over Mithridates was his own; and he obtained that his decrees which Pompey had repealed might be in force, and those that Pompey made in reference to the Conquered Kings should be null: and he hindred, by the help of Cato, a Law which he would have preferred about dividing grounds to his Soldiers. Pompey being thus used in the Senate, betook himself to the Tribunes, one whereof (L. Flavius) that the Law for the grounds might more easily pass, would have given the suffrage to all Citizens, but Metellus the Consul so earnestly opposed it, that though the Tribunes cast him in prison, yet would he not depart from his former sense, which pertinaciousness of him and others, when Pompey saw, he desisted, repenting too late that he had disbanded his Armies, and exposed himself thus to the malice of his Enemies.

48. At this time came C. Julius Caesar to Rome to stand for the Consulship. Pompey joyned with him, upon condition that he procuring the Consulship for him, he would confirm his acts. And whereas Pompey and M. Crassus had formerly been at odds ever since their joyned Consulship which they executed with great discord; Caesar now made them friends, and not only so, but they all three conspired together, that nothing should be done in the Commonwealth which displeased any one of them; which conspiracy, say Writers, was pernicious to the City, the World, and at length to themselves. This conspiracy of these three principal persons, Varro (who wrote four hundred and ninety Books) described in one Book, and called it tres-caput, Tricipitina, or Three headed. Dionorius Siculus fetcheth the Original of Caesarian matters from this year, wherein he travelled into Ægypt, when young Ptolemy Dionysus was King. With this conspiracy also Asinius Pollio began his History of the Civil War. For the falling out of Caesar and Pompey, did not, as most have thought, procure the Civil Wars; but rather their Conjunction, which was designed to break in pieces the power of the Nobility, as Plutarch observeth in the life of Caesar. This was the fix

S E C T. VI.

From the beginning of the Triumvirate, or first Triumvirate, to the absolute reign of Julius Cæsar.

Containing the space of sixteen years.

1. CÆSAR by the help of Pompey obtained the Consulship; but not without the assistance of money also. There were two other Competitors, L. Lucullus and M. Bibulus, whereof he was much for the former, having agreed with him, that because he was less in favour, but very rich, he should give money for them both through the Centuries. But the Grandees understanding this, and fearing if he had him for his Collegue he might do what he listed, they caused Bibulus to offer more, they themselves contributing to the expence, which corruption Cato denied not to be for the good of the Commonwealth, now brought by the means of such evil members into absolute danger and necessity. Cæsar confirmed Pompey's acts according to agreement, neither Lucullus nor any other opposing it, and Pompey procured, that what honour Lucullus had promised to certain men of Pontus, should not be confirmed by the Senate, filling the City with Soldiers, and by force casting him and Cato out of the Forum. In this his first Consulship he sold alliances with Rome, and also Kingdoms; and, to procure the favour of the Commons, preferred a Law for dividing certain grounds in Campania (which had been preserved to defray publick charges) to such Citizens as had three children or more. This he caused to pass by force, and compelled all Plebeians to swear to observe the Law, and the Senators also, though Cato urged them to refuse; for they did it to save their lives, he having caused the People to decree, that it should be capital for any to deny it. He had recourse to the People in all cases, making little use of the Senate, which he seldom called together. Bibulus his Collegue having opposed his actions for some time to no purpose, kept himself at home, and stirred not for the remaining part of the year. Cæsar then governed alone, and was much courted by the Equites or Knights, who having farmed the custom, desired an abatement of the rent. The Senate refused to remit any thing, but he did their business for them, procuring the People to abate a third part. By this and other ways of shews and largesses, he so inveigled the multitude, that he got Gall to be decreed to him for five years, with four Legions, and for the remaining part of the year, spent it in seeking how to establish himself for the time to come.

2. Knowing how considerable a man Pompey was, to bind him faster to him, he gave him in marriage his Daughter Julia. He procured two of his own creatures, A. Gabinus and L. Calpurnius Piso (whose Daughter he had Married after Cornelia's death) to be designed Consuls for the following year, as also Vatinius and Clodius Tribunes, though the later had abused his Wife (for he was a person exceedingly loose that way) having in womens clothes crept into the meetings proper only to that Sex, for which he was accused as a breaker of the sacred customs by Cicero. He appeared not against him though he put away his Wife, nay he helped him to his place, as it's thought, out of opposition to the Orator (who was wont to declaim against the combination of the three great ones, as pernicious to the Commonwealth) and in way of requital for the help he had afforded him in the procurement of Gall, whither, when the time of his Consulship was expired, he departed. This year was Titus Livius the Historiographer born at Padua.

3. Clodius out of malice to Cicero seeking for the Tribuneship, whereas he was a Patrician, thereby incapable of the place, he procured himself to be adopted by a Plebeian, and so with the loss of his former dignity obtained it. Then did he prefer a Law, that whoever had put to death any Roman Citizen unheard, water and fire should be forbidden him, which amounted to as much as banishment; and set Cicero his day of appearance, for putting to death Cæcilius, Lentulus, and others of Catalines conspiracy unheard. Pompey at first stood stilly for the accused, saying, he would rather dye himself than Tully should be hurt; but Cæsar took him off, because Cicero having desired to go his Lieutenant into Gall, upon Clodius his seeming willing to be reconciled, had changed his resolution, and hereby displeased him. This is certain, that he who was wont to defend others so earnestly, was very timorous in his own cause (which hapned also to Demosthenes) and chose rather to depart the City, and late at night, than undergo his trial, after that Pompey had forsaken him, and the Consuls would give him little hopes. After his departure Clodius banished him by decree of the People four hundred miles from Italy, demolished his Villages and his House, on the plot wherof he built a Temple to Liberty, and set his goods to sale. He went to Thessalonica a City of Macedonia, being by Letters of the Senate commended to such Kings or Governours, as into the Dominions of whom he might have occasion to come.

4. Clodius having thus rid himself of Cicero, for that Cato's preference was very troublesome to him, sent him also out of the way, under colour of doing him honour. He preferred a Law against Ptolemy King of Cyprus (Brother to Antiochus of Egypt) for the spoiling him of all his estates, and reducing that Island into the form of a Province, though this man had nothing ill deserved. He was indeed, very vicious, if that could have given them any right to what he had; but the truth was, Clodius had been taken by the Pirates, and sending to him for money to redeem him, he would part but with two Talents, and therefore he took this occasion to be revenged on him and Cato both together. The King hearing of Cato's coming, killed himself, and some said that he cast his treasures into the Sea. Cato sold his goods, and brought a great sum of money into the treasury. But, by this time Pompey repented that he had forsaken Cicero; for, Clodius wanting other matter now to work on, vexed all the great ones, and repealed some things which he had done, so that now he set himself to have him recalled. Clodius withstood it, but thereupon the Senate passed a Decree, that nothing should be heard before his restitution was propounded. Lentulus the Consul propounded it on the Calends of January; but the matter being hindered, several ways, was brought down to the People on the eighth before the Calends of February, where was great endeavour used by T. Annius Milo and P. Sextius two other Tribunes for his restitution. Clodius their Collegue taking some Fencers belonging to his Brother Appius, fell upon the multitude and killed many; The Tribunes were wounded, and Q. Cicero Brother of the banished (newly returned from Asia, which he had governed three years) lay for dead amongst the slain. Now the People began seriously to bethink themselves. Milo ventured to draw Clodius by force to judgment, and Pompey possessing himself of the Forum, put the People to their suffrages, who with universal consent voted his restitution. The Senate decreed honour to such Cities as had entertained him, and that his House and Villages should be re-edified at the publick charge. So Cicero who had been banished the year before about the Calends of April, returned this year in the month Sextilis, or, the day before the Notices of September, and therefore was absent about sixteen months. As Plutarch more rightly computeth than * Simpson, who strangely forgetting himself blaming him, for laying he returned in the sixteenth month, contended that from the first of April to the month Sextilis or August of the following year, intervene but fourteen months. Now P. Cornelius Lentulus and Q. Cæcilius Metellus were Consuls.

5. But Cæsar, as we said, obtained of the People Gall within the Alpes and Ilyricum with three Legions; and the Senate added Gall without the Alpes (which in part we now call France) with another Legion. This gave occasion to a War of such consequence as none at this time was greater, and being described by the Captain himself in his celebrated Commentaries, we shall be more particular and large in the Account we are obliged to give of it. His first work was to repel the Helvetii (les Helvètes & Suisses) who having burnt their Houles and resolved to seek out more convenient Habitations, intended to pass over the Rhone, and so through his Province. But before he came to shew how this was done, at the entrance of his work he gives his Reader a short description of Gall in this manner.

Sect. 6.

His Geography of Gall.

6. All Gall is divided into three parts; whereof the Belge inhabit one, the Aquitani another, and those which they call Celtes, and we (Romans) call Galli a third, all which, differ each from other in Manners, Language and Laws. The River Garonna or Garonne separates the Galli from the Aquitani; and Matrona, and Sequana (Morne and Seine) bound them from the Belge. The Belge are most Warlike as being at most distance from the Civility and Politude of the Province, and less frequented with Merchants or acquainted with such things as are imported to render effeminate mens minds, as also being seated next to the Germani beyond the Rhine, with whom they have continual Wars. For which cause also the Helvetians excel the rest of the Galli in valour, being in daily conflicts with the Germani, for defence of their own territories, or by invading theirs. The part inhabited by the Galli, begins at the River Rhone, and is bounded with the Garonne, the Ocean and the Confines of the Belge; and reaching also to the Rhine as a limit from the Sequani, it stretcheth Northward. The Belge take their beginning at the extreme Confines of Gall, and inhabit the Country which lyeth along the lower part of the Rhine, inclining to the North and the rising Sun. Aquitani spreadeth it self betwixt the River Garonne and the Pyrenean Hills, as far as the Ocean which lyeth toward Spain, between the West and North.

Athenius.

7. This division of Gall hath by reason of the Authority of the Author, been esteemed a Rule for the Geography of that Country; and yet a late accurate Surveyor of it thinks himself obliged to hint several either faults in it, or mistakes of those that ordinarily read it. For, he contends that by all these words laid together it is not to be understood that Cesar makes a threefold division of Gall, but that the Celtick was twofold as including Gallia Narbonensis, though not expressed. And he accuseth Cesar of want of diligence in affixing the Borders of Gallia Celtica towards the East, where he writes that By the Sequani and Helvetii it reaches to the Rhine, as if the Sequani in any part bordered upon the Rhine, or the Helvetii, at a further distance, were seated on that River. And as improperly he writes that the Celtick Gall took its beginning from the River Rhone. For the Rhone except in a very little tract at the Lake Lemanus gives no limit or bound to Gall, but perpetually cuts through it, from Geneva to the Sea of Marsilles. Such faults Monetus findes with Cesar's beginning of his Commentaries, as to his Geography. And we shall see he makes other Exceptions to his Narratives, both as to Countries, Nations, and his very own Acts. Let us first hear as compendiously as we can what Cesar saith.

8. Amongst the Helvetians Orgetorix was most Eminent both for the Nobility of his Descent and Riches, and in the year when M. Messala and M. Piso were Consuls, out of ambition to reign, moved the Nobility to a Commotion, and persuaded the State as an easy matter for them, who in valour excelled all other Nations, to invade their Neighbours with their whole power, and make themselves Masters of all Gall. He did the more easily persuade them because the Helvetians were shut up on every side, by the strength and Nature of the place they inhabited. On the one side with the depth and breadth of the River Rhine, which divides their Country from Germany; on the other side with the high ridge of the Mountain Jura which runs betwixt them and the Sequani; and on the third part they were flanked with the Lake Lemanus, and the River Rhone parting their Territories from the Roman Province. Being thus frightened they could not easily enlarge themselves, or make War upon the bordering Countries; and thereupon being men wholly bent to Arms, and War, were discontented as having too little room for their multitude of People, and the fame they had obtained for their valour; their Country containing two hundred and forty miles in length, and in breadth one hundred and eighty. They resolved to make preparation for an Expedition, for which purpose they bought a great number of Carts and Horses for Carriages, sowed much Corn that they might have plenty in their Journey, and made peace with the confining Countries. For this they thought two years would be sufficient, and in the third enforced their setting forward by a solemn Law, appointing Orgetorix to give order for what remained.

9. Here we see that the straitness of their Country, and its inability to nourish and sustain their Multitudes, was the great motive of this design of the Helvetians, as the like hath been to most other Nations for transmigration; and if Monetus be heard, they had much more reason afforded from that inconvenience than Cesar imagined. For, whereas he here writes that their Country contained two hundred dred and forty miles in length, and one hundred and eighty in breadth, he affirms him to make it bigger by two thirds than it really was. Indeed the Helvetians themselves in their Geographical Carts give out that from the Town of Geneva to the Aceronian, or Lake of Constance, may be found the length assigned by Cesar, and from Jura and the Rhine to the Alps that border upon them, the breadth of eighty miles; but he affirms they will never prove it to any Foreigner that knows the ways, but that their first assertion exceeds all belief. Then they challenge that Country lying at the roots of the Alps which the Rheti (Grisons) the Nantuates and Leptontii will not yield them, as neither will the Latobrigi (* Vaudais or Vauquois) * Proprié 22 that are adjacent to the Lake Lemanus, the Confederates indeed of the Helvetians, but not of their Body or Nation. To the Latobrigi he saith, of right belongeth as far as from the Mountain Jura and the West, to the Veragri and the East, whatsoever ground lyeth upon the Lake, as far as the Region of Berne toward the North; although Cesar in his running discourse, and intent upon something else, assigns it all to the Helvetians. But he either having seen these places but once, and but for a few days, or disturbed with the noise and cares of the Helvetian War, or for that, after the Gallick and Civil Wars were over, he published his Commentaries at a long distance, speaks little confidently and accurately of this Country and many others.

other people.

10. But Orgetorix, still acted by his ambitious design, communicated it to two of his Neighbours, and persuaded Casticus one of the Sequani, and Dumnorix one of the Aedui, to set up also for themselves, and get the Sovereignty of their Countries. But his practices were discovered, and when he should have been called to account he was found dead, not without suspicion that he killed himself. However the Helvetians pursued their former design of leaving their Country; and when they thought themselves prepared, set fire to all their Towns, in number twelve, and four hundred Villages, besides private Buildings, and burnt all the Corn but what they carried along with them, that all hope of return being taken away, they might the more readily undergo all hazards; and order was given that every man should carry with him so much meal as would sustain him for three months. They persuaded the Rauraci, Tulingi, and Latobrigi to do the like and go along with them; as also the Boii, who once dwelt beyond the Rhine, but were now seated in the Territories of the Norici, and had taken the Capital Town of that Country. There were only two ways which gave them passage out of their Country, the one through the Sequani very narrow and difficult, between the Hill Jura and the River Rhone, through which a single Cart could hardly pass, and having an high Mountain hanging over, so that a small force might easily hinder them: The other was through the Roman Province far easier and readier, the River Rhone running betwixt the Helvetians and the Allobroges (who lately had been brought into obedience to the People of Rome) giving passage in divers places by Fords. Now the utmost Town belonging to the Allobroges, and bordering upon the Helvetians was Geneva, where there was a Bridge leading to the Helvetians. They doubted not to persuade the Allobroges (who seemed yet but little affected to the people of Rome) or at least to force them to give them passage. Being now ready for a march, they appointed a day whereon to meet on the Banks of Rhone, which was on the twenty fifth of March, L. Piso and A. Gabinius being Consuls.

11. Here Monetus again reprehends this great Man as unskillfully delivering that there were only two ways through which the Helvetians could pass to their Neighbour Nations, so as to come to the Country of the Santones, on which they intended to seize. It's certain, saith he, that the Allobroges both then and now were passable by two ways, as well by the Helvetians as other Nations, and those leading through the Borders of the Latobrigi; and that the Sequani were passable by as many; of which certainly the Helvetians would have chosen the most commodious. Of the two ways leading from the Latobrigi to the Allobroges, one lies beneath the Western Head of the Lake Lemanus and Geneva, through which the Helvetians attempted to pass, as shorter; where yet the Rhone is seldom fordable, as always swelling with the waters flowing out of the Lake; and the other lies above the Eastern Head of the Lake in the Territories of the Veragri, where the Rhone is not deep, but easily fordable. From the Latobrigi also to the Sequani lies two ways. That of which Cesar speaks at the root of the Mountain Jura and the right hand Bank of the River Rhone; and another almost fix leagues distant from it, toward the West, in the Straits of Jura, leading to Pons Rilius, now Pontarlier and and Vesuntio, or Bezanzon. And besides there was still another leading from the Helvetians to the Segnani, and that was through the Territories of the Tulingi their Confederates, the most large and even, but longer and more turning than the rest, by the Confines of the Lingones and Aedui. And so there were not only two, but five ways, by which the Helvetians might have passed out of their own Bounds, as well by the Segnani as Allobroges contrary to what Cæsar delivers, who is neither more to be believed when he writes that the Rhone runs between the Borders of the Helvetians and Allobroges, giving passage in certain places by Fords. For the Rhone doth not touch the Helvetians but the Latobrigi; as also doth the Lake Lemanus: and as for the Latobrigi, though in this Expedition and War they were associate to the Helvetians, yet were they no portion of their Nation, Cæsar himself being witness where he delivers, that the Helvetians persuaded them, as also the Rauraci and Tulingi their Neighbours to join with them in the Expedition. Moreover what he writes concerning the Rhone being fordable near to its passage out of the Lake Lemans, will not easily go down with any that are acquainted with those places. But to proceed.

They sent to
a passage.

12. Cæsar having notice of the design of the Helvetians posted from Rome into Gall, and came to Genève, where he brake down the Bridge, and raised Forts throughout the Province, there being but one Legion in those parts. They having intelligence of his Arrival sent their Ambassadors, the choicest of their Nobility, to desire his permission to pass peaceably through the Province, having no other way to go. But he remembering how L. Cælius the Consul was slain, his Army defeated, and his Soldiers put under the Yoke, thought it not fit to grant their request; for he did not think that men so ill affected would forbear to offer wrongs and injuries, if permitted. However for the better gaining of time, and raising sufficient Forces, he took space so deliberate till the Ides of April. And in the mean time with that Legion he had ready, and the Soldiers that came out of the Province, he made a Ditch and a Wall of sixteen foot in height from the Lake Lemans that runneth into the Rhone, to the Hill Jura, which divideth the Segnani from the Helvetians, being in length nineteen miles. The work being perfected, he disposed Garisons, and fortified Castles to hinder them if they went about to break out by force. At the day appointed for return of the Ambassadors he utterly denied to give any leave to pass through the Province, as having neither Custom nor Precedent from the People of Rome to warrant him in that kind. And if by force of Arms they would endeavour it, he said he should use his endeavour to oppose them. Here again Monetus asks the question what need there was of so long a Wall and Ditch, seeing that Cæsar a little before had said, that this Passage was so strait that a single Cart could scarcely get through it? Was it for that he would draw this Fortification from the Bank of the Lake toward the inward Champions of the Latobrigi, the better to keep off the Helvetians from passing the Ford of the Rhone, and from the Town of Genève? But a little after Cæsar shall confess openly that the Helvetians entred these Fords, and yet broke not through his Fortifications; and when he so writes will manifestly contradict himself. Let us hear it as it comes in order.

a passage in vain.

13. The Helvetians frustrated of their former hope, went about, some with Boats joyned together, others with Flats whereof they made store, and the rest by Fords where the River was shallow, sometimes in the day and oftentimes by night, to break out; but being beaten back by the help of the Fortification, the concourse of Soldiers and multitude of Weapons, desisted from that attempt. Now, faith Monetus, the Northern Bank of the Lake Lemans, and the declining Horn of the Mountain Jura, by this their vicinity make that Region of the Latobrigi, whom Cæsar not rightly calleth Helvetians, of the form of a Wedge, through which the Wall that was nineteen miles in length must be drawn in a transverse line, at distance from the straights of the said Wedge, and the Rhone at that place issuing out of the Lake Lemans, from the Mountain Jura to Lemans, towards the inward Regions of the Latobrigi; that by that Fortification the Helvetians might be excluded from that other way that lay to the Segnani, more remote from the straights of that way. But beyond that Wall fortified with a Ditch on this side at a longer distance the Western Head of Lemans was left, and from that Head the Rhone issueth forth, which being so, let us see, faith he, how little consistent Cæsar is with himself, who must necessarily be said to have spoken contradictions, or else at that time the site of Jura, Lemans and the Rhone were otherwise than now, although he represents it the same as at this day is found. For, if when the Hel-

vetians endeavoured to gain the Bank of the Rhone, they were prevented by a Ditch and a Wall lying so far before it, and yet this Fortification was not broken thorough by them, (the Legions driving them back from it.) then must the Helvetians by flying in the Air or by passages under ground, have got to the Rhoni so fortified, and attempted their passage by Boats joyned together, the Romans being utterly ignorant which way they came. But if that Fortification of Cæsar was on this side the Passage of the Rhone, from the Lake, and consequently on this side the whole Bank of that Lake, why is it said that a Wall was raised from Lemans as far as the Mountain Jura? And why so long a Wall in so strait a Passage, that a single Cart could scarcely pass through it? Then with what pudence could Cæsar raise a Wall of Stone on this side, and not beyond the River, of which he desired to have the Command, and so might, his design being assisted by the great convenience of the soil?

They are de-
sar.

14. There was only another way left (Cæsar proceedeth) through the Segnani, which they could not pass, it was so narrow, but by the favour of the Country. They themselves could little prevail as to that matter, and therefore they sent to Dumnorix an Æduan to desire his mediation, who having married the Daughter of Orgetorix an Helvetian, being of good authority in his Country, and ambitious of Dominion, undertook the business and procured them leave to pass, each Nation giving the other pledges, that the Segnani should not interrupt the Helvetians in their Journey, nor they offer any injury to the Country. Cæsar now having intelligence that they would pass through the Territories of the Segnani and Aedui into the Confines of the Santonnes, who were not far distant from the borders of the Tholosani, a People of the Province, and knowing how ill the consequences might be, left T. Labienus his Lieutenant to defend the Fortifications and posted into Italy, where he raised two Legions and took three more out of their Winter quarters, near to Aquileia, with which five Legions he halted back again into Gall, and though opposed in his return by certain Nations, got into the Country of the Allobroges, and so into that of the Subassani that were the first beyond the Rhone, bordering upon the Province. By this time the Helvetians having passed the Straights and Frontiers of the Segnani, wasted the Country of the Aedui, who thereupon sent and complained to Cæsar, as also did the Arabarri, who had alliance and dependency with the Aedui. In like manner did the Allobroges quit their farms and possessions beyond the Rhone, and fled to him, complaining they had nothing left but the sole of the Country. Cæsar therefore seeing it was not convenient to linger any further, till the Allies of Rome were spoiled of their fortunes and strength, and the Helvetians were come to the Santonnes, when he heard that they were to pass the Arar (Soane) running through the Confines of the Ædusi and Segnani, about the third Watch of the Night he fell upon them with three Legions, and surprized part of them, which had by the assistance of Flats and bridges made of Boats got over; slew many of them, and the rest escaped to the woods. Of the four Cantons into which the Helvetians were distinguished, this was the Tigurine (of Zurich) which Canton alone had formerly slain L. Cælius the Consul, and put his Army under the yoke. But now Cæsar took revenge not only for the publick, but his particular loss, for in that battle with Cælius they slew also L. Piso the Grand-Father of L. Piso his Father in Law.

15. Now as Cæsar pursued the Helvetians, so Monetus pursues him. Here he faith he lays down two things that look little like truth, whereof one is that leave was obtained for the Helvetians to pass through the Country of the Segnani by the mediation of Dumnorix the Æduan; the other is the story of their passage through the inward Territories of the Segnani; not by the outward straights of the Mountain Jura, and the Rhone which they neither passed by Fords nor Boats. The first he faith, he shall never persuade a prudent man to believe. For it was not in the power of the Segnani to grant them leave, who were then after a servile manner oppressed by Arviostus, a most proud German King, who would never have suffered the Armed Helvetians, a most numerous and fierce People to have passage through his Dominions. To obtain this leave, the Address was not to be made to the Segnani, who had no power over their Countries, or themselves in their own hands, but to Arviostus, from whom there could be no hope, that leave should be obtained. But of this fiction convenient for the time, Cæsar served himself, to prevent the disgrace that must fall upon him and his men, the Helvetians having broken through his fortifications, during his absence in Italy. For is both false

Sect. 6. false and fabulous to believe that they passed through the Straits of Fura to Pons Ælius, and Vesontia, without acquainting Arivovisus, and that the Sequani durst attempt it, or could obtain leave. But Cæsar was althampt to acknowledge that the Helvetians in his absence broke through his Trenches, and thence conceived great hatred against them, and to be revenged, obstinately pursued them which way soever they turned from him, and the Roman Province through the Territories of the Ædui. Two things perfwade that, they passed between Jura and the Rhone. They would not venture to provoke Arivovisus, nor endanger being stopped by him in their Journey. And the way by the Rhone was better and shorter, and one only Legion at the Wall, especially in the absence of Cæsar, could not hinder their passage. Their passage through these Straits is attested by their wafting of the Territories of the Sebutians, Ambarri, Ædui, and the complaints thereof made to Cæsar, but no devastation made in the borders of the Sequani. But for certain Reasons he adds most things are otherwise written by Cæsar than indeed they were, of which we shall admonish the Reader in our Commentations, as fit occasion presents it self. So bold is Mometus, and bold he is indeed as well in his own assertions as refuting what hath been written by others. It were well if he were as perspicuous.

16. Cæsar after this overthrow, passed the River Arar and carried over his Army, to pursue the rest of the Helvetian Army. They much daunted at his sudden coming, sent their Ambassadors (for he had got over the River in one day which they could scarcely pass in twenty) who yet, as the custom is, were not wanting to urge all the Conveniences on theirs, and all the inconveniences on the other side. Cæsar made answer suitable to the state of his Affairs, and Drivico chief of the Ambassadors replied with so little satisfaction, that the next day they removed their Camp, and so also did Cæsar. But he sent all his Horse before, to the number of four thousand, which he had raised in the Province, and drawn from the Ædui and their Associates. This was to spy which way the Enemy took, and they falling in upon the Reere, were forced to engage with the Cavalry of the Helvetians in a disadvantageous place, and thereby lost some few of their Company. With this success they were elevated, and thereupon several times made Salles. But Cæsar kept back his men, judging it enough for the present to keep the Enemy from harrying and spoiling the Country, and for fifteen dayes ordered his march in such a manner, that there were not above five or six miles betwixt his Army and the Reere of theirs. In the mean time Cæsar finding no forage, pressed the Ædui daily to bring in Corn, according to their promise, for, the River Arar stood him in small stead at that time, by reason that the Helvetians had taken their Journey, clear from the River, and he would by no means forsake them. But the Ædui delayed to bring any in, and thereupon Cæsar called to him besides others, their chief Magistrates (who had the Name of Vergobret and power of life and death over their Subjects) for this year Driviciacus and Lisius, whom he blamed exceedingly for not supplying him in such a place and condition, where he could have none else, and when for their sake, and at their request he had undertaken the War.

17. Lisius gave out such words as hinted that Dumovix the Brother of Driviciacus, though a private person, had more Authority with the People, than they the Magistrates, and having ambitious designs was a great Enemy to the Romans. Cæsar in the Assembly would not make any inquiry, but privately got the whole matter out of him; how by keeping Taxes low he had obtained his wealth and Authority at home, and by Marriages Contracted friendship with other Nations. How he wished well to the Helvetians, but hated the Romans, and especially Cæsar, because that by their coming into Gall, his power was weakened, and Driviciacus his Brother restored to his antient Honour and Dignity. Besides this it was found that the route of Cæsar's Horse came by his means, for he commanded the Troops which the Ædui sent to his Assistance, and from their disorder the rest of the Cavalry took the fright. He had a great mind to punish him, but durst not do it without acquainting his Brother, who upon breaking it to him, burst out into tears, embraced Cæsar, and though he had devised the ruine of him as well as of the Romans, yet he obtained that he should be spared as well for Brotherly affection, as for avoiding a general alienation and distrust of Gall. Cæsar now having intelligence that the Helvetians were lodged under an Hill, sent a party to get possession of the Top; but by the Cowardise of P. Caustidius, one who had been counted a great Souldier in the Army of L. Sylla and afterwards with M. Crassus, was prevented of his purpose. He commanding the Discoverers his fear caused him to to imagine that the Helvetians were possessed of the Top, and so acquainted Cæsar; whereas Labiennus who was sent for that purpose, had gained it, and in vain expected Cæsar to come and assist him, according as they had agreed. The Enemy being dilodged, Cæsar followed and incamped within three miles of him; the day following the Army being to be paid in Corn. Two dayes after being but eighteen miles distant from Bibracte (the same with Augustodunum, Augusta Julia Ædonum, Flavia, Florentia and Politia, now Autun in the Duchy of Burgundy) a great and opulent City of the Ædui, he turned aside from the Helvetians and made towards it.

ed toward Bibracte.

18. Hereupon the Helvetians turned back, and fell upon the Romans in their Reer, which Cæsar perceiving, drew his Forces to the next Hill, and sent his Horse to sustain the charge of the Enemy. In the middle of the Hill he made a triple Battel of four Legions of old Souldiers. Upon the highest ridge he placed two other Legions newly raised, together with the Associate Forces. The whole Front of the Hill he filled with men, and betwixt the Carriages so as to be guarded by the uppermost Battalions. The Helvetians also placed their Carriages for best security, and having beaten back Cæsar's Horse with a thick thronged Squadron, put themselves into a Phalanx, and pressed under the first Battel of the Legions. To take away all hope of flight, he sent away first his own Horse and then the rest, and after some encouraging words, began the Battel. His Souldiers with the advantage of the Hill, by their Piles, easily brake the Phalanx, and then with their Swords came to a furious close. The Piles of the Romans falling on the Targets of the Galls, struck them through and joyned them together, so that they were glad to cast them away, and retreat to an Hill a mile off. Thither they were pursued, and a furious charge was made on both sides, not one man being found to have turned his Back, although the fight continued from one a clock, till the Evening. And it was kept still on Foot, at the Carriages of the Helvetians, till it was far in the Night, and then after a long Conflict the Baggage was taken together with their Camp, and therein a Son and a Daughter of Orgovix. About one hundred and thirty thousand persons were saved out of the Battel, who, marching all the Night, came the fourth day into the Confines of the Lingones; there being no pursuit made after them, by reason of the wounds of the Souldiers, and the burial of the slain wherein three dayes were spent.

vetians a great

themselves.

19. Cæsar sent to the Lingones (les Langrois) forbidding they should supply them with any sort of necessaries, or he would esteem of them as of the Helvetians themselves, and after three dayes followed with all his Forces. The Helvetians seeing in what condition they were, sent to treat of their rendition, and then were commanded to come up to that place, and there attend his pleasure. He required their Arms, their Servants, and Hostages to be delivered up, as also the fugitives. But while these things were performing, about six thousand men of the Canton called Verbiges, either out of despair of Life, or hoping to escape in such a multitude, in the beginning of the Night, left the Helvetian Camp, and made towards the Rhine, and the German Confines. Cæsar commanded those through whose Territories they passed to bring them out, as they also tendered his displeasure, and being brought back, dealt with them as Enemies. All the rest, the conditions performed, he received to mercy, and commanded them the Tulingi and Latobrigi to return into their Countries. He ordered the Allobroges to supply them with Corn, and willed the Helvetians to reside there their Cities and Towns, that the Germani, invited by the richness of the soil, might not remove thither and become near Neighbours to the Province of Gall and the Allobroges. The Ædui desired that they might take the Boji, knowing them to be men of great Valour, to dwell in their Country, and he permitting it, they gave them lands, and the same liberties and privileges as they themselves enjoyed.

20. In the Helvetian Camp was found a List or Register written in Greek, containing by Pole the whole Number that left their Country; how many of them were able to bear Arms, and the Boyes, Old Men and Women were also inrolled by themselves. The Summary whereof was, that the whole Number of the Helvetians amounted to two hundred sixty and three thousand; of the Tulingi to thirty six thousand, the Latobrigi to fourteen; the Rauraci to twenty three, and the Boji to thirty two. Of these there were that bare Arms ninety two thousand, and the Total of all was three hundred and sixty eight thousand. A view being taken by Cæsar's appointment of those that returned home, there were found one hundred and ten thousand persons. So many Cæsar saith he found, which is to

Sect. 6. Monctus finds fault both with his Narrative and his Cruelty. Its certain, he writes, both from Cæsar and others, that from the Mountain Jura to the Rauraci on this side the Rhine, is the longest exireit of the Helvetian Borders, which yet is not an Interval of thirty French Leagues, or sixty Roman Miles; and as for the breadth, their Territories were much more Contracted where most large. Whence necessarily either Cæsar or his Books have been abused, and whence also it may be gathered, that two hundred and sixty thousand Souls could hardly proceed out of so small a Country. And whereas he writes that after the Battel of the three hundred and sixty thousand Helvetians and Associates, only one hundred and thirty thousand persons remained, it follows that the Number of the Armed men being but ninety two thousand, there must have been killed by him almost two hundred thousand persons that were weak, helpless or unfit for War. By this he must have procured great Infamy for his Cruelty, or else there is a great mistake and error Committed by him in his Account, or by the Transcribers of his Copies.

The Estates of Gall open to him the condition there-of.

21. But the Estates of Gall, he saith, Congratulated his victory, and procuring leave to call an Assembly, after they had consulted together desired secrecy, and by their Deputies revealed to him their grief. Droitacius the Ædus told him, that Gall was divided into two Factions; that the Ædus were the Head of the one, and the Arverni of the other, each contending many years for the Principality. The Arverni with the Seguni their Clients hired the Germans to take their Part, of whom one hundred and twenty thousand had passed the Rhine, with that success that the Ædus opposing them received an utter overthrow, both of Nobility and Senate. With these losses they were so broken, that having formerly struck a great stroke throughout Gall, they were now forced to deliver up the chieftest of their State to the Seguni, and to bind themselves by Oath never to seek their release or freedom, nor the aid of the People of Rome, nor use means to free themselves from their Sovereignty. Only he himself refused to take the Oath, and give up his Children, but fled to Rome and craved aid of the Senate. Yet for all this, the victory became more grievous to the Seguni than to the Ædus; for Arviostus King of the Germans was planted in their Territories, and being already possessed of a third part of their Country (the best part of Gall) now required them to forgoe another third part, for twenty four thousand Harudes, who being lately come over to him, Lands and Possessions were now to be allotted them. By this means it would come to pass in short time that all the Galls would be driven out by the Germans, who were allured by the goodness of the Country, betwixt which and theirs there was no comparison. Arviostus having once defeated the Galls in Battel proved a cruel Tyrant, whom they could not bear, but must forsake their Habitations, as the Helvetians did, if Cæsar and the People of Rome by their Authority or Arms afforded them no relief, and hindered not the Germans from transporting any more Colonies into Gall. But if Arviostus should know any thing of this Complaint, he would rage cruelly against them, especially the Seguni, who were in his Power.

He undertakes their quarrel against Arviostus the German King.

22. Cæsar dismissed them with good words, and concluding that it was neither honourable nor safe for the People of Rome to have such troublesome Neighbours as the Germans, and esteeming the infolency of Arviostus intolerable, resolved to prevent such mischief with all speed. He sent him to appoint some indifferent place for a Parly about some publick affairs which nearly concerned them both. To this he answered, that had his occasions required Cæsars assistance, he would have farthered them with his own presence, and he thought it as reasonable, that if it were in his power to pleasure the Romans, Cæsar ought not to think much of the like labour. He said plainly he durst not come into those parts of Gall which were in Cæsars Hands, without an Army; and that an Army was not to be drawn up without much trouble and expence. The thing he most wondered at was, that Cæsar had to do in that part of Gall which the Law of Armes had made his Inheritance. Now the Reader must know, that in Cæsars Consulship the People of Rome had vouchsafed to esteem of Arviostus as a King in his Dominions and as of a Friend to their Commonwealth. Cæsar therefore returned, that for as much as he required the honour done to him by the State and himself, he would let him know that he required, that he should not transport any more Troops of Germans over the Rhine into Gall. In the next place, that he should deliver up the Hostages of the Ædus, and suffer the Seguni to do the like, and cease all Hostilities against the Ædus, and their Associates; if not, he would not neglect the injuries done to them, being enjoined by the Senate to take care of their Friends and and Confederates. Arviostus replied, that the Law of Nationis allowed a Conqueror to rule a conquered Nation as he pleased. That the People of Rome thought fit to order their matters as they themselves pleased; and why should they direct him more than he did them. That Cæsar had much wronged him, in that his coming thither had made the Tribute of the Ædus much less than formerly. That he would still retain their Hostages: That he would make no unjust War upon them of their Associates, but if they failed of their Tribute, the Society of the Romans would come too late. In conclusion, that no man ever contended with him but to his own destruction. And try when he would, he should find the Germans invincible and most exercised in Armes, having for fourteen years had no House over their Heads.

Cæsar's men afflicted at the Report concerning the Germans.

23. At the same time Ambassadors from the Ædus complained, that the Harudes, lately transported into Gall, wasted their Borders, and that though they gave up Hostages they could not buy their Peace of Arviostus. And others from the Treviri brought News of an hundred Townships of the Suent that were come to the Rhine to seek a passage into Gall, under the conduct of Nafina and Cimbertus two Brothers. Hereupon Cæsar resolved to use all expedition to prevent the conjunction of the Suent with Arviostus, who, he understood, after three days journey, was with all his Force gone to take in Vesontia, the strongest Town of the Seguni. Knowing the place to be well provided, and so fitted that he that Commanded it might prolong the War at his pleasure, he prevented him by taking the Town and therein left a Garrison. There as he rested a few days to furnish himself with Corn and other necessities, the Romans enquiring of the Galls and Merchants concerning the Germans, received such an account concerning their Stature, their Courage and their Experience in War, that they were seized with a wonderful fear and consternation. From the Tribunes and Commanders of Horse and such as for friendship followed him from Rome, and had small or no skill in War, it proceeded even to the old experienced Soldiers. And many stuck not to tell Cæsar that whensoever he should give Command to march and advance the Standards, the Soldiers would refuse to do it.

He Reproves them at a Council of War.

24. Upon this Cæsar called a Counsel of War, and admitting all Centurions of what degrees soever to it, exceedingly blamed them for this their fear. He shewed how vain it was from former experience, when the Cimbri and Tenenti were vanquished by Marius, and in the late servile Tumult in Italy, though then they were not a little afflicted by what they had learnt of the Romans; and from what had been done against them by the Helvetians, who had had the better of them in divers conflicts in their own Country, and at their own doors, as well as in Gall, though the Helvetians were not able to contend with the Romans. Indeed they had beaten the Galls, but these had been wearied with continual Wars, and surprized when dispersed; and Arviostus must not think to inflame the Roman Armies with the like subtilties. He told them that such as pretended the want of Corn and dangerousness of the ways, seemed arrogant and to direct their General; that the Seguni and Lingones had undertaken that charge, and Corn was now ripe every where in the Fields. He shewed they had no reason to disobey his Orders; for he was neither Unfortunate nor Covetous, as his success against the Helvetians and the whole course of his Life could shew, and therefore he was resolved to dislodge by the fourth watch of the Night, though it were with the tenth Legion alone as a guard, of which he had no doubt or suspicion, having chiefly cherished and put most trust in it, and that deservedly for their Valour. The effect of this was, that the tenth Legion gave him thanks for his good opinion, and assured him of their readines; and then the rest made means by the Tribunes and Centurions of the first Ranks to give him satisfaction. This being taken, and Droitacius having upon viewing the ways reported, that in fetching a compass of fifty miles he might carry the Army through open and Champion Countries (for the Soldiers were frighted at the Woods) in the fourth Watch of the Night, according to his former saying, he dislodged.

25. Continuing his March, the seventh day he received a Message from Arviostus lying but twenty four miles off the place, that now being out of danger he was content to treat, and Cæsar refused not the offer. The fifth day following was appointed for the Parly, but Arviostus refused to meet if any Foot-men came, admitting only of Horse to attend each Parly. Cæsar not willing to break upon this account, resolved to set on Horse the tenth Legion which he could most trust. The Legion he placed two hundred paces from a Mount on which they were to meet, and the Horse of Arviostus stood at the same distance; and according to his desire they brought ten Persons each along with them, and dis-coursed on Horfe-back. Cæsar began by shewing him the unusual favour conferred on him by the Romans through his means. He declared how of a long time they had had Friendship and Alliance with the Ædui, who long before that had held the Principality of Gall. That they were kind to, and cherished their Allies, and therefore could not permit that to be forced from them, which when they entred into a League with the Romans they quietly possessed; and then he required the same things he had formerly done by his Messengers. Ariovistus made little answer to Cæsar's demands but spake much of his own virtues and valour. He laid the blame of his Actions upon the Galls themselves, who had incited him and provoked him to their own loss. He affirmed that he was feared in Gall before the Romans came thither. That that part of it was his Province, in which they ought to give him no disturbance, no more than he gave them in theirs. If his Tributaries would pay their Arrears they should have Peace, if not, he regarded little that they had the Romans for their Friends. If Cæsar would not be gone out of the Country, he should take him for an Enemy.

And if he killed him he should perform a very acceptable service to many great men at Rome, as he well understood by Letters and Messages received from them.
If he would depart and leave him the possession of Gall he would well reward him; and what War soever he would have undertaken, should be prosecuted without either his peril or charge.

To no purpose.

26. Cæsar replied as to many things, and shewed that he could not desist from the course he had taken; which while he was doing, he was told that Ariovistus his Horfe approached nearer the Mount, and assaulted his men with stones and other weapons. Hereupon he brake off the Parly, but forbore to charge the Germans, lest it should be said that under pretence of an interview he had intrapped them: But the Army upon hearing how Ariovistus and his men demeaned themselves, were more provoked to fight. Ariovistus two days after sent to Cæsar to give him another meeting, or that he would send him Commissioners to treat concerning those things that were left imperfect. This later Cæsar refused not to do; but as soon as Ariovistus saw the Messengers, he asked wherefore they came thither, and whether they were not sent as Spies, and he commanded them to be put in Irons. Then did he remove and get two miles beyond Cæsar, and there he incamped himself to cut off all Provisions that might be sent to the Romans from the Ædui and Segnani. Cæsar for five days together stood prepared to give him Battel if he should offer it. But he kept his Army within his Camp, and daily sent out his Horfe to skirmish with the Romans. The Germans were wont to exercise themselves with this manner of fighting. They had fix thousand Horfe-men, and as many strong and nimble Foot, whom the Horfe-men selected out of of the whole Army, every man one for his defence; these they had with them in Battel, and unto them they resorted for succour. If the Horfemen were overcharged, these ever stepped in to help them. If any was wounded or unhorsed they came about him and relieved him. If the case required that they should either hast forward or speedily retire, their continual exercise had brought them to that swiftness, that hanging on the Mane they would keep pace even with the Horfes.

27. Cæsar to prevent the design of Ariovistus of intercepting entercourse betwixt him and his Friends, drew out his men in three Bodies, and with one of them, notwithstanding all the opposition the Germans could make, fortified a second Camp about five hundred paces beyond them. Ariovistus attacked this second lesser Camp to no purpose, but would not bring out his Army to a battel because they had a custom, that the Women by casting of Lots and South-saying should declare whether it was good for them to fight or not; and they found by their Art that they could not get the victory, if they fought before the New-moon.
The next day Cæsar, to make a shew, because his Legionary Soldiers were few in comparison of the Germans, placed all his Auxiliaries before the lesser Camp, and putting his Legions in a triple Battel, marched and provoked the Germans to fight. They set every Tribe and People by themselves in like distance and order of Battel. There were the Harades, Marcomanni, Triboci, Vangiones, Nemetes, Seadusti and Suevi; and they invironed their whole Army with Carts and Carriages, that there might be no hope of flight. And in them they placed the Women, that by their Tears and Hands stretched out they might move the Soldiers so to demean themselves, that they might not be brought into the thraldom of the Romans. Cæsar assigned to every Legion a Legatus and a Questor, that every man might have a witness of his valour; and perceiving where the Germans were weakest, he began the Battel from the Right Wing.

28. The Romans charged fiercely, and the Germans came on to speedily, that the Legions had no leisure to cast their Piles, but betook themselves to their Swords, which the Germans received according to their manner in the form of a Phalanx. But many Legionary Soldiers were observed to leap upon the Phalanx, to pull up the Targets that covered it, and to wound and kill those that were underneath. The left Wing of the Germans was overthrown and put to flight; but in the mean time the left of the Romans was overcharged with an unequal number. This being perceived by P. Crassus a young man who commanded the Horfe, he sent the third Battalion to relieve their fellows; by means whereof the fight was renewed and the Enemy was put to flight, and never looked back till they came to the Rhine about fifty miles off, which some passed by Swimming and by Boats, and the rest were killed by the Horfemen. Ariovistus lighting upon a Bark tied to the shore recovered the other side, but both his Wives perished, and of his two Daughters the one was slain and the other taken. Cæsar in the pursuit recovered his two Messengers he had sent to him. The noise of the success drove back the Suevi that were come to the Banks of the Rhine, whom the Inhabitants of that Quarter finding terrified, straight pursued, and slew a great number of them. Cæsar having thus ended two great Wars in one Summer, brought his Army into their wintering Camps in the Country of the Segnani somewhat sooner than the year required, and leaving Labienu to command them went into the hither Gall (as the Romans called it) to hold the publick Assembly. And thus with this war he concludes the first Book of his Commentaries, having done these things in the Conflux of his two Creatures, Pis and Gabinius.

The Belge
whence descended.

29. While he was yet in his Winter Quarters, he was continually alarmed with news of the motions of the Belge, who were the third part of the further Gall. They were, he saith, descended from the Germans, who passing over the Rhine time out of mind, and finding the Country very fertile drove away the Galls, and seated themselves in their possessions. They alone kept the Cim-bri and Tentoni from entering into their Country, and thereupon they challenged Authority, and boasted much of their feats of Arms. Upon notice of Cæsar's success they thought themselves in danger as well as their Neighbours, and being excited and incouraged by some of them, thought themselves highly concerned to give some stop to that progress the Roman power had made in Gall. Cæsar upon notice raised two Legions, and when Summer came on sending them away by Q. Pedius his Legate, followed himself as soon as there was forage for the Army. Within fifteen days he came to the Borders of the Belge, which being unexpected, the Rhemi who lay next to Gall (Celtick he means) submitted themselves and all they had to the Roman Empire, affirming they were innocent as to the Conspiracy of the rest of the Belge. Of them the Bellocaci (les Beauvaisis) exceeded all others, in power, authority and numbers, being able to make an hundred thousand fighting men, out of which they promised fixty thousand to this undertaking, and in that respect they demanded the Administration of the whole War. Here again Mometus is difficult of belief, though a Jesuit, affirming that if Cæsar (or the Embassadors of the Rhemi, he should have said, if from them he had his information) said true, they must have had vast Territories which could afford an hundred thousand fighting men, and indeed far larger than he can find in his Geography. But he saith Cæsar himself puts him out of belief of it, who makes none of the neighbour States to be their Clients, but sets them down as Clients of the Ædui. He affirms that Cæsar is wont to increase the Power of certain Nations above measure, to make way for his own glory, which would receive augmentation from so valiant and warlike People being vanquished by one or two Battels. Yet he denies not but that the Bellocaci were always most famous amongst the Belge, of which there still remain eminent evidences in the singular privileges of their chief Town, which now is Beauvais.

30. Next to them lay the Suessones (Les Soissons) Inhabitants of a large and fruitful Country, whose King Divitiacus had lately possessed a great part of these Territories and also of Britain, and was the most powerful King within Gall. At present Galba was their King; and on him, for his Justice and Prudence, they unanimously

Sect. 6. nimously bestowed the management of the War; they had twelve Walled Towns, and promised to set forth fifty thousand men. The Nervii (the People of the Territory now called Hennat by the French, from the River Hene) who were most barbarous amongst them all, and dwelt farthest off promised as many. The Atrebatii (the People of Artois) fifteen thousand. The Ambiani (the People of the Territory of Amiens) ten thousand. The Vellocassii or Femelocassii (inhabiting the Territory of Rouen) and the Vergomandui (the People of Vermandois) as many. The Morini (Belgois, Gallieis, Offens maritime & de terre-ferme) five and twenty thousand. The Menapii (Suedrois, Clevois & Juliers) nine thousand. The Caletes (Les Cauchois, le peuple de Cauc) ten thousand. The Aduatii twenty nine thousand. The Eburoni (Les Liegeois) Condruis (le peuple des Ardennes) and others called Germani forty thousand, as was reported. Cæsar received Hostages from the Remi, and after that to provide against the multitudes of the Enemy, he persuaded Divitiacus the Æduus to enter the Territories of the Bellocaci and waste them, thereby to divert them and hinder the Confederates from uniting in one Army. And to secure himself against their great valour, as it was represented to him, he resolved not to be too hasty in giving them battle; but first by skirmishing with his Horse to try what they could, and what his own men durst do.

They assembled together.

31. But finding them all assembled together, and at no great distance, he hastened and passed over the River Axona (Aine) which parted the Rhemi from the other Belge, and there incamped. No Enemy here could come on his Back, and he might receive Provisions from Rheims and other Cities; but that he might command the passage back he fortified a Bridge, and caused Titurius Sabinus, a Legate; to intrench himself strongly on the other side. The Belge in their way intended to take in Bibrax (Bourai en Reclais) a Town of the Rhemi, and had done it, but that upon notice given by the Governor, Cæsar sent him speedy relief. Disappointed here they then made towards Cæsar, who finding his own men no whit inferior to them, by several skirmishes drew them out, placed himself conveniently for a Battle on a rising ground, and left the Enemy should by their multitudes encompass him, he drew a Ditch behind his Army from one side of the Hill to another, fix hundred paces in length, the ends of which he fortified with Bulworks, and therein placed store of Engines. There was a little Marsh betwixt the Armies which neither party would adventure to pass over to the other, but skirmishes were maintained betwixt the Horse, in which Cæsar having the advantage thought it sufficient, and so retired to his Camp. The Belge immediately took the way to the River Axona, either to break the Bridge, take the Fort held by Titurius, or cut off Provisions from Cæsar; but Cæsar followed with a strong party, and cutting off many of their men, hindered their design. In which being prevented, as also in their attempt upon Bibrax, when now their provisions began to fail, they resolved to break up and go to their several homes; where if he invaded any of them they could be supplied, though they intended to waste the Country where-ever he came, and thither to haste from all parts to give him battle, rather than in a strange and unknown place. The Council was the rather embraced, for that the Bellocaci having intelligence that Divitiacus with a great power of the Ædi approached their Borders, hastened homeward to defend their Country.

They retreat.

32. In a tumultuous manner they returned, striving who should be gone first, so that Cæsar perceiving them to fly rather than retreat, at first suspected some design, and contained his Army within his Camp; but at length finding the truth he sent some Parties after, who made great slaughter of them as they fled, so long as the light continued. The day following he still gave the chase that they might not have time to take breath, and led his Army into the Territories of the Suessones, wherein he came to Noviodunum, which he attempted to take by surprise; but in regard of the breadth of the Ditch, and the height of the Wall, was forced to besiege it. Yet when the Inhabitants saw the Vinea (little Hovels made for shelter of the Soldiers) the Mounts raised, and the Towers built with such expedition, affrighted at the greatness of the works, they desired to yield, and by mediation of the Remi obtained their suit. Having received besides others, two Sons of King Galba for Hostages, he took the Suessones to mercy, and led his Army against the Bellocaci, who desiring the same favour, with Hands stretched out according to their custom, he granted it at the suit of Divitiacus; for he spake well of the Common People as drawn into the Confe-

racy by the Arts of their Nobility. But their State being populous and powerful more than others, he required five hundred Hostages, and marched into the Coast of the Ambiani, who without delay gave up themselves and all they had into his Power.

33. But the Nervii that bordered upon them were another sort of men. There was no recourse of Merchants to them, neither did they suffer any Wine, or what else might tend to riot, to be brought into their Country. They were a savage people and of great valour, often upbraiding the rest of the Belge, for yielding their Necks to the Roman yoke, and openly affirming that they would neither send Ambassadors nor take peace upon any condition. They all assembled on the farther side of the River Sabis (Sambre) and there attended the coming of the Romans. With them were joined the Atrebatæ and Vergomandui, and they expected a Power from the Aduatii. Cæsar passing the River had some skirmishes with them, and endeavoured to fortify himself; but they made such sudden onsets, and were so swift both in their coming and retiring, that they seemed, he saith, to be in and out of the Woods at the same time, and gave him no leisure to prepare for a Battle by his wonted methods. He had all parts to play at one time; the Flag to be hung out to give warning, the Trumpet to be sounded for the Charge, the Soldiers to be called from their work of Intrenchment; and such as were gone to fetch Turf and Materials for the Rampire, to be sent for, the Battle to be ordered, the Soldiers to be encouraged, and the Signal to be given; the most of which were cut off by shortness of time and assaults of the Enemy. But these things he tells us were supplied by the experience of his Soldiers, who could as well prescribe to themselves what was to be done as any Commander could teach them. And notwithstanding Cæsar had given order to every Legate not to leave the work or forsake the Legions, till the Fortifications were perfected; yet in extremity of danger they expected no countermand, but ordered all things according to their own discretion.

34. Cæsar had time only to desire the tenth Legion to remember their ancient valour, and be courageous; and to give the sign of Battle, the Enemy being within a weapons cast. In the Fight, the Legions that stood in the Left Wing had the better at first, and put to flight their Enemies; but those of the Right were sorely distressed and disordered, inasmuch that the Belge got into the Camp. The Ensigns were crowded together into one place; the Soldiers of the twelfth Legion were so thick thronged on an heap, that they hindered one another; all the Centurions of the fourth Cohort were slain, the Ensign-bearer killed, the Ensign taken, and the Centurions of the other Cohorts either slain or fore wounded. Cæsar seeing them turn tail, and matters to be almost desperate, took a Target from one of the hindmost Soldiers, and pressing to the Front of the Battle, called the Centurions by name, and encouraging the rest, commanded the Ensigns to be advanced toward the Enemy, and the Maniples to be enlarged, that they might with more facility use their Swords. By his presence being encouraged, his men recovered themselves, and he caused two Legions that were oppressed to join back to back, and thereby making two Fronts they secured each other. But the whole face of things was changed by the coming in of the tenth Legion, which T. Labienus, having won the Camp of the Nervii, sent to the assistance of their fellows. Now the wounded men began to fight afresh; the Horse strove with extraordinary valour to wipe away the dishonour of their former flight; nay the Boys and Scullions perceiving the Enemy amazed, ran upon them unarmed, not fearing their weapons.

Cæsar overthrown them.

35. Howbeit, as amazed as they were, they shewed such manhood, that as the foremost were overthrown, the next in place bestirred their Carcases, and fought upon them; and these being likewise overthrown, and their bodies heaped one upon another, they that remained posset themselves of the mount of dead Carcases, as a place of advantage; thence threw their weapons, and intercepting the Files returned them back to the Romans. But the Battle was however thus ended, and the Name and Nation of the Nervii was well nigh destroyed; of five hundred Senators, but three men being left, and of sixty thousand fighting men scarcely five hundred. The Elder sort, with their Women and Children, being before conveyed into Islands and Bogs, Cæsar, upon their submission pardoned, granting them the free possession of their Towns and Country, and Commanding their Neighbours not to offer them any wrong. The Aduatii being on their way to assist the Nervii, when they heard of the defeat of their Friends, returned,

Sec. 6. and put themselves, and all they had into one Town, very strong by its situation. They were defended from the Cimbri and Tentoni, who in their journey into Italy left such Carriages as they could not conveniently take along with them on this side the Rhine, and fix thousand men to look to them. They after the death of their fellows were many years disquieted by their Neighbours, and sometimes invading their States, and sometimes defending themselves, at length procured peace, and chose this place to settle themselves in, which some think to have been about Dumay or Boldue in Brabant.

Take the Town of the Advantici.

36. Cæsar laying siege to the place, at first they despaired him; and when they saw the Vines framed, the Mount raised, and a Tower built afar off they scoffed, and demanded with what hands and with what strength, especially by men of that stature (for the Romans were but little in respect of the Galls) a Tower of such huge and massy weight should be brought to do execution. But when they beheld the Tower removed, and approaching, they were astonished, and sent to treat with this complementing message, that they believed the Romans did not make war without the special assistance of the Gods. They submitted all they had to Cæsar's mercy, but desired that their Arms might not be taken from them, for fear of their Neighbours. Yet he thought fit to require them, saying he would take the same care for them as he had done for the Nervii, that they should not be molested. However when they gave up their weapons they concealed a third part, and in the Night, thinking to surprize the Fortification of the Romans, they set upon it, but were beaten back with the loss of four thousand. The next day Cæsar brake into the Town, and finding none make defence, he sold all the People, with the Spoil, to the number of fifty three thousand bondslaves. At the same time P. Crassus sent him information, that the Veneti, Unelli, Osijini, Curiofilitæ, Sefiroii, Auleri and Rhedones, being maritime Cities that lay to the Ocean, had submitted to the People of Rome. The fame of this Cæsar's success in Gall produced so great effects, that beyond the Rhine several Nations sent and submitted. But halting into Italy he placed his Army in its Wintering Camp, and willed the Ambassadors to come to him in the beginning of the following Summer. The Winter Quarters he took up next to those places where his Wars had been, amongst the Carnutes, Andes and Turones. For his Achievements, upon the fight of his Letters, a supplication was decreed for fifteen days, which honour had formerly happened to no man.

The Advan-
tures of Galba.

37. Cæsar going into Italy, gave order to Ser. Galba, with the twelfth Legion and Part of the Horse, to march into the Territories of the Nantuates, Veragri and Seduni, which extended from the Rhone and Lemanus, to the tops of the highest Alps, to clear them from Thieves and Robbers, who intercepted those that trafficked that way. Two Cohorts of his Legion he placed amongst the Nantuates, and with the other took up his Winter Quarters in Obodurus, a Town of the Veragri, in a narrow Valley, over which hung mighty Hills. Here he thought himself secure because of the Hostages these Nations had given up, and for other reasons; but they taking it to heart, that they should be so deprived of their Children, and that the Romans should lay these Territories to their Province, and moreover encouraged by the smallness of the number Galba had brought, resolved to assault his Camp. And thus they did with such fury, that by their numbers they overpowered the Romans and put them to great distress, which had been followed by their ruin, had not the advice of P. Sextus Baculus, the Principle of that Legion, and C. Volusenus Tribune of the Soldiers, men of singular courage and wisdom interposed. They ran to Galba, and told him there was no hope of safety if they did not break out upon the Enemy himself, which being resolved the Soldiers by their Centurions were commanded to cease fighting, to receive such weapons as were cast into the Camp, and having taken a little breath, upon the watch-word given, to break out. This they did with such courage and alacrity, that the Enemy surprized was easily put to flight, and beaten from the several Gates at which they issued, and of thirty thousand lost the third part. Galba glad of the success, yet considering he wanted Forage, and that he had met with difficulties he never dreamed of, burnt the Town, and the next day returned without opposition, and brought the Legion safe into the Nantuates, and thence to the Allobroges, where he wintered.

38. The Belge being now overthrown, the Germani driven out, and the Seduni, who lived amongst the Alps subdued and vanquished; Cæsar, who was gone into Illyricum imagined not but that Gall would be in repose; but there suddenly fell out another commotion. P. Crassus winning with the seventh Legion in the Country of

of the Andes (Anjou) near to the Ocean, and wanting Provisions, sent out the Prefects of Horse and Tribunes to demand Corn of the next Cities and States; particularly of the Unelli or Venelli (Normans about Caen) the Curiofilitæ (those of Corvovaillie) and Veneti (people of Norm) of most authority of all Nations in that Tract. For they had great store of Shipping, with which they traded into Britain, had most skill in Navigation, had command of all the Ports on these Seas, and of those that used them, as their Tributaries. The Veneti retained the Messengers sent to them, hoping thereby to recover the Hostages they had given to Crassus. And the rest followed their example, and made a League to maintain their liberty against the incroachments of a Stranger. Thus united they sent to tell Crassus, that if he would have his Messengers returned, he must send back their Hostages; whereof he certified Cæsar. He resolving to chastize them for breaking the Law of Nations in calling the Messengers into Irons, gave order for Ships and Gallies to be made upon the Ligeris, (Loire) and they on the other side made as effectual preparations as they could to maintain what they had done. And the Veneti encouraged themselves from the nature of their soil, which was defended by Arms and Greeks of the Sea, and by their experience in Maritime affairs, wherein, as in the knowledge of Ports in their quarters, they thought they were far superior to the Romans.

The Maritime
against Cæsar.

39. Cæsar by chastizing them, resolved to prevent the like insolency of such as had submitted. And considering how quick the Gallies were to make a war, he sent into all parts, where he thought there might be danger, Forces to hinder their rising and union with the Veneti. He made D. Brutus chief Admiral of the Navy, and of those Ships he had got together from the Pisones (Poitouins) Santonis (Saintongeois) and other Provinces which continued quiet, with orders to make for the Veneti with what speed he could, and he himself marched thitherward with the Foot-Forces. But do what he could, the Tides were so much their Friends, being situated in Points and Promontories, and their Ships so accommodated to the nature of the Sea, that they could in danger, remove themselves from one Town to another, and they deluded him the greatest part of the Summer. Yet, he tells us, that instead of Cables they made use of Iron Chains, and raw Hides and Skins for Sails, either for want of Linnen Cloth, or ignorant of the use of it, or because Sails of Linnen would hardly serve to carry Ships of that burthen, or endure the tempestuousness of these Seas, and the violence of the Winds. If they wanted Linnen, how great is the alteration we find at this present time in that Country which affords so much Linnen, that thence (from Morlaix in Britany and other places) are we furnished with Sails for our Fleets, to its great advantage: and their Linnen we now find sufficient to carry Ships of the greatest burthen, to endure the tempestuousness of those Seas, and the violence of Winds.

40. The Romans took one Town after another; but the Veneti still conveyed themselves to the next; so that Cæsar seeing it lost labour, attended the coming of his Navy. And when it came there was but small hope of success against two hundred and twenty Sail of Ships, of such height and strength, that his could do no execution upon them. But this device made amends for those Inconveniences. The Romans had provided themselves of sharp Hooks or Sicles, which putting upon long Poles, these they fastned to the Tackling which held the Main Yard to the Mast; then forcing away their Ship with force of Oars, they cut the Tackling and the Main Yard fell down. Thus the Galls lost the use of their Shipping, and so the Controversie fell within the compass of Valour, in which the Romans being superiours obtained the Victory; for to their natural Valour was added a desire of Glory, they fighting in the fight of Cæsar, and the whole Army; for all the Hills and Cliffs, which afforded prospect into the Sea, were covered with the Roman Forces. Their Main Yards coming by the Board, their Enemies with fury took many of their Vessels, at the sight of which the rest fled, but on a sudden were becalmed, so that the Romans coming up with them fought Ship to Ship, and easily mastered them. Of so great a Navy very few escaped after eight hours fight, by the advantage of the Evening, and so the War ended with the Veneti and the other Maritime Nations. For all sorts of People, young and old, that were fit either for Council or Action were present at the Battle, and all the Shipping they could make engaged. These that remained, not knowing how to dispose of themselves, yielded to Cæsar, who to terrify other Barbarous People from violating the Law of Nations, put to death all the Senate, and sold the ordinary sort for Slaves.

41. In the mean time L. Titurius Sabinus, with his Forces entered the Territories of the Unelli. With them joyned the Auleri and Eburones (People of Maine, Normans) mans of Aulanjan Seas and Esereux; and Lexolii (People of Lisfene) having slain their Senate because they would not countenance the War. They were headed by Phindrix, one of the Unelli, who marched and offered battle to Sabinus. He counterfeited himself fearful to such a degree, that they were thereby moved to attack his Camp, which being placed upon an Hill, he caused his men to take the advantage of the upper ground, and of the Enemy his being burthened with Turf and other Materials for filling up the Trenches, and issuing forth at two Ports they fell upon them, and did such Execution, that they flew great numbers, and chasing their Horse suffered very few to escape. Upon the noise of these two Victories obtained much at the same time, all the Cities and States yielded themselves to Therius; for as the Galls were eager to undertake a War, so were they weak in suffering, and impatient of the Consequents and Calamities thereof.

42. At the same time it happened, that M. Crassus coming into Aquitain, found he was to use no small diligence; for the Country was large and Populous, and there L. Valerius Prætorius, the Legate was slain, and the Army overthrown, and thence L. Manlius was forced to fly with the loss of his Carriages. Having made what provision he could, he invaded the Sontiates who presently raised very considerable Forces and opposed him in his march, but the Roman Soldiers, desirous to shew what they could do, without their General and the rest of the Legions, under the Conduct of a very Young man, put them to flight, and flew a great number; and then he besieged their chief Town, which he attacked with Vines, Turcs and Mounts. The Towns-men defended themselves both by falling forth and undermining, wherein the Aquitains were very skilful. But seeing the industry of the Romans they offered to surrender, which being accepted, it was expected they should deliver up their Arms. In the mean time Adolmannus, their Governor or chief Magistrate, issued out at another Port with six hundred devoted Companions, whom they called Soldanni, the manner of whom was to enjoy all good things in common with their chosen friends, and if any misfortune befell them, either to dye with them, or presently to kill themselves; neither was it ever known in the memory of man, that any of them refused to dye when his Friend was slain. But making a noise they were discovered and driven back again into the Town, by the Soldiers that kept that Fortification; where, according to his desire, the Governor was taken in the number of the submissive multitude.

43. The Barbarous Galls alarmed at the taking this Town, assembled their Forces together, and got aid out of Spain and the adjoining Countries, with such Commanders as had got experience in Sertorius his Wars. Crassus being come into the Confines of the Vocates and Tarusates, these began, according even to the Custom of the Romans, to take place of advantage, to fortifie their Camp, and to intercept the Enemy from necessary intercourses. Crassus perceiving this, resolved it was most expedient to give them battle, and prepared for it; but when he offered it they refused, hoping to end the War without bloodshed, and if for want of Provisions the Romans retreated, they intended to fall upon them when they were weary and out of heart. Crassus perceiving their drift, resolved to set upon them in their Camp, and this his resolution was heartily received by his men, and put in execution. As they were with all alacrity attacking one part of the Fortification, some of the Horse informed Crassus, that the Rampire at the Decumane Port was weak, and would admit an easy entrance. This place was easily surpris'd and entred by four Cohorts, which making a noise, and coming on the Backs of the Galls to unexpectedly, put them into a fright, and this fright drove them over the Rampart to slift as they could for their lives. But the Country being Champion, the Horse pursued them with such execution, that of fifty thousand which came out of Aquitain and Spain, scarcely the fourth part remained.

44. This success of Crassus had such effect, that most part of Aquitain submitted, and of their own accord gave him Hostages. Amongst them were the Tarbelli, Bigerrienses, Preciani, Vocates, Tarusates, Elusates, Garites, Ausci, Garumni, Sibisates and Cocostates. Only some few that lived farther off, trusting upon the coming in of Winter, held off and did not submit themselves. To this enumeration Cæsar maketh of People subdued thus by Crassus we must also reckon the Sontiates, which make up the number of twelve; and now, if you will believe him, they were all several People or Nations, or as such he represents them. But Monetus the Geographer will tell you, that but three of them were truly People; that the rest in no sort were such, but of Towns or Villages, and for the assistance of young Beginners he takes the pains to enumerate them. The Ausci, Bigerrienses, and Tarbelli

Sect. 6.

Tarbelli were People. The Cocostates, or Cefates, were no other than the Citizens of Cocostium or Cosium, now Bafas the Metropolis of the Vasates or Bafadates. The Elusates were also Townsmen of Elusa, now Euse a Town at the bottom of the Territories of the Ausci, (les Ausciens, and Armagnaquais) neither of old nor now so big as Cæsar would have it. The Garites, or rather Gawrites, were Inhabitants of the Valley of Gaura, in the Country of the Corvone or Comingiois, the County of Gauris of which some Towns are at this day reckoned unknown to the Romans, as Baumont, Granate, and Gimont. The Garumni inhabited a Village, or Villages, in the Valley adjoining to the Mountains of St. Beat at the head of the River Garunna, or Garonne.

45. The Preciani were Inhabitants of some ignoble Valleys near the Garumni, in the Territories of the Corvone. The Sibisates also possessed a Ground now whit famous, called now Seboufan, or Siboufan, in the Confines of the Corvone. The Sontiates, or rather Sottiates, as Pliny hath it, were Inhabitants of the Mountains of Sotti, now Mons de Sant, in the Grounds of the Western Bigerri, or Bearnois. The Tarusates were the Townsmen of Tarus, now Tartas, in the Borders of the Tarbelli, Baiennois, or Baques. And lastly, the Vocates, in Pliny Basbocates, were Inhabitants of the Town of a Vasates not now standing, in a Ground where at present is a Village. But Cæsar, though the Summer was well nigh spent; yet for as much as all Gall was at peace, only the Morini and Menapii stood out in Arms, and had never either sent Ambassadors, or otherwise treated of Peace, hoping yet the War would quickly be at an end, invaded their Territories. They managed their matters far otherwise than the other Galls; for upon his approach they conveyed themselves and Goods into the Woods and Boggs, and thence skirmished with the Romans. Cæsar set his Men at work, who with admirable speed, cutting down much Wood, cleared the Ground, and by that means took their Goods and Cattel; but they themselves fled into the thicker Woods, of which they had plenty. Now fell abundance of Rain, which so distressed the Soldiers, that they could neither work, nor lie under their Tents of Skins; and therefore he burned and spoiled their Country, and placed his Army amongst the Auleri, Lexovii, and other late subdued Cities, therein to winter.

46. Now by this time Cæsar had got great store of Wealth, wherewith he not only paid his debts, but made him great store of friends by Gifts and Contributions. Here with he corrupted the Adiles, Pretors, Consuls, and their Wives. Passing over the Alper this Winter to Luca, where he took up his head Quarters, so great concourse was made to him, that there were present two hundred Senators, amongst whom were Crassus and Pompey, and so many Proconsuls and Pretors, that one hundred and twenty bundles of Rods have been seen together at his Gates. He fearing he might be recalled, procured Pompey and Crassus to obtain the Consulship for the following year, and continue him his employment in Gall for other five years. Cato perswaded L. Domitius to stand for the Consulship, telling him he should contend not for Magistracy, but for liberty, against the Tyrants. But Pompey fearing Cato's vehemency, left, leaving the whole Senate in his power, he should perswade the People to what was best, sent some armed Men upon Domitius as he went down to the Forum, who killed the Slave that carried the light before them and dispersed them all, Cato being the last that fled, who received a wound on his Arm whilst he fought for Domitius. Pompey and Crassus having thus by force obtained the Consulship, bore themselves nothing more moderately afterwards. The People being about to give Cato the Prætorship, Pompey pretended a strange fight from Heaven, and dismissed the Assembly; then corrupting the Tribes with Money, he procured Antias and Vatinus to be chosen Pretors. Now by the help of Trebolius the Tribune they procured Laws, which continued to Cæsar (as they had agreed) his Government in Gall for other five years, they assigned Syria to Crassus with the Parthian War; and to Pompey all Africa, and the Spains with four Legions, whereof two he lent to Cæsar for the Gallick Wars. Pompey being permitted to govern his Provinces by Deputies stayed at Rome, where he spent his time in Shows and Pastimes. Crassus much rejoiced in his partly, being able to contain himself abroad and at home; but contrary to his wonted gravity, breaking forth into childish expressions of joy. For, he slighted the thoughts of Syria and Parthia, as one who would so order his affairs, that the exploits of Lucullus against Tigraves, and of Pompey in the War with Mithridates, should seem but toys, extending his hopes as far as Bactria, the Indians, and the utmost Ocean.

47. The Tribune hindered all they could the Consuls from raising Men, and laboured to repeal the Laws made for their Expeditions. Pompey was herewith well enough contented, having sent his Lieutenants into his Provinces, and being unwilling ling to leave the City, as he pretended, because of the charge of Provisions committed to him, which Cicero, in way of recompence for his labour in his restitution, had procured him from the Senate, that so he might have authority all over the Roman Empire. But Crassus betook himself to force, which when the Tribunes saw themselves unable to withstand, they desisted, but loaded him with curses, and when he made the accustomed prayers in the Capitol for prosperous success, they spoke of unlucky auspices and prodigies which had hapned. Atticus the Tribune laboured to hinder him from going, many exclaiming against it as an unworthy thing, that he should fall with Warapon those who had nothing ill deserved of the Romans, but were at peace with them. This made him fly to Pompey to conduct him forth, at the sight of whom those who came to stop him gave way. But Atticus meeting him, earnestly exhorted him to desist, and when that would not do, sent a Viator to lay hold of him; but the rest of the Tribunes not permitting this, and the Viator not quite dismissing him, Atticus got before to the Gate, where he had some fire ready, and as Crassus came by, throwing his Odours upon the Coals, devoted him with horrible and bitter curses, invoking certain terrible and unheard of gods. These secret and ancient execrations the Romans thought to be of that force that no man ever escaped destruction to whom they were denounced, and that they also proved unfortunate to the denouncer, and therefore they were seldom used, and Crassus was blamed on the behalf of the City. * Florus calleth this Tribune Metellus, and others write, that the Tribunes generally * Liv. 3. c. 11. thus devoted him, but it appeareth, * from Cicero, that P. Atticus was principal in this Action. * Liv. 1. d. Divinat.

48. Crassus in his march rifled the Temple of Jerusalem, and took away the Treasures which Pompey touched not. He spent many days in weighing the Treasure of the Idol, called Atargatis by the Syrians, and by the Greeks Dereto, the Goddess of Thierapolis, otherwise called Edessa, and Bambyce, and Magog by the Syrians. In his whole passage he shewed more covetousness than valour, lifting Men, and then for Money discharging them. He neglected his opportunities of falling on the Parthians unprovided, and the friendship of the Armenian King, who offered him to invade Parthia through his Kingdom, as also of refreshing his Army in some City, (as Caesar advised him) till he had certain news of the Parthians, or else passing down the River to Seleucia, where he might have had Provisions by water, and could not be compassed in by the Parthians. This latter Council he rejected by the cunning insinuations of Abgarus the Ostroenian (otherwise called Angarus, Mazares, Mazarus, Metrachus, Macorus, Arianmes, and * Acbarus by several) the Regulus or Petty Prince of the Arabians, who having formerly been a Friend and Ally of the Romans, had now applied his mind to the Parthians, and feeding Crassus with Money, to conceal his treachery, gave him notice of whatsoever was done. He perswaded him to leave off thoughts of Seleucia and Ctesiphon, and go straight against the Surenas and Sillax the Kings Captains. This he did, and thereby first losing his Son, a choice young Man, he himself was by the Surenas circumvented under pretence of a Treaty, and either slain by his Enemies, or killed by some of his own Men, to prevent his falling into their hands. This hapned at Sinnaca, a City of Mesopotamia, on the sixth of the Ides of June, as Ovid informeth us; twenty thousand Men were slain, and ten thousand taken, according to Plutarch, (not to name other accounts) so that the East being almost destitute of Forces, many Provinces thereof revolted; but by the care, industry, and valour of C. Cassius the Questor of Crassus (the same who afterwards with Brutus killed Julius Caesar) Syria was appeased. This King of Parthia, against whom Crassus miscarried, (called Orodes, Herodes, and Hyrodes) was something skilled in the Greek Tongue, and other learning. Artaabazes, or Artavazdes, the Armenian, (that first offered kindness to Crassus) had reconciled himself to the Parthian, who was now with him. He being also learned, (for he wrote Tragedies, Orations, and Histories) part of Euripides his Bacche was repeated, and the head of Crassus was brought in as it were by chance, and thrown at their feet. But the Surenas was afterwards punished for his treachery, being killed by his Master, who envied him his glory. And Orodes himself having lost his Son Pacorius, in a Battle against the Romans, and fall into that kind of Droopie, called Anasarcia, Phraates (or Phraortes) his other Son, gave him Aconitum, or Wolfsbane, which working lo upon him, as with it self it brought out the humour, and gave him ease, he made short work of it, and strangled him with his own hands.

49. This perished Crassus, (a) (who was so rich, that he would have none so accounted, but he that could by his own Revenues maintain an Army) and one of the Heads of the Tricpitina was hereby cut off. This laid the foundation of the Civil War

War betwixt the other two, for he, whilst he lived, balancing them, when he was gone, Cesar must bring under Pompey before he could be Chief. Whilst Crassus warred against the Parthians, Gabinus, who had been Consul when Cicero was banished, reduced (b) into his Kingdom Ptolemy Auletes, whom his Subjects had expelled. Then was he Proconsul of Syria; but at his return being accused, especially for making War upon Egypt, (which was supposed to be forbidden by the Verbes of Sibylla) and ready to be torn in pieces by the People, he was yet acquitted by corrupted Judges (or Lelius the Tribune) of Treason, but banished, as upon other accounts, so chiefly for that he had screwed out of his Province one hundred thousand Drachmas, or Denarii, and was afterwards recalled by Cesar.

50. The Winter after Cesar his Action against the Marini and Menapii, Pompey and Crassus being Consuls, two German Nations, the Uspetes and Tenchbiteri passed with great multitudes over the Rhine, not far from the place where it falleth into the Sea. They had been ill treated for many years by the Suevi, the greatest and most warlike Nation amongst the Germani, who had one hundred Pagi, which yearly afforded to their Wars a thousand Men apiece; the rest living at home maintained themselves and them, and succeeded them in the War the following year. By this means both Tillage and experience in War was continued. No Man had any Ground peculiar to himself, neither might they abide longer than a year in one place. They lived chiefly upon Cattel and Milk, and used much hunting; being for that, and because they were not urged to any thing against their disposition, strong and of large stature. Their Bodies were but covered in part, and that but with Skins and Hides, and they washed them in the Rivers. Merchants frequented their Ports; not so much to bring them any Commodities, as to buy what they got in War. Oxen they cared not for, though the Galls would purchase them at any rate; but made use of their own rugged ugly Cattel, which by use they rendered tame and fit for service. They often forsook their Horses in Battle, which being taught to stand in one place, and ready again to receive them, they fought on foot. Furniture of Horses they esteemed a base thing. They admitted no Wine as that which would effeminate them. They thought it intanced their reputation as to valour, to have the bordering Territories lie waste, as being not to be refitted by many States. And it was reported, that one way the Country lay waste from thence fix hundred Miles together.

51. Next to the Suevi inhabited the Ubi, a State also great and potent, somewhat more civil than the rest, by reason of their intercourse with Merchants, and with the Galls. These the Suevi had much brought under, though they could not drive them out of the Country; as also they handled the Uspetes and Tenchbiteri before-mentioned, who for three years were forced from their Possessions to wander through the Continent of Germany, and at last fell upon the Menapii, inhabiting either side of the River Rhine. They being terrified thereat, forsook all their dwellings on the German side, and betook themselves to that of Gall, to hinder them from farther passage. And they did so far hinder them, that they counterfeited a Retreat to their old habitation; but their Horse, after three days Journey, speedily returned, and surprized, and slew such as upon their absence were returned to the farther side. These being slain, and their Shipping taken, they got over the River before the other Menapii had notice of their coming, easily dispossessed them, and lived that Winter upon the spoil. Cesar having notice of these things, and knowing the fickle humour of the Galls, and how they took their measures from light and idle Stories, hasted to his Army sooner than he was wont to do.

52. He found what he had suspected, that the Germani were invited by some Galls to come farther into the Country, and they proceeded as far as the Confines of the Eburones and Condrusi, who were under the protection of the Treveri. Yet Cesar thought fit to dissemble the matters, and encourage the Princes now got together in their loyalty. But he resolved to oppose the Germani, who in his march sent their Ambassadors, desiring, that being forced out of their Habitation, they might have leave to fix in Gall; and several things they propounded, as Cesar believed, to spin on the time till their Horsemen were returned, which were gone for spoil and provision over the Mosa. He gave them truce for one day, but notwithstanding that Truce, they set upon and defeated a Party of five thousand Horse. Then did he not think it safe to hearken to them any more, especially seeing that by that fraudulent Act they gained reputation amongst the Galls, to whom he durst not give place to think upon it. He resolved to fall upon them even in their Camp, which when he communicated to the Legates and Questors, a very fortunate accident hapned. For the next morning the chieftest of them came to excuse their late practice, and to defire a further Truce. He detained them in hold, and marched with his Army in a triple Battle (the Horse behind the Foot, because lately discouraged) to the Camp of the Germans. At first the Soldiers found some resistance, but upon the screaming of the Women and Children, who running away, were pursued; the Men also took themselves to their heels, and such as had escaped the Fight, coming to the confluence of the Mosel, and the Rhine, what through fear, weariness, and the force of the water, were all drowned. In the Conflict the Romans lost not a Man, yet the number of the Enemy, with Women and Children, was four hundred and thirty thousand. He gave leave to them he had kept in hold to depart; but they fearing the cruelty of the Galls, for the mischief they had done them, desired they might continue with the Romans, which Cæsar granted.

And passed the Rhine.

52. The German Horse that was absent at the overthrow, fled into the Confiners of the Sicambri, who refused to give them up, upon Cæsar's demand; saying, that if the Romans were forbidden Gall, why should the Romans challenge any Authority in their Territories? But Cæsar thought fit they should see that the Romans could pass the Rhine as well as they; especially being desired by the Ubi, who had alone accepted of his friendship, to fend them aid against the Suevi. To pass the Rhine he resolved, but to do it by Boats, was neither safe, neither for his own honour, nor for the Majesty of the People of Rome; and therefore, notwithstanding the difficulty in so large, deep, and swift a River, yet he resolved to try to make a Bridge, which if it succeeded not, he determined not to pass over at all. But within ten days that the Timber began to be cut and carried, the Work was ended, and the Army transported; leaving then a strong Party at either end of the Bridge, he invaded the Sicambri, receiving in the mean time many Ambassadors, and requiring Hostages. The Sicambri, at the persuasion of the Ubi and Tenchleri, had forsaken their Country, and betaken themselves into Woods and Deserts. He wasted their Territories, and marched to the Ubi, to whom he had promised aid against the Suevi. By them he understood that the Suevi, upon rumor of the Bridge, had sent all their Wealth, with their Wives and Children, into the Woods, and resolved, that all that were able to bear Arms should make Head, and give Battle to the Romans in the middle of their Country. But Cæsar having terrified the Germans, been revenged upon the Sicambri, and let, as he saith, the Ubi at liberty, (the things he designed) and spent eighteen days beyond the Rhine, having done enough for his own Honour, and the good of the Common-wealth, returned into Gall, and brake up the Bridge.

54. Before this he had understood, that in most part of the former Wars the Galls had received their Supply out of Britain. Though the Summer was so far spent, that it would not suffer him to finish a War, yet he thought it would be to good purpose, if he came only to view the Island, to understand the quality of the Inhabitants, and to know their Coast, their Ports and Landing places. Hereof the Galls were altogether ignorant; for seldom any but Merchants did travel to them. Neither had they discovered any thing but the Sea-Coast, and those Regions which were opposite to Gall. Calling Merchants together from all Quarters, he neither could understand of what quantity the Island was; what Nations, or of what power they were that inhabited it; what use or experience of War they had; what Laws or Customs they used; nor what Haven they had to receive a Navy of the greater Ships.

Britain.

55. Britain, or Britany, which also is Allion, being in Greek ΒΡΕΤΑΝΙΑ, ΒΡΕΤΑΝΙΚΗ, ΒΡΕΤΑΝΙΑ, ΑΒΡΙΟΝ, and ΑΒΡΙΟΝ, was by the Romans called Britannia and Romania. It is most probable, saith Cambden, that the Inhabitants were called Britains from their painted Bodies, for whatsoever is thus painted and coloured, in their ancient Country speech they call Brit, having been of old much given to paint themselves, as many Writers do testify. Now the Ancient Greeks, who failed by the Coast, understanding that the Nation was called Brit, might unto it add Tania, (which word in Greek, as the Glossaries shew, betokeneth a Region) and thereof make the compound name Britania, that is Britons-Land, which is corrupted into Britannia, but by Lucretius and Cæsar the two first Romans that make mention thereof is truly called Britania. In confirmation of this opinion Cambden observeth, that in the names of well-nigh all the ancient Britains, there appeareth some signification of a colour, which no doubt (he saith) arose from this kind of painting. The Red colour is of the Britains called Coch and Goch, which in his judgement lieth couched in their names, Cogidunus, Argentocoxus, and Segonax. The Black colour called Du, sheweth it self in Mandubratius, Carimandua, Togodunnus, Bunducia,

Sect. 6.

Bunducia, Cogidunus. The White colour called Gwin, in Veantius and Immannentius. The Waterish called Gwelch in Fellocatus, Carulius and Snella. The Blen, which they call Glas in Cuniglasus, and he proceedeth further. But this Learned Man coming to speak of the time wherein Britain came to be known abroad, denieth that the Britains were with Hercules at the rape of Hesperie; that Ulysses was ever in Britain; that the Britains bestowed upon Prefatus upon Cato; that King Alexander the Great, or Hannibal, was ever in the Island; he doubteth whether ever the Ship of Hercules, mentioned by Athenaeus, came hither; yet thinketh that the Britains were mingled with the Cimbri and Galls, in their Expeditions into Italy and Greece.

Camden Arguments that Britain was but known lately.

56. But as the Romans, Galls, and Spaniards, were unknown to Herodotus, and the ancient Greek Geographers, so of this mind he ever was, that it was late ere the Greeks and Romans heard of the Britains name. For he judgeth that little Book of the World, which goeth abroad under the name of Aristotle, and maketh mention of the Britains, of Albion and Hierne, to be of later days by far than that Philosopher, as the best learned Men (saith he) have judged. He accounteth Polihus the ancientest Greek Writer that mentioneth the British Isles; who yet knew nothing of them: then doth he, in reference to other Nations, count it but a fable that Himilco the Carthaginian, being commanded by his Superiours to discover the Western Sea-Coasts of Europe, entered into this Isle many years before that time. And the first Latin Author to his knowledge that made mention of Britain was Lucretius, in his Verses concerning the difference of Air. Now that Lucretius lived but a little before Cæsar no man denieth: at what time we are taught out of Cæsar himself, that Droitianus King of the Soissons, and the most mighty Prince of all Gall, Governed Britain, which, as also appeareth from Cæsar, is only to be understood of the Maritime Coasts. Howbeit, Diodorus Siculus writeth, that Britain had experience of no Foreigners rule; for neither Dionysius, (or Bacchus) nor Hercules, nor any other worthy, or Demi-god have we heard (saith he) to have attempted War upon that People. Now Cæsar, who for his noble Acts is called Divus, was the first that subdued the Britains, and forced them to pay a certain Tribute. From his time (saith Cambden) and no further off must the Writer of our History fetch the beginning of his Work, if he thoroughly weigh with judgment what the learned Varro hath in time past written, (viz. of the three distinctions of times which we have formerly mentioned, Uncertain before the Flood, Fabulous before the Olympiads, and Historical since the beginning of them) and my self already heretofore signified. This most learned Man mentions this division of Varro, because that the British History of Geffrey of Monmouth taketh its beginning three hundred and thirty three years before the first Olympiad. This History we must absolutely disclaim as utterly fabulous in reference to King Brutus, and other fictions depending on his Story. But whether or no Britain was not known abroad till so late time as our Antiquary judgeth, must be examined for the honour of our Country, saving ever that respect which is due (and that justly) unto his name, and will not be at all diminished, seeing the contest is betwixt him also, and Bochartus himself.

The contrary is offered.

57. The controversy is decided clearly against Cambden, if two things can but be made out. 1. That the Cassiterides or Islands of Tinne were known very anciently, and 2. That the Cassiterides were no other than the British Isles. The first is proved from the Testimony of many, that the Phœnicians were wont to trade to the Cassiterides, and thence to fetch plenty of Tinne. Strabo affirmeth it, and that they first traded thither alone from Gades, hiding from others this course of Traffick, in so much that a certain Phœnician Sailor being chased by a Roman Vessel, chose rather to run his Ship aground, and suffer Shipwrack, to cause his pursuers to miscarry, than to reveal the matter, for which fidelity, having escaped himself, he had his loss made up out of the publick Treasury at his return to Carthage. Pliny also writeth, (b) in the Chapter of the first Inventors, That Midacritus first carried Lead from the Island Cassiteris. For Midacritus is to be read Melacritus, or Melacritus, the Phœnician Hercules, according to Sanctionation, whom the Phœnicians make Author of the Western Voyages. (c) Herodotus acknowledged he knew not where the Cassiterides were; but that there were some then he acknowledgeth also, whence Tinne came to them the Greeks, and from him it appeareth, that they were situate in the utmost limits of Europe. The Phœnicians being unwilling that any should know them but themselves, the Greeks bought Tin and Lead, either of them, or the Veneti, or Narbonenses, to whom it was wont to be carried by Land in a journey of thirty days, as Diodorus telleth us. (d) Diodorus Siculus mentioned them under the name of Hesperides, and so doth Plinius. Filius

Sect. 6. Festus Anienus speaketh of them under the name of Oestrymides, expressly of the sailing of the Phenicians to them, and that Hamilco, who was sent from the Senate of Carthage to discover the West, came thither, as he himself recorded, whom Festus professed to follow in the description of the West, having made his Collections out of the depth of the Punic Annals. These things considered, prove sufficiently, that the Cassiterides were known in very ancient times.

58. For the second, that the British Isles are those Cassiterides or Stannaries, there needs no proof, Cambden himself confessing, nay proving by many Arguments, that the Islands of Silly lying off from the Promontory of Cornwal eight Leagues, and in number one hundred and forty five, are the very same that from the plenty of Tin were called Cassiterides, from their five Hesperides, and Oestrymides, from Oestrym the Promontory of the Artabri, now Gallitia in Spain, over against which they lie. Now for the consequence of the thing, can any imagine that these Islands should be so long known, and not Britain itself to which they lie so close, and from which they are deservedly called British Isles? And what reason is there to think, (as Cambden doth) that such dream as believe that Hamilco came hither? It's a wonder he should say, that there's nothing for it but a Verse or two of Festus Anienus; when Festus saith, that he read the story of the whole Navigation, described by Hamilco himself in the Punic Annals. Cambden himself contendeth, that from the Cassiterides was Lead first of all carried into Greece, whence it followeth, that they were known before the time of Homer, who maketh mention of the Metal. As for what he urgeth concerning Polybius, that he was utterly ignorant of these Parts, if it were granted that he was, yet the Phenicians, who in the Heroick times sent out Colonies into the Ocean beyond Gades, knew these Coasts sufficiently. But Cambden mistook the Historian, as may appear from all that passage read together, which only importeth, that as it was not known whether Asia and Africa on the South side were terminated by the Sea, so neither whether the Sea flowed about the Northern parts of Europe that lie above Narbon; which truly at this day we know not certainly, though in so much light. That this interpretation is to be made, and that Polybius did not mean, that in his age whatever lay above Narbon was unknown, and that they dreamed who spoke or wrote any thing of it, hence appeareth. For he himself accurately described the Fountains of Rhodanus, with Corbilon upon Ligeris, and many other places of Gaul above Narbon. And in his third Book he promiseth he would write of what lay beyond the Sea, and what was there remarkable, nay, (which is especially to be noted) of the British Isles, and making of Tin. That he performed his promise in the Books that are lost, appeareth from **Strabo*, who telleth us, That Polybius describing the Regions * Liv. ap. 104. of Europe, said, he would let pass the Ancients, and inquire into such as reprehended them, as Dicaearchus and Eratothenes, who list of all had handled Geography, and Pytheas who had imposed upon many. For, he (Pytheas) said, he had not viewed all the Soil of Britain; but the Island was above forty thousand (Stadia or Furlongs I suppose) in compass.

59. From this place it appeareth, that several whom Polybius calleth his disciples or Ancients, wrote of these Parts, before either Dicaearchus or Eratothenes, Pytheas, or himself. Now Eratothenes, who, as he saith, was the last that handled Geography, Strabo writeth to have been born in the 126 Olympiad, which was celebrated in the thirty seventh year of the Seleucide, the seventh of Antiochus Soter, the ninth of Ptolemy Philadelphus, and the 478 year of the City, when Q. Fabius Gurges and C. Gentius Clepsina were Consuls, Pyrrius then warring in Sicily, two hundred and seventy four years before the birth of Christ. But Dicaearchus boasteth in Athenens, that he had Aristotle for his Master; and then Pytheas, who was cited by both, must needs have preceded them. Yet these Writers were but of late in comparison of Orpheus the most ancient Poet, one of the Argonauts, by whom Cambden himself affirmeth Britain to have been described. Although in truth Orpheus was not Author of those Poems fathered on him, but Onomacritus an Athenian Poet, who lived under the Pisistratide, as both (a) Clemens Alexandrinus, and (b) Tatianus inform us, yet two advantages we have hereby. For first, Cambden is inconstant, denying that Britain was known to the ancient Greeks; and secondly, this Island must have been known then long before the former Geographers; for the Pisistratide were banished Athens in the third year of the sixty seventh Olympiad, the twelfth of Darius Hystaspis, the 244 of the City, (at the same time that Tarquinus was banished) five hundred and eight years before the birth of Christ, though they write that he flourished in the fiftieth Olympiad, in the first year whereof Pisistratus indeed got the Sovereignty over the City. These things sufficiently prove, that Britain was known of old old to several Nations, though we mentioned not what Bochartus probably conjectureth concerning the Etymology of the name. The Phenicians trading hither for Lead or Tin, might justly call it Barat-Anac, that is, The Land of Lead or Tin, as the Greeks Cassiteris; and this might easily be changed into Bretanica. Anac significeth both Lead and Tin, no places in the World are so fruitful of either as the British Isles. And it may seem no wonder that the Word should be so altered, seeing that from Phoenice are derived Pannice, Punicus, Punicus, and Pannus. He also giveth other marks of the Phenicians their planting in those Islands, in the thirty ninth Chapter of the first Book of that excellent Work entituled Canaan, concerning the Colonies and Language of that People, to which we refer the studious in Antiquity, having thus far in some sort seemed to vindicate the honour of our Country. Now to return to the course of our History.

60. Cæsar sent out C. Volusenus with a Gally to discover what he could concerning the quality of the Island, and its Inhabitants, with order speedily to return, and get all his Ships together on the Coast of the Morini; in the mean time his resolution being known, many private States of the Isle sent and submitted themselves, offering to give Hostages, and he returned back the Messengers with good words. Ere Volusenus returned, who durst not go ashore, the Morini submitted, and being unwilling to have an Enemy at his back, he received them and their Hostages. Eighty Ships of Burthen he thought sufficient to transport two Legions. He divided the Gallies to the Quæstor, the Legates and Commanders of the Horse, appointing other eighteen Ships of Burthen which lay wind-bound at another Port for the Horsemen. In the third Watch he put to Sea, commanding his Horse to follow, which was but slowly performed. About the fourth hour of the day he arrived upon the Coast, where he found all the Cliffs possessed by the Forces of the Enemy. The Place where he arrived was such, that the Hills lay so steep over the Sea, that a Weapon might easily be cast from the higher ground; and therefore he thought it not fit to land, but cast Anchor till the rest of the Navy were come up. Then after a Council called of the Legates and Tribunes, wherein he required a quick obedience to Orders, he removed eight Miles further unto a plain and open Shoar.

61. The Britains sent their Horse and Chariots (which they commonly used in War) before, and followed with the rest of their Forces. Cæsar found that his Men did not use the same courage as formerly in landing, for the Ships were so great, that they could not be brought near the Shoar, and the Soldiers were forced to wade deep with their heavy Armour, in places unknown; whereas the Britains well knowing where they were, managed their matters with great advantage. He caused the Gallies to be rowed toward the Shore, with which the Britains unacquainted, and thence offended with Slings, Engines and Arrows, began to give back. But still the Soldiers lingering, by reason of the depth of the Sea, the Ensign-bearer of the tenth Legion defying the Gods that it might fall out happily to the Enemy for his own part, that if they would forsake their Eagle and betray it to the Enemy for his own part, he would do his duty both to the Common-wealth, and to his General. Therewith he cast himself into the Sea, and carried the Eagle towards the Enemy, at which fight the Romans exhorting one another not to suffer such a dishonour to be committed, all leaped out of the Ship, and were followed by others near at hand with great alacrity. The Fight on both sides was very eager, the Romans struggling with great disadvantages, and keeping with the Ensign they first met. The Britains over-powered them, till Cæsar caused the Ship-boats and smaller Vessels to be manned with Soldiers, and where he saw need, sent them in to the rescue. Having got footing on Land, his Men made Head together, charged the Enemy, and put them to flight. But the Horsemen were notable to pursue, nor take the Island; which thing (he saith himself) was only wanting to Cæsar's wonted fortune.

62. But the Britains being overthrown in this Engagement, sent and surrendered themselves, gave some Hostages, and promised that others should be delivered, excusing themselves by ignorance for what was done amiss, and casting the blame upon the Multitude. Their People they commanded to return to their Quarters, but the Governours and Princes came out of all Parts, and commended themselves and their States to Cæsar. Peace was hereby concluded, and four days after that he was come into Britain, the eighteen Ships appointed for the Horsemen put out to Sea with a gentle Wind, but were so distressed with a Tempest, that when they were within view of the Romans Camp, some were forced to return to the Port from whence they came, others were driven to the Westward, and there casting Anchor, took in so much water, that they were forced to direct their course back again to the Coast of Gall.

Señ. 6. Moreover the Fleet that Cæsar brought over with him, as well Gallies as Ships of burthen, were miserably distressed by the Tide, of which the Romans were ignorant; many were split and rent in pieces, and the rest lost both Anchors, Cables, and other Tackling, and became altogether unserviceable. Hereat the whole Army was exceedingly troubled, there being no Shipping to carry them back, nor Provisions to sustain them; for here in the Island they could not continue. And the British Princes knowing this; besides, that they wanted Horse, and considering the smallness of their Camp, (for Cæsar had transported his Forces without such necessary Carriages as they used to take with them) they resolved to intercept their Provisions, keep them in till Winter, and so starve them; concluding, that if they were cut off, no Man would ever after adventure to bring an Army into the Island.

The manner
how the Brit-tains fought from their Chariots.

63. Cæsar grieved that the event of the losing of his Shipping would be such, especially when he saw that they brought not their Hottages; therefore he fetched in Corn out of the Fields, and so repaired his Ships, that he lost but twelve of the number, the rest being made able to abide the Sea. But the seventh Legion being sent out for Corn, were set upon by the Britains, and overpowered; which Cæsar suspecting from a greater dust than was usually discovered in that Quarter, Cæsar found his Men incompanied with their Horsemen and their Chariots. Their manner of fighting in Chariots was to ride up and down, and cast their Weapons as they saw advantage, and with the terror of their Horses, and the rattling of their Wheels, to disorder the Ranks; and when they brought themselves within any Troops of Horse, they forsook their Chariots, and fought on foot; in the mean time the Drivers would go a little aside, and so place them, that upon occasion they might have an easie passage, and help their Malvers. In all Fights they performed both the nimble motion of Horsemen, and the firm stability of Footmen, being so ready with daily practice, that they could stop in the declivity of a steep Hill, turn short, or moderate their going as they pleased, and run along the Beam, and rest upon the Yoke or Harness of their Horses, and return as speedily again when they thought fit.

64. Cæsar came in to the rescue in very good time; upon which the Enemy stood still, and his Men received courage; but having staid some time in the place, he thought not fit to provoke the Enemy, or give him Battel, and so drew off back again to his Camp. After this, by tempestuous weather, the Romans were kept in their Camp, and all Action prevented. But in the mean while the Britains encouraged one another from the smallness of the Roman Forces, and resolved to attacke their Camp. Cæsar gave them battle before the Camp, and easily defeated them, of whom great slaughter was made, though he had with him but forty Horse; and their Towns were burnt far and near. The same day they sent to treat, and Cæsar required double Hottages to be brought over to him into Gall. For the Æquinoctial being at hand, he thought it not safe to put to Sea in Winter, and therefore a little after midnight he set sail, and brought all his Ships safe to the Continent, only two of Burthen, not able to reach the same Harbour, put in somewhat lower in the Land; and when the three hundred Soldiers that were in them went on shoar, they were set upon by the Morini, but relieved at length by a Party of Horse which Cæsar sent. The next day he sent T. Labienus against these revolted Morini, who having not whither now to escape, their Fens and Boggs being dried up, fell under the power of his mercy. Q. Titurius and A. Cotta, two other Legates also, after they had wasted the Territories of the Menapii, who were retired into thick Woods, returned to Cæsar. He placed the wintering Camp amongst the Belge, to which two only of the States of Britain sent Hottages, the other neglecting. These things being related by Cæsar's Letters, the Senate decreed a Supplication for thirty days. Now the Ceremony of Supplication was this. After the Magistrate had publicly proclaimed that the General had happily and successfully administrated the Affairs of the Common-wealth, the Roman People clothed in white, and crowned with Garlands, went to all the Temples of their Gods, and there Sacrificed, to gratulate the Victory in his Name; and in this time they were forbidden all other business but what appertained to this Solemnity. At first it lasted but one or two days, then came to four, five, ten, afterward to fifteen in honour of Cæsar; and for his further Honour was now increased to the number of twenty.

65. Cæsar going into Italy from his Winter Quarters, as every year he was wont to do, when L. Domitius and Appius Claudius were Consuls, gave order to his Legates to build as many Ships as they possibly could, and repair the old; and the new ones he would have lower and flatter for lading and unlading, and transporting Horse, and all of them made for the use of Oars. From Gall within the Alpi he passed to Illyricum,

Galicolico.*

Illyricum, where the Piræte infested the Province, whom having terrified into a compliance, and received Hottages, he deputed certain Persons to compound differences, and punish the guilty, and so he returned the same way he came to his Army into Gall. After his Arrival he went to the Treviri, whom he suspected of a design to revolt, because they came not to the Assembly of Estates, and for other reasons. Amongst them Indutiomarus and Cingetorix contended for Superiority, of whom the latter presently came over to Cæsar; but the former resolving upon War, secured all persons unable to bear Arms in the Wood Arduenna, which being very large, began at the Rhine, and ran through the Treviri to the Borders of the People of Rheims: But finding all the chief to fall off, left he should be left alone, he also submitted. Cæsar resolving upon another Expedition into Britain, accepted of two hundred Hottages, and reconciled the chief of the Treviri to Cingetorix, whom he found to be for his Interest; which so vexed Indutiomarus, that of no friend he became to the Romans a bitter Enemy. Having settled matters there, he came back with the Legions to the Port Itius, (now of Calis) where finding things in good readines, and Horse to the number of four thousand, he resolved to take over with him some of the Galls from among the chief Men of every City that were come to him. And he pitched in particular upon Dumnorix the Æduan, knowing him to be a Man desirous of change, greedy of Rule, of courage and resolution, and one of greatest Authority. He was very unwilling to go, and when Intreaties could not prevail for his stay, he endeavoured to make a disturbance, and when that would not do, he fled, but by Cæsar's order was killed resisting, by those that were sent to pursue him.

The second
into Britain.

66. Cæsar having left Labienus in the Continent with three Legions, and two thousand Horse, to secure the Roman Interest, with five Legions, and as many Horse as he left behind him, embarked in a Navy of in all above eight hundred Vessels, and put out about Sun-setting with a soft South-wind. The Wind continued till mid-night and then he was becalmed; but was carried with the Tide till morning, when he perceived the Island to lie on his right hand. By rowing as the Tide changed, he endeavoured to reach that place where he formerly landed, and this he did by the great industry of the Soldiers, who by Oars made the great Ships of Burthen to keep way with the Gallies. Arriving at high Noon, he found the Britains had been on the Coast, but upon sight of so huge a number of Ships, they retired, and hid themselves in the Woods. Having fortified his Camp, and left a Guard for his Ships, in the third Watch of the night, he marched towards them, and found them at twelve Miles distance, where at a River they made some opposition, but were beaten back and retired into a Wood. The Place was strongly fortified both by Art and Nature, and seemed to be made for a defence in their Civil Wars. For all the Entrances were closed with great Trees laid overthwart the Passages. They endeavoured to hinder the Romans from entering the Fortification. But the Soldiers of the seventh Legion with a Testudo and a Mount took it, and drove them out of the Woods without any loss; but being ignorant of the Place, he would not suffer them to pursue, resolving to employ the remaining part of the day in the further fortifying of his Camp.

67. The next day early he sent out his Forces in three Companies to seek them out, but received news in a short time from Q. Arivus, with whom he had left ten Cohorts and the charge of the Shipping, that the whole Navy by an hideous Tempest was either fore beaten or cast on Shore. Cæsar called back the Legions, and found that forty Ships were lost, and the rest not to be repaired but with great industry and pains. He chose Carpenters and Shipwrights out of the Legions, caused others to be sent for out of Gall, and wrote to Labienus to provide what Shipping he could. And how laborious soever it was, he thought fit to take up all the Ships on Shore, and bring them within the Fortification of his Camp; in which work, and fortifying the Camp, were spent ten days without intermission either of day or night; and returning to the Place whence he came, he found the Britains in great numbers assembled, and the management of the War conferred on Cassivellaunus, whose Kingdom was divided from the Maritime States, by the River Thames, beginning at the Sea, and extending it self for fourscore Miles into the Island. He had made continual War with his neighbour States; but, upon coming of the Romans, they all forgot their homebred quarrels, and cast their whole Government upon him, as the fittest to direct in the War.

68. Now, the inner part of Britain was inhabited by such as were reported to be born in the Island, and the Maritime Coasts by such as came out of Belgia, either to make Incursions or Invasions; and after the War was ended, they continued in the Possessions

Sect. 6. Possessions they had gained, and were called by the Names of the Cities from whence they came. The Country was very Populous, and well inhabited with Houses, much like unto them in Gall. They had great store of Cattel, and used Brags for Money, or Iron Rings weighed at a certain rate. In the Mediterranean Parts was found great quantity of Tin; and in the Maritime Parts Iron, but they had but little of that: their Brags was brought in by other Nations. They had all sorts of Trees, as in Gall, except the Fig and Beech. Their Religion would not suffer them to eat either Hare, Hen, or Goose; notwithstanding they had of all sorts, as well for novelty as variety. The Country, saith he, is more temperate, and not so cold as Gall. The Island lieth Triangular, whereof one side confronteth Gall, of which side that Angle wherein Cantium (or Kent) lies, is the usual Place of landing from it, and pointeth to the East, and the other Angle to the South. This containeth about fifty Miles. Another side lieth toward Spain, and the West, the same way that Hibernia, (or Ireland) being an Island half as big as Britain, and as far distant from it as Gall. In the mid way, betwixt Britain and Ireland, lieth Mona, (now Anglesey) and many other Isles; of which some write, that in Winter time, for thirty days together, they have continual night, whereof we learned nothing by enquiry; only we found by certain measures of Water, that the Nights in Britain were shorter than in the Continent. The length of this side, according to the opinion of the Inhabitants, containeth seven hundred Miles. The third side lieth to the North, and the open Sea, saying that this Angle doth something point towards Germany. This is thought to contain eight hundred Miles; and so the whole Island in circuit two thousand. Of all the Inhabitants, they of Cantium are most courteous and civil, all their Country bordering upon the Sea, and little differing from the fashion of Gall. Most of the In-land People fow no Corn, but live upon Milk and Fleth, clothed with Skins, and having their Faces painted with a blew colour, that they may seem more terrible in fight: They have the hair of their Heads long, and all the parts of their Body shaven except their upper Lip. Their Wives are common to ten or twelve, especially Brethren with Brethren, and Parents with Children; but the Children that are born, are put to them unto whom the Mother was first given in Marriage.

Cæsar encounters the Britains.

69. The British Cavalry and Chariots gave a sharp opposition to the Roman Horse in their march; but, Cæsar tells you, so as the Romans got the better every way, driving them with great slaughter to the Woods and Hills, and being too venturesome in the Pursuit, they lost certain of their own Men. After some intermission of time, when the Romans little thought of them, and were busied in fortifying their Camp, the Britains, from out of the Woods, suddenly charged upon such as kept Watch before it. Cæsar sent out two of the chiefest Cohorts of two Legions to assist their fellows. However he confesseth, that Q. Laberius Purnus, a Tribune, was slain; and the Britains were repelled with more Cohorts which he sent to relieve the former; and he adds, that the Soldiers upon the Watch first set upon, and terrified with a strange kind of Fight, while the Cohorts sent to their relief fought with a Lane or Alley betwixt them, brake through, and came to their fellows. He owns farther, that the Fight happening in the view of all the Camp, it was plainly perceived, that the Legionary Soldiers, neither able for the weight of their Armour to pursue the Enemy, nor yet daring to go far from their several Ensigns, was not a fit Adversary to contest this sort of Enemy; and that the Horse likewise fought with no less peril, in as much as the Enemy would retire back of purpose, and when they had drawn them a little from the Legions, they would then light from their Chariots, and encounter them with that advantage which is betwixt a Foot-man and an Horse-man. Besides, they never fought thick and close together, but thin, and at great distances, having stations of Men to succour one another, to receive the weary, and to send out fresh Supplies.

70. The next day they made a stand upon the Hills afar off, and shewed themselves not so often, neither were they so busie with the Roman Horse as the day before. But about noon Cæsar sent out three Legions, and all his Horse to forage, and they made a sudden assault upon the Foragers, and fell in close with the Ensigns and the Legions. The Romans charged so fiercely, that they beat them back, and the Horse encouraged by having the Legions behind them, put them to flight, and did great execution, giving them no respite to make Head, or forsake their Chariots. After this overthrow all their Auxiliaries forsook them; neither did they afterward contend with the Romans, with any great power. But Cæsar knowing their design, led his Army to the River Thamesis, and the Confines of Cassivellaun, which River was passable by foot but in one place, and that very hardly. At his arrival he found a great power imbatteled on the other side, and the Bank fortified with many sharp Stakes, and many other were also stuck under the water. These things being discovered by the Captives and Fugitives, Cæsar put his Horse before, and caused the Legions to follow presently after; and notwithstanding they had but their heads above water, the Soldiers proceeded with that violence, that the Enemy was not able to sustain the Charge, but left the Bank, and betook themselves to flight. Cassivellaun having no courage to contend any further, dismissed most of his Forces, and retaining only four thousand Chariots, observed the motions of the Romans, keeping the Woods whither he had driven the People and Cattel out of the Fields; and as their Horse made any Salles for Forage or Booty, he sent his Chariots upon them, and put them to great peril, in so much that the Horse durst never venture further than the Legions; neither was there any more spoil made in the Country, than what the Legionary Soldiers made themselves.

71. In the mean time the Trinobantes, being almost the greatest State in the Country, sent to Cæsar their Ambassadors, to offer submission, and that Mandubratius might be sent to reign amongst them, and be protected from Cassivellaun; for, his Father Immaginatus holding that Kingdom, had been slain by Cassivellaun, and he had fled to Cæsar into Gall. Cæsar requiring forty Hostages from them, and Corn for his Army, sent Mandubratius to them. After this the Centimagi seeing how the Trinobantes were delivered from all violence, as also the Seguntiaci, Ancalites, Bibroci, and Cassi, yielded themselves. From them he understood that the Town of Cassivellaun was not far off; that it was fortified with Woods and Bogs, and well stored with Men and Cattle. Now the Britains call, saith he, a Town, some thick Wood inclosed about with a Ditch and Rampire, made for a place of Retreat, when they stand in fear of incursions from the Borderers. Cæsar marched and found it well fortified both by Art and Nature. He assaulted it at two several places, and the Enemy unable to keep it, withdrew himself by a back way, and so he took it; therein he found great store of Cattle, and slew many of the Britains.

73. In the mean time Cassivellaun sent into Kent, wherein were four several Kings, Cingetorix, Carvolius, Taximaglus, and Segonax; them he commanded, with all the power they could make, to set upon the Camp wherethe Roman Navy was drawn up. The Kings obeyed his Order, but by a Sally made upon them, were overthrowen, many of their Men slain, and Legatorix a great Commander taken Prisoner. The ill success of this Attempt concurring with the former losses, and especially the revolt of the fore-named States, moved Cassivellaun to desire peace. Cæsar was resolved to winter in the Continent for fear of Commotions in Gall; and considered that the Summer was far spent, and might easily be lingred out. He therefore appointed what Hostages he would have, and what yearly Tribute the Britains should pay to the Romans; and gave a strict charge to Cassivellaun to do no injury to Mandubratius, or the Trinobantes. Having received the Hostages, he found his Ships repaired, and at twice transported his Army over into Gall, which he was constrained to do, because of the number of his Prisoners, and that some Vessels were cast away.

73. This is the account which Cæsar himself gives us of his two Expeditions into this Island, of the behaviour of the Britains, and the success. We have no relation of the Britains themselves to compare with it, who probably would have told us several passages; which either he did not observe, or wittingly omitted. As to the main of the Affair, other Writers have agreed, that he rather affrighted the Inhabitants, than performed any great matter. Tacitus saith, he rather shewed than delivered Britain to the Romans. Eutropius writes, That in his first Expedition he was wearied with bitter fights, and seized with an adverse Tempest; but Lucan (indeed no great friend to the Family of the Cæsars) sings how he ran away in a fright from the Britains, whom he had fought out. To speak indifferently, his Narration of this British War is something odd and different from other parts of his History, in the boldness of Style, and vigour of Spirit, wherein he excelled. In relating the skirmishes that hapned in the march of the Romans, he makes rather excuses why his Men did no better, than any thing else. He acknowledgeth, that the Legionary Soldiers, by reason of their heavy Armour, and because they durst not go from their several Ensigns, were not a fit Adversary to contest this kind of Enemy. And yet he also acknowledgeth, that his Horse fought with no less danger, by reason of the advantage the Britains received from the nimble management of their Chariots, and their manner of fighting and succouring one another. He confesseth that his Horse was put to great peril, and for that Cassivellaun sent his Chariots by unknown ways, and surprized them, they durst never adventure further than the Legions, neither was

74. It's to be feared, that had not the Revolt of the Trinobantes, and other States happened, Cæsar would have been put more to his invention to excuse his want of success, and by reason of the temptation accompanying such as write Commentaries of their own Acts, to make fairer glosses and flourishes than possibly the severity of truth might require. However, wanting direct matter to oppose him, we shall not undertake the business. Suetonius tells us the report went, that he came over into Britain to seek for Pearls, to which the relation made by Pliny doth bear some testimony, who writes, that being returned victorious out of the Island, he dedicated a Breast-plate made of British Pearls to Venus Genetrix in her Temple. The place where he landed is believed to have been Dea, where the Coast is flat, and easy of access, and some risings of ground are to be seen, which the Inhabitants call Romef-worke. He passed the River near Ostlands in Surrey, at a place called Comay Stakes, from the Stakes which Beda in his time said were still to be seen, as big as a Mans Thigh, and covered with Lead, sticking in the bottom of the River. The Town of Caistor is thought to have been Verulam, in the Hundred of Caistor, afterward a famous Municipium of the Romans. To conclude this matter concerning Cæsar's Expeditions into Britain, I know no Historical Relations Authentick, before those that he hath made; neither do I think, that we have any thing certain concerning British Affairs before his time, except what I have said concerning the Castibrides, and that Droicius King of the Suessones had Dominion here. As for them that will have a Brute, let them have a Brute if they will; but give leave to them that will have no Brute, to have no Brute; as he said concerning the May-pole. Now let us follow Cæsar into Gall.

Cæsar again in Gall.

75. Having held a Council of the Galls at Samarobrina, he found that by reason of the scarcity of Corn which had followed a drought, there was necessity of dispersing his Army into their Winter Quarters, than there had been the years before. To several Officers he gave several Legions to be placed in several Countries, yet all within an hundred Miles, except that where E. Roscius settled, in a quiet and peaceable part. This was, as the present Copies have it, amongst the Esuvii. But our Geographer Mommsen tells us, that in Cæsar's Commentaries several forged People are put for true and genuine, by unskilful Transcribers or Interpreters; and he instanceth in this place, where he saith, That instead of Esuvii is to be read Sesuvii, the word being corrupted first, by transposing the two former Letters, and one put out of the middle. He tells us, That the Aulerci Diablintes, or Diablites, being one, were divided into two private People, viz. the Sesuvii, (now those of the Territory of Sees in Normandy) who possessed the upper and Northern Parts, whose Metropolis was Noviodunum, now Sees; and the Arovis, inhabiting the lower and Southern, (now the People of the Territory of Alanson) whose chief Seat was Vagorotum or Alangon. Now he gives a reason why Cæsar calls this Tract of their quiet and peaceable. Because in the bordering Nation of the Carnutes reigned Talgetius, a great lover of Cæsar, who contained the neighbouring Nations in the bounds of peace.

76. Cæsar indeed continues his Narration by telling us, that there was now among the Carnutes a Man of great Birth called Talgetius, whose Ancestors had born the chief Rule in their State. That this Man for his singular valour and good will towards him, (for he had done him very good service in all his Wars) he restored to the Dignity of his Fore-fathers. But before he had reigned three years, his Enemies, by a conspiracy of divers of his Citizens, killed him in the open Streets; which thing was complained of to Cæsar. He fearing, that in regard to many Men had an hand in the Murder, the City, at their instigation, might revolt, commanded L. Plancius immediately to march thither with his Legion from his Quarter in Belgium, and there to winter; with Orders to apprehend such as were Ringleaders in the death of Talgetius, and send them to him. But fifteen days had scarcely passed after the Legions were settled in their wintering Camps, but a Commotion happened; and Sabinus and Cotta, who wintered amongst the Eburones, were attacked by Ambiorix and Catimolcus, who commanded that People, at the instigation of Inducipargus of Trier, who owed Cæsar an ill turn, and now thought it a fit time to pay him. The Romans so well defended themselves, that they could not compass their ends, which when Ambiorix perceived, he betook himself to a fraudulent practice. Having desired that some might be sent to treat with him, he pretended he was constrained to do what he did by the People, the Galls having universally agreed to fill upon the Romans in their dispersed Quarters that day; he pretended great love and gratitude to Cæsar for great benefits received from him, and in way of return advised, that forthwith as there was a great number of Germans coming, they would remove from that Camp, and joyn themselves either to Q. Cicero or Labeinus, of whom the one was not past fifty miles off, and the other but a little farther. And he affirmed by Oath, that they should have safe passage through his Territories.

77. A Council of War met to consult what to do, where by the vehemence of Titurnus Sabinus it was carried that they should discamp: and all things were disposed in such sort, as to make the Soldiers believe they could not stay without danger, and that the danger might be augmented by being wearied with watching. As soon as it was light they began their march, in length, and with as much Baggage as they were able to carry; and some two miles off were way-laid by the Galls, who in the Woods had placed two Ambuscados. Titurnus now ran about like a distracted man, and so fearfully and after such a manner did he dispose his Cohorts, as if all things had gone against them, as it happeneth for the most part to such as are forced to consult in the instant of Execution. Cotta, who had thought what would happen, and was against the Journey, did all things required, both from a General and a private Soldier, and it was proclaimed that the Romans should forsake their Baggage, and cast themselves into an Orb. This was not to be re-proved; but the Enemy then conceived hope, out of apprehension that they were discouraged and possessed with fear. And though they made brisk sallies with good execution, yet the Galls by advice of Ambiorix gave way to them, purified them in their retreat, and then by their missile Weapons sorely distressed them as they stood in their Orb. Many being killed, and some excellent Soldiers wounded, Titurnus the cause of all the mischief went over to Ambiorix his Friend, and intreated him to spare him and his Soldiers, and he gave him good words till he was incircled about and slain. The Galls, then crying out victory with a great noise, assaulted the Romans and routed their Troops. Cotta was slain, and most part of the Soldiers with him. The rest returned to their Camp, amongst whom L. Petrofidius, the Eagle-bearer, when he saw himself overcharged, cast his Eagle within the Rampire, and fighting with great courage within the Camp was killed. The rest with much ado endured the fight till Night, and then despairing of succour killed themselves. Some few escaped; and by unknown ways through the Woods got to Labeinus, and acquainted him how all things had fallen out.

Titurnus and Cotta distressed and slain.

78. Ambiorix puffed up with this success, using all speed imaginable, got to the Aduatici his Neighbours, and from the late success easily persuaded them, the Nervii and others, to pursue their good fortune, and to attack the Camp where Cicero wintered. Many Soldiers sent out upon Foraging, they cut off, and violently attacked the Camp, which the Romans as valiantly defended, and that for several days together, still making preparations by Night for the defence of the following Day. In one Night were built one hundred and twenty Towers. No rest was given to sick or wounded. Stakes hardened with fire were prepared, many mural Piles made, the Towers floored, and Pinacles and other devices framed, Cicero himself though ever sickly and of a weak Constitution, rested not by night till the Soldiers of their own accord by way of intreaty compelled him to spare himself. The Nervii seeing things not to succeed, indeavoured by fair words and the like Arguments to deceive Cicero as Ambiorix did Sabinus, but in vain. And when this would not do, they drew a Ditch and a Rampire round about the Camp, according as they had learnt by conversation with the Romans and from Fugitives. They had no Iron Tools for this purpose, but cut the Turf with their Swords, gathered Earth with their Hands, and carried it away in their Mantles; yet was the Rampire eleven foot high, and the Ditch fifteen foot deep, and the Fortification of fifteen Miles in circuit, finished in less than three hours, whereby may be gathered what multitudes of People there were at the siege. And they provided Towers, Hooks and strong Penthouses for safeguard, as the Captives instructed them.

Cicero besieged in his Camp.

79. The seventh day of the siege they cast hot balls of Clay out of Slings, and burning Darts upon the Cabins of the Romans, which being thatched with Straw, after the manner of the Galls, took fire, and the day being windy, it was carried over all the Camp. Then did they with all their force with scaling Ladders, and such Engines as they had, attack them, but by the great valour of the Roman Soldiers who attended their Fortification, and never looked back at the burning of their Wealth, they were repulsed, and a Tower they had made was burning. The Centurions of the third Cohort drew back their men from the place,

* G g g g g

Sect. 6. and bid the Enemy enter if they thought good; but none durst adventure to make a trial. Here was remarkable the valour of two Centurions Pulso and Varenus, who were at perpetual contention amongst themselves who should be first preferred, coming on apace to the Dignity of the first Orders. Pulso issued out upon the Enemy, and drew the other after him, and they were both difficultly engaged, and each saved the others life, and came off upon such equal terms, that it could not be discerned who had got the greatest honour.

86. But the siege daily growing hotter, and many Messengers having been sent with Letters to Cæsar, but intercepted, and some of them tortured to death before the Camp, at length one of them being a Gall, of the Nation of the Nervi, by his Habit and Demeanour escaped their observation, and reached Cæsar with the Letters. He sent for several Legions that lay nearest in Quarters; but Labiæus being in a manner already besieged by the Treviri; he could get but two; however with them he marched, using all celerity, and hired a Gall to convey a Letter to Cicero of his coming, which he did by tying it, according to his directions, and throwing it into the Camp. It happened to stick on a Turret, and there stuck for two days, but at length discovered and read, being in Greek Characters, it brought no small joy to the besieged, which was confirmed in them shortly by the sight of the fires. The Enemy upon discovery hereof raised the siege, and went toward Cæsar, of which Cicero gave him notice by his former Messenger. He perceiving himself much overmatched in numbers (he having but seven, and the Galls some fifty thousand men) fortified his Camp, and by counterfeiting fear, drew the Enemy over a Valley before his Camp, to a place very disadvantageous for them. They were confident of Victory; and made some brisk attempts; but he sallied out upon them from all Ports at once, easily put them to flight with great slaughter, and not thinking fit to pursue them into the Woods, went to the Camp of Cicero, whom he encouraged, together with his valiant Legion, and comforted them in the revenge of the loss lately sustained through the treachery of Sabinus the Legate. The report of Cæsar's victory put a stop to several Designs of the Galls, of attacking other Wintering Camps of the Romans; but upon the noise of the overthrow of Sabinus, great Combinations had been made, and Resolutions taken for prosecuting that Advantage, and now they were still promoted by Induciomarus, who bestowed himself all manner of ways against the Roman Interest. He caused a Council of Arms to be called, which according to the manner of the Galls was always the beginning of a War, being such as constrained all men of years, by the Common Law of the Land to assemble together prepared; and he that came last was in the fight of all the rest put to death with exquisite torture. His first attempt he told them should be to take the Camp of Labiæus in the Marches of the Treviri, amongst the men of Rheims. And accordingly he besieged him, who counterfeited fear the more easily to draw him on, but when he and his men insulted, he caused to issue out the Horse which he got in readiness, which with some Cohorts easily put the Braggadochio to flight, and killed Induciomarus as they had it given in especial charge, before any other execution performed. His Head was brought into the Camp from the Foard of a River wherein he was surprized; which being known, the Eburones and Nervi departed home, and afterward Cæsar had Gall better settled and quiet.

87. But for all this he found reason to fear greater commotions, and therefore to let the Galls see what the Romans could do, he raised new Forces, and procured Pompey the Proconsul, so famous as he continued at the City, about publick businesses, to recall to their Ensigns, and send to him such Soldiers as he had raised in Gall within the Alps when he was Consul. By this means, before Winter was ended, three Legions were enrolled, and brought unto him, whereby that number of Cohorts was doubled which was left with Tiberius. Though Induciomarus was dead, the Treviri gave the Government to his Kindred, and drew Ambiorix into their society. The Nervi, Adriatici, Menapii and all the Germans beyond the Rhine were in Arms; the Senones being summoned came not, but were in Council with the Carnutes and other neighbouring States. Cæsar therefore thought it best to begin betimes and surprize them; and so he did the Nervi, whom suddenly invading he wasted their Country, took a great number of men and Cattel, and caused the People to come in and give Pledges; which business having speedily ended, he brought back the four Legions into their wintering Camps.

82. In the beginning of Spring he called a General Assembly of all the States in Gall, from which the Senones, Carnutes and Treviri only absented themselves, he took took it for a Defection. That he might seem to set all other things apart, he transferred the Council to Luettia, a Town of the Parisii, who were Confines to the Senones, and in the memory of their Fathers had united their State unto them, but were held clear of this Confederacy. The same day he marched, and by great journeys came into the Territories of the Senones, who surprized with his sodain Arrival, sued for pardon, and obtained it by mediation of the Ædii; and the Carnutes obtained the like favour by means of the Remi, upon giving Hostages as the other had done. Now did Cæsar bend his endeavours to reduce the Treviri and Ambiorix. He understood that he had friendship with the Menapii (People of Celdres and Cleve) who being inclosed with Bogs and Woods, had never sent to Cæsar about any contract of Peace. Them he invaded, and by wasting the Country brought them to submit; and he accepted of their submission, on condition that they would not receive him into their Country, or any Messengers from him.

83. In the mean time the Treviri were got together to attack Labiæus, who was come into their Confines, and they expected the arrival of some Germans to their assistance. Betwixt them and Labiæus there was a River, and he being posted on an advantageous ground, did all he could to draw the Enemy over to fight before the Germans should come to them. And by counterfeiting fear, and pretending to fly and forsake his Camp, he drew them over; and then turning head defeated them, and took in their whole State. For the Germans hearing of their overthrow returned home, and with them went the Kingmen of Induciomarus, the Author of the Defection, who being gone, the Government was given to Crugotrix, and he from the beginning had been true and faithful to the Romans. Cæsar being come from the Menapii to the Treviri, passed over by Bridge again into Germany to chastize such as had sent succours and supplies to them, and that Ambiorix might have no entertainment against them. He found by the information of the Ubi, that the Suevi had been the Offenders, and they upon his coming had retired to their utmost Confines, where was a Wood of an infinite greatness, called Baccen, which served for a Rampire and defence to keep the Cerusii from the incursions of the Suevi, and the Suevi from the injuries of the Cerusii. At the entrance of this Wood they expected the coming of Cæsar, who here makes a stop without entering, and instead of an attack, gives us a more profitable account concerning the Customs and manner of Life both of Galls and Germans.

84. As for Gall, not only in every City, Village and Precinct there were Factions and Parties; but almost in every particular House. Before Cæsar came into Gall, the two great Parties were of the Ædii and Sequani, of whom the later got the better, till he by his Power and Interest repaired the Authority of the other, and also brought the Remi into repute; so that at this time in Power and Authority the Ædii excelled all other States, and next unto them were the Remi. Throughout all, there were but two sorts of men of any Reckoning or Account. For the Common-people were in the condition of Servants, and of no value in themselves, nor admitted to the publick Councils, but kept under by Debts, Tributes, or oppression of the great ones, and putting themselves into the service of the Nobles, who had the same power over them as Lords enjoyed over their Slaves. The two sorts were one of the Druides and another of those Cæsar calleth Equites. The Druides managed matters of their Religion which they expounded, and gave order for the publick and private Sacrifices. To them being held in great veneration, the Youth resorted for Learning, and they determined almost all Causes betwixt publick and private Persons. Controversies both Criminal and Civil they decided, rewarded the virtuous and punished the wicked. If any, either private man or State, did not obey their Decree, they interdicted him their Sacrifice; and this was the greatest punishment amongst them. For such as were thus interdicted, were reckoned in the number of impious and wicked men; every man left their Company, and avoided to meet or speak with them, lest they should receive any hurt by their Contagion: neither had they any benefit of the Law, though desiring it, neither was any Respect or Honour communicated to them.

85. Over all the Druides one prefiged with chief Authority, who was succeeded by him that next excelled, and if equals pretended, they went to election, which sometimes was attended with force and Arms. They met at a certain time of the year in the Confines of the Carnutes, being the middle part of Gall, where they lay in a secret place, and determined Controversies from all quarters. The Art and Learning of the Druides was first found out in Britain and was thought thence to have been translated into Gall; and in Cæsar's time such as would attain to the perfect

Their Learning had its original here in Britain.

Sect. 6. perfect knowledge of that Discipline, travelled hither to learn it. The Druides were exempt from Warfare, Tribute and all other Duties incumbent upon other men, which allured many to the Profession. They were said to learn many verses, and some to have applied themselves to that learning twenty years. To commit any thing to writing it was unlawful; in other publick and private busineses they made use of Greek Letters, but they seemed to do it, that their knowledge might not become common and vulgar, and that their Scholars might not trust so much to writings as to their memory, it happening for the most part, that men relying upon Books and Papers, in the mean time omit the benefit of good remembrance. Their endeavour was chiefly to teach that the souls of men do not dye, but remove out of one Body into another, which they thought very important to fit men up to virtue, and to neglect the fear of death. They also disputed and delivered many Traditions to the Youth concerning the Stars and their motions, the magnitude of the Earth and the World, the nature of things, and the might and power of the Gods.

What they taught.

The Epistots.

86. The other sort of men amongst them were Equites, who upon all occasions, as before Cæsar his coming there never wanted, were conversant in War, each according to his Power and Wealth being attended with Clients and Followers, which they esteemed the only note of Nobility and Greatness. The whole Nation was much addicted to that they accounted Religion. If sick, or engaged in War, they would either sacrifice men, or vow the oblation of themselves. Using herein the ministry of the Druides, they conceived that the Immortal Deity could not be pleased but by giving the life of one man for another, and to that purpose they had publick Sacrifices appointed. They burned men in Images made of Oiers. The Execution of Thieves and Robbers they thought most pleasing to the Gods, but wanting them they spared not the Innocent. They chiefly worshipped Mercury as the Inventor of all Arts, the Conductor in all Voyages, and having great power in all Merchandize and gain of Money. Next to him they preferred Apollo, Mars, Jupiter and Minerva, having the same opinion of them as other Nations. They vowed to Mars the spoil of an Enemy they were to encounter, and such Beasts as they took they sacrificed; other things they laid up in some sacred place, heavy punishment being inflicted upon any that either kept back, or took them away.

The Religion of the Galls.

Other Customs.

87. Being made believe by the Druides that they were defended from the God Dis, they boasted themselves in their descent. For that reason they determined the space of time by the number of Nights, not of Days, observing their Nativities and the beginnings of their Months and years, so as the Day followed the Night. Contrary to the custom of other Nations they suffered not their Children to come publicly unto them till fit for War. To the Portions of their Wives they added as much of their own; and the use of all the money was laid apart, and together with the principal Coin to the Survivor. They had power of life and death both over Wives and Children. The death of great men was wont to be inquired into by the Kindred, and a suspected wife was examined by torture; if guilty, put to death by fire and all other torments to be imagined. Their Funerals, as their Life, were magnificent and sumptuous, and with the Corps was burned whatsoever the man delighted in, not sparing living Creatures: Nay, not long before the time that Cæsar wrote, the custom was to bury such Clients and Servants with him as he had favoured in his Life-time. Such Nations as were careful, prohibited by a special Law, the communicating of Rumors or Reports concerning matters of State, to any but a Magistrate; it being found that rash and unskilful men had been put upon dangerous attempts by such reports. The Magistrates kept secret what they thought fit, and what not they published; but it was not lawful, except in State Assemblies, to speak of State Affairs.

The Customs of the Germans.

88. The Germans, Cæsar adds, did much differ from the Galls in their course of Life, for they had neither Druides nor Sacrifices. Nor Gods did they worship but such as they could see, and by whom they were manifestly benefited, as the Sun, Vulcan, and the Moon. In hunting, or in War they spent their lives, being from their Childhood inured to labour. They liked of such as continued longest beardless amongst them, some thinking it to conduce to their Stature, others to their Strength and Sinews. Before twenty years of age they held it abominable to know a Woman; and such matters could not be hid; for they bathed themselves together in Rivers, and used Skins and other small coverings on their Reins, but were naked on the rest of the body. They used no Tillage, the greatest part their their Food being Milk, or Cheese, or Flesh. Their Magistrates and Princes every year allotted certain portions of Lands to Kindreds and Tribes that inhabited together, where and as they thought convenient; and then next year appointed them in a new place; and this they thought they did for several good reasons. In case of War a State made choice of Magistrates to have the command with power of Life and Death; but in time of peace they had no common Magistrate, but the Principal Persons of the Regions and Pagi interpreted the Law, and determined Controversies.

89. Theft committed out of the Confines was commended as an exercise of the Youth. Such as would not follow their Great men in an exploit publicly declared, were held in the number of Traitors, and had never any credit afterward. Strangers they religiously protected from all injuries, to such every mans House being open and his Table common. The time was when the Galls excelled the Germans in valour, and made War upon them, and by reason of the multitude of People, and want of Ground, sent many Colonies over the Rhine into Germany. By that means those fertile places of Germany lying near the Wood Hercynia (known by the name of Orcinia to Evatishenes and other Greeks) were possessed by the Volsæ Tediosages, who in Cæsar's time still there inhabited and retained their antient opinion of Justice and Military Glory. The Germans still continued in the same poverty and patience as in former times, using the same Diet and Apparel; but the Galls having knowledge of other neighbouring Nations, lived in a more plentiful manner, and had by little and little been overthrown and weakened, so that at this time they stood not in comparison with the Germans. The Hercynian Wood was nine days journey over; for they had no difference, he saith, of space, but by days and journeys, as at this day in those Countries they reckon not how far it is to such a place by Miles or Leagues, but say it is so many hours to such a Town or City. It began at the Confines of the Helvetii, Nemetes and Rauraci, and ran along the Danube as far as the Daci, whence it declined to the left side, and by reason of its large extension, bordered on many other Countries. No German could say that he himself had gone, or heard that any other had reached to its beginning, though therein he had travelled threecore days. In this Wood, he saith, were many sorts of wild Beasts not to be seen in any other place. He instanteth in one like a Hart, and the Beasts called Uri somewhat lesser than an Elephant. But most remarkable was that other sort called Ales and remarkable indeed, not for being like a Goat, somewhat bigger and without Horns, but having their Legs without Joints, so that when they took their rest, they neither sat nor lay upon the ground, but leaned against Trees; and if they chanced to fall could not rise again. The Hunters therefore, to catch them, were wont either to undermine or so far cut the Trees, that with their weight, leaning upon them, they might bear them down and fall with them. And who would not but give money now to see this rare sort of Beast?

Cæsar visits Germany.

Ambiorix defeated.

90. But Cæsar thought fit to return, and no further pursue the Suevi; but to leave some terror behind him, he cut down part of the Bridge next to the Ubi, the length of two hundred foot, and in the end of that which remained built a Tower of four stories, and left a Garrison of twelve Cohorts with young C. Volcatius Tullus to defend it. He himself, as the Corn ripened, went forward to the war of Ambiorix, by way of the Wood of Arduenna, the greatest in Gall, extending from the Banks of the Rhine, and the Confines of the Treviri, to the Seat of the Nervii, and carrying a breadth of five hundred miles. He sent before him L. Minutius Bassus with all the Cavalry, who surprized Ambiorix, and took all his Horses and Chariots; but he himself escaped on Horseback, being assisted in his flight by the Woods, that were about his House; for the Galls to avoid heat did commonly build near to Woods and Rivers. The People had by Ambiorix his advice betaken themselves into Woods, Bogs, Islands and other places of Refuge. Catuvolcus King of one part of the Eburones being drawn in by him, cursed him for it doing, and not able by reason of his age to undergo the trouble of War or Fight, drank the juice of Yew (whereof was great store in Gall and Germany) and poisoned himself.

91. The Eburones being so dispersed that Cæsar could do no good upon them, he gave notice to the Neighbouring Nations, that all men should have liberty to sack and make a spoil of their Country, for he durst not suffer the Legionary Soldiers to fragile from their Enigms. Upon the noise of this, the Sicambri dwelling in Germany next to the Rhine, sent over a Party of two thousand Horse, which

Señ. 6. got great booty, being bred and born in Theft and War. But being by one of the Captains informed, that in a place called Vatua the Romans had left all their Baggage; they took him for their Guide, and went also thither. For there Cæsar had placed it, having divided his Army into three Parties, and sent them to such Quarters as he thought convenient, he himself going to the River Scadis (now the Seilde) to hunt out Ambiorix, but with purpose to return after seven days. There he had left Q. Cicero with the fourteenth Legion newly raised, and two hundred Horse for a guard. Of these, five Cohorts went out to gather Forage with three hundred old Soldiers that had been left, became infirm. The Sicanuri having first attempted to break into the Camp, fell upon these Romans as they returned. And they cut off most of them that belonged to the Cohorts, being raw and unexperienced, but the old Soldiers so discreetly ordered their matters, that they brake through their Enemies and got to the Camp. The Sicanuri now out of hope to take the Camp, returned with their Booty over the Rhine, and Cæsar also returned seasonably; for the Soldiers were in such fear, that they would not believe but that the Legions were cut off. The Country being most grievously depopulated he brought his Army back to Duro cornum in the State of the Renni, where an Assembly was called to question the conspiracy of the Senones and Carnutes. By order taken therein, Deco the great Ringleader was put to death, as others had been, and they not escaped. This done, Cæsar dispersed his Troops into their Wintering Camps, and having made provision of Corn went into Italy, to hold the Assemblies as he was wont.

Acta put to death.

Sirs in the City.

92. Now with Cæsar let us make for Italy, a step further than his Journey, to Rome it self. There we shall find him deeply concerned while he was fighting with the Galli; for, his Daughter Julia, the Wife of Pompey, while he was thus employed, died in Childbed, and the Infant with her. Hereby was the Bond of Friendship betwixt them dissolved, and their mutual emulation and envy which thereby had been restrained, now wanted but an occasion to vent it self. The following year produced great fits in the City, and those no less in Gall. For now were the times so altered, that Rome could not be found in Rome. Nothing was managed by ancient equity and moderation, all Offices were purchased by Money, or else by Stones, Clubs, or Swords; and the inconveniences of popular Government now grew ripe, the name of a Free-State, or Commonwealth, covering the greatest injustice, disorder, and oppression of the Peoples Liberty. The Consuls being debarred by the power of the Triumvirina from leading out Armies, or waging Wars according to the ancient right and custom, made up their Markets out of the publick Revenue, or their Offices by indirect practices, and therefore none of honour would seek after the Consulship. Pompey connived at this, hoping that a necessity of affairs would draw upon him the Dictatorship, as some of his Creatures, though not in his name, did not stick to hint. This year especially was there such an horrid contention amongst the Candidates (all or most men of large Consciences) that for a long time no Consul could be elected; and this heightened the matter, that T. Annius Milo, one of them, being at great enmity with Clodius, killed him as he met him in the way not far from the City. This fact the People ill repented, and naughty, and dissolute persons, under pretence of searching for Milo's Friends, committed many outrages in Rome. This turned indeed all mens eyes upon Pompey, as the fittest person to redress those evils; but whilst they thought of making him Dictator, Cato drew the Senate to this resolution, that he should be made Consul alone, that he might be called to an account for his male administration if need were, and so he was made sole Consul, without any Precedent at all. First, he sat in Judgement alone, and examined Milo's case; he also made inquisition after such as had by indirect means procured Offices. Milo was defended by Cicero, or rather should have been; for the Orator was so terrified by Pompey's Soldiers, and Clodius his Friends, that he could not proceed, and is therefore said to have written that Oration afterwards, which is now extant. Milo then was banished, with several others for other Crimes. Pompey having hitherto as it were executed the Office of Dictator, took to him a Colleague, Q. Scipio Metellus, whose Daughter Cornelia he had married. These things being heard in the further Gall, and a rumour spread that Cæsar, who was now in Italy, would be there retained by the motions in the City, many of the Natives conspired for the recovery of their liberty, and chose Percingetorix for their Captain.

Milo killed Clodius.

Pompey made Consul alone. His Acts.

The Galli hearing of these things rebel.

93. Cæsar in Italy heard of the death of Clodius, and of a Decree made by the Senate touching the Assembly of the young Soldiers of that Country; whereupon he resolved to raise Men in all the Provinces. The Gallies hearing of these things, added other rumours, and that Cæsar, detained by troubles at Rome, could not return to his Army. They stirred up one another now to make halt, and recover their ancient liberty: And the Senones made themselves the chief of the War, and for fear of discovery, not daring to take and receive Hostages, they strengthened their Covens by Oaths and mutual Collation of their Military Engines, the most religious and binding Ceremony amongst them; and the Carnutes began the work by falling upon some Roman Citizens that lay about their own concerns at Orvium, whom they slew, and seized their Goods. The report thereof was quickly spread throughout Gall, by that ordinary means whereby they were wont to signify any extraordinary matter. It was by an out-cri and shout, which begun by some, was taken by others, and delivered to the next; and so went from one to another so speedily, that what was done at Genabum at Sun-rising, was before the first Watch of the night heard in the Confines of the Arvern, which was above one hundred and threescore Miles.

The Galli begin revolt.

94. In like manner Percingetorix, of the Nation of the Arvern, being the Son of Celtillus, and named King by his People, though they had slain his father for attempting to set up a Kingdom, persuaded them to revolt, and though opposed and cast out of the Town of Gergovia by his Uncle Gabinius, and those of the contrary Party, got together a great Force, and expelled his Adversaries by whom he had been cast out. The Senones, the Parisi, Pitones, Cadurci, the Arvernes, Aulerci, Lutetici, Andes, and all the rest that bordered upon the Ocean quickly joyned in confederacy with him. He took Hostages of them, rated every City, and made ravillion of Horse especially. To extraordinary diligence he added extraordinary severity, and the Bituriges sided with him, their Patrons the Adui having in vain attempted to protect them from him. Besides this, Unedris, one of the Cadurci, unadvised the Ruteni to the Arvern, and further proceeding, received Hostages from the Mittibriges, and the Gabali, and laboured to break into the Roman Province, and proceed toward Narbo.

95. Cæsar having heard these things in Italy, as soon as he understood that matters were brought into better state in Rome by the means of Pompey, made what haste he could, and understanding in his Passage of Lugetarius his Design, went himself to Narbo, and prevented him. He marched to the Helonii, and thence over the Hill Gebenna, though the Snow was five foot deep, into the Confines of the Arvern, who therewith exceedingly surprized, betook themselves for succour to Percingetorix. Knowing what Percingetorix would do, with wonderful celerity, he passed to the Lingones, and got the Legions together before the Arverni could have any notice of it. This being known, Percingetorix laid siege to Gergovia, a Town held by the Baii, whom Cæsar had left there after the Helvetian War, and given the Jurisdiction of the Place to the Adui. Cæsar was now in perplexity, whether he should attempt to assault the Friends of Rome, or by drawing out his Army from its Winter Quarters sooner than ordinary, expose it to hardships and danger for want of the usual Provisions.

Cæsar takes Noviodunum.

96. But resolving to adventure all hazards, rather than desert his Allies in their necessity, he sent Orders to the Adui to make supply of all necessaries as far as possible, and by a Message encouraged the Baii with news of his coming. In his Passage he took by surrender Vellaunodunum, a Town of the Senones. Genabum, now Orleans, was a City of the Carnutes upon Ligeris, over which lying a Bridge, the Townsmen were about to pass over it, and escape by night; but he being aware of it, had appointed two Legions to watch, who burnt the Gate, took the Place, with most of the People, set it on fire, and sacked it; which done, he passed over into the Territories of the Bituriges. There he resolved to become Master of Noviodunum (now Vierçon), and when he was about it, Percingetorix his Forces went themselves, who having heard of his March, left the Siege of Gergovia, and thence to meet him. But he sent out first his own Horse to charge them, and then four hundred Germans, who put the Gallies to flight, and many of them being slain, the rest retired to the Army. Hereupon the Townsmen yielded, having delivered those that stirred up the People unto Cæsar.

The Galli wait their Country.

97. Percingetorix, upon so many losses received, with much ado persuaded the Gallies to lay wait their Country, to cut off all forage from the Romans, and to prevent their taking refuge in any Towns, to burn them all; and none escaped but Avaricum, (now Bourges) at that time the fairest City in Gall; inclosed with a River and

Sect. 6. and a Bog, which the Bituriges, prostrating themselves at the feet of all the Gallæ, desired and obtained to defend. Cæsar, after the taking of Noviodunum, resolved to attempt this Place, and accordingly sat down before it, and made preparations for an Assault in that narrow place, where it was approachable. Vercingetorix followed and incamped himself fifteen Miles off to intercept all the Foragers he could. And Cæsar was really distressed for want of Corn, and the Army subsisted merely by Cattel fetcht afar off, which made him offer to the Legions to raise the Siege, but they stoutly and generously refused. To remove this distress, he himself left the Siege, and attempted to surprize the Enemy; but by reason that he had placed himself upon a convenient ground; not willing to expose his Men to danger in such disadvantages, he retreated without any thing done, and gave order for re-inforcing the Siege of the Town. And the Gallæ took as great care to fortify it, by the addition of ten thousand Men chosen out of all their Forces. For being perswaded that it was their main business to make this Town good against the Romans; they thought it not fit to commit the common safety of Gall to the Bituriges.

98. And the Garrison all manner of ways possible defended the Place, both by mining the Mounts, erecting Towers, and making Sallies where and when the case required, being encouraged by the goodness of their Wall, which was framed so, both of Wood and Timber, that the Stone kept it from burning, and the Wood from the violence of the Rams. The Romans raised a Mount in the space of five and twenty days of three hundred and thirty foot in breadth, and four score in height. This Mount, when it began to touch the Wall, did the Besieged by a Mine set on fire, and great contest there was about it, till the fire was at length quenched by the Romans. The Besieged finding that nothing would do, but the Siege increased every day in vigour, resolved to quit the Town, and get through the Marish to Vercingetorix, but were hindered by the Women, who when they could not prevail with them to stay, cried out, and signified their flight to the Romans. Thereupon they desisted from their purpose. But Cæsar having perfected his Works, took the advantage when a Rain fell, and the Walls were slenderly mantled, to make an Assault, which the Legions carried on with that success, that they took the City, and made such slaughter in revenge for what had been done at Genabum, that sparing neither Sex nor Age, of forty thousand, or thereabouts, scarcely eight hundred came safe to Vercingetorix, who received them in the night with great silence, for fear of a Sedition through the commiseration of the People.

99. Vercingetorix comforted the Gallæ for the loss of Avaricum, by laying the blame upon the Bituriges, by calling them to witness, that the keeping of it was against his opinion, and telling them that he was in a way to unite all Gall together, and now he first perswaded them to be at the pains to fortify their Camp to prevent an Assault of the Romans. For the accomplishment of his Promise of uniting Gall, he omitted no endeavour, and commanding each State to send in their Supplies, and getting together all the Archers, of whom there was great store, he speedily repaired his losses at Avaricum. At this time arose a great controversy amongst the Ædii, about the election of their Annual Magistrate. There were two, of whom each pretended to be duly elected, Cotus and Comitolitanus, and the matter must come to a Civil War, if Cæsar did not take it up. Fearing the consequence might be otherwise bad, and that one Party might be drawn to side with the Gallæ against the Romans, he went and decided the Controversie in behalf of Comitolitanus, as legally chosen, and then marched by the River Elaver against the Arverni, and notwithstanding the watching and great diligence of Vercingetorix, having by a Bridge got over his Army, laid siege to Gergovia.

100. In the mean time Comitolitanus being corrupted by the Arverni, perswaded some young Noble-men to revolt from the Romans, and draw their State from the society with them, as Enemies to the liberty of Gall; and by lying stories told how the Romans had cut off their Brethren, the Princes, and some Horse-men, they induced ten thousand Men that were to be sent from the Ædii to Cæsar, to march for Gergovia, to join with the Arverni. Cæsar having notice of this from his friends, took along with him four expedite Legions, and met with the ten thousand Men, and shewing to them the Princes, whom they believed to be slain; when they saw they were abused, they cast down their Arms, and submitted. But their Countrymen not knowing thereof, and being led by covetousness, or by anger and rashness, robbed and killed divers Roman Merchants; for it was natural to the Nation to take a light Hear-say for a certain Truth. When they understood how things had gone, they then disowned what had passed, as wanting publick Authority; called to account count such as had robbed the Romans, exposed to sale the Goods of such as had been Authors of the Revolt, and sent their Ambassadors to Cæsar to excuse themselves. They they rather did to recover such of their Men as were in Cæsar's Hands, who though he understood well enough, that out of fear of punishment, and to avoid greater inconveniences, they under-hand studied how to raise a War, and solicited other States to a League and Alliance to that purpose, yet gave them good words, casting the blame upon the common People.

101. While Cæsar was absent, the Gallæ had violently assaulted the Camp before Gergovia, and put the two Legions to great extremity to defend it, till he, having received the News, made all hast imaginable, and arrived before the rising of the Sun. Fearing a greater Revolt of the Gallæ, and that he should be incompanied by them, he thought to raise his Siege and be gone, but his purpose was diverted by a discovery he made of an opportunity to advance the Service upon the Town. An Assault was made in pursuance of this Discovery, wherein the Romans were too hardy, and the Enemy so vigilant and industrious, that he over-charged them on all hands, to their loss of six and forty Centurions, after which they beat them off, and they feared their flight as well as they could, as well as Cæsar can make it, who confesseth, that few less than seven hundred of his Souldiers were wanting. But he tells us that the next day he rebuked his Army, forasmuch as they themselves judged how far they were to go, and what they were to do, neither would they stop upon founding a Retreat, nor hearken to the Tribunes or Legates that would have kept them back. Yet he attributed the success the Enemy had, not to his valour, but the inequality of the Ground and Place where they fought. To evidence this, he faith, he drew out the Legions several times, and skirmished successfully where the Ground was indifferent, and then thinking it sufficient to abate the pride of the Gallæ, and encourage his own Men, he removed his Camp into the Territories of the Ædii; the Enemy refusing to make after him. Yet still did the former Revolters amongst the Ædii so beset themselves, that for all this that State revolted; which Defection, procured by the means of Litavicus especially, was perfected by two other Noble-men, whom Cæsar had had with him, viz. Virdamarus and Eboracoris, who desired to be gone, under pretence of putting a stop to it; and Cæsar dismissed them, though he perceived their intentions, lest he should seem to be injurious, or give any suspicion of fear. They burnt and wasted the Country, and used other Arts to terrifie the Romans. Cæsar knowing he wasto use Expedition before all their Forces could unite, marched with incredible celerity, and got his Army over the Loire, (the Foot passing with their Arms and Shoulders above water) and having refreshed it with Corn and Cattle, resolved to march toward the Senones.

102. At this time Labienus, with four Legions, coming to Luétia, a Town of the Parisians, built in an Island in the River Sequana, (as Cæsar describes it) and being to pass the River, by making a show to attempt it in several places, deceived and divided the Enemy, and gave them a notable defeat. But, for all this, the Revolt of the Ædii being known; in a Council of all Gall assembled at Bibracte, Vercingetorix was chosen general, and the Ædii disappointed in their expectation of having the chief Command; so that if they had not been already engaged in the War, they would have thought again of Cæsar. He perceiving the Enemy to be stronger in Horse than himself, and the Passages to be so shut up, that he could not send into the Province nor Italy, procured Horses from such States in Germany as he had quickened the year before, with such light-arm Footmen as were used to fight amongst the Horse, whom he furnished with Horses he took from the Tribunes, the Roman Equestes, and the Boacuti. Resolving then to protect the Roman Province, Vercingetorix made Head against him, as having a notable opportunity; with his Horse, and perswading his Men that so indeed he had, they required that this Resolution might be strengthened with an holy Oath or Imprecation. Let him never be received under any Roof, nor have access to his Wife, Children or Parents, that did not twice Charge through the Army of the Enemy. The thing being approved, and every one forced to take the Oath, he divided his Cavalry into three parts, whereof two Bodies shewed themselves on either side, and the third began to oppose Cæsar's Front. Cæsar caused his Horse to be divided also into three Parties, and to charge the Gallæ, having received the Carriages within the Legions, which he so placed, as to succour the Horse upon occasion. The German having possessed themselves of an Hill, forced the Gallæ to give ground; and the advantage was so prosecuted, that all the Horse was routed, and many Prisoners taken of good note. After this Vercingetorix marched towards Alesia, a Town of the Mandubii, and Cæsar following him in his Rear, as long as the day would give leave, flew some three thousand of his Men, and, the next day following, incamped also before Alesia, which was sited on the top of an Hill, in a very eminent place, and not to be taken but by a continued Siege. At the foot of the Hill ran two Rivers on each side of the Town: Before the Town lay a Plain of three Miles in length: The other sides were inclosed with Hills, at a reasonable distance, of equal height with the Town.

103. Cæsar resolved to inclose the Town with a Ditch, and a Rampire, and the whole circuit contained eleven Miles. At the Camp, sited in a convenient place, were made three and twenty Castles, well manned both day and night. The Work being begun, there happened a Fight betwixt the Horse on both sides. The Romans were over-powered, till Cæsar sent the Germans to their Relief, and drew out the Legions for their Refuge, with which animated, they routed the Gallæ, and driving them back into their Camp, killed many, and took very many Horses. Vercingetorix upon this, thought best to dismiss all the Horse before the Fortifications were perfected by the Romans, and he sent them away in the night, every Man to repair to his own State, and to fend all to the War that were able to bear Arms, and to procure his safety who had so well deserved of them; but in case they were negligent, fourscore thousand Men he affirmed should perish with him in that place. He husbanded his Corn, which would serve, at the former rate, but thirty days, measuring it out sparingly; and the Cattel he delivered to the Soldiers by Poll, whereof there was great store brought from the Mandubii. All the Forces which he had placed before the Town he received within the Walls, and so purposed to attend the Supplies of Gall.

The prodigious Works of Cæsar.

104. Cæsar understanding this from Fugitives and Prisoners, took a prodigious course to fortify himself. He drew a Ditch of twenty foot in breadth, and depth, as broad at the bottom as the top. At forty foot distance from this he made two Ditches of fifteen foot in breadth and depth, the innermost whereof drawn through the Fields, and the lower ground he filled with Water out of the River. Behind them he made another Ditch, and a Rampire of twelve foot, which he strengthened with a Parapet and Pinacles, and with great boughs of Trees cut like to an Hart-Horn, which were set where the Hovels were joynted to the Rampire, to hinder the Enemy from climbing up. He made Towers round about the whole Work in the distance of fourscore foot one from another; and his design of having the distance of forty foot betwixt the Ditch first mentioned, and the other Work, was, that the whole Body of the Romans might not easily be inclosed with an Army, which he thought to prevent by taking in so great a circuit of ground, and left the Enemy, in a sudden Sally, should by night attempt to destroy the Works, or by day trouble the Soldiers by missile Weapons, as they were busied about the Fortifications.

105. But the Roman Forces being employed both in fetching Materials for the Works, and supply of Corn, were much weakened, and the Gallæ, by falling out of divers Ports, attempted to destroy the Works. That therefore the Fortifications might be made good with the less number of Men, he still thought fit to add unto them. He made Trenches round about them of five foot deep, wherein he planted either the Bodies of Trees, or great firm Boughs sharpened into many Pikes and Snags, and bound together at the bottom, that they might not be easily plucked up. There were of these five Ranks so combined and interlocked one in another, that which way soever the Enemy should enter upon them, he must necessarily run himself upon a sharp Stake. These they called Cippi, before which, in oblique courses, after the manner of a Quincunx were digged holes three foot deep, narrow at the top. These they set with round Stakes, of the bigness of a Mans Thigh, with sharp points hardened with fire, in such sort, that they stuck not above four fingers out of the Earth, and, for the better fastening of them, they stuck a foot within the ground; the rest of the Holes, for the better ordering of the matter, were hid with Officers, and brulby Wood. Of these were eight Courses, three foot distant one from another, and these they called Lilæ, from the resemblance they had to the Figure of that Flower. Before these were Galthrops of a foot long, fastened in the Earth, and headed with barbed Hooks of Iron, betowed up and down in all places at a reasonable distance; and these they called Stimuli. The inner Fortifications thus finished, he followed the level ground as much as the nature of the place would permit, taking in fourteen Miles in circuit, and made the like Fortifications in all Points against the Enemy without, as he had done against the Town; that if he were driven upon occasion to leave the Works, he might quit the Camp without danger, a few few Men being able to defend it. Things thus appointed, he commanded, that every Man should have in readiness Forrage and Provision of Corn for thirteen days.

106. In the mean time the Gallæ having summoned a Council of the Princes and chief Men of every State, resolved to raise an Army, but not as Vercingetorix advised, of all that were able to bear Arms, left the Multitude should be ungovernable, and want Provisions; but to proportion a number to every State. Of the Ædii, and their Clients the Segusiavi, Ambivariti, Aulerci, Brannovices, and Brannovii, they require five and thirty, or as some read, five and twenty thousand. Of the Arverni, and their Clients, the Helvetii, Cadurci, Gabali, and Vellavii, as many. Of the Senones, Segunni, Bituriges, Santonæ, Ruteni, Carnutes, twenty one (or two) thousand. Of the Bellovacæ ten thousand. As many of the Lemovices. Eight thousand of the Pisones, Turoni, Parisii. Of the Helvetii and Suessones eight thousand. Of the Ambiani, Mediomatrici, Petrocorii, Nervii, Morini, and Nitiobriges, five thousand. They required of the Aulerci, Cenomani, as many. Of the Atrebates four thousand. Of the Bello-Cassæ, Lexovii, Aulerci, Eburones, three thousand. Of the Rauraci and Boiothrice (some Copies have thirty) thousand. Of the States bordering upon the Ocean by the Custom of Gall, called Aremorice, as the Crisigolites, Redones, Ambibarii, Caletes, Offinii, Lemovices, Veneti, and Venedi, six thousand.

107. Such are the names of the States, and the number of Soldiers charged upon them, as we now find in Cæsar's Copies. But that the Text is corrupted, Monetus tells us, loudly inveighing against the Transcribers and Correctors of the Copies for bringing in such confusion into a few words written by Cæsar, and committing such mistakes in the Numbers. For the Names, that of Helvetii is contentious, there never having been such a People in Gall, no not in Europe. In stead of Helvetii he reads Hekui, who were Neighbours to the Vellavi and Arverni. He observes, that some People of these that are named are placed far from their own native and proper Seats. As the Ambivariti and Aulerci are here put as Neighbours and Clients of the Ædii, whereas they were far distant each from the other, and those were far from being Clients to, and joynted in society with them. For the Ambivariti were the same we now call Brabanters upon the Meuse. And the Aulerci, as now, were seated at the mouth of the Sequana, or Seine, partly that People called Cenomani, (or Manceaux) and partly Cimbrecæ, or Normans. Therefore for Ambivariti is to be read Ambarri, which was a Neighbouring People, and Clients to the Ædii, now divided into the Charolæ and Maconnais.

108. The Bogi he affirms ought not to be joynted with the Rauraci, but with the Segusiavi and Ambarri, with whom they were Clients of the Ædii, being seated in the Country of Bourbon, as it's now called, near the Segusiavi. More absurdly still are the Lemovices, by some ignorant Transcriber or Annotator put amongst the American States, or those upon the Ocean. For nothing is more erroneous in Geography, than that they, being a Mediterranean People, and situated Southward near the Pisones, an hundred French Leagues from the Ocean, should be placed in the Shore thereof amongst the Offinii and Venedi; from whom they are separated by two great Provinces of Poitiers and the American Britain. Instead of Lemovices, who are to be left in the place formerly assigned them in Cæsar's Enumeration, Eburones are rather to be read, the Country of whom lay by the Lexovii, at the mouth of the Seine. Further, whereas Aulerci and Cenomani are divided in this Enumeration, they ought not, but to be joynted together, being one and the same People. But this Error is too often committed in the Text of Cæsar, of severing the Cognomina of certain People from the Names themselves. For as Cenomani, Diablintes, (or Diablitæ) and Eburaci, or Eburvices, were the Cognomina of the Aulerci; (or Diablitæ) and Vibisii of the Bituriges. In like manner the Volce, one People, had several Cognomina, being from Narbon to the Rhone called Arecomici, and those of Tolose and toward the South Tectolages; and both by the Romans were called Provinciales, because of the Province of Narbon, proper to the Romans.

109. But yet further he observes, that Nations most distinct in situation and original, are in this Enumeration joynted for contributing Soldiers to this Social War. As the Ambivariti upon the Meuse, and the Segusiavi upon the Loire; the Senones seated at the Seine, and the Santonæ at the Garonne, the Pisones at the Western Ocean, and the Helvetii at the Rhine, and the Oriental Alps; the Suessones not far distant from the Northern Ocean, and the Nitiobriges not far from the Garonne, and the Mediterranean; the Caletes seated upon the very Shore of the Northern Sea, and the Lemovices toward the South near the Petrocorii. How he at large amends this place, and endeavours to restore it to itself, is too tedious here to show though from what we have said already it receiveth light. As to numbers of Soldiers, what is more incredible, he demands, than that upon the Bos and Rauraci should be imposed thirty thousand Men, as some Copies have it, and upon the Bello-Cassi, Lexovii and Eburones, populous Nations, no more than three thousand; upon the Suessiones, Ambrini, Nervi, Morini, Mediomatrici, Petrocorii, and Nitiobriges, seven powerful People, but five thousand men; and as many upon the Centomani alone, a People contained in narrow Bounds? Other Instances of the like in-equality might be made.

The Generals of the Gallæ.

110. But whatsoever these Numbers were, the Bellovaci refused to give theirs, declaring that they would not serve under any Man's command, or make War in any other than their own Name. Yet Comius, one of the Atrabates, persuaded them to fend two thousand Men, which Comius having served Cæsar faithfully in Britain, had been rewarded by him, by freeing his State from all Duties to the Roman Empire, restoring them to their ancient Laws, and by giving to him the Morini. But he would not for all this be wanting to the general content of Gall, now bent to redeem its liberty and reputation in War. Having already mustered eight thousand Horse, and two hundred and forty thousand foot in the Confines of the Ædui, they gaveth Command to Comius of Aræ, Vindomarus and Eporodorus, both Ædui, and Vergisilaenus of the Arverni, the Cousin-german of Vercingetorix; and as well Officers as Soldiers were full of hope, in consideration of their Numbers both within and without Alesia, whither they marched.

The Resolution of such as were besieged in Alesia.

111. In the mean time they that were besieged in the Town, the day being past by which they expected relief, knew not what course to take. Some were for a Surrendry, and others for Sallics to be made upon the Enemy; but above all, the Speech of Critognatus, a Nobleman of the Arverni, was so remarkable for its singular and nefarious cruelty, that Cæsar thought fit to give an account of it in his Commentaries. The Design of it was to persuade them to hold out as their Fore-fathers did in a War against the Cimbri and Teutones, who being shut up within their Towns, and brought to the like necessity, satisfied their hunger with the Bodies of such as were unfit for War; neither did they yield themselves to the Enemy. Nay if they had not had such an Example, he would have it begun now, and to be left to Posterity, no War being like to this. For, the Cimbri left the Country, and the Laws and Liberties all intire, whereas the Romans would bring them to slavery and bondage, as they had sufficient evidence by the manner wherein they treated already that part of Gall which they had reduced into a Province. Having delivered their several Opinions, they resolved, that such as through Age, or other Infirmities, were unfit for War, should depart the Town, and that they should try all means before they yielded to Critognatus his opinion: and yet if the matter so required, to consent unto it; and to attend their Succours, rather than yield to any surrender or condition of Peace.

The Gallæ repulled.

112. However, in the mean time the Mandubrii, who had received the Army into their Town, were themselves thrust out with their Wives and Children, and coming to the Roman Trenches, desired with Tears to be received and nourished with Bread, though on condition of slavery, but Cæsar rejected them. Now all the Gallick Forces came to the relief of Alesia, and though they appeared so numerous, yet Cæsar drew out his Horse, and caused it to engage the Enemy. Herein he had the better, by means of the Germani; but was attacked both by them that were newly arrived, and those in the Town, who with Hurdles endeavourd to fill up the Ditches, and with other Instruments of a Siege to scale the Works, but were forced to retire with loss; for, some fell unwittingly upon the Gathrops, others falling into the Holes, were struck through their Bodies with sharp Stakes, and others died by Mural Piles cast from the Rampire, and the Towers. Being repelled twice with great loss, they fell into consideration what course they were best to take, advising with them that were best acquainted with the Nature and situation of the Place.

113. This done, the Captains chose out sixty thousand of those States, which had the greatest repute for courage, and attacked the Roman Camp at the declivity of an Hill, where they might best master the Works, giving diversion at the same time in other places. But the Industry and Fortune of Cæsar surmounted all difficulties, by sending Supplies where there was need, and being assisted by the conduct of Labienus, who having got together thirty nine Cohorts, charged the Enemy with great execution. Threecore and fourteen Ensigns were taken and brought to Cæsar, and very few of so great a number returned safe into their Camp. They in the Town, discouraged, drew back their Forces from the Works, which being known, the Gallæ presently presently fled out of the Camp, and if the Soldiers had not been wearied, they might easily, in the opinion of the Conqueror, have destroyed all their Enemies. However, the Horse being sent out about mid-night to fall upon the Reer, flew and took a great number. The next day Vercingetorix, calling a Council, told them he had not undertaken the War for his own Interest, but for the common concern, and publick liberty; and seeing they must necessarily yield to fortune, he offered either to satisfy the Romans by his Death, or to be delivered up to them alive. Ambassadors were sent to Cæsar, and upon his Command the Captains were brought to him, sitting in the Fortifications before the Camp, and Vercingetorix amongst the rest, with whom their Weapons were delivered. The Ædui and Arverni being reserved, of whom he dismissed twenty thousand Captives of the rest he gave throughout the Army every Man a Prisoner by way of booty. He marched to the Ædui, and received them, having been so kind to them and the Arverni, out of hopes by their means to bring in other States. Thither did the Arverni send their Ambassadors, and promised to obey his Orders. He required a great number of Hostages, and sent the Legions into their wintering Camps: He himself determined to winter at Augustodunum or Bibracte. The Achievements of this year being known at Rome, a Supplication for twenty days was enjoined.

114. Such account Cæsar himself gives of this Action before Alesia, and therewith concludes his Commentaries of his Wars in Gall. His Works and Fortifications being such as he describes them, though in down-right Language, without ornament of Rhetoric, hath stupified all Readers with admiration, as too great for a Man to effect. The single Work to encompass the Town was wonderful; but doubled with another without to keep the Gallæ from raising the Siege doth double the wonder. Hereby he did besiege, and was besieged, took the Town, and overthrew the Enemy in the Field. The Gallæ in this War were acted by a natural and generous heat to preserve the liberty of their Country, though they failed therein, and the unfaithfulness of any of them in not standing to their former Engagements cannot be excused. Above all others Vercingetorix was remarkable both for his Valour and Conduct, the manner of whose delivery Plutarch describeth. Being armed at all Points, mounted on an Horse, and furnished with a rich Caparison, he came to Cæsar, and rode about him, as he sat in his Chair of State; then lighting, he took off his Caparison and Furniture, and disarming himself, laid all on the ground, and went and fate down at his feet, and said never a word. Cæsar at length committed him as a Prisoner of War to be led as a Captive in his Triumph, which the Civil Wars prevented.

115. Florus also writes of his coming as a Supplicant to the Camp, and casting down his Ornaments and Arms before Cæsar's Knees with these words: Take them, thou hast overcome a Valiant Man, O Man most valiant! But where this Camp was, this Writer was vilely mistaken. You have heard Cæsar all along tell his own story. Certainly he knew what Town it was he took, and about the Siege of which the great stress of the War lay. He himself saith it was Alesia, but Florus writes that it was Gergovia, a Town of the Arverni; that here it was where so great Munitions were raised; where Vercingetorix was taken, and the War being in a manner finished, all Gall was reduced to the obedience of the Romans. Now could Cæsar be ignorant what Towns he took, or which he was forced to quit? (as he did Gergovia) and two hundred years almost after his death Florus must undertake to correct what he had written. But this he did out of his forgetfulness, or rather his impudence, in falsifying History, according to his Custom, as we cannot but observe upon occasion.

116. Roman Writers speak of Gall as now subdued; but for all that, Cæsar could not pass the Winter in quiet; though having rested no part of the former Summer, he was desirous to refresh his Soldiers. For the Gallæ concluded, that though the Roman Army could not be mastered in one place, and altogether; yet if they raised Commotions in divers places; Cæsar should not be able to prosecute all at once. To prevent the effect of this Consultation, Cæsar leaving M. Antonius with charge of his Winter Garrisons, with all speed invaded the Bituriges, and making no usual signs of an Invasion, by Fires prevented all relief which one City could afford unto another, and thereby surprizing many thousands of such as lay in the Fields, constrained them to submit. He drove the Carnutes to great extremity, by forcing them into the Woods in the violence of cold weather; from which not able to defend themselves, they were scattered abroad, and with the loss of a great part of them, disappeared into the neighbouring Cities.

117. This, notwithstanding the Bellovaci, under the conduct of Corbeus and Comius the Atrabition, levied Men, with resolution to invade the Suessones. Cæsar thinking not only his Honour, but his security concerned to save his Allies, which had well deserved of the Common-wealth, with three Legions marched against them. The Gallæ he found seated on the higher ground, from which they would not defend, notwithstanding the smallness of the number of the Romans compared with theirs; and Cæsar considering their multitudes, would not attack them with such disadvantages, but strongly fortified himself to make them believe he was fearful, and thereby to draw them down to Battle. Yet were told that he saw it necessary to send for three Legions more, the coming of which while he expected, the Enemy defeated by an Ambush a Party of the Rhemi, which was appointed to guard the Foragers, and killed Vertigo the Prince of their State, and Captain of their Horse, while, though an old Man, and scarcely able to sit on Horse-back, he too greedily pursued them. And on the other side the Germani, whom Cæsar had sent for from beyond the Rhine to fight, intermingled with his Horse-men, boldly passed the Marsh that lay between the Camps, and routed such flying Parties of the Gallæ as they could meet.

118. The Gallæ, upon hearing of the coming of more Legions, were discouraged, and sent away by night with their Carriages such among them as were infirm or wanted Arms, fearing such another Siege as had been at Alafia. Cæsar perceiving they would all be gone, and that the Marsh would hinder the Pursuit, made Bridges over it, and possessed himself of a ridge of an Hill which ran betwixt the Marsh and the Enemies Camp; and so ordered his Battle, that thence the Engines might play amongst the thickest of them. They being fearful to stay, and not knowing how to secure their retreat from Cæsar, who stood ready to pursue them, cast up a great heap of Faggots betwixt the two Camps, and set them on fire, thereby to intercept his sight when they fled, and that with such success, that though he sent out the Horse after them, as suspecting their Design, yet his Men were afraid to venture into the thick flame and smoke, and the Bellovaci escaped to a place ten Miles off; whence, by laying Ambushes both of Horse and Foot in divers places, they did the Romans great displeasure in their foraging. Corbeus chose out of his whole Army six thousand Foot, and lay in Ambush with them in a place so uncompacted with a River and Woods, that the Romans coming thither should be taken as in a Toile. But Cæsar by a Captive got notice of it, and sent his Horse-men to the place, to ordering his matters, that being readily attacked by the Enemy, they were succoured first by light Foot-men, and he himself was presently at hand with his Legions. Upon knowledge hereof the Gallæ would have fled, but could not, being themselves caught in the trap they had laid for the Romans. Yet they adventured to enter the River, and the Woods, but were all overtaken and slain; and Corbeus refusing quarter, but fighting and hurting many Men, exasperated therewith the Victors so much, that they could not forbear to throw their Darts at him, and dispatch him.

119. By some few that escaped through the Woods, the Gallæ incamped at eight Miles distance, perceived the misery they were in, for Cæsar would be suddenly upon them; they called a Council by sound of Trumpet, and sent their Ambassadors to him, to whom they accused Corbeus, as Author of the Revolt. Cæsar told them it was an easy matter to cast the blame upon the dead; and he put them in mind how the Bellovaci had stood most stiffly in their opinion, and would not be reduced, when the other States had submitted. Nevertheless he was satisfied with the punishment which they had brought upon themselves; for they lamented, that besides the loss of their Horse-men, many thousands of their choicest Foot were cut off, scarcely any escaping to bring tidings of the slaughter. The rest of the States having staid to see what success they would have, when they saw that they were admitted to give hostages, submitted themselves, and did so too; only Comius having, upon his revolt from Cæsar, been almost assassinated by procurement of Labienu would trust his life with no Man, but kept himself with the Germani, whom he had procured to assist in the War. Cæsar perceived that no Nation now stood against him, the most warlike being subdued. And therefore he disposed of his Forces into several parts of Gallæ. He himself invaded the Country of Ambiorix, which he harassed with Fire and Sword, on purpose to make him hated by his People. Having slain, and taken Prisoners a great number of Men, he sent Labienu with two Legions amongst the Treviri, the Country of whom, by reason of its nearness to Germani, being daily injured to War, was not much unlike it in rudeness and savageness of its Inhabitants. Neither did they obey Cæsar's Commands at any time longer than he had an Army in their Country to compel them.

Sect. 6.

120. In the mean time a new War was raised in the Territories of the Pistones, a part of which State renounced their obedience. But they were happily reduced by C. Fabius, who before had received many Cities by composition, and now in an encounter caused the death of above twelve thousand Men; after which he went against the Carnutes, and the other States, the power of whom he knew to be crushed by that overthrow. Giving them no respite, he speedily brought them to submission; for the Carnutes, who, though often before roughly handled, yet would never listen to peace, now gave hostages, and submitted. And besides them, the Aremorian States following their example, upon the coming of Fabius with his Legions among them, received his Command without delay. Drapec, one of the Senones, and Luterius of the Cadurci, having escaped from the Battle, fled toward the Province, and were pursued by Cæsar the Legate with two Legions. Perceiving that they could not upon his approach enter the Province without danger, they took Uxellodunum, a Town of the Cadurci, excellently well fortified by its situation. Hence, as they went to gather Forage, Cæsar fell upon them, and quite defeated their Forces, which done, he sat down before the Town, and Fabius the next day came to his assistance.

121. Ere this, Cæsar having left M. Antonius the Quæstor with fifteen Cohorts among the Bellovaci, to prevent new Confederacies, visited the other States, and charged them with more hostages; but encouraged them with comfortable words. Yet when he came amongst the Carnutes, he demanded Enturatus, as Author of their Revolt, to be given up into his Hands, and Hirtius tells us, he was compelled by his Soldiers to punish him, who imputed to him all the dangers and losses they had sustained by the War; so that being in a manner scourged to death, he was beheaded. Having received information from Cæsar, how Drapec and Luterius were defeated, and that the Town-men stood it out, he resolved to go and punish them too, lest occasion should be given to the rest of the Gallæ to think that they wanted not strength, but constancy and resolution to withstand the Romans, and other Cities trusting to the strength of their situation, and encouraged by their Example, should attempt to recover their liberty. For he was sensible that all the Gallæ knew his Power was to continue but one Summer longer; which if they could weather out, they thought they should need to fear no danger after. Coming beyond all expectation before the Town, he presently saw there was no means to conquer it, but by cutting off the Water. For a River ran below the high Hill on which it stood, and a Spring of Water gushed out under the Walls; with much labour and expence of Blood he caused Batteries to be planted, and drove them both from River and Fountain. They set fire to his Works, and by a Sally hindered him from quenching it. To divert them he resolved to assault the Town, which apprehension caused them to retreat. And at length, by Mines, he diverted the course of the Spring another way; with which they were so daunted, that thinking it above the wit of Man, and to have been effected by the Gods, they yielded themselves. Cæsar judging that his clemency was sufficiently known, and could receive no blemish from one Act of severity, for an Example to others, cut off the right Hands of all such that were able to bear Arms.

122. While Cæsar was thus employed, Labienu warred prosperously against the Treviri; of them he slew many, as also of the Germani, who were ready to assist any Man against the Romans. Cæsar having conquered, and subdued Gallæ Celticæ, and also Belgica, but never all this while visited Aquitania, further than that he had made a kind of entrance into it by certain Victories obtained by P. Crassus, with two Legions marched thither with intent to bestow there the latter part of the Summer, and that he did also with such success, that all the States thereof sent unto him, and gave him hostages. This done, he went with his Horse-guard to Narbon, and disposed of his Foot into wintering places, so as no part of Gallæ was without an Army. Having staid a few days in the Province, and inquired how every Man had behaved himself during the general Rebellion of Gallæ, which he had overcome by the faithfulness and assistance of the said Province, he returned to his Legions into Belgium, and wintered at Nemetocenna. In the mean time Comius the Atrabian lived by robbing and intercepting such Provisions as were carried to the Roman Camps. Against him M. Antonius sent out C. Volusenus, whom he encountered, and wounded dangerously in the Thigh, but the Roman Horse, out of indignation that their Commander was wounded, enforced the Fight with such violence, that Comius his Party was routed. And though he himself escaped, yet he thought it best to submit, and offer hostages; which Antony received, and besides pardoning him, granted him

Sect. 6. his request, that he should not come into the sight of any Roman, which resolution he had taken, upon the danger he had formerly elapsed.

123. Cæsar, being come into Belgium, bent his Endeavours to this end, that at his departure, and withdrawing of his Army, he should not be constrained to have War, and leave troubles behind him. He therefore took this course, to treat the several States obligingly, by highly rewarding the Noble-men, and by burdening the Country with no new Impositions, by which means he easily kept it quiet, now tired out with many unfortunate Battels; for so long as a lence of the miseries of War remains upon an harassed People, they listen not to their turbulent and unquiet families; but when that is off, they return to their whim again, which is wont to come upon them no otherwise than the fits of an Ague at Terms and Periods. Winter being over, Cæsar, contrary to his custom, halted into Italy, his chief business being to commend to the Municipal Towns and Colonies the Suit of his Quæstor M. Antony for the Priesthood. He had sent him before to sue for that promotion, and made all the Friends he could; and was now so far engaged, that some few Men were grown factious and troublesome about it, and by putting Antony beside his purpose, sought to disparage Cæsar now going out of his Command.

124. Yet before he came near Italy, he understood that Antony was made Augur. Notwithstanding he thought fit to visit the Towns and Colonies, to give them thanks for their appearing for him, and to recommend to them his own business. For, he intended to sue for the Consulship himself for the following year, being concerned that his Adversaries made their brags that L. Lentulus and C. Marcellus had been advanced to that dignity to deprive him of all Honour and Authority, and that it was wrested from Sergius Galba, though he had more Voices on his side, because he was a familiar friend of Cæsar, and had been his Legate. He was received with extraordinary affection and respect, upon this his first coming from the Wars in Gall. For nothing was omitted which they could devise for the adorning of their Gates, Ways, and Places where he was to pass. The People with their Children met him on the Road, Sacrifices were every where offered, the Temples and Forums were hanged with Tapestry, and, as if some great Triumph had been provided for, great expence was made by the Richer, and great Expressions by the meaner sort.

125. Having lightly passed through the Countries of Gallia Togata, he returned with all speed to his Army at Nemetocenna, and called all his Legions out of their Winter Quarters into that of the Treviri, where he mustered them. Of Gallia Togata he made Labiennus Governour, thereby to obtain more favour and furtherance in his Suit for the Consulship. He heard oftentimes that Labiennus was solicited strongly by his Enemies; and was informed, that by the prevalence of a small Faction, it was carried in the Senate to take away from him part of his Army; yet would he not give credit to any thing said of Labiennus, nor would be drawn to act contrary to the Authority of the Senate, believing, that if the Members thereof might have freedom of Voice, he should easily obtain what he desired. For C. Curio, Tribune of the People, had often professed, that if any were terrified by the Army of Cæsar, forasmuch as the Power of Pompey kept other Persons as much in awe, both of them should disband their Armies, and so the City be free to use her own right as she pleased. The Senate was just and civil enough to him, as appeared both at this time and the year before, when Marcellus, opposing his Dignity contrary to the Law of Pompey and Crassus, brought in a Bill for his discharge, before the time of his Authority was expired. Yet did not this discourage his Enemies, but rather excited them to make good their Party, and compel the Senate to approve of what they had determined.

126. Hereupon it was resolved, that Pompey should send one Legion, and Cæsar another, to the War against the Parthians. But Hirtius tells us, it was easily discerned that both these Legions were taken from Cæsar; for, the first Legion Pompey had sent unto Cæsar, and given it him as out of his own Number, being levied in the Province. Yet did Cæsar, though no Man doubted but that he was weakened at the pleasure of his Enemies, send Pompey his Legion again, and of his own Forces he ordered the fifteenth Legion which he had in Gall within the Alps, to be delivered according to the Decree of the Senate. And in the room thereof he sent the thirteenth into Italy, to lie in Garrison in the same place whence the other was drawn. Now did he place his Army in its Winter Quarters amongst the Belge and Adni, as the best way to keep Gall in quiet, the former being the most valiant, and the latter of greatest Authority. Then took he his Journey into Italy, whither when come, he underunderstood that the two Legions which he had dismissed to be according to the Decree of the Senate employed in the Parthian War, were by Marcellus the Consul delivered to Pompey, and kept still in Italy. By this dealing was sufficiently evident what was intended against Cæsar. Yet he determined to take all things patiently, as long as there was hope of determining the controversy rather by Law than by the Sword.

SECT. VII.

Containing the History of the Civil War betwixt Cæsar and Pompey, to the Absoluteness of Julius Cæsar.

The space of five years.

1. Such is the account which Hirtius, or whoever wrote the eighth Commentary of the Gallick War, giveth us of the beginning of the Civil war betwixt these great Persons; but it is our part to enquire farther into the original of it. For whoever was the Author of that Book, who wrote moreover Commentaries of the Wars of Alexandria, Africa, and Spain, till the Death of Cæsar, was no small a Friend and Admirer of him. In his Preface he tells his Balbus by whose daily Admonition he was constrained to write, that though all that read the Writings of Cæsar admired them as well as he, yet he had more reason to do it than others, because they considered only in them the purity of Phrase, and excellency of Style; whereas he who knew with what facility and expedition he wrote, had a more particular Subject of Admiration. He was it seems present at the Gallick War, and for the General had very great Honour and Respect; but he had not so much reason and opportunity to understand the Intrigues relating to the Civil; neither was he possibly willing to reflect upon Cæsar, as, or where he did deserve.

Hirtius favourable to Cæsar.

The grounds and occasions of the Civil Wars betwixt Pompey and Cæsar.

2. The Truth is, Cæsar's carriage, especially in his Consulship, had rendered him very distastful to the Senate. Pompey on the other side, by his fair demeanour, had of late gained much upon it, which Cæsar being aware of desired leave to stand for a second Consulship in his absence. This was granted him; but he, fearing the malice of his Adversaries in case he were reduced to a private condition, further importuned the Fathers that he might have his Government of Gall prorogued, casting about all manner of ways to keep his Army till he should be Consul. This was hindered by Marcellus the Consul, who had succeeded Pompey; whereupon Cæsar laying his hand upon his Sword, said, That that should obtain it for him. This Marcellus was very bitter against him, pressing hard that a Successor should be sent him; but this was crooked by Pompey, either out of good nature, or policy. Such were designed Consuls for the ensuing year, as were most opposite to Cæsar, viz. L. Æmilius Paulus, and C. Claudius Marcellus, Nephew to the former Consul by his Brother: Curio also, an inveterate Enemy of Cæsar, was made Tribune. Yet all these, except Claudius, were drawn aside by Money; Paulus by fifteen hundred Talents, and Curio, who was much indebted, by one hundred thousand Seสเตอร์. Marcellus then urging, that a Successor was to be sent to Cæsar, Curio stiffly withstood it, alleging, that then ought Pompey also to dismiss his Army; for that his power was equally dangerous to the public liberty. Pompey outwardly seemed willing, and said he would disband his Men; but Curio fell foul upon him, telling him, that promise without performance was nothing; and that he might seem to stand for the good of the Commonwealth, and not curry favour with Cæsar, he desired, that if they both refused to disband, they should, the one as well as the other, be declared Enemies to the State.

3. Pompey exceedingly nettled heretofore, threatened him; but he ceased not to urge the thing. The Senate could have withstood them both reduced, but feared to disband Pompey's Army, looking upon Cæsar as the more dangerous person. Pompey sent now to him for the Legion he had lent him, two being ordered into Syria to defend the Eastern Parts now in danger by the overthrow of Crassus; he sent him this Legion, and another of his own; but there being no need or them in Syria, they wintered at Capua. Those that brought them into Italy did ill Offices for Cæsar, and gave out, as if his Army at his return would all revolt, which though very false,

Sect. 7. was believed by Pompey, who thereupon neglected to provide for so dangerous a War as followed. The next year C. Claudius Marcellus and L. Corn. Lentulus were Consuls, and it was propounded to the Senate, whether both Pompey and Cæsar should lay down all Power. Though once it was carried that Cæsar only should, when the Consul propounded it severally, yet *Curio again putting it to the question, it was carried against both by three hundred and forty eight Voices. Hereat the Consuls enraged, left the City, and gave Pompey power as from themselves to fight for his Country against Cæsar, which he feared not altogether to approve. Now Curio perceiving himself in danger, and that he could do no more service for Cæsar, fled unto him.

4. Cæsar himself tells us, that all things were carried impetuously and confusedly; that leisure was not given to his Friends to advertise him, nor yet to the Tribunes to avoid the danger falling upon them, nor to use the Right of opposition left unto them by Sylla; but within seven days after they were entered into their Office, they were forced to shift for their safety, notwithstanding the most turbulent and factious Tribunes of former times were never put to look into their Affairs, nor give account of their Actions before the eighth Month. In the end they betook themselves to that extremest Act of Senate, which was never made but when the City was upon the Point of burning, or in the desperate estate of the Common-wealth: Let the Consuls, Prætors, Tribuni Plebis, and such Proconsuls as are about the City, do their endeavour that the Common-wealth receive no detriment. This Senatus-consultum was made on the seventh of the Ides of January; so that in the five first days in which the Senate might sit, after that Lentulus had entered the Consulship, the two Comitial days excepted, most heavy and bitter Decrees were made against the Power of Cæsar, and against the Tribunes of the People, famous and worthy Men, who thereupon fled presently out of the City, and came to him, who being then at Ravenna attended an Answer to his easie and modest demands; if by any reasonable course matters might be drawn to a peaceable conclusion.

5. Others write, that Curio, being called to a Consultation, would have had him presently invade Italy; but he chose rather first to make an overture of Peace, writing to his Friends, it's said, to procure, though but two Legions with Gall within the Alps and Ilyricum, until he should be Consul again; which though it seemed something reasonable to Pompey, the Consuls would not admit of it. Then wrote he to the Senate a menacing and bitter Letter; for so it is titled by Cicero, who now was returned from Cilicia, his Province, which he had governed a year, and for his good Service in the Field had been saluted Imperator, and had a Triumph decreed him by the Senate, which these disturbances hindered, he saying, that so an agreement were made, he had rather follow the Chariot of Cæsar than triumph in his own; and to effect it, he omitted no travel, writing to Cæsar, and speaking unto Pompey. But Cæsar in that Letter, after an honourable mention made of his own Exploits, signified, that he was willing to resign his Power, in case Pompey did the like; otherwise he should retain his Forces, and speedily come to revenge the Injuries which had been offered as well to himself as his Country. At the reading of these last words all cried out, that War was denounced, and they sent L. Domitius to succeed him in his Command, with four newly raised Legions. Antonius and Cassius the Tribunes being of Curio's Judgment, the Consuls bad them depart out of the Senate, left their Persons Sacrosancti (as the term was) by their Offices should be violated; and they in a great rage departing, that night fled toward Cæsar. So began this famous Civil War, in the fourth year of the CLXXXII. Olympiad, the DCCV. of the City, XLVII. before the Birth of Christ; A. M. MMCMCLVI. the aforesaid C. Claudius Marcellus, and L. Cornelius Lentulus being Consuls.

6. Amongst other things ordained by the Senate in order to preparation for War, Cæsar writes, that two Consular, and the other Pretorian Provinces were given to private Men, that had no Office of Magistracy. That Syria fell to Scipio, and Gall to L. Domitius. That into the other Provinces were sent Prætors without consent or approbation of the People, as had been practised in former years, who having made their Vows, took their Paludamenta, and went their ways. That the Consuls (which before that time was never seen) went out of the City, and had their Lictors privately within the City, and in the Capitol, against all Order and ancient Custom. That Levies were made throughout Italy, Arms were required, and Money was exacted from Municipal Towns, from Temples and Religious Places. That all Divine and Humane Rights were confounded. Provoked by these things things, he called the Soldiers together, acquainted them with all the Injuries he had received from time to time by procurement of his Enemies, and how they had alienated Pompey from him, of whom he had well deserved. He lamented that the Power of the Tribunes, which former times had re-established, should now be suppressed by force. For Sylla having stripped the Tribunial Power of all Rights and Prerogatives, yet continued to it the freedom of Intercession. But Pompey, who would seem to restore it to its Dignity, took away that Power which alone was left unto it. As for the Senatus-consultum, whereby the Magistrates were required to take care for the safety of the Common-wealth, and by the Voice of which the Roman People were summoned to take Arms, it had never been practised, but when pernicious Laws were propounded, upon the violence of the Tribunes, and the mutiny and secession of the People; when the Temples, and more eminent Places were seized, which Examples of former Ages had been expiated by the fortune of Saturninus, and the Gracchi. But at this present there was no such matter attempted, nor in thought; no Law published; no tampering with the People; no secession. Therefore he exhorted them to undertake the Defence of the Reputation and Dignity of their General, under whose Conduct for nine years together they had most happily managed the common Interest, fought many prosperous and victorious Battles, and settled all Gall and Germany in Peace. The Soldiers of the thirteenth Legion being only present, for the other Legions were not yet come, cried out instantly, that they were ready to undertake his Defence, and protect the Tribunes.

Arminum.

7. Having founded the minds of the Soldiers, he went, he saith, directly toward Arminum, and there met with the Tribunes of the People that were fled to him; sent for the rest of the Legions from their Wintering Camps, and gave order that they should follow him. Plutarch relates, that he had not in all above five thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse about him in Gall within the Alps, having left the rest beyond the Mountains to be brought after him by his Lieutenants. That considering how for the execution of his Design he needed not so many Men, but that his Interest was to come upon his Enemies on a sudden, and surprise them, rather than by great Preparations to give them notice and time to make opposition, he commanded his Officers to go before, without any other Armour than their Swords, to take Arminum, (the first City* came to us of Gall) with as little blood-shed and tumult as they could possibly. Then committing the Army he had with him to the care of Hortensius, one of his Friends, he continued a whole day together openly in the sight of every Man, to see the Gladiators exercise before him. At night he went to his Lodging, and bathing his Body a little, came afterwards into the Hall, and made merry a while with them he had invited to Supper. When it was pretty late, and very dark, he rose from the Table, and prayed the Company to be merry, and not to stir, for he would straight be with them again; but he had secretly given order to a few of his truest Friends to follow him, some one way, and some another. He himself having hired a Carriage, made at first as if he would have gone some other way; but suddenly turned back again towards Arminum. Now, when he was come to the little River Rubicon, which parted Gall within the Alps from Italy, he stopped his course upon a sudden.

His anxious
the Rubicon.

8. For, the farther he went, and nearer he came to execute his purpose, the more remorse he had in his Conscience, to think what it was he took in hand, and his thoughts were more perplexed, when he entered into a consideration of the desperateness of his Attempt. He was plunged into various thoughts, and spoke never a word, waving sometimes one way, and sometimes another, and often changed his determination contrary to himself. At length he fell into discourse with his Friends he had with him, amongst whom was Africanus Pollio, telling them what mischief this Passage over the River would breed in the World, and how much Posterity would talk of it. But at last, with Courage, casting from him all these Melancholic thoughts, he spake such words as Valiant Men are wont when they attempt dangerous Enterprizes, as that a Desperate Man fears no danger, comes on, and passing the River, never stopped; so that before day-light he was within Arminum, and took it. It's said, that the night before he passed over this River, he dreamed that he lay with his Mother.

Was great
him upon his invading.

9. The City of Arminum being taken, and the rumor thereof dispersed throughout Italy, as if open War had been begun both at Sea and Land, as if all the Laws of Rome had been broken, together with the extreme Bounds and Limits of the State, not only Men and Women, but whole Corporations themselves quitting their Habitations, fled from one place to another. Rome was immediately filled with

Sec't. 7. multitudes that flocked thither, like droves of Cattel, being not to be commanded by any Authority of Magistrates, nor persuaded by any Arguments, so confused they were, to the great danger of the City. For, in all places Men were of contrary opinions, and Tumults were raised by such as were glad of this trouble, who could keep in no certain place, but every where fell out with such ascended either afraid or angry at it, and boldly threatened them with that which was to come. Pompey himself was amazed, but much more was troubled with the reflecting words which were given him on both sides. Some said he had done bravely, and paid for his folly, in making Cæsar so great and powerful both against himself and the Common-wealth. Others blamed him as having refused the honest and reasonable Conditions offered by Cæsar, and suffering Leontius the Consul too much to abuse him. Phœnius bade him stamp on the ground with his foot; for Pompey one day in bravery said in the Senate, that none needed to trouble themselves about Preparation for War; for when he lifted, with one stamp of his foot, he could fill all Italy with Soldiers. At this time Pompey had a greater number of Men than Cæsar; but those about him, and concerned with him would never let him follow his own Determinations, bringing him so many lies, as if Cæsar had been already at their heels. Dion Cassius writes, that he was affrighted by what he learnt from Labienus concerning Cæsar. For Labienus, who had been one of Cæsar's greatest Friends, and had fought valiantly under him, as his Legatus in Gall, forsook him and went to Pompey, to whom he revealed all his Secrets. A wonder it is made by Dion, what the cause should be that moved Labienus to this Revolt. But he concludes it was, because being now puffed up with his Wealth and Reputation, he carried himself very highly, and Cæsar disdaining he should think to equal him, did less respect him than formerly. This alteration of mind Labienus not enduring, and standing in fear of what might be the consequence of it, revolted from him.

Pompey being altered in his Inclinations by this means, sent Messengers to Cæsar, namely, L. Cæsar his Kinsman, whose Father was Legate in his Camp, and Rafcius the Prætor, who voluntarily undertook the Employment. L. Cæsar told him, that Pompey desired to clear himself, lest he should take those things to be done in contempt of him, which were ordered only for the Service of the State. The good of that he said he always preferred before any private respects, and that Cæsar was also obliged in honour to lay aside all indignation and affection, for the sake of the Common-wealth, and not to be so transported with anger and disdain as he seemed to be, lest hoping to be avenged upon them at Rome, he should endanger his Country. Somewhat more he added with excuses on Pompey's part, in all which he was seconded by Rafcius. Cæsar answered, that he had ever held the Dignity of the Common-wealth dearer than his own Life. He grieved that a kindness bestowed on him by the People should be spitefully wrested from him by his Adversaries; that six Months of his Government were to be cut off; and so he was to be called home to the City; and that notwithstanding at the last Creation of Magistrates it was resolved, that regard should be had of him though absent; Yet for the Common-wealth's sake could he be content to undergo the loss of that Honour. But having writ to the Senate, that all Men might quit their Armies, he was so far from obtaining it, that a Levy thereupon was made throughout Italy; moreover, that the two Legions, drawn from him under pretence of the Parthian War, were still retained about the City, which were also in Arms. He perceived well enough that all this tended to his destruction, and yet was he content to condescend to all things, and to endure all inconveniences for the good of the Publick. Let Pompey, said he, go to his Government and Provinces. Let both the Armies be discharged. Let all Men in Italy lay down their Arms. Let the City be freed of fear. Let the Comitia be left to their ancient Liberty, and the whole Administration free to the Senate and People. For the security hereof let an Oath be taken, else let Pompey come near to me, or me be permitted to go nearer to Pompey, that by conference an end may be put to these differences.

11. The Messengers delivered this Answer to Pompey, and the Consuls at Capua, to which, after Consultation, they made a Reply by Writing, and the same Messengers. This was the drift of it, that Cæsar should return into Gall, quit Arminum, and dismiss his Army; which if he did, Pompey would then go into Spain; in the mean time, till security could be given that Cæsar would do this, the Consuls and Pompey would not forbear to levy Men. These Conditions were very unequal, that Cæsar should quit Arminum, and return into his Province, and Pompey hold Regions and Provinces belonging to others; that Cæsar should dismiss his Army, and Pompey raise new Troops; that Pompey should promise to repair to his Government, but assign affign no day for his departure; so that if he had not gone till Cæsar's time of Government had been expired, he could not have been accused of breaking his word. But there being no time appointed for a conference, nor any show made of coming nearer, there could be no hope of Peace. Cæsar seeing this, sent out M. Antony, and others, and took in several Municipal Towns by the assistance of the Decuriones of Ausimium, though Astius Varus, who held that Town, opposed it, making Levies of Men through the Country of Picenum.

12. The noise hereof flying to Rome, struck the City with such terror, that Leontius the Consul being to deliver out Money to Pompey, according to a Senatus-consultum, and having opened the inner Treasury, forthwith fled away; for it was reported falsely, that Cæsar approached, and that his Horse was near at hand. Marcellus the other Consul, and most of the other Magistrates, followed after. Pompey departing the day before, was gone to those Legions he had taken from Cæsar, and had left in Apulia to winter. In the mean time the Levies ceased in the City, and no place seemed secure betwixt that and Capua, where they began first to assemble. There to secure themselves they pressed for Soldiers such Coloni as by the Lex Julia were placed there. The Gladiators, which Cæsar kept in exercise, were by Leontius brought out of the School, set at liberty, and had Horses given them, being commanded to follow him. But afterward upon advice how ill it was spoken of, he dispersed them throughout Campania for their safe keeping. So writes Cæsar himself as to the flight of the Consuls, and Pompey out of Rome. Plutarch adds, that Pompey, wearied with the frights, fury, and madness of those who cried still that Cæsar was at hand, and seeing all things in tumult, concluded there was no way but to forsake the City, and commanded the Senate to follow him, and not a Man to tarry there, except he loved tyranny more than liberty, and the Common-wealth. And so the Consuls themselves, before they had offered their common Sacrifices, as was wont, upon going out of the City, fled away; as did most of the Senators, taking away in halt such things as came to hand, as if they had stolen them. And in this hurlyburly some even of Cæsar's Friends took the same course, being out of fear, carried with the stream of this Tumult.

13. Dion Cassius having told us how the great ones were unwilling that Cæsar and Pompey should meet and confer, lest they should conspire together against their Interest; and that Pompey was unwilling to be reduced to a private Life, because he knew, that in that condition he should not be so great with the People as Cæsar would be; adds also, that before the Messengers were returned he went into Campania, where he thought he could with more convenience raise the War. He commanded, that all the Senate and Magistrates should follow him, by a Senatus-consultum having propounded Impunity to such as would quit the place upon this occasion, and having declared that he would esteem him that continued here no other than a publick Enemy. He procured also a Decree, that they should take along with them all the publick Money, and all things consecrated to their Gods, thereby hoping to be able to raise a great Army: And almost all the Cities of Italy had that kindness for him, that a little before having heard he was dangerously sick, they made publick Vows for his recovery; which was an extraordinary Honour, and happened only afterwards to them, who obtained Sovereign Authority; although it was no strong Argument, that therefore they would continue constant in fidelity to him. And although it was decreed, that all the Treasure and Consecrated things should be carried away, yet was neither fort removed out of their Places. For when it was heard that Cæsar had not given any peaceable Answer, but blamed the Messengers as having falsely reported things on his side, and that he had many Men bold and courageous, and resolved to make havock of all things, (as in such Cases things are usually made worse, and more terrible than indeed they are) affrighted therewith, before they touched them, they ran away in great tumults and disorder. They called to mind what horrid things had been committed by Marinus and Sylla, and could not think better of Cæsar, whose Soldiers for the most part were Barbarians. But in such manner did Pompey leave the City, and with him most of the Senators; for some few staid behind, who were addicted to Cæsar, and some others that resolved to stand Neuters.

14. Cæsar having notice hereof, went not straight to Rome, for he knew that the City would fall to the Victor as a reward, and he professed that he did not make War upon Rome, but for her sake against his Adversaries. But throughout Italy he dispersed Papers, whereby he challenged Pompey to debate the matter betwixt them, and indeavoured to persuade others to be void of fear, and to keep themselves at home.

Pompey and the Senators leave Rome, and go to Capua.

Scct. 7. home. Dislodging from Auximum, he passed through the Country of Picenum, and there was most willingly entertained by all the Governments. But a fop was given to him at Corfinium by Domitius Ahenobarbus, who had raised twenty Cohorts out of Alba, the Marſe, Peſigni, and adjacent Countries. Cæſar paſſed the River, which Domitius in vain attempted to hinder, by breaking down the Bridge at three Miles diſtance from the Town; but the Party he ſent was beaten off by Cæſar's Vanguard, vho then ſate down before the Place. Domitius ſent to Pompey to deſire aid, affirming, that Cæſar vvith two Armies, by reaſon of the ſtraitneſs of the Paſſages, might eaſily be ſhut up; vvhiſh opportunity if he neglected, he himſelf vvith above thirty Cohorts, and of Senators and Eſquires a great number, muſt needs run a very great danger. In the mean time he took care for effectual defence, and to encourage his Soldiers, promiſed to each Man four Acres out of his own Lands, vvith a ſuitable proportion to the Centurions and Evocati; for having been of Sylla's Party he had got great Poſſeſſions.

15. Cæſar made great Works to fortifie his Camp, and begit the Town vvith Caſſes, and other Fortifications, vvhiſh vvile he vvvas about, the Meſſengers returned to Domitius. Pompey vvrote back that he vvould not hazard the Cauſe by driving it to ſuch extremity; and vvheras Domitius had, vvithout his advice or conſent, engaged in keeping Corfinium, he adviſed him, if poſſible, to quit it, and bring the Forces to him. But he diſſembled the matter, and gave out, that Pompey vvould come ſpeedily to their relief, and at the ſame time conſulted vvith his intimate Friends, hovv to make his eſcape out of the Town; vvhiſh being at length knownn by his demeanour, and other Circumſtances, his Men ſeized on him, and ſent to Cæſar, offering to deliver him up, and ſurrender the Place. He concluded that the importance of ſuch a Town vvvas not to be neglected, but kept his Men from entering that night, left any violence ſhould be committed, vvhiſh he reſolved to prevent, as good policy it vvvas in his undertaking. Lentulus Spinther being in the Town, came forth to him, begged pardon, and put him in mind of their former familiarity, acknowledging the favours received from him, vvhiſh indeed vvvas of the greateſt ſize; for by his means he had been choſen into the Colledge of Pontifices, upon leaving his Prætorſhip had obtained Spain for a Province, and had been aſſiſted by him in his Suit for the Conſulſhip.

16. Cæſar interrupting him ſaid, That he came not out of his Province to do any harm, but to defend himſelf from the affronts of his Enemies; to reſtore the Tribunes of the People, vvho had been driven out of the City, to their Dignity, and to put himſelf and the People of Rome into liberty, being oppreſſed by the faction of a few perſons. Lentulus put into heart by this Answer, deſired to return into the Town to encourage others who were deſperate as to their fortunes; and the next day Cæſar ſent for the Senators, and Senators Children, the Tribunes of Soldiers, the Equites and Decuriones, a great number of vvhiſh Domitius had culled out of the Municipal Towns. All theſe he protected from the Inſolencies of the Soldiers, and having a little upbraided them vvith their Ingratitude, diſmiſſed them in ſafety. And that he might not ſeem more ſparing of the Lives, than the Monies, of Men, ſixty Seſtertii, vvhiſh Domitius had brought vvith him to Corfinium, and depoſited there, being preſented to him by the Dumviri of the Town, he reſtored to him; though he knew it was publick Money, and given out by Pompey to pay Soldiers. Domitius his Men he commanded to take the Military Oath to himſelf, and having ſtaid ſeven days at Corfinium, through the Conſines of the Marrucini, Terenſini, and Lavinates, he came into Apulia.

17. Pompey having notice of vvhat had paſſed at Corfinium, took his Way from Luceria to Brundifium, raiſing all the Force he poſſibly could, even to the arming of Shepherds and Slaves, vvhom mounting, he made ſome three hundred Horſe. In the mean time ſeveral Cohorts revolted to Cæſar, and Cn. Magius of Cremona, Maſter of the Works of Pompey, was taken on the way, and brought to Cæſar. Him he ſent back vvith this Meſſage to Pompey, that ſeeing there was no opportunity of meeting, he was reſolved to ſeek him at Brundifium; it highly importing the Common-wealth, and every Mans ſafety, that they two ſhould confer together: Neither could matters ſucceed ſo vvell at a diſtance by the Intervention of a third Party. Coming then to Brundifium vvith fix Legions, he found that the Conſuls were gone over to Dyrachium, and Pompey vvvas in the Town vvith twenty Cohorts. He knew not vvwhether he ſhould there to command the Adriatick, and the Coaſts of Italy and Greece, or only wanted Shipping to make his Paſſage; but he vvould not endure that he ſhould think he could not be forced to quit Italy, and therefore he reſolved to block up the Haven, and to take away the uſe of it from him.

18. Where

18. Where the mouth of the Haven was narroweſt he raiſed great Mounts of Earth, and vvhere the Sea was ſhallow near unto the Shoar; and farther in the deep vvhere no ſuch Mounts could be raiſed, he placed flat Boats two together, over againſt the Mounts, of thirty foot ſquare, vvhiſh he faſtened vvith Anchors to keep them from being toſſed vvith the Waves; to them thus placed he added others of the ſame ſize, and covered them vvith Faggots and Earth, that Men might move vvpon them readily, and defend them. He fenced them vvith Hurdles, and ſuch ſtuff, and on every fourth ſtote made a Tower two Stories high, to protect them from the force of Shipping and Fire. Pompey againſt them ſent out great Ships of burthen vvith Towers of three Stories, full of all ſorts of Munition; and every day the Parties fought vvith Slings, Arrows, and other caſting Weapons. Yet Cæſar, he himſelf tells us, carried matters ſo, as being vvilling not to let fall Conditions of Peace. Wondering that he heard nothing from Magius, he ſent Caninius Rebius, one of his Legati, to Scribonius Libo, (vvhoſe Daughter Pompey's Son had married) to vvhom he was allied, and an inward Friend, to perſwade him to mediate a Reconciliation, and procure that Cæſar might ſpeak vvith Pompey. It might be, he ſaid, that both of them might yield to lay down their Arms vvpon equal Conditions, and then the greateſt ſhare of the Honour vvould fall to Libo. Having heard Caninius Libo went ſtraight to Pompey, and vvithin a vvile returning, brought vvord, that nothing could be done vvowards an agreement, becauſe the Conſuls were abſent. Whereupon Cæſar reſolved to trouble himſelf no more about a Treaty, as he often had done, but to prepare vvigorouſly for War.

19. The Work being half perfected, after nine days, the Ships that had tranſported the Conſuls, and the other part of the Army, returned, and thereupon Pompey began to fit himſelf for his departure, either moved by theſe Works of Cæſar, or elſe purſuing his former Determination. And the better to retard the proſecution of Cæſar, he ſtopped up the Gates, Streets, and Paſſages, ſunk Ditches croſs the vvays, and therein ſtuck ſharp Piles and Stakes, vvhiſh he covered lightly vvith Hurdles and thin Earth, leaving only two vvays free, vvhiſh led to the Haven, and theſe too he fenced vvith a ſtrong Palifado of huge and ſharp Stakes. Then did he command the Soldiers to get aboard vvithout noiſe or tumult, leaving here and there vvpon the Walls, and in the Towers, ſome of the readieſt Slings and Archers, to be called away vvpon vvarning vvhen the Soldiers were ſhipped; appointing Veffels of burthen to take them in at a convenient place. The Citizens of Brundifium being diſobliged by the affronts received from Pompey, and the injuries from his Soldiers, gave notice to Cæſar of their departure, as they were running here and there, from the tops of their Houſes. Cæſar prepared to ſcale the Walls, but Pompey vv weighed Anchor, and the light armed Soldiers got to the Veffels ere his Men could mount them. Then vvvere they ſeaſonably adverted of the blind Ditch by the Inhabitants, and avoiding the danger, vvvere brought a great compaſs about, and came to the Haven. There, by Skiffs and Boats, they ſeized two Ships vvith Soldiers, vvhiſh ſtuck by chance vvpon the Mounts Cæſar had made.

20. This flight of Pompey, accompanied vvith all the Circumſtances, is eſteemed the beſt Stratagem that he ever uſed in all his life, and indeed he had made it evident to Cæſar, if it had not been for the Information given by them of Brundifium. However, his quitting the Place is cenſured but for a faulty reſolution, though handſomly carried. Cæſar marvelled much, that lying in a ſtrong City, and expecting his Army to come out of Spain, and being Maſter of the Sea beſides, he vvould leave Italy. Cicero alſo blamed him for abandoning Italy, therein following the Example of Theſtiſtales rather than of Pericles; vvheras this troubleſome time and affair vvvas rather to be compared vvith that of Pericles than of the other; Cæſar himſelf having ſhewed that he vvvas afraid of the time in that he ſent to Brundifium to treat vvith Pompey. But ſo as Dio obſerves, did Pompey quit his Country, in ſuch a manner, as vvvas both in deliberation and action contrary to his former practice, vvhen he came into Italy out of Aſia; and therefore he procured a Fortune and Reputation contrary to his former. For he vvwho once diſmiſſed his Soldiers from Brundifium, that they ſhould not moleſt the Citizens, now carried others out of Italy to moleſt them, and he vvwho before had carried the Riches of the Barbarians to Rome, now carried all things from it he vvould to other places; and deſpairing utterly concerning his Country, reſolved to uſe againſt it the aſſiſtance of Strangers, and of ſuch as he had formerly reduced into ſervitude; and he put more confidence in them for his ſafety and Power, than in thoſe of vvhom he had vvell deſerved. Therefore he vvwent under

Sect. 7. under such circumstances that he got instead of his former glory in War, a repute of pusillanimity and fear of Cæsar; and for the Honour he had had of increasing the Renown of his Country, now procured the infamy of forsaking her.

21. But by this means became Cæsar in three score days Master of all Italy without Blood-shed. Now although he well understood, that it much imported his Interest to put an end to the War by pursuing Pompey, before he could joyn himself with the Transmarine Forces, yet considering the lets and the length of time, and that he had no Shipping, but must stay for such as could be brought from Ancona, Gall, and the Straits, which at this time of the year would require a long and troublesome Passage; he resolved to steer another Course. He thought it not fit that Pompey's old Army, and the two Provinces of Spain, whereof one in gratitude was deeply engaged to his Adversary, should be assured and settled, or that time should be given them there to raise new Forces, or opportunity to wrest from him Italy and Gall in his absence. He resolved therefore for Spain, and gave order to the Municipal Towns to provide Shipping, and send it to Brundisium. He sent Valerius and Cotta with convenient Forces to seize Sardinia and Sicily, which they easily did, Cato and Cato the two Governours flying out of their Provinces.

22. Cæsar then, to ease his Men and refresh them, carried them back into the Municipal Towns, and went himself directly to Rome, where, calling a Senate, he laid open to them the affronts and injuries offered him by his Enemies. He protested that he never sought Honour in the State by extraordinary means; but expected the legitimate time of the Consulship, and was content with that which it was lawful to an Citizen to stand for. And the Tribunes of the People had propounded, that consideration of him, though absent, should be had; but it was contradicted by his Adversaries, and by Cato's long resistance, who spent the time according to his custom in tedious Speeches; which if Pompey, being Consul, disliked, why did he suffer it to be done? and if he did allow of it, why did he not suffer him to enjoy the kindness of the People? He declared how patient he had been, in having moved on his own accord, that both might quit their Forces, though this would have been very prejudicial to his Honour and Dignity. He shewed the malice and bitterness of his Enemies, in that they refused to do themselves what they required of others, and chose rather to put all things into confusion, than relinquish their Commands, and their Armies. He told at large what injury they had done him in taking away his Legions, and how cruel and insolent they had been against the Tribunes. He mentioned the Conditions he propounded, and the Conference desired and refused; and upon the whole, he sought them to take the charge of the Common-wealth, together with him; but if, out of fear, they refused, he would not be burthenome to them, but undertake it himself. He would have Messengers sent, neither did he regard at all what Pompey had said in the Senate, That they to whom Messengers were sent had Authority attributed to them, and it signified fear in those that sent them; these things being Arguments of pusillanimity; for his part, as he had endeavoured to excel in proofs and strength, so would he also in Justice and Equity.

23. The Senators were well pleased that Messengers should be sent, but no Man was found that would go, for fear of Pompey, who, upon his departure from Rome, had said in open Senate, that he would hold him that it laid there in the same condition with him that was in Cæsar's Camp. Three days were spent in Debates and Excuses, L. Metellus the Tribune Plebis being induced by Cæsar's Adversaries to protract the time, and hinder any matter that he should propound. Perceiving then their resolution, after he had spent there in vain some few days, that he might not spend any more time, nor leave those things undone which he determined to do, he left the City, and went into the farther Gall. Such is the Account he gives us himself of what was done by himself and others during his stay in Rome, which is not full enough, if we consult and regard other Writers. Dion Cassius mentioning his coming to Rome, adds that the Senate was called without the Pomarii by Antonius and Cassius, who had formerly been put out of it. That his Speech was long and full of courtship, he endeavoured thereby to gain their good wills, for the present, and put them in good hope for the time to come. For, beholding the multitude of his Soldiers, they were full of fears and suspicions, and therefore he thought it fit to cherish them, that they might keep quiet till he had done his business. Therefore neither did he blame any, nor threaten; nay, he inveighed against them who would make War upon their fellow Citizens, not without Imprecations, and moved, that Messengers might be sent to Pompey about a Peace. After the same manner he spake to the People, which flocked together also without the City, and he commanded Corn to be brought out of the Islands, promising also to bestow upon every Man three hundred Sesterces. For all this, they at Rome considered with themselves, that the words and the actions of Designers were very different, as was evident when such obtained what they sought for. That at first they promised all fine things to such as might be in capacity to oppose them; but having got possession of the thing designed, remembered their promises no more, but made use of what they had procured from them against them that gave them it, as they remembered that Marinus and Sylla had pretended all fair things imaginable. Their fear was increased when they law that no Messengers were sent; and that Piso the Father-in-law of Cæsar was blamed exceedingly for making mention of a Message. And how could they expect any Money, when what was left in the Treasury, was to be given to those Soldiers, of which they stood in fear, for their maintenance? Yet, as if all things went prosperously, did they resume these Habits which they wore in time of Peace, and had laid by them.

24. The Proposal concerning Money was opposed by L. Metellus the Tribune Plebis, who not being able to prevail, got him to the Treasury to watch the doors. But the Soldiers made no more of his watching than they did of his liberty of Speech, and breaking the Lock, (for the Consuls had taken away the Keys) took away the Money. Besides, many other Decrees were made, most of which Antonius propounded under shew of equality, but indeed to establish Domination. But each side called its Adversaries, the Enemies of the Common-wealth, and pretended for the sake of it to wage War, but both wrought only their own ends, and equally weakened the common Interest. Plutarch, as to the Messengers, adds another Reason to that of Cæsar, why none would undertake the Employment. He saith, It was either because they feared Pompey, having forsaken him, or because they thought Cæsar meant not as he spake, but that he used words of course to colour his purpose. When Metellus, one of the Tribunes, would not suffer him to take any of the common Treasure out of the Temple of Saturn, but affirmed it was against the Law, he told him that times of War and Law were two things, and bade him, if what he was about did offend him, to get him gone; for, War could not bear such freedom and boldness of Speech; but when the War was ended, and all was quiet again, then he might speak what he would. He added, that he told him this of favour, departing therein from his Right; for, saith he, Both thou art mine, and all they that have risen against me, and whom I have in my Power. Having spoken thus to Metellus, he went to the Temple door, where the Treasury lay, and finding no Keys, he caused Smiths to be sent for, and made them break open the Locks. Metellus thereupon began to hinder him, and some that stood by commended him for so doing; but Cæsar at length speaking bigly to him, threatened he would kill him presently if he persisted to trouble him; and further said, Young Man, thou knowest it is harder for me to say it than to do it. This word made Metellus quake, and he got him away, and ever after that Cæsar had all at command for his Wars.

25. All this Cæsar omits concerning this publick Treasure, which they say was preserved from the time that Rome was taken by the Galls, not to be made use of but upon some extream necessity. He pretends that Lentulus, who had order to send it to Pompey, abandoned it by his flight, as we have seen, upon the first false report that Cæsar's Troops approached Rome. But, to say the truth, his Report is very different in many things that concern himself from what we read of him in other Authors, these two especially we make use of; and therefore we think it necessary to take in what others say in this matter of the Civil War especially; it being difficult to a Writer in such a case to resist the temptation, and treat as indifferently of things which concern himself, as those wherein he is no way concerned. But, if you please, take along with you the excuse Appian maketh for him, who deriding the scrupulosity of the ancient Romans that would not touch that Treasure but in extremity of War against the Celts or Galls, saith, That Cæsar might lawfully take it, because he had conquered that Nation, and the Romans had no more cause to fear them. Dio tells us further, That he took in Sardinia and Sicily without a stroke, the Governours then receding from their Commands; and that he sent away Arifolulus into Palestine his Country, that he might act something against Pompey. He gave liberty to the Sons of such as had been proscribed by Sylla to sue for Offices of Magistracy; and in conclusion, settled all matters both in Rome and throughout Italy, as might most conduce to his present Affair. Having committed the care of them to Antonius, he resolved for Spain, which greatly favoured Pompey, and put him in fear, lest in his absence Gall might also be persuaded to revolt. In the mean time Cicero, having not come in the sight of Cæsar, and with him certain other Senators, went to Pompey.

Pey,

Sec. 7. pey, whom they looked on as having the better cause, and who would they imagined prove victorious. For, the Consuls before their departure, and Cicero himself, then Proconful, had commanded that all should follow them to Thessalonica, the Enemy having seized Rome. They were indeed the chief of the Senate, and whithersoever they went, they carried with them a resemblance of the Common-wealth. Therefore did most of the Senators and Equestes follow them either presently, or after some distance of time: And the Inhabitants of all the Cities which Cesar had not secured by his Arms. But now let us hear Cesar himself relate what he did after he had left Rome.

26. Upon his Arrival in Gall he found that Pompey had sent into Spain Vibullius Rufus, whom Cesar had taken at Corfinium, and disarmed; as also that Domitius with eight Gallies was gone to secure Massilia, (or Marfeilles) the Inhabitants of which, upon a Message received from Pompey, shut their Gates against Cesar; called into their City the Albicans, a barbarous People, who of ancient time had held amity with them, and dwelt upon the Mountains above Marfeilles, and made all preparations for defence. Cesar calling out some fifteen of the Citizens, expostulated with them, and told them they should rather follow the Example of all Italy, than apply themselves to the Will of any one Man. The Town made this Answer, That they understood the People of Rome were divided into two Parties, and whether of them was in the right they could not judge. That the Leaders of these Factions, Pompey and Cesar, were both special Patrons and Benefactors to their City, the one having augmented their publick Revenues, and endowed their State with the Lands of the Valle Arcomica, and the Heboni; and the other having conquered and subdued Gallie, (a Place it seems fo called near the Town) gave it to them, and increased their Tolls or Imports; that therefore, as they were equally obliged to both, they would carry an equal respect unto them, and not aid either of them against the other, or receive them into their City or Ports. But while these things were in hand, Domitius arrived, and was made both Governour of the City, and General for the War. A Fleet now they rigged up, and made Provision for a Siege; with which injuries Cesar, he tells us, provoked, brought three Legions to Marfeilles, resolved to prepare necessities for an Attacque, and to build twelve Gallies at Arelatum, or Arls. These in thirty days time from the cutting down of the Timber, were built, armed, rigged, and brought down to Marfeilles. And the Command of them he gave to D. Brutus, and left C. Trebonius, his Legatus, to follow the Siege.

city Marfeilles.

27. Dion Cassius his Relation fo far agrees with this of Cesar, as to affirm that they of Marfeilles were the only Men in Gall, who neither followed his Party, nor received him into their City. He saith the Answer they gave him was observable, that they were the Associates of the People of Rome, and that at present they did not curiously inquire, nor were able to distinguish whether the one or the other was in the wrong. But if they pleased to come as Friends, they would receive them both without their Arms, but neither of them, if they came in a State of War. He speaks nothing of Domitius his coming, which Cesar insults upon, and the receiving of him as a just ground for the War; but adds, that being besieged, they both defended themselves against him, and also against Trebonius and D. Brutus a long time, that Cesar himself spent some time in attacking Marfeilles, which he thought eafie to be taken, thinking it a thing unfeufferable, that he who had taken Rome it self without any trouble, should be shut out by them of that City. But perceiving the Siege would be drawn out in length, they making such resistance, he left it to officers, and hastened into Spain. He had dispatched thither C. Fabius; but fearing that he might be worsted if he engaged in Fight, he resolved to attend his business there in his own Person. He himself writes to the same effect. As that he sent from Marfeilles C. Fabius one of his Legati with three Legions that wintered about Narbon, commanding him with all care and diligence to seize on the Passage of the Pyrenean Hills, which were at that time kept by the Forces of L. Afranius. The other Legions which wintered further off he ordered to follow after. And Fabius according to his Directions halted and put the Garrison from the Passage; and by great journeys marched toward Afranius his Army.

He hastens to Spain.

28. After the Arrival of Vibullius Rufus in Spain the three Legati of Pompey, which were Afranius, Petorius, and Varro, did to dispose and divide their Charges, that Petorius was ordered to bring his three Legions out of Lusitania, through the Territories of the Vettones, and join himself with Afranius in the hithermost Spain; and Varro was to keep the farther Province. Petorius accordingly halted to Afranius, and and induced by the opportunity of the Place, they agreed to keep the War on foot near about Ilerda. Afranius had three Legions, and Petorius two, besides Scutarii of the nearer Province, and Cetrati of the farther, some eighty Cohorts; and of both Provinces about five thousand Horse. Cesar had sent his Legions into Spain, together with six thousand Auxiliaries of Foot, and three thousand of Horse, which had been with him in his former Wars. And at his request he had the same number out of Gall, the most noble and valiant being called out of every City, besides those of the Aquitani and Highlanders, bordering upon the Gallick Province. Now was he advertised, that Pompey himself was coming through Mauritania into Spain with his Legions, and with all speed would be with him. Thereupon he borrowed Money of the Tribunes, and the Centurions of the Soldiers, and distributed it to his Army, by which largess he gained two Points. For by the Loan as a Pledge he engaged the Officers to endeavour his good success as their own Interest. And by the Largess he purchased the good Affection of the Soldiers.

29. Within two or three days Cesar arrived with nine hundred Horse, which he had kept with him for a Guard; and having viewed the Place, the next day in a triple Body he marched toward Ilerda, and offered Battle in an equal and indifferent place. But, Afranius was not disposed to Battle, which Cesar seeing, drew a Trench behind some of his Legions, as they stood in Arms facing the Enemy, and fortified his Camp, though Afranius and Petorius to divert him brought down their Forces, and provoked his Men to fight. Betwixt the Town and the Hill where Pompey's Officers were incamped, there was a Plain above a quarter of a Mile over, and in it a rising Ground, which Cesar endeavoured to possess himself of, thereby to cut them off from the Town and the Bridge, which lay over the River Sicoris; but his Design being perceived, Afranius his Men came thither first, and those of Cesar were forced to retire to the Legions. The whole Army was well-nigh affrighted, for as all Soldiers, by living long in a place, get much of the Usages and Customs of the Country, Afranius his Men now fought in a fashion like those of the Lusitanians, who were wont to run furiously upon their Enemies, and bold to seize on a Place, not regarding their Orders or Ranks, but fighting in a scattered and dispersed manner. The Enemy now insolent upon their success, vigorously pursued, till Cesar, bringing out the ninth Legion, forced him to turn tail, and retire under the Walls of Ilerda; but the Legion pursued them, till it came into a disadvantageous place under the Hill, whereon the Town stood. Here from the upper ground it was sorely annoyed, and the Fight continued long in so unequal a Place, each Party relieving its Men with fresh Supplies. They fought some five hours, and Cesar's Men having spent their other Weapons, drew their Swords and made up to the Hill with such success, that they forced their Enemy under the Walls, and the Horse got up in an easie ascent, and riding betwixt the Armies, the better secured the Retreat of their Friends. On Cesar's side seventy Men were slain, and six hundred at least wounded. And of that of Afranius two hundred Soldiers, and five Centurions. But as well the one as the other thought it had the better.

difficulties.

30. After this followed a great Rain, which caused the Rivers, betwixt which Cesar was incamped, so to swell, that all Provisions were cut off from him, and he was very much distressed. And the Inconvenience grew to that height, that, on the contrary, Afranius his Party having plenty of all things, by reason of the Bridge of Ilerda, concluded the War in a manner to be at an end, and thereof they wrote Letters to Rome, where the News was so acceptable, that Visits were made to the Family of Afranius by those that congratulated for his success. Hereupon also many went out of Italy to Pompey, of whom some to be the first Messengers of the News, that they might not seem to expect the last event of the War, and come when they saw the quarrel determined. All the ways were kept by Afranius, and no Bridges could be made to serve in stead of those that had been broken down with the violence of the Waves. When things were come thus to extremity, Cesar caused some Boats to be made of light stuff, and small Timber in the Keel, and with Wicker in the upper parts, being covered with Hides, and in the night conveying them in Carts about twenty two Miles from the Camp, therewith made a shift to transport his Soldiers, and settle a course for Provisions. And he was cheered by news from Marfeilles of a Defeat given by D. Brutus his Admiral to the Inhabitants, who fending out seventeen Gallies, besides many other Vessels, hoped to over-power him by their Numbers. But Cesar had taken the stoutest Men of all the Legions, as well of the Antesignants as Centurions, and put them aboard the Fleet; they themselves desiring to be employed in that Service. They grappled with the Massilians, who in dexterity of

31. But, upon making the Bridge, fortune turned on Cæsar's side, for he then had the Command of the Country. Many Cities and States sent and submitted to him, and the Enemy being discouraged, resolved to transfer the War into Celtiberia, where the Name of Pompey was very precious, and that of Cæsar scarcely known: There they expected a good Addition of Horfe, and other Supplies, and thought to draw on the War in length till Winter. Setting forward, they were much disturbed in their march by Cæsar's Horfe, and the Legions in the Camp moved him by their Centurions and Tribunes, that they also might pursue them, refusing no labour nor hazard. Having with great difficulty got over the River, which he drained with Trenches as much as he could, they fetch'd a compass of some six Miles, and yet came up with the Enemy about three of the Clock in the Afternoon, and still dogging him at the heels, forced him to incamp himself, and stop his Journey. Upon discovery, both sides found the way for five Miles was open and Champion, but afterwards Mountainous and Rocky, and that it was their Interest to possess themselves of the straits, which whoever first should take, might hinder the Enemy from proceeding farther. Cæsar took a Circuit, and kept no High-way, the Soldier refusing no toil in passing broken Rocks and Stones, which did so hinder them, that they were forced to give their Weapons from Hand to Hand, and lift up one another for most part of the way. This course he was forced to take, because the Ways leading to Iberus and Odisseja were possessed by the Enemies Camp, and he had that good fortune that none of his Men thought much of their labour, because they hoped an end would be put to all their travel, if they could but keep the Enemy from passing Iberus, and cut off his Provisions.

32. It had been resolved in a Council of War by Africanus and Petruus, not to stir in the night, and when they imagined that by Cæsar's course he took, he was returning back to Iberia, they applauded themselves in their resolution. But finding at length that he did but fetch a compass, and that the Front tended directly to the Straights, they were startled, and hurried in all haste to get first the possession of them. Now the contention was which of the two Parties should first take them: Cæsar's was hindered by the difficulty of the Way, and that of Africanus by Cæsar's Cavalry; and indeed if it should first get the Hills, it might happily quit itself of danger; but the Baggage and the Cohorts left in the Camp would be so intercepted by Cæsar's Army, that there would be no means to relieve them. It so fell out, that Cæsar first came to the place, and being got from amongst the Rocks into a Plain, could put his Army in order to give Battle. Africanus thus disappointed, got to a small Hill, and thence sent four Cohorts with all speed to possess themselves of the highest Mountain, intending to follow after with all his Forces, and by the ridges of the Hills to get to Odisseja. But as, by a Circuit, they endeavoured to do this, Cæsar's Horfe set upon them, and cut them all in pieces in the sight of both the Armies. Now was a notable Advantage offered of doing something to purpose against the Enemy, who was discouraged by this Defeat, so as in probability not to endure a Charge. And the Legates, Centurions, and Tribunes came to Cæsar, and desired him to improve it, for all their Soldiers were ready and forward to it. But he tells us he was in hope to end the Controversie without a Stroke, or any Wound of his Men, having cut off the Enemy from Provisions. Why then should he lose any of his Soldiers, though it were to gain a Victory? Why should he suffer those who had so well deserved of him to be wounded? Why should he put the matter to hazard? especially it being the part of a General no less to overcome by Policy than the Sword. He was also moved with pity toward such Roman Citizens as should be slain; and rather desired to accomplish his business, and work out his ends with their safety. This opinion of his was so universally disallowed, that his Men stuck not to fly, that because he over-slept such an opportunity of Victory, when he would have them, they would not fight. Yet he continued resolute, and fell a little off from the Enemy to abate their fear and amazement. And Petruus and Africanus, upon the opportunity given them, withdrew themselves into their Camp.

33. To be sure Cæsar had shut up all Passages leading to Iberus, so that the adverse Party had but two Ways left open, either to return to Iberda, or to Tarricon. Being troubled thereat, and that they were barred of all Provisions, they consulted what course to take, but were diverted by a necessity they were put upon to protect their

Soldiers that fetched Water. They attempted to do this by raising a Rampart from the Camp to the Water-side, and upon this occasion, the two Generals being far off from the Camp, the Soldiers called to one another, and fought out their acquaintance, and they of Africanus his Party confessed they ought their Lives to the favour of Cæsar, who had spared them when they were terrified the day before. They desired assurance for the Lives of their two Generals, lest they should seem to look to their own safety and betray them; which being granted, they promised to come with their Ensigns to Cæsar's Camp, and thereupon sent some of their chief Centurions as Deputies to treat. On both sides they invited their Friends, so as they seemed to have one and the same Camp, and several Persons applied themselves in particular to Cæsar. And Africanus, upon notice hereof, left the Work he had begun, and retired into his Camp, prepared as it seemed to take patiently what should befall him; but Petruus was of another opinion, he put his Houthold into Arms, and with the Pretorian Cohort of the Cetrati, and some stipendiary Horfe of the Barbarous People, whom he was wont to keep about him as a Guard, hastened to the Rampire, broke off the Discourse of the Soldiers, and drove those of Cæsar from the Camp, killing such of them as he could light on. This done, he went weeping about to the Maniples, calling on the Soldiers, and beseeching them not to forsake him, nor Pompey their General. A concourse of Soldiers being made, hereupon an Oath they required of every Man, not to abandon or betray the Army, or the Generals, nor to Cabal in any Consultation without consent of the rest. This both Generals, Officers and Soldiers took; and hereby the minds of the Soldiers being changed, the matter was reduced to the former course of War.

34. Such effect had the choler of Petruus, as to cause it to be proclaimed, that whoever had with him any of Cæsar's Soldiers, should bring them out; and some being brought, they were publicly killed before the Pretorium; yet most of them were concealed by their Acquaintance, and in the night-time sent over the Rampire. But Cæsar took the contrary course. He caused enquiry to be made after such as came into his Camp in time of Treaty, and sent them away safe; and his moderate and mild Proceeding had such operation, that many Tribunes and Centurions staid with him, whom he advanced together with such Roman Equites as were of the better Rank. In the mean time the Africanus were distressed, being hindered from foraging. The Legionary Soldiers indeed had some of them store of Corn, being commanded to take with them twenty two days Provision from Iberda; but the Cetrati and Auxiliaries not being in condition to furnish themselves, nor their Bodies able to carry Burthens, a great number of them fled daily to Cæsar. The Captains seeing in what extremity they were, resolved to return to Iberda, as the most expedient course, where they had left behind them a little Corn; and this they attempted to do, but were so closely pursued by Cæsar, that they could not incamp themselves in any place fit for watering and forage. And seeing them surrounded with so many Difficulties, he chose rather to force them to a Composition, than to fight.

35. For this purpose he endeavoured to inclose them with a Ditch and Rampart, to hinder their Salies. They to prevent this, brought out their Legions, and im-battled themselves under their Camp; yet still he refused to fight, both for the reason now mentioned, and because the place betwixt the Camps was so narrow, that a Victory obtained would have been little advantageous to him. Notwithstanding he also drew out, and they stood im-battled till Sun-setting, and then retired into their Camps again. The next day, when Cæsar went about to finish the Fortifications, they tried to pass the River Sicoris by a Ford, but being hindered also from that by Soldiers he had disposed upon the Banks, they then sent and required a Parley; for they were now shut up on all sides, their Horfes had been without meat four days together, and they were in extrem want of Water, Wood and Corn. They would have had the Conference private; but Cæsar denied to treat, except in publick. Then did Africanus, in hearing of both the Armies, desire of him, that he would not be offended, neither with them the Commanders, nor the Soldiers, for being faithful to Pompey. But now they had done their duty, and having sufficiently smarted in all respects, and suffered more in Body and Reputation than they were able to bear, they confessed themselves vanquished, and imploring his mercy, desired they might not undergo the extremity of Fortune. In answer to what Africanus delivered, as humbly and submissively as possible, Cæsar expostulated for the Injuries they and their Friends had done him, and shewed how all the Forces had been kept up in Spain, purposely against himself, the Provinces standing in no need of them; how the course of Elections of Magistrates had been broken to do him prejudice; and

Sect. 7. to him was denied what had been granted to all Generals; that when they had brought matters happily to an end, they might dismiss their Armies with Honour, and, at least without dishonour, return home. Notwithstanding all this, he would require only that they should dismiss their Armies, having quitted the Provinces; which was readily accepted, especially by the Soldiers, who had feared worse things. Such as had Houses and Possessions in Spain were presently discharged, and the rest at the River Vorus sent out of Spain; whither while they marched, Cæsar promised to supply them with Corn, and did accordingly perform it.

And dismiss
teth them.

Other Writers celebrate his Generosity therein.

36. To this generosity of Cæsar other Authors bear witness, who had sufficient opportunity to know the Truth. They rather make the dangers he underwent in this Expedition greater than he doth himself; and Dio writes, That at Rome they gave him for lost, and many, as well Senators as others, betook themselves to Pompey. He adds, That at the same time D. Brutus gave a defeat to the Massilienses at Sea, which if it had not happened, Cæsar had been ruined; but the Report of this Victory being increased by design, and arriving in Spain, had such operation upon them there, that changing their opinions, they settled themselves to his Party. Having promised Afranius and his Companions to offer them no violence in any respect, and particularly not to constrain them to fight for him against Pompey, he kept himself strictly to his word; for he put none of them to death, although they had killed some of his unwary Soldiers in time of Truce; neither compelled he any of them to follow him in the Civil War, but the chief being dismissed, the rest of their own accord closed with him for advantage. This did him especial service both as to his Reputation and management of his Affairs. For all Spain, and the Soldiers in it, except such as in Belgica, M. Terentius Varro, the Legate of Pompey commanded, he hereby got to his Party, which things so succeeding, he travelled as far as Gades, and did no other injury to any Man than in what concerned Money, a great quantity of which he raised every where as he could. Many Honours he bestowed both publicly and privately, and gave freedom of the City to the People of Gades, which they of Rome afterward confirmed. And so in the opinion of Dio, he requited them for the Dream he had there when he was Quæstor, that he lay with his Mother, and for the hope he thence conceived of having all things in his sole Power. Over Spain he set Cassius Longinus, who being Quæstor there under Pompey, had reason to understand the humour of the Nation. He himself went by Ship to Tarraco, and thence proceeded by the Pyreneans, where he erected no Trophy, knowing his Adversary to have been blamed for so doing, but near that of Pompey caused a large Altar to be made of smooth Stone.

37. In the mean time, at Marcellæ, C. Trebonius made Mounts, and did all things he could to annoy the Town, at that place which gave passage by Land; for three parts of it were in a manner walled by the Sea. But such was the Provision of all necessities for War, which in ancient time they had stored up in the Town, that no Hurdles made of Rods or Officers were able to resist the force of their Engines. For out of their great Baliste they shot Beams twelve Foot long, pointed with Iron, with such execution, that they would pierce through four Courses of Hurdles, and stick in the Earth. Besides this the Albici made frequent Salies, and set fire to the Mounts and Towers; but they were easily preserved by the Roman Soldiers, who forced such as Sallied out to return with great loss. While they tugged thus on both sides by Land, an opportunity was presented for a Sea-Battle, by means of L. Nasidius, who was sent by Pompey with a Navy of sixteen Ships. To these the Massilians joined as many with all earnestness imaginable, and with Exhortations to one another, and Prayers to their Gods, as now being to adventure for all, for the Lives of themselves, and the Liberty of their City. But Brutus had also increased his Fleet with those which Cæsar had caused to be built at Arles, and he had the advantage of exhorting his Men to despise the Enemy as a vanquished Party, who had been overthrown in their very strength. The Massilians yet were wanting in no Point of Valour, fighting for all they had, as their Friends had adured them; and their Vessels excelled in nimbleness of Swimming and Tacking. But however, they were out-done by Brutus, whose Ship also was so nimble, that it elaped two of theirs, which designed from contrary quarters to come upon her, so as they fell foul on each other, and did such mutual mischief, that their Enemies seeing them thus distressed, set upon, and quickly sunk them both. The Ships that came with Nasidius proved of no use, and quickly left the Fight, which had that issue, that of those which came from Marcellæ five were sunk, and four were taken. One elaped with Nasidius his Fleet; and one of them that remained carried Tydings of the Defeat to the City, which received the

38. Notwithstanding they left not off pursuing what they had formerly done for their defence at Land. And the Legionary Roman Soldier was as industrious to oppose them, and protect himself in that opposition; for which purpose he raised an extraordinary Tower not far from the Wall, which was built by Stories, and by degrees with admirable Art and Industry. The Work-men were defended by the out-jettings of Matrelles, and other Materials, till they brought to perfection six Stories, and a Misculum or Moule, which reached even the Wall itself, with such strength and shape, that it could not be forced down, nor over-powered. This Device had so great execution, that the Besieged discouraged at it, and looking for nothing but the destruction of their City, threw themselves unarmed out of the Gates, and with Lamentations and Weeping, joined with Arguments that were moving, (for they were Men Learned and Eloquent) obtained of the Legates, that all Hostility should cease till Cæsar himself arrived. But so perfidious they were, that after a few days when the Romans were grown remiss and careless, they took the advantage of the Noon-time, when all were asleep, or out of the way, and rushing out of the Gates, set fire to the Works and Engines. The Cæsarians were at first amazed, but recollecting themselves as well as they could, they drove them back with great slaughter, and fell to re-edify the Works with greater alacrity than before. They began a Mount of a strange and unheard-of fashion, raised with two Side-walls of Brick six foot thick apiece, and joyned together with Floors. And the Work was carried on with such speed, that the loss of their former Labour was redeemed by their incredible Dexterity and Valour. They within perceiving all things to go contrary to their expectations, and considering that the Neck of Land leading to the Town, might be so possessed with Fortifications, that their Soldiers could not stand upon their Works; That the Enemy had raised a Counter-mine against the Wall of their Town, and that Missile Weapons might be cast upon them; knowing also that there would not be any more place for deceit and treachery, they defended to the same Articles of Surrendry as had been formerly accorded.

ous humour.

39. Marcus Varro in the further Province of Spain had all this while variously demeaned himself toward Cæsar. At first distrustful how matters would go with the contrary Party, he spake as kindly of him as of Pompey; but afterward upon report, and his own belief of Afranius his good success, he set himself against him every way he could both by Word and Action. He levied Soldiers, he caused them of Gades to provide ten Gallies, and ordered many others to be made at Hippallæ. He took all the Money and Ornaments out of the Temple of Heracles; made many reflecting Speeches against Cæsar and his Interest, affirming in publick, that he had been several times worsted, and that a great number of his Men had revolted to Afranius. He exacted much Money and Wheat from the Provincials, confiscated the Estates of such as he thought disaffected, and constrained all the Province to swear fidelity to him, and to Pompey; and being at length adverted what had happened, in the hither Province, he kept himself with two Legions, and all the Shipping and Provision, at Gades, as most safe, knowing that the whole Province affected the Cause of Cæsar. And that so it did he found shortly by further experience. For though Cæsar by good Motives was called into Italy, yet resolving to leave no appearance of War behind him, he sent two Legions before him, and basted himself with six hundred Horse into the farther Spain. He sent also an Edict for calling an Assembly at Corduba, and thither the Towns sent their Deputies unanimously, and all Roman Citizens appeared. They shut their Gates of their own accord against Varro, and the Gaditanis agreed with the Tribunes to drive Gallonus, whom he had left Governour there, out of their City; so that of Varro's two Legions, one forsook him and went its way, he looking on, and then perceiving how he was distressed, he sent and yielded up the other; and afterward coming to Cæsar at Corduba, delivered up the Money lying in his Hands, and gave an Account of the Corn and Shipping that was any where provided. After this Cæsar gave thanks, and caused restitution to be made to his Friends; ordered the things taken out of the Temple to be carried back, and making Q. Cassius Governour of the Province, he left with him four Legions. From Gades he passed by Ship to Tarraco, then by Land to Narbon, and thence to Marcellæ, where he first received News of the Law made at Rome for creating of a Dictator, and that M. Lepidus the Pretor named him to be the Man. The Massilians being reduced to great straits by Famine and Pestilence, and having no hope of relief, now yielded

How Matters
went in Af-

40. In the mean time Matters had a contrary issue in Africa under the Conduct of Curio, who transported two Legions into that Country. The Fleet of Pompey he beat and dispersed, and such Ships as were in the Bay of Utica he drew off to his Party, by proclaiming, that such (being in number two hundred) as would not presently come, should be taken for Enemies. At Utica lay Aldius Varus, to whom King Juba had sent to assist that Party six hundred Numidian Horse, and four hundred Foot, having had acquaintance with Pompey by reason that his Father was his Guest, and he bare a spleen to Curio, for the Law he preferred when he was Tribune of the People, for Confiscation of his Kingdom. The Cavalry on each side engaged; the Numidians were not able to abide the Charge of Curio's Horse; but about an hundred and twenty being slain, the rest retired to the Camp. The next day he incamped himself near the Town, but before the Fortifications were finished, a noise there was of great Forces that were coming from King Juba. Yet did his Horse, before the Legions could be well put in order, drive away all the Kings Forces that came marching without fear or care, and slew a great number of the Foot, the Horse getting almost all safe into the Town by the Sea-Shore. But so it happened that the next night after, two Centurions of the Nation of the Narfi fled from Curio with twenty two of their Soldiers to Varus, to whom they declared, that the minds of the whole Army were alienated from him, and that it was very expedient that the Armies should come in fight, and find means to speak together: Hereupon Varus drew out his Soldiers the next morning, and Curio put his Men also into order. But it had further happened that Curio had carried over these Legions which Cæsar had formerly taken at Corfinium; so that a few Centurions being slain, the Companies and Maniples remained the same. Now in Varus his Army there was one S. Quintilius Varus, who had been also at Corfinium, and being let go by Cæsar, went into Africa. This Quintilius taking the occasion so fully offered, went about the Army of Curio, and belought the Soldiers as he could, that they would not forget the first Oath they had taken to Domitius, and to him their Questor, nor bear Arms against them that had run the same Fortune, and endured the same Siege; nor fight for those who by way of reproach had called them Fugitives or Turn-coats. And he added some Promises of Recompence, if they would follow him and Africus.

41. Hereupon Curio his Army stood mute, and was much disturbed in mind, but they declared not themselves by any sign either one way or other, and each Party drew back to their Camps. In conclusion, the Legions which before were in the Service of Pompey, willingly embraced what was offered them; old acquaintance having made them forget what kindness they had lately received from Cæsar, being also of divers Countries and Nations. Curio seeing himself and his Affairs in such danger, after the matter had been in vain debated in a Council of War, called together the Soldiers, and in an exquisite Speech harangued unto them. He called to remembrance what they had done for Cæsar at Corfinium; how by their furtherance he had gained the greatest part of Italy, all the rest of the Municipal Towns being drawn to follow him by their endeavours. He shewed how great folly it would be now to betray those who professed themselves wholly theirs, and that afterwards they might come into their Power who took themselves to be undone formerly by their means. He related what Cæsar had done in Spain; that there two Armies were beaten, two Generals defeated, two Provinces taken, and all within forty days after he came in view of them. He put them in mind that they did not forsake Domitius, but that he forsook them. For he thrust them out, and exposed them to all extremity. Without their knowledge or privacy he fought to save himself by flight; and then they were kept alive by Cæsar's Clemency. He demanded how he could bind them by the Oath of Fidelity, when having cast away his Faeces, and laid down his Authority, he himself was made a private Person, and became captivated to another Man's Power. He told them, in conclusion, what he himself had done in this Expedition, for which, though he was content to be called Cæsar's Soldier, yet they had filled him by the Title of Imperator. And if it repented them, he would willingly again resign it, lest they should seem to give him Honour, which might turn to his Reproach.

42. His Oration so wrought upon the Soldiers, that they oftentimes interrupted him, as grieving to lie under a suspicion of Revolt, and at their desire he resolved to give give Battel upon the first occasion offered, seeing that the minds of all Men were so changed. And the day following an occasion was offered, which he so improved, as to put Varus his Army to the rout, and to force them to retire to their Camp, which he might have taken, but that his Men, not thinking of such work, but only of a Battle, were not provided of fit Instruments. Of the Adversaries were slain six hundred, with the loss of one Man on Curio's side, one Fabius Pelignus, an ordinary Soldier, who in the Pursuit fought for Varus, calling him with a loud Voice, as though he had been one of his own Soldiers, and had something to say to him. Being often called, as he looked back, asking him what he would have, and stood still, he made at Varus his Shoulder with his Sword, which was unarmed, and was very near killing him: Yet he avoided the danger by receiving the Blow upon his Target, and Fabius was presently inclosed and slain. Many more on Varus his side were wounded than were slain, who all, besides many others that feigned themselves hurt, left the Camp for fear, and went into the Town; which Varus perceiving, and knowing the affrontment of the Army, left a Trumpeter in the Camp, and a few Tents for show, and about the third Watch drew his Army in silence thither.

43. Curio now as Conqueror, the next day prepared to besiege Utica, the Inhabitants of which favoured Cæsar, and the rest in the Town being discouraged, all talked of a Surrender, and began to press Varus to it. But news arrived, that King Juba was coming to the Relief of the Place with all his Forces. This Curio was so confident, as not to believe at first, but when it was found assuredly that the Kings Forces were come within twenty five Miles, then he withdrew himself into a Place called Cornelianus his Camp, from P. Scipio his Incamping himself there formerly, which was every way convenient for defence and supply of Provisions. Hither he sent to have the two Legions and the Horse brought out of Sicily; and here he thought to draw out the War in length; when another report was brought, that the King himself was not come, being detained by some Controversies of the Lepidians; but only Sabura his Lieutenant was sent with some competent Forces, and was not far from Utica: To these Reports giving too light and easie credit, he altered his purpose, and resolved to give him Battle, being violently led to this resolution (Cæsar his Friend tells us) by his youthful heat, the greatness of his courage, the success of former times, and his confidence in managing of the War. He sent all the Cavalry the first night to the River Bagrada, where the Enemy lay indeed under the Command of Sabura. But the King followed after with all his Forces, and lay continually within six Miles, or thereabouts.

44. The Horse fell upon the Numidians, as they lay scattered, in a barbarous manner, altogether secure, and killing many of them, put the rest to flight. Curio himself having left a Guard to his Camp, followed, and met with his Cavalry in their return, of whom demanding who was General at Bagrada, and they saying Sabura, he omitted for half to inform himself of the rest, but told his Men, that now they saw was true what was formerly reported by Fugitives, that the King was not come, but had sent some small Forces which could not make their Party good with a few Horse; and he bade them therefore make haste to take the Spoil, and to receive the reward of their merits. The Soldiers encouraged with the sight of the Booty, which their Friends had taken, and their bragging Speeches, conceived also hope that it would be as he said, and hasted to find the Enemy, affrighted and affronted, as Curio believed, who commanded the Cavalry to follow him; but the Horse-men having travelled all night, could by no means do it; but some stayed in one place, and some in another, and yet this did not hinder or discourage Curio. Now for the Issue. Juba having notice of the Conflict, in the night sent immediately two thousand Spanish and Gallick Horse, which he kept for the safety of his Person, and such of the Foot as he most trusted, to relieve Sabura; he himself, with the rest of his Forces, and forty Elephants, followed slowly after.

45. Sabura suspecting that Curio was coming, Imbattelled all his Forces, and gave order, that under pretence of fear they should retreat by little and little, till he gave the Signal of Battel, or other directions. Curio supposed they fled indeed, and drew his Forces down from an Hill into the Plain, having marched now sixteen Miles. Sabura gave the Signal for Battel, and with his Horse charged the Romans, who were harried and wearied, and the Horse-men being but two hundred in number, (the rest staying by the way) were spent with travel, yet wanted they no courage nor desire to fight, and on what part soever they charged, they forced the Enemy to give way; but they could not pursue them far, nor put their Horses to any round or

Sect. 7. long Carrier. At length the Numidian Cavalry from both the Wings circumvented the Army, and malled them down behind, being often re-inforced by Succours sent from the King. Curio seeing his Men so dismayed, as not to receive his Orders, commanded them, as the last hope, to fly to the adjoining Hills; but Sabura had also possessed these places, and so they fell into utter despair, some being slain as they fled, and others falling down without wounding. Cn. Domitius, General of the Horse, desired Curio to save himself by flight to the Camp, promising not to leave or forsake him; but he confidently replied, That he would never come in Cæsar's fight, having lost the Army committed to him; and thereupon fighting valiantly, was slain. A few Horse-men saved themselves. The Foot were all killed to a Man; but such Horse-men as staid behind to refresh their Horses escaped to the Camp. Such as desired to be transported into Sicily, when Boats were brought, sunk them by crowding in, and the rest of the Vessels would not come to Shoar, by that sight discouraged; so that but a few Soldiers and Masters of Families that could swim to the Ships got over safe. The rest yielded to Varrus, whom Juba challenging as his Booty, caused many of them to be slain, and selecting a few of the rest, sent them into his Kingdom; Varrus in vain complaining that his Faith and Promise were violated. The King rode into the Town, accompanied by many Senators, and there remaining a few days, gave such orders for things as he thought fit, and then returned into his own Kingdom with all his Forces.

46. But now was Cæsar Dictator, and held the Assembly for creation of Magistrates. He himself and P. Servilius Isauricus were created Consuls; for at this time was he capable to be chosen, it being now ten years from his first Consulship, and consequently he was not obnoxious to the Law published by Sylla, wherein was provided, that no Man should be chosen to an Office within ten years after he had supplied the same. He took notice that credit was very scant throughout Italy, and money lent was not repayed. He gave order that Arbitrators should be chosen to make an estimation of Estates and Goods according as they had been valued before the War, and that at that rate Creditors should take them for their Monies. He restored the ancient course of Rogations, made by the Pretors and Tribunes, to the People; as also certain that were condemned for indirect suing for Magistracy by a Law in Pompey's time, when he kept the Legions about him in the City, he restored, and those who had offered him assistance at the beginning of the War, though they did not do it, he procured to be absolved by the People, that he might not seem ingrateful, nor yet assume to himself what belonged to the Comitia. In accomplishing these things, celebrating the Latine Holy-days, and holding the Assemblies of the People, he spent eleven days; then gave over his Dictatorship, left the City, and went to Brundisium, having commanded seven Legions, and all his Horse, to come thither. Such is the Account he himself gives us of what he did in his Dictatorship.

47. And other Writers in their Relations do little differ from that of his. Plutarch faith in his Life, That when he returned to Rome, Piso, his Father-in-law, advised him to send Messengers to Pompey to treat of Peace; but Isauricus, to flatter him, was against it. That Cæsar, then created Dictator by the Senate, called home all the Banished, and restored to Honour the Children of them who had been slain in Sylla's time, and did somewhat restrain the Usuries that did oppress them; and besides made some other Ordinances, but very few; for he was Dictator only eleven days, and then made himself Consul with Servilius Isauricus; and after that determined to follow the War. All the rest of his Army he left coming on the way, and went himself before with six hundred Horse, and five Legions, in the Winter Quarter, about the Month of January, which by the Athenians was called Pogideon.

48. Dion Cassius having told us how this great Man took away all the Arms, Ships and Money of the Masilians, and at length all the rest saving the Name of Liberty, because Pompey left free Phoenia, from which the Masilians descended, then acquaints us with a Mutiny of certain of his Soldiers at Placentia. They pretended they were spent with labours, but the matter was, they took it ill that he would not give them leave to plunder and spoil the Country; and now they thought they could ask nothing but he would grant it, because of the need at present he had of them. But their hopes were very ill founded; for so far was he from granting any thing they mutually desired, that calling them together, he shewed them in a long Speech what it was they deserved, and not only by word but deeds; for he caused them to be incompanied with their fellow Soldiers for his own security, and then made them an example of his Justice by taking out by lot, and putting to death the boldest of them; the

the rest, as being of no use to him, he cashiered; but afterward received them again when they had seen and repented of their Error.

49. But while he was still in his Journey from Marsilles, Dion adds, that M. Hæmilus Lepidus, he who afterward was Triumvir, and at present Prætor, advised the People to make him Dictator; which was speedily done according to the Custom. Coming to Rome, he entered upon his Office, but nothing sharp or severe did he the time he bore it: On the contrary, he gave liberty to Exiles, Milo excepted, to return home, and ordained Magistrates for the following year, for hitherto none had been put into the places of them that were gone away; inasmuch that there being no Ædiles, the Tribuni Plebis were obliged to discharge their Duties. He made new Pontifices in the room of the Deceased, yet therein not observing all things required by their Laws. He gave freedom of the City to the Gallæ inhabiting within the Alpes, because they had been under his command, and then laid down his Dictatorship, though indeed he still retained all his Power, the Senate permitting, that he should do what he would. And he improved this Power in a matter of great and necessary consequence. For now did Creditors with all bitterness imaginable exact what Monies were owing to them from those who borrowed of them for Supply in the Civil War, and most of them were utterly unable to pay, at this time it being very difficult either to pay or borrow. By occasion hereof many severe Acts were committed, and great mischiefs could not but follow; for although formerly the Tribuni Plebis had done something to restrain Usury, yet was not thereby any provision made for paying Debts; the Debtors parting with their Pledges, and yet the Creditors exacting the Sums after the ancient manner.

50. To obviate this mischief, Cæsar commanded the Pledges to be valued; and that Judges should be chosen by lot to take up these Controversies. And because many Persons were said to have much Money, and to suppress it, he commanded by an Edict, that none should have in Gold or Silver more than sixty Sesteria; which Law he did not make, but only renewed it, either that Debtors might pay something to their Creditors, or to discover who were rich; or else that no Man might have any vast Sums to raise any disturbance in his absence. However, with this Law the People were elevated, and began to require; that a Reward should be propounded to such Slaves as would accuse their Lords; but he not only refused to add this unto the Law, but laid Imprecations upon himself if ever he gave credit to a Slave that accused his Master. All these things done, and all Ornaments taken away both from the Capitol and other places at the end of the year, and before he entered his Consulship, he went to Brundisium. Dion here mentions, according to his Custom, Particulars prefiging what afterward happened, which caused his Diviners to desire him to hasten his Journey, affirming that destruction would befall him if he staid in the City; but safety and Victory if he passed the Sea. After he was gone the Boys of Rome divided themselves into two Parties, of which one took the Name of Pompeians, and the other of Cæsarians; and making a show of Fight, without Weapons, those that called themselves Cæsarians departed with advantage over the other. While these things were done at Rome, and in Spain M. Octavius and L. Scribonius Libo, with Pompey's Fleet, drove P. Cornelius Dolabella out of Dalmatia, and thence to C. Antonius, who prepared to relieve him in a small Island, where being deterred by the Inhabitants, and pinched with famine, they took him and all his Men, except such as killed themselves, or escaped into the Continent. Dion's Story of Curio's defeat in Africa, otherwise agrees with that of Cæsar; but he adds, that Juba was greatly honoured for that Action by Pompey, and the Senators with him in Macedonia, and had the Title of King. But by Cæsar and those of his Party he was adjudged an Enemy; and Bocchus and Bogud were slained Kings, because they were Enemies to Pompey. Now let us see what Cæsar himself writes of the coming to Blows betwixt him and Pompey.

51. He came, as we said, to Brundisium, but with an Army much lessened with travel and sickness, by reason of change from the good and wholesome Air of Gall and Spain, into that of Apulia, and the Maritime Parts. And he found no more Shipping ready than would hardly transport twenty thousand Legionary Soldiers, and five hundred Horse; and this want of Ships he saith hindered him from dispatching the War. On the other hand, Pompey having had a years space to provide himself, without any trouble or molestation, had got together a great Navy out of Asia, and all places where he could build Ships. He had raised great Sums of Money out of Asia and Syria, and exacted Supplies thereof from all Princes and States. From several Quarters he had raised nine Legions of Roman Citizens, to which he added, as

SECT. 7. a Supply, a great number out of some parts of Greece and Epirus. He mingled Antioch Soldiers amongst them, and expected two other Legions to be brought by Scipio out of Syria. He had from Crete, Lacedaemon, Pontus and Syria, and the rest of the Cities, three thousand Archers, of Slingers six Cohorts, two others Mercenary, and of Horse-men seven thousand. Herodotus brought six hundred Gales, and Arionides five hundred out of Cappadocia; and Cato out of Thrace had sent the like number with his Son Sadalis. From Macedonia came two hundred commanded by Rafipolis, a Person of much worth. From Alexandria five hundred Gales and Cypriotes, which A. Gabinus had left as a Garrison with King Phylax. Pompey the Son with the Navy had brought eight hundred of his own Slaves, and of those belonging to his Cattel. Tarcondarim, Callos, and Donilus, had sent three hundred out of Gallogracia, of whom one came in Person, and the other sent his Son. Two hundred did Antiochus Comagenus, to whom Pompey had given great Gifts, send out of Syria, amongst whom most were those Cesar called Hippocada, or Shooters on Horse-back. To these he added Dardani and Belli, partly mercenary, and partly procured by his Power and Favour; besides Macedonians, Thessalians, and those of other Nations and Cities, whereby he filled up the said number. For Corn he provided great quantity out of Thessaly, Asia, Crete, Cyrene, and other Regions. He appointed the Winter Quarters at Dyrrachium, Apollonia, and all the Maritime Towns, to keep Cesar from passing the Sea; and for that purpose disposed of his Soldiers all along the Sea-Coast. Now of the Egyptian Ships Pompey the Son was Admiral. Those that came out of Asia were commanded by D. Lelius and C. Triarius. C. Cassius had the command of those of Syria; and C. Marcellus, with C. Pompeius, of those of Rhodes. Of the Lithurians and Achaian Navy, Scribonius Libo, and M. Octavius, had the Charge. But M. Bibulus was General for Maritime Affairs, with chief Command.

52. Cesar at Brundisium having persuaded the Soldiers to leave all their Slaves and Baggage behind them in hope of Victory, and his liberality, shipped seven Legions, and in safety landed his Men at a place called Pharsalus, not daring to venture into any known Port, which he believed to be possessed by the Enemy. Being landed, he sent back his Ships to Brundisium to bring over the other Legions, but in their return thirty of them fell into the hands of Bibulus, who sensible of his neglect of guarding the Passage, and in wrath, let them all on fire, and therewith consumed both owners and Mariners, hoping by this Example to terrify the rest. This done, with greater diligence than had been usual, he possessed all the Sea-Coast from Salone to Oricum with Men and Ships of War, he himself in the depth of Winter refusing no labour, but watching on Ship-board, nor expecting any Supplies, if he could meet Cesar. M. Octavius, with something better success by Sea, came and drew Hissa from Cesar's Party, and not being able to prevail with the Inhabitants of Salone, he besieged the Town. The Place was indifferently well fortified by Nature, and their Industry, but the Inhabitants being wearied and spent with Wounds, still at length to the last Refuge of infranchising all their Slaves above the Age of fourteen, and cutting the Hair of their Women to make Engines. Their Resolution being known, Octavius begirt them with five Camps and Intrenchments, and they endured the want of Corn and other inconveniences. But the Siege continuing a long time, and this making the Besiegers remiss and negligent, they took the opportunity of the Noon-time, and placing their Women and Children on the Walls to make a show, they themselves, and such as they had enfranchised, made a Sally, and with violence broke through all the five Camps, and with great laughter forced Octavius, and his Men remaining, to betake themselves to their Ships, and leave the Place. He despairing of taking the Town, and Winter approaching, retir'd to Pompey at Dyrrachium.

53. Now did Cesar, as he tells us, think fit to send to Pompey about a Peace, and the Party on which he pitched to carry the Message was Vibullius Rufus, whom, being one of Pompey's Lieutenants, Cesar had twice taken, once at Corfinium, and a second time in Spain. His Instructions were to let him know, that in his opinion it was time to give way to Fortune, and lay down Arms, either Party having had such losses as might instruct it to prevent greater Inconveniences. That this was the only time to treat of Peace when both was confident of his own strength, and seemed to be of equal Power. That for Conditions, seeing they could not agree of them themselves, they ought to seek them from the Senate and People of Rome; and in the mean time it was convenient that both should take an Oath before their Armies within three days next following, to lay down their Arms, fend away their Auxiliaries, in which they confided, and consequently submit to the Decree of the People: And for assistance, rance, on his side, he would presently discharge his Forces, as well them in the Field, as in Garrison. Vibullius halted to Pompey; chiefly to let him know of Cesar's coming, and he, upon the News, with all speed made towards Apollonia, lest he should possess himself of the Maritime Cities. In the mean time Cesar took in Oricum, Apollonia, the Town of the Belindenjers, and also Epirus submitted to him. Pompey upon notice of these things halted toward Dyrrachium; but his Army was so affrighted with the News, that it seemed rather to fly than march, many of the Soldiers casting away their Arms. When he came near the Town, he opened the Trenches, and incamped himself; but still his Men were in such fear, that Labienus stepped out first, and swore never to forsake him whatsoever should happen. Then was the same Oath taken by the Legates, the Tribunes, Centurions, and all the Army.

54. Cesar understanding his Passage to be stopped to Dyrrachium, incamped himself upon the River Aspius, in the Confines of Apollonia, and there determined to winter under Skims, to expect the coming of his other Legions out of Italy, and protect such Places as had well deserved of him. And Pompey did the like, pitching his Camp on the other side of the River, whither he assembled all his Troops and Foreign Aids. Now did each Party mutually obstruct the Designs of the other. For Bibulus lay with his Fleet at Oricum, and kept the Sea and the Ports, so as Cesar's Army could not land from Brundisium; and then again, the Sea-Coast was all along so watched and guarded by Cesar's Men, that he could neither get Water nor Wood, nor his Ships to Land upon occasion; inasmuch as he was brought into such distress, that he fetched his Water and Wood from Coreyra; nay at one time, the Weather being very tempestuous, they were forced to content themselves with the Dew which by night fell upon the Skins that covered the Decks of their Ships. All these extremities they patiently bore, and would not leave the Coast; and yet they fought by a pretence of a Treaty to draw Cesar to a Truce, who requiring that his Messengers might have safe conduct to Pompey, when that was denied, he saw that their drift only was to avoid present danger, and began to think of prosecuting the War. In the mean time Bibulus, having contracted a Sickness by extremity of Cold and Labour, resolving never to be friends with Cesar for the loss of the Edility and Prætorship, ended his days on Ship-board. Now, Cesar tells us, he made again several offers for a Treaty, but the Conference was still broke off; once Pompey saying, that in case it proceeded to an Issue, he should be thought to enjoy his Life and the City by Cesar's favour; and at another time Labienus affirming, that no Composition could be made without Cesar's Head.

55. This made him the more to long for the Arrival of his other Forces from Brundisium, and they seeming to him to have omitted several convenient Gales, he wrote to them, and required them to take the first opportunity, which the Soldiers willingly did by the conduct of M. Antonius, and Ensius Calenus, for the love they bore to him. Three Legions of old Soldiers, one of new, and eight hundred Horse, by favour of the Wind, safely arrived, though they were pursued by Capornus, Admiral of the Rhodian Navy, of which sixteen Vessels perished by the turning of the Wind, and the roughness of the Weather. Only two of Cesar's Ships lagged behind, whereof one yielded to Octavius Crassus, upon a Promise of Life, but the Men being inexperienced young Soldiers, were put to death before his face; those of the other being old Soldiers, stoutly defended themselves, and escaped. About this time Scipio, though he had received several losses about the Mount Ananus, which separates Syria from Cilicia, yet had taken upon him the Title of Imperator. This done, he imposed heavy Taxes upon the Cities and Potentates of these Tracts, and from the Publicans of his Province took all the Money in their hands for the two years past, and by way of Loan that of the following year; and from the whole Province he exacted a number of Horse-men. He left then the Parthians behind his back, who had lately slain M. Crassus, and besieged M. Bibulus, and drew the Legions out of Syria. At his departure the Soldiers gave out Speeches, as if they would not march against a Citizen and Consul; but however, he brought the Army to Pergamus, and quartered it about in Winter in divers rich Cities; and for the better affording of his Men to him, gave them great Largesses and Gifts; nay, and besides, some Cities to plunder. In the mean time he most heavily oppressed the Province with Impositions. Upon Slaves as well as Free-men he imposed a Tax by Poll, and any Name or Pretence that could be invented for raising Money was most acceptable, they being esteemed the worthiest Men that would domineer, and cruelly exact most from such Cities and Villages as they were set over. The poor Province besides this was oppressed

Hereupon he determined concerning his Journey into Macedonia, and ſet forward a few days after.

Cæſar ſends Forces into the Province.

56. Cæſar now being joined with Antony, notwithstanding the endeavours of Pompey to the contrary, reſolved to march further up into the Province. At the deſire of ſome of the Inhabitants of Theſſaly, he ſent thither that Legion called the Seventh and twentieth, conſiſting of young Soldiers, with two hundred Horſe, and five Cohorts, and a few Horſe into Ætolia upon the ſame Invitation. Moreover two Legions called the Eleventh and Twelfth, he ordered into Macedonia, of which Province, that which was called the Free had profeſſed a great deal of forwardneſs in his Service. Ætolia was eaſily gained; but the Theſſalians ſtood divided in their opinions; and when Cn. Domitius Calvinius, who commanded the Legions, came into Macedonia, word was brought him that Scipio would ſpeedily be with him. And accordingly he marched with great fury toward him, but when he was come within twenty Miles, he ſuddenly turned his courſe toward Caffius Longinus in Theſſaly, and with ſuch ſpeed, that ſame did not prevent his Arrival. Caffius thus ſurprized, made away towards the Hills which incloſe Theſſaly and Ambracia. Scipio as earneſtly purſued him; but in his heat he received News from Favonius, whom he had left at the River Haliacmon, (which divideth Macedonia from Theſſaly) with eight Cohorts to keep the Baggage, that Domitius would ſpeedily be upon him, and that he was not able of himſelf to hold the Place. Upon receipt of the Letters he altered his purpoſe, and haſted back day and night to help Favonius, whereby it happened, (both Scipio and Domitius arriving together) that as the Industry of Domitius did help Caffius, ſo did Scipio his ſpeed deliver Favonius.

Pompey the Son ſits ſucces at Sea.

57. Scipio after this paſſed the River Haliacmon, as to fight with Domitius, who embracing the occaſion with alacrity, he was diſcouraged, and pitifully regretted to his former Poſt, fearing that the following day he ſhould either be conſtrained to fight, or with ſhame keep himſelf within his Camp. After this Domitius drew him to a loſs by an Ambuſhment, wherein M. Opimius, who commanded his Horſe, was taken. Cincius the Son of Pompey in the mean time, who commanded the Egyptian Fleet, by Cæſar's conſent had good ſucces at Sea, where he broke into the Haven of Noricum, notwithstanding all endeavours uſed to hinder him, and burnt his Enemies Ships both there and at Liſſus, and the Towns themſelves he endeavoured to maſter, but with no ſucces. At this time his Father lay at Alparagus, a Place belonging to Apollonia, and thither Cæſar marched with his Forces, ſate down near him, and offered him Battle. This he thought not fit to accept of, which put Cæſar upon new Councils. He retreated toward Dyrachium, with deſign thereby either to conſtrain him to fight, to force the Town, or elſe cut from him all Proviſions which there were laid up for the whole War. This laſt he effected, though Pompey at firſt thinking he had retired for want of Proviſion; upon finding his error, laboured to get thither before him. Being thus cut off from this Town, Pompey incamped himſelf in a convenient place to receive Proviſions by Sea. Cæſar now doubted that the War would prove tedious, and therefore the Sea-Coaſts being blocked up by Pompey's Fleet, he took order for Grain to be imported out of the Mediterranean Tracts of Epirus. And theſe Regions being far off, he appointed Store-houſes in certain Countries, and impoſed carriage of Corn upon the Places adjoining to them.

Cæſar beſieges the Father in a ſtrange manner.

58. This done, he entred into ſuch a courſe as the nature of the Place where Pompey was incamped did prompt him to. His Camp was incloſed with many high and ſteep Hills. Theſe Hills he took and built Forts upon them; then, as the condition of the Ground would bear, he drew Lines from one Hill to another, and ſo determined to incloſe Pompey with a Ditch and Rampire. This he did being ſtrained for want of Corn, that he might now freely forage about without fear of Pompey's Horſe, in which he was ſtrong; but chiefly he hoped to abate the exceeding great reputation he had amongſt Foreign Nations, when it ſhould be noiſed about that he was beſieged by Cæſar, and durſt not fight. Yet, for all this, Pompey reſolved to venture that, rather than quit the Commodity of the Sea, and Dyrachium, where all his Proviſion ſion of War whatſoever was to land. He reſolved to poſſeſs himſelf of as many Hills as poſſible, and to keep as much of the Country with good and ſufficient Guards, thereby to diſtract Cæſar's Forces, as it fell out, taking in no leſs than twenty five miles in Circuit, in which he foraged, and there cauſed many things to be ſet and planted by hand which ſerved for Food for his Horſes: Moreover, his Works excelled, for he abounded with Men, and had on the inſide a leſs compaſs to fortiſie. He reſuſed to fight, but he forely galled Cæſar's Men with his Archers and Slingers, ſo that almoſt all of them made them Coats of Quilt, ſtiſſening, or Leather, to keep them from danger. Mutual Contention gave occaſion to many Skirmiſhes and Encounters; to be ſure, in the opinion of Cæſar himſelf, the War was carried on in a ſtrange and unuſual manner. And this was not only in reſpect of the great number of Forts and Caſtles, but of the whole Siege and Conſequents thereof. For the weakſt are wont to be beſieged, and Sieges are made to cut off the Enemy from Proviſions; but Pompey was the ſtronger of the two, and received Proviſions by Sea. Cæſar on the other hand was in great ſcarcity, and yet his Soldiers, he tells us, bore it with ſingular patience, remembering how, notwithstanding ſuch great want endured both in Gall and Spain, they had gone away Conquerors of many great Nations. They were content with Barly and Peaſe inſtead of Wheat, and of a certain Root called Chara, which they made uſe of in the room of Bread. This, when Pompey's Soldiers jeered them, and objected their ſcarcity and miſery, they would commonly throw at them, and ſcatter in divers places, to diſcourage them in their hopes.

And Cæſar ſeſels.

59. But afterward the Caſe quite altered, Summer coming on. For Pompey's Army could ſcarcely be kept alive, eſpecially for want of Water, Cæſar having either turned another way, or dammed up all the Rivers and Brooks of the Country. On the contrary, Cæſar's Army was in extraordinary good health, having plenty of Water, and all Proviſions, except Wheat, of which there was good expectation, Harvest being ſo near at hand. After this followed ſeveral Skirmiſhes, wherein Pompey had far the worſt, and was forced to quit a Mount he had ſeized, to ſuccour his Mect, and return to his old Fortifications. Cæſar now by his Officers drew to his Party ſeveral Countries of Greece, and underſtanding that Scipio was come into Macedonia, ſent to him to procure a Peace, which he would have perſwaded him he might eaſily conſtrain Pompey to accept; having the Command of an Army. But this not ſucceeding, Cæſar applied himſelf more ſtraightly to block up Pompey, which brought him into ſuch diſtreſs, that his Horſes having conſumed all the Leaves of Trees, and all the Barley, there remained no more ſuſtenance for them, and now they were not able to go on their Legs. Hereupon he reſolved to break out, eſpecially after he had been informed of the condition of Cæſar's Fortifications by two Allobroges, Brothers, who having cheated the Soldiers of their Pay, revolted to him. He gave order to his light Armed Soldiers and Archers to defend themſelves with Bains and Faggots of Oſiers, and drawing out threeſcore Cohorts, Shipped them, and fell upon the Fortification of Cæſar by the Sea, which was not completed. This was done with ſuch execution, that all the Centurions of the firſt Cohort were ſlain, except the firſt of the Maniple of the Principes; and though both Cæſar and his Officers endeavoured to put a ſtop to the Proceedings of the Enemy, yet the Iſſue of the Attempt was, that Pompey got out of the Fortifications, and Incamped upon the Sea, in ſuch fort as he might freely go out to forage, and have no leſs acceſs to his Shipping, than he had formerly. Cæſar perceiving the loſs he had ſuſtained, and that this courſe of War had not ſucceeded according to his expectation, reſolved to change it, and ſate down cloſe by Pompey. He deſigned to cut off a Legion which had taken up a Poſt by a Wood; but in the Attempt his Men were intangled within the Fortifications of the old Camps lately deſerted, and therein ſo over-powered by the Supplies ſent in by Pompey, that he loſt, by his own conſent, nine hundred and threeſcore Soldiers, beſides Horſe-men of note, ten Tribunes, and thirty Centurions, beſides thirty two Military Enſigns. But the greateſt part periſhed in the Trenches, and on the River Banks, preſt to death, as driven by the fear and flight of their Fellows, without any Blow or Wound given them.

60. Pompey hereupon was ſaluted Imperator, and ſo ſuffered himſelf to be ſiled; though he uſed not the Title in any of his Miſſives, nor had any Lawrel in the Bundle of Rods carried before him. Labeius having begged the Priſoners, cauſed them all to be ſlain; and Pompey's Party took ſuch aſſurance, that not thinking any more of the Courſe of the War, they carried themſelves as already Victors, not at all conſidering the ſewneſs of Cæſar's Men to be the cauſe of their Succes, nor the diſadvan-trage of the Place, nor that the Army was divided into two parts, in such sort, that neither of them was in a capacity to relieve the other. They did not remember the common chances and casualties of War, wherein oftentimes very small causes, either of false suspicion, or of sudden fear, or of scruple of Religion procure great and heavy losses, as often as, either by the negligence of the General, or the fault of a Tribune, an Army is disordered. As if they had overcome by down-right Force and Valour, and no alteration could after happen, they magnified this days Victory by Letters and Report throughout the World. But Cæsar being driven from his former Purposes, resolved to change the whole course of the War, to omit the Siege, and withdraw the Garrisons. He cheered up his Army as well as he could, by putting them in mind of their manifold Victories in Italy and Spain, and other Successes, which, put together, over-balanced by much the late disaster. Having disgraced and displaced certain Ensign-bearers, the Soldiers were earnestly desirous, by a fresh Engagement, to redeem their credit; but he thought it not fit to put it to the trial, till their minds were settled, and he resolved to make a fair Retreat to Apollonia. He did with such speed, that Pompey could not overtake him, only some of his Horse came up with the Reer, but with loss were repulsed. Pompey followed a full Journey, but some of his Men rising hastily, had left a great part of their Baggage behind them, and induced by the nearness of their last nights lodging, left their Arms, and went back to fetch those things that were behind. Cæsar took this Advantage which he had expected, and continued his diligence; so that Pompey being tired the first day, and afterward striving in vain, and making great Journeys, and yet not overtaking him, the fourth day gave over the Pursuit, and betook himself to another Resolution.

61. Cæsar, for accommodating his Wounded Men, for paying his Army, feeding his Allies and Confederates, and leaving Garrisons in the Towns, was necessitated to go to Apollonia; but in performing these things, made all hast imaginable. For he desired to be with Domitius with all possible celerity, lest he should be engaged by Pompey's Arrival. If Pompey followed after him, he should by this means draw him from the Sea-side, and from such Provisions of War as he had stored up at Dyrrachium, and so should compel him to equal Conditions. If he should go over into Italy, then having joyned his Army with Domitius, he would go and succour that Country by the way of Illyricum. And if he should besiege Apollonia or Oricum, and so exclude him from all the Sea-Coasts, he would then besiege Scipio, and force Pompey to relieve him. Pompey conjectured as Cæsar purposed, that he might attack Scipio, and therefore thought it requisite to halt to his relief; but if he would not depart from the Sea-shore and Coryra, as expecting more Forces out of Italy, he then resolved to fall upon Domitius. Each halted to relieve his Friends, and surprize his Enemies; but Cæsar had turned out of the way to go to Apollonia, whereas Pompey had a ready way into Macedonia by Condearia. The News of Cæsar being defeated at Dyrrachium, did much incommode his Affairs; for thereupon several States drew off from his Party, and the Ways were so stopped, that no intercourse could be had betwix him and Domitius, till he met with him at Reginum, a Town situate upon the Frontiers of Thessalia. The first Town of this Country by the Way leading out of Epirus, was Gomphi, the Inhabitants of which formerly had offered themselves and all they had to be disposed of at his pleasure; but upon the Rumor of his overthrow, Androtheneas, Prætor of Thessalia, had drawn the multitude of Servants and Children out of the County into the Town, and sent to Scipio and Pompey for Aid. Cæsar knowing of what consequence this Town would be, and to strike terror into the rest, resolved to storm it, and making the Attack after three of the Clock in the Afternoon, notwithstanding the extraordinary height of the Walls, took it before Sun-set, and gave it to the Soldiers to be rifled. Then presently removing, he went to Metropolis, by his halt preventing all Messages and News. The Inhabitants at first Manned their Walls; but understanding by the Captives in Cæsar's Camp what had happened to Gomphi, yielded, and saved themselves. And this their happiness being compared with the desolation of Gomphi, had that effect, that there was not one State of Thessalia, Larissa excepted, which was kept in by Scipio, but yielded obedience to Cæsar; who now being got into a Place plentiful in Corn, which was almost ripe, resolved to attend Pompey's coming, and there to prosecute the remainder of the War.

62. A few days after, Pompey came into Thessalia, and taking the Legions all into one Camp, he made Scipio, with whom he had joyned, Partaker both of his Honour and Authority, commanding the Trumpets to attend his Pleasure for matters of direction, and that he should use a Prætorian Pavilion. Pompey being strengthened thus with the addition of another Army, all Men gave Cæsar for lost. His Enemies were in pain till their assured Victory was obtained, that they might return into Italy, and into heavy contests they fell, who should be successively Consuls, concerning Rewards and Preferments, and especially who should have Cæsar's Pricthood; some begged the Houses and Goods of such as were with Cæsar; besides, a great controversy grew in open Council, whether L. Hirtius should not be regarded at the next Election of Prætors, being absent, and employed by Pompey against the Partians. Other things they disputed, as not thinking so much of the means how to overcome, as how to lose the Victory. As for Cæsar, Provision of Corn being now made, and his Soldiers well relieved after a sufficient time passed from the Battel at Dyrrachium, he thought fit to try what Will Pompey had to fight. Every day he drew out his Men farther and farther from their Trenches, to imbolden them; and because he was much inferior to his Enemies in the number of Horse, he commanded certain lusty young Men of them that stood before the Ensigns, being nimble and swift in running, to fight amongst the Horse-men. They by their daily practice had learnt the use of that sort of fight; so that Cæsar tells us, one thousand of his Cavalry, in open and Champion places, upon occasion, would undergo the Charge of seven thousand of theirs, and they were not much terrified with their Multitudes. Now they made a fortunate Encounter; but Cæsar thinking Pompey would not be drawn to Battel, resolved to shift his Camp, and be always in moving, hoping by often removes to be better accommodated with Provisions, and upon a March to find some good occasion to fight; besides, he thought he should weary Pompey's Army with continual Journeys, it being not accustomed to travel.

63. But when the Tents were taking down, it was discovered, that the Enemy was advanced from the Hill, where he was formerly incamped, somewhat farther from his Trenches; so that it seemed they might fight in an equal and indifferent place. Thereupon Cæsar stopped his March, and drew out his Forces to fight, and Pompey, as afterwards it was known, was resolved to give Battel, for all that were about him moved him to it; and some few days before he had given out in Council, that he would overthrow Cæsar's Forces before the Armies came to joyn. He told them (who wondered at it) that the Cavalry had, upon his desire, promised him, when they drew near, to attack Cæsar's right Corner on the open side; so that the Army being circumvented behind, should be amused and routed, before Cæsar's Men should cast a Weapon, and thereby the War should be ended without danger of the Legions, or almost without any Wound received. Labiennus seconded his Speech and further encouraged them by affirming, that this was not the Army wherewith Cæsar performed such things in Gall and Germany, which was either dead, gone home, or a very small piece of it was remaining; but was gathered from the Leaves made in the hither Gall, and most of them out of the Colonies beyond Padus, and yet all the flower and strength of them was taken away in the last two overthrows at Dyrrachium. Affirming this, as not speaking rashly, but having been himself present at the Battels in Gall and Germany, he took a solemn Oath, not to return into his Camp, but with Victory, exhorting the rest to do the like. Pompey commending him, took the same Oath, neither was there any that refused it, all being now cocksure, and conceiving Victory already in their minds, as not imagining that any thing should be spoken vainly by so skillful a Commander, especially in so important a matter.

64. In the left Corner of Pompey's Army stood the two Legions which had been in the beginning of the War, taken from Cæsar by decree of the Senate, the one being called the First, and the other the Third, and with them stood Pompey. Scipio had the middle Squadron, with the Legions he brought out of Syria. The Legion of Cilicia joyned with the Spanish Cohorts, which Africanus brought, made up the right Wing. The rest of the Troops were interlaced betwix the Squadron and the Wings. In all they amounted to one hundred and ten Cohorts, and fifty five thousand Men, besides two thousand old Soldiers, and Men of note, which Pompey had dispersed over all the Army. The remaining seven Cohorts he left in the Camp, or disposed about the Forts near adjoining. The Right Wing was flanked with a River, having high and cumbersome Banks, and therefore he put all his Horse together with his Archers and Slingers in the Left. Cæsar observing his former Custom, placed the Tenth Legion in the Right Wing, and the Ninth in the Left, though they were much weakened in the Fights at Dyrrachium, but to the Ninth he joyned the Eighth, so as he seemed to make one of two, and commanded them to succour each other. In all he had about Eighty Cohorts, which was but twenty and two thousand Men; and two Cohorts he left to keep the Camp. The Left Wing he assigned to Antonius, the middle Battle to Cn. Domitius, and the Right Wing to Pub. Sylla, and stood himself against Pompey. Having well observed all things, and fearing lest his Right Wing should be inclosed by the Multitudes of the Enemies Horse, he speedily drew five Cohorts out of the Third Battle, and of them he made a Fourth to encounter their Cavalry; shewed them what he would have done, and admonished them that the success of that day rested in the Valour of those Cohorts. He put them all in mind of his favours and his carriage towards them from time to time, and especially how they themselves were Witnesses, that he had several times fought for Peace: Neither was he willing at any time to spend the Soldiers Blood, or deprive the Common-wealth of either of those Armies.

of the Fight.

65. There was so much space left between both the Armies, as might serve either of them to meet upon the Charge. Pompey commanded his Men to receive the shock of Cæsar's Soldiers without moving from the Place. This he did by the advice of C. Triarius, to the end that the first violence of the Soldiers being broken, and the Battle diffused, they that stood in perfect order might have the advantage of them that were dispersed. Besides, it was hoped the Piles would not fall so forcibly upon the Army standing still, and that Cæsar's Soldiers, having so far to run, would by that means be out of breath. This in Cæsar's opinion was without reason, there being, he saith, a certain incitation and alacrity of Spirit planted in every Man naturally, which is inflamed with a desire to fight; which no Commander ought to repress or restrain, but rather increase and set it forward. However his Soldiers, upon sign of Battle, running out with their Piles ready to be cast, and perceiving that Pompey's Men did not make out to meet them, whom they looked upon as Men of experience, and exercised in former Fights, they stop their course, and almost in the mid-way stood still, that they might not come to Blows upon spending of their strength: Then, after a little respite they ran on again, threw their Piles, and presently drew their Swords, as Cæsar had commanded them. Pompey's Soldiers were not now wanting on their part, but having received the shock, cast also their Piles, and betook themselves to their Swords, keeping their Ranks. His Horse-men did not forget the Orders they received, but from his Left Wing, with the Multitude of Archers, made such a Charge, that Cæsar's Horse was not able to sustain it, and they put themselves into Squadrons to inclose the Army. Now did Cæsar give the Sign to the six Cohorts to advance, who came with such fury upon Pompey's Men, that none of them were able to stand before them, but fled as fast as they could to the highest Hills, whereby the Archers and Slingers, being left naked, were put to the Sword; and now the Cohorts, notwithstanding any resistance, charged the Left Wing upon their Backs. At the same time Cæsar commanded his third Battle, which as yet stood still, and was not removed, to advance forward; and these Men being fresh and sound, and relieving such as were faint and weary, and others charging them upon the Backs, Pompey's Party was no longer able to endure it, but all turned their backs, and fled. Thus it fell out according to Cæsar's opinion, and as he had spoken in his Incouragement to the Soldiers, that the Victory would grow from the six Cohorts placed in the fourth Battle against Pompey's Horse-men.

66. As soon as Pompey saw his Horse were beaten, and perceived the Party he most confided in to be amazed and affrighted, he distrustful the rest, and forthwith left the Battle, conveying himself on Horse-back into the Camp: With a loud voice he commanded the Centurions, which had the Watch at the Pretorium Gate, to defend it diligently, to prevent any hard casualty that might happen, saying, That he would go about to the other Ports to settle the Guards; but into the Pretorium he went distrustful the main Point, and yet expecting the Event. And he was followed into the Camp by his Soldiers, to whom Cæsar would give no respite; but notwithstanding the great heat, it being now mid-day, perswaded his Men to force it, which they did without very much trouble, it being chiefly defended by Thracians and Barbarians, for the Soldiers were weary and wounded, and fought how to shift for themselves. Neither could they that stood upon the Rampire endure the multitude of Weapons, but, fainting with Wounds, forsook the Place, and fled to the high Mountains adjoining, being led thither by the Centurions and Tribunes. In the Camp were found rich Furniture, and the Tents were strowed with fresh Herbs and Rushes, and many other superfluities there were, which discovered their extream luxury and assurance of Victory; and yet they upbraided Cæsar's patient and miserable Army with riot and excess, to which there was always wanting such Requisites as were expedient for necessity.

ry enigs. When Cæsar's Men entered the Camp, Pompey having cast off all Imperial Ensigns, got on Horse-back, and from the Decumanus Gate fled to Lerissa with all the half he could make, whence with the same speed he posted night and day, till he got to the Sea-side, with a Troop of thirty Horse. Then went he aboard a Ship of Burthen, complaining, that his opinion only deceived him, being as it were betrayed by those that first fled, from whom he had chiefly hoped for Victory.

Pompey's Soldiers submit to him.

67. Cæsar having got the Camp, perswaded his Soldiers not to look after Booty, but to finish the Work they had been about. Then began he to inclose the Hills with a Fortification, which caused Pompey's Party to desert the Place, being without Water, and take the way toward Lerissa. With four Legions he followed them, and coming a nearer way, after six Miles, Imbattled his Forces, whereupon they betook themselves to an high Hill, under which ran a River. Now Cæsar's Soldiers were pendent with continual toil all this day, and night was at hand; yet for all this he prevailed with them to cut off the River from the Hill, by a Fortification, to keep them from watering that night. This being perfected, they began to fend about, treating upon Conditions to yield themselves, and some few of the Senators escaped away in the night. As soon as it was light Cæsar caused them all to come down into the Plain, and to cast away their Arms, which done without refusal, they cast also themselves upon the Earth, spread their hands abroad, and shedding many Tears, desired mercy. He comforted, and commanded them to stand up, and having spoken something of his clemency a little to ease them of their fear, gave them all their Lives with safety, commanding the Soldiers to hurt none of them, and that they should want nothing which was their own. After such wonderful diligence used, he sent for other Legions which had rested in the Camp, and that day went to Lerissa. He tells us he lost in the Battle not above two hundred Soldiers, but of Centurions, valiant Men, he lost thirty. Of Pompey's Army were slain about fifteen thousand, and twenty four thousand yielded themselves. Such Cohorts as were in the Forts yielded to Sylla, and many fled into the next Towns and Cities. Of Military Ensigns were brought out of the Battle to Cæsar one hundred and fourscore, with nine Eagles. The News of this Victory arrived in good time in the Western Parts, where, at Sea, Cæsar's Affairs went down the wind. Cassius in Sicily burnt his Ships in divers places, and if the Report had not come seasonably, Messana had been taken.

Pompey flies into Egypt.

68. But Cæsar resolved, that all other things he was to set aside, and to pursue Pompey, lest he should leave Forces that renew the War. He made forward every day as far as his Men were able to go, and the fame of his Victory flew before him, which caused the Cities to exclude Pompey and his Party as they went by Sea; and Pompey leaving off his purpose of going into Syria, directed his course toward Pelusium. There by chance was King Ptolomy, a Child within years, making War against his Sister Cleopatra with great Forces, whom a few Months before, by means of his Allies and Friends, he had thrust out of his Kingdom. Pompey lent to him, that in regard of the ancient Hospitality, and the Amity he had with his Father, he would receive him into Alexandria, and by his Wealth and Power support him, now fallen into misery and calamity. And they that were near, when they had done their Message, began to speak liberally to the Kings Soldiers, and to desire them to stand by Pompey, not despising the lowe ebbe of Fortune to which he was brought. Their Speech was so properly applied, that amongst these Men there were many that had been Pompey's Soldiers, whom Gabinus had received out of his Army in Syria, and brought to Alexandria; and upon ending of the War had left them with Ptolomy, the Father of this Boy. But these things being known, such as were Protectors of the King, and Guardians of the Kingdom in his minority, either induced by fear that the Army should be gained, (which afterward they affirmed) and thereby Pompey might seize upon the City and Egypt, or despising his Fortune, (for the most part it happening, that a Mans Friends become his Enemies, when low) gave a good Answer openly to such as were sent, and willed him to come to the King; but secretly plotting among themselves, sent Achillas, a principal Commander, and a Man of great boldness, together with L. Septimius, a Tribune, to kill him. They gave him good words, and he himself knowing Septimius to have led a Company under him in the War against the Pirates, went aboard a little Bark with a few of his Soldiers, and there was slain by Achillas and Septimius. In like manner L. Lentulus was apprehended by commandment of the King, and killed in Prison.

And there is killed.

69. Cæsar having staid a few days in Asia, and heard that Pompey was seen at Cyprus, conjectured, as it was, that for his friendship and correspondency with the Kingdome

Se<sup>ct</sup>. 7. Kingdom of Ægypt, he was gone thither, where he might be furnished with other advantages. He proceeded therefore to Alexandria with two Legions, eight hundred Horse, ten Gallies of Rhodes, and a few Ships of Asia. In the Legions were not above three thousand and two hundred Men, the rest being either wounded in Fights, or spent with travel; yet trusting to the fame of his great Performances, he doubted not to go with these weak Forces, thinking every place would entertain him safely. But coming to Alexandria, where he heard of Pompey's Death, his having Bundles of Rods carried before him gave great offence to the Multitude, which at his landing, and afterward, was very tumultuous, crying out, that the Kings Authority was diminished. Hereupon he gave order for other Legions, inrolled out of Pompey's Soldiers, to be brought him out of Asia, he being stopped in Ægypt, as he saith, by the Etesian Winds, which are against them that Sail from Alexandria. He now conceived, that the Controversie between the King and his Sister belonged to the Cognizance of the People of Rome, and consequently of himself as Consul, and the father, for that in his former Consulship there was a League made by Decree of the Senate with Pholomy the Father: In regard hereof he let them know his pleasure, that they should rather plead their Cause before him, than decide the Controversie by Arms. At this time one Photinus, an Eunuch, had the Administration of the Kingdom, who disdaining that the King should be called to plead his Cause, drew the Army secretly from Pelusium to Alexandria, and made Achillas General, giving him Instructions what he would have done. Now old Pholomy by his Will had left his eldest Son and his eldest Daughter his Heirs and Successors in his Kingdom, and had charged the People of Rome by all things Sacred to see it duly observed. Cæsar was endeavouring to take up the Quarrel by a friendly and peaceable Arbitrement, when he was disturbed by the coming down of the Kings Forces. His own were not such as to hazard a Battle without the Town, but he stood upon his Guard, and commanded the Soldiers to Arm. He procured also, that Discolides and Serapion, two Persons eminent for their Embassies at Rome, as well as for other Employments, to be sent from the King to Achillas to know his Purpose, whom, as soon as he saw, he commanded to be put to death. Hereupon Cæsar endeavoured to get the King into his own Hands, to make use of the Authority of his Name and Title amongst his People, and to make it appear, that this War was moved rather by the private Practices of some seditious and designing People, than by his Order and Commandment.

The Alexandrian War.

The Alexandrian Army.

70. Achillas his Forces were not to be despised, either for their number, or fashion of Men, or experience in War. For of them he had twenty two thousand in Arms. They consisted of the Soldiers of Gabinus, who by this time were grown into an habitual Custom of the Life and Liberty of the Ægyptians; and having forgot the Name and Discipline of the People of Rome, had married Wives, and most of them had Children. To these were added such as were gathered from the Thebes and Robbers of Syria, and other neighbouring Countries, besides many banished Men, and others condemned to die. For Alexandria always afforded a receptacle for all the Roman Fugitives; and there they had a certain Condition of Life: for upon giving up his Name a Man was presently inrolled a Soldier. And if a Slave chanced to be apprehended by his Lord, he was presently rescued by the concurrence of Soldiers, who being all in the same condition, did strive and struggle for him as for themselves. These Troops thus constituted, would when they pleaded cause the Kings Friends to be slain, they would rob Rich Men of their Goodsto enlarge their pay, besiege the Kings House to expel his Ministers out of the Kingdom, and send for others home, and that according to an old Custom and Privilege of the Alexandrian Army. But beside, there were two thousand Horse that had been of ancient continuance in many Wars, and had brought back Pholomy the Father, and restored him to his Kingdom; had slain Bibalus his two Sons, and made War with the Ægyptians; such experience they had in War.

71. Achillas trusting to these Forces, and contemning them that belonged to Cæsar, attacked that part of the Town where he lay, and endeavoured by all means to break into his House. This caused a most fierce Encounter, and another as fierce happened at the Port where Achillas endeavoured to seize on all the Shipping, whereby he would have cut off all Supplies that might have been sent to Cæsar. This caused Cæsar to bestir himself, which he did to such purpose, that the Vessels he got into his Power, and burnt them all, not being able to keep so many things with so few Forces, and presently landed some Soldiers at Pharus. This Pharus, he tells us, was a Tower which took its name from an Island wherein it stood; the Island was of a great great height, and the Town built with strange Workmanship. The Island lay over against Alexandria, and so made it an Haven. But former Kings had enlarged it nine hundred Paces in length, by raising great Moles in the Sea, and by that means brought it near the Town, that they had joyined them both together with a Bridge. In the Island dwelt Ægyptians, who made up a Village resembling a Town, and robbed all such Ships as by Error or Tempest were cast upon the Place, none being able to get into the Haven by reason of the narrowness of the Entry, without the leave of such as held Pharus. Cæsar afraid of this, while the Enemy was engaged in fight, landed his Men, and seized the Place by a Garrison, so that Corn and all other Succours might come to him; for he had sent to all the confining Regions for Aid. He caused also several Places near him to be fortified in the City, while in the mean time the younger Daughter of Pholomy, out of hope to obtain the Crown, now in question, conveyed her self out of the Kings House to Achillas, and both jointly undertook the management of the War. But they presently fell out about the chief Command, to the great advantage of the Soldiers, whom they both cared with Largesse. While they were thus busied, Pholitus, Governour of the young King, and Superintendent of the Kingdom, sent Messengers to Achillas, desiring him not to desist, or be discouraged. Upon discovery and apprehension of such Messengers, Cæsar caused him to be slain. And these were the beginnings of the Alexandrian War.

72. Thus long we have heard Cæsar himself relate his own Acts; for indeed we generally believe we hear or read him, when we peruse those Writings which bear his Name. Yet Julius Lipsius it seems thought these Commentaries not to have been written by him, saying, That the reason why most Eloquent Men esteemed that Book as a Pattern of Eloquence, was, because they presumed it was Cæsar's, and if it had not Cæsar's Name, peradventure the Book would not be in such request. Now there is nothing of this nature more certain, than that Cæsar left Commentaries of his Achievements, both in the Gallick, and Civil War with Pompey; not only Suetonius affirming this, but Plutarch, Pliny, Strabo, and Cicero commend them for extraordinarily good. It is known sufficiently, that Cæsar excelled or equalled in Language the most famous Orators of his time. But indeed the broken and loose manner of the Composition of these Commentaries, as now we find them, hath given occasion to Learned Men to question, whether they be his true and genuine Works the Author oftentimes rather endeavouring to speak, than speaking. They object, that they are obscure and intricate, here bare, and there superfluous, and far different from that Terse and Attick Style of Cæsar, which Cicero so exceedingly commends. Therefore Lipsius doubted, whether he should not ascribe these Books to Julius Cæsar, having found in a certain Piece called Margareta Poetica, more than twenty fragments cited out of them, but always in the Name of Julius Cæsar. Moreover, Johannes Salverbiensis, in his Polyhistoricus, or his Works De Nugis Curialium, produceth many Testimonies taken in these Writings, but from Julius Cæsar too. Vincencius, in his Spectulum, describing the Bridge of the Rhine, celebrated by Cæsar in his fourth Book, commends Julius Cæsar, not Cæsar, for Author. And Rodericus Sanctius, in the third part of his History of Spain, and the thirty third Chapter, commends the Authority of Julius Cæsar for the History of the Alexandrian War, in Passages now found in the Book commonly ascribed to Horius.

Whether the Commentaries going under the Name of Cæsar were his.

73. It's therefore thought, that this Cæsar tampered with the Commentaries of Cæsar, and if he did not wholly alter, yet he interpolated them, that, as Claudius Cæsar said, The Author indeed appears, but the Style is evident. In an ancient Copy of Lexinius Torrentinus, at the end of the seventh Book, was found written The Epiphemerie or Journal of C. Julius Cæsar, concerning the Gallick War, here ends. Julius Cæsar of Constantinople, a Man of the Rank of Clarissimus, read it. He cut off, and cast away many things, and particularly the History which Servius, in his second Book upon Virgil, recites from Cæsar's Journal, for now it no where appears. Virgil saying, That having plucked the Enemy from his Horse, he grasped him with his Right Hand, Servius notes, That he had this out of the History. For C. Cæsar being taken by the Enemy, and carried away armed as he was, one of the Enemies that knew him met him, and said insulting, Cecos Cæsar, which in the Language of the Gallies signifies Dismissed; and so it came to pass that he was dismissed. This Cæsar speaks of in his Journal, where he commemorates his own felicity. For these Reasons, both Lipsius and others thought, that in those Commentaries we now make use of, the Matter and Narration was Cæsar's, but not the Words. If we consider what formerly we have seen objected by Monetus, concerning the Errors either of Cæsar, or such as meddled with Sect. 7. with his Writings, it will induce to think they might have the more reason for their opinion, and it tends not to the dispute of Cæsar. Presuming however at the least, that the Matter and Story is his, it's convenient to examine what other Writers furnish us with that may attest or qualify his Narrations.

What other Writers say of this War.

74. What ever he speaks concerning his desire of Peace, and making means to obtain it, Writers censure as well him as Pompey, for designing high things, and our of ambition more than any other Principle, driving on the War to such extremity. Pompey was not forward to pursue Cæsar, so as he might have done after the advantage he had got at Dyrbachium, Cæsar saying to his Friends, that his Enemies had won the Victory, had they known how to overcome. And indeed Pompey's Followers generally behaved themselves as if the War was then at an end, in so much that some of them went to his Wife Cornelia to congratulate with her upon that account, and some took care about Possessions, and suing for Offices in Italy, crying out, that he should return thither. But now when he had Cæsar in chase, he thought it not honourable to fly from him, especially to desert Scipio his Father-in-law, and other Senators dispersed through Greece, who upon his retreat must fall into Cæsar's Hands. Yet he did not purpose to fight him; only to besiege, and cut him off from Victuals. Plutarch tells us plainly of a Report raised amongst the Equites, that if Cæsar was overcome, they must also reduce Pompey to a private Man again; that this confirmed him in his resolution, and was the cause why he would no more employ Cato as one who intended to make him resign his Authority. This was melted out by his Companions, who seeing him loiter, said, he made not War against Cæsar, but the Senate and his Country, that he might ever retain his Authority, and have them for a Guard, and his Servants about him, to rule and command the World. The Taunts of Domitius Ahenobarbus, who called him Agamemnon, and King of Kings, raised him much envy, as also the Speeches of several others, amongst whom Afranius ranted against him, impatient to have Cæsar's Offices disposed amongst themselves, with other Places of Dignity in the State. So, as Plutarch writes, they hurried him to a Battle, contrary to his Judgment of fighting Cæsar's Army, which had taken a thousand Towns by Assault, had subdued above three hundred several People, had won infinite Battels against the Germans and Gauls, was never overcome, had taken a Million of Men Prisoners, and had slain as many in several Battels. This fatal one was fought on the Plains of Pharsalus, (not of Philippi, as Florus silly relate, and with him Mamilius and Virgil) betwixt that Town and the River Empæus. The word of Pompey was, Unconquered Hercules, and that of Cæsar, Victorious Venus. It's said, that Cæsar gave order to his Horse-men to cast their Darts upwards into the Faces of their Enemies, which made the young Gallants not only smart, but being astonished at the manner of Fight, to cover them with their Hands, and run away.

to the highest pitch from a very low state.

75. But thus, by the Valour of his Soldiers, as well as his own Conduct, was Cæsar raised from the extremity of his wants, and the disgrace of his former losses, to the chiefest Height of Earthly Glory and Power; so that what was wont to be said of his Country, that the Fortune of the People of Rome was great, but still grew greater from troubles and difficulties, might be applied unto him. Now had Pompey, by his over great Power and Interest, brought the Common-wealth to that pass, that it could not subsist but by the benefit of Servitude, as Seneca words it, or with being in the Hands of a single Person, who caused Servitude or Liberty as he was inclined. It's said, that at Mytilene, in his flight, he had much discourse with Cratippus the Philosopher, (the same to whom Cicero sent his Son to study) who in their talk made it evident, that his course of Government had brought a necessity of changing the State from the condition of a Common-wealth, to that of a Just Monarchy. When he was come into Ægypt, and had sent to the King to be received, a Council was called by the Governours to consult what was to be done, during which he rode at Anchor, expecting their resolution. Some would have him received, and some not; but Theodotus of Chios, who taught the King Rhetoric, to shew his Eloquence, affirmed, that neither the one nor the other was to be done; for by receiving him they should make Cæsar their Enemy, and Pompey their Lord, and by denying him they should disoblige him, and displease Cæsar for letting him escape. In conclusion, he persuaded them to send to kill him, for thereby they should win the favour of the one, and not fear the displeasure of the other; and some say, that he added this Saying, That a Dead Man bites not. This being determined, they gave Achilles order to do it, who took with him Septimius and Salvius, another Centurion, with three or four Soldiers, and persuaded him to come out of his his Ship into a Fishers Boat, the Shore being filled with Armed Men. None in the Boat speaking friendly to him, he told Septimius he thought he should know him, having served formerly with him, at which the other nodded with his head, that it was true, but gave him no other answer, nor shewed him any courtesy. Seeing this, he took a little Book he had in his Hand, in which he had written a speech he intended to make to Prology, and began to read it. When they drew nigh the Shore, he took hold of the Hand of Philip, his enfranchised Slave, to rise more easily, and then Septimius coming behind him, thrust him through with his Sword. Now Salvius and Achilles drew theirs. Pompey did no more, but took up his Gown with his Hands, and covered his Face, then patiently and manly he received the Wounds they gave him, only fighting a little. Thus died he, fifty nine years old, the next day after that of his Birth. A great Man, as not only the Sir-name given him, but his Actions, in the Eastern Countries, and others, declared; but he was over-matched by his Rival, and was, however, too formal and slight to overcome Cæsar and his Fortune.

Cæsar.

76. Having stricken off his Head, they cast his Body over-board, as a miserable Spectacle for all that had a desire to see him. Philip his Freedman remained by it till they had all gazed their full, and then with an old Fishers Boat he found on the Shoar scarcely burnt it, being assisted by an old Roman, who had dwelt long in the Country, and prided himself in this Honour of doing to him this last Office. Not long after came Cæsar into Ægypt, and Pompey's Head was presented to him, but he turned aside, and would not see it, abhorring him that brought it as a detestable Murderer. He took his Ring with which he sealed his Letters, and whereon was engraven a Lion holding a Sword, and burst out a weeping. Achilles and Pothinus (Plutarch adds) he put to death. King Prology was overcome in Battle, vanished away, and was never heard of. Theodotus the Rhetorician escaped Cæsar's Hands, and wandered up and down Ægypt in great misery, despised by every Man, till Marcus Brutus, who slew Cæsar, fubduing Asia, met with, and put him to death after cruel Torments. The Ashes of Pompey's Body were afterwards carried to Cornelia his Wife, who buried them in a Town of hers by the City of Alba. This is Plutarch's Account, who blames this great Captain especially for being heftored by his Officers into a Battle, and deceived by his Father-in-law Scipio, who, it is said, intending to keep the greatest part of the Money he had brought out of Asia to himself, halted and perswaded him to fight, by telling him there was no Treasure left.

77. Dion Cassius relates the same Story as Plutarch, concerning Cæsar his weeping at the sight of Pompey's Head. He adds, that he lamented, called him his Son-in-law, and related what they two had done together. That he was so far from owning his Murderers to have done him any Service, that he blamed them for the Fact, and gave the Head to others to be honourably interred. As hereby he deserved Praise, so in the opinion of the Writer he deserved to be laugh'd at for his counterfeiting. For having above measure coveted Domination, hated Pompey always as his Adversary upon that account, devised all manner of things against him, and undertaken this War for no other reason, than that having removed him out of the way, he might obtain the Sovereignty, and being for no other thing come into Ægypt, than to destroy him, if he was yet alive; he pretended a mis of him, and to be troubled at his Death. He being so made away, Cæsar thinking there was nothing of Hostility now behind, spent his time in Ægypt in gathering up money, and deciding the Controversie betwixt Prology and his Sister Cleopatra, and became intangled in the Alexandrian War, as we have shewn in the History of that Kingdom. In the mean time Pharnaces was at work in Pontus, where being encouraged by the late Civil War, he had attempted to seize on his Fathers Kingdom. And another, both Civil, and, as Dio terms it, Foreign War was begun by Cato and others in Africk. For he being left by Pompey at Dyrbachium to guard the Passage from Italy, upon his overthrow, betook himself from Epirus to Coreyra, with whom joyned such as had fled from the Battle, or were of that Party; for though Cicero, and some other Senators, went frait to Rome, yet most of them with Labiæus and Afranius (who both desired of pardon from Cæsar, the one because he had revolted from him, and the other because having once been pardoned he had again taken Arms against the Conqueror) went to Cato, and under him, as General, renewed the War. To them joyned Octavius, who had played about the Ionian Sea, had taken C. Antonius, and many Towns, but his Men, after the Battle of Pharsalus, fell off from him. So did Cn. Pom- pey, who with the Egyptian Fleet had made incursions into Epirus, and attempted Orienum, as also Brundisium, though without success, after the defeat of his Father, and the departure of the Egyptians; whereupon he betook himself to Caro, to whom also repaired C. Cassius, who had vexed many Parts of Italy and Sicily, and fought often prosperously both by Sea and Land. Cato using these Persons as his Councillors and Assistants, passed into Peloponnesus, with hopes of seizing on that Country, knowing yet nothing of the Death of Pompey. But Q. Fulvius Calenus marching against them, they set sail, and went to Cyrene, where, hearing of Pompey's Death, they then differed in opinion. Cato, who by no means would bear the Domination of Cesar, resolved for Africa, and was followed by such as despaired of safety, where they omitted nothing they could devise against Cesar. Most of the rest were dispersed, as it happened; and some went strait to Cesar, and obtained pardon, amongst whom was C. Cassius.

78. Calenus, before the Battle of Pharsalia, being sent into Greece by Cesar, attacked the City of Athens, but could not force them to yield, till News arrived of his Success. Then they submitted, and Cesar forgave them without any injury offered to them, or any fine imposed, saying, That they having grievously offended, were preferred by the Dead; by which saying he hinted, that he spared them for the Glory and Virtue of their Ancestors. After this most other Towns of Greece reconciled themselves to him, and Megara paid dear to Fulvius for its contumacy. At Rome, before the Controversie was determined, all openly spake well of Cesar, for fear of his Soldiers there left, and of Servilius his Colleague. When they believed the defeat of Pompey, they caused the Statues of him and Sylla to be demolished at the Rosira; but fearing he might yet recruit himself, they thought they had done too much. But when they understood for certain of his death, then what was it they would not do for Cesar, the principal Citizens striving who should exceed in flattery, and hoping to obtain Preferments for so doing, whereas it was known they were driven to it by the exigency of Affairs? They gave him Power to determine of those of Pompey's Party as he pleased, and they made him Lord of Peace and War against all Men whatsoever, though he neither consulted the People nor Senate. This Power he had taken to himself before in the management of the late Wars; but this is to be observed concerning these Times, and in reference to Cesar and his adopted Son, that the Romans desiring to seem still Free Citizens, and their own Men decreed those things in their behalf, which they were already possessed of, and gave such things as they could not keep. Now was he voted Consul for five years together, Dictator not for half, but an whole year, and to have Tribunitary Power for his Life; so astro fit amongst the Tribunes, and do their Work, which had not been granted to any before him. Having delivered the Provinces to the Consuls by lot, yet they decreed, that Cesar might grant them to Prætors without forfeiture, and so they returned both to Consuls and Prætors again, contrary to their former resolution. They ordered him a Triumph over Juba, and the Romans that served him, as if the Victory was already obtained, when Cesar knew not as yet whether there would be such a War. Now though he was out of Italy, yet he presently took the Dictatorship, and made Antony his Magister Equitum, who as yet had not been Prætor. And after this Magistracy, he was made Consul, the Augurs making a clamour, that it was not lawful for a Magister Equitum to hold above six Months. For this they were laughed at to purpose, in that having, against all Precedent, made the Term of the Dictatorship to be Annual, they would be so accurate as to that of his Magister Equitum.

79. While Cesar was buied in the Alexandrian War, great Tumults happened in Italy, and at Rome. In Italy Milo raised Commotions, being the only exil'd Person whom Cesar did not restore; but he was suppressed and slain at Apulia, by the Arms of Servilius the Consul. At Rome M. Cæcilius presumed to contradict what Cesar had ordained concerning Creditors, being displeased that he had not been made Prætor of the City formerly by him, which Office he now obtained. He raised also grievous Commotions, and at length was slain by those of Cæsar's Party. Yet with these Men did not the Disturbances of the City receive an end; for Antony the Magister Equitum was burdensome to them, wearing the Prætexta, and having six Lictors, when there was neither Consul nor Prætor to be seen. Indeed he assembled the Senate, and thereby was represented a sort of a Commonwealth; but when they saw him girt with a Sword, and Guarded by a great number of Attendants, they began to think what sort of Person the Dictator himself would would prove, who though he had hitherto made no other show, than that of clemency, yet they thought a Man in full possession differed in humour from one who endeavoured to clear his way to his designs, by an obliging demeanour. But above all, they were plagued by the outrageous carriage of L. Lepidus, and P. Cornelius Dolabella, the Tribuni Plebis, the latter of which being once a Patrician, had made himself a Plæbian, to obtain the Place. By publishing Laws, and making Slaughters to enact and confirm them, they harassed the Citizens. Dolabella not expecting pardon from Cesar, so great were his demerits, and therefore not caring what he did to be remembered after his death. Till Cæsar's arrival in Italy they would not give over, but then when they expected punishment, he betook himself to his wonted clemency. Finding all things quiet, he not only forgave his Enemies, but preferred some of them, amongst whom Dolabella himself, to the Dignity of Consul, although he had never born the Prætorship.

Pharnaces invades some Countries of the East.

80. Cæsar might sooner have come to Rome, if Cleopatra had not held him fast in Egypt, which hold she was forced at length to let go after some nine Months, and give way to a greater violence, which hurried him out of her Embracements. This proceeded from Pharnaces the Son of Mithridates, who was King of the Bosphorus Cimmericus, but inflamed with an earnest desire of recovering his Father's Dominions, having the opportunity of the Civil and Egyptian Wars. He seized Colchis without any trouble, and all Armenia in the absence of Deiotarus, besides some Cities of Cappadocia and Pontus, which were subject to the Jurisdiction of Bithynia. Cæsar having not yet settled matters in Egypt, as he desired, and hoping to reduce him into order by others, had sent away Cn. Domitius Calpurnius against him, with command to recover Asia, and receive the Forces that were there. Calpurnius joyed to himself Deiotarus and Ariobarzanes, and went straight against Pharnaces, who had his abode at Nicomedia, on which he had seized. Pharnaces affrighted at his coming, desired a Truce, that the matter might be composed by a Message, but Calpurnius contemned, and would not hear him, but resolute to fight, was worried in the Engagement, and Winter now drawing on, returned into Asia. Pharnaces elevated by this Success, took in the rest of the Cities of Pontus, stormed Amisus, and marched for Bithynia and Asia, with hope of having his Father's Succession. But he was stopped in his career by the revolt of Alexander, to whom having committed the charge of Bosphorus, the Man being in hope to have it granted to himself by the Romans, endeavoured to curry favour with them. He purposed to go against him, but was diverted by News that Cæsar himself was coming into Armenia, who Ptolomy being now dead, and Domitius overthrown, thought it not honourable for him to make any longer stay in Egypt. Pharnaces was more affrighted with his vigorous Spirit, than his Army, and before he drew near, sent often to him about a Peace, labouring by all means to evade the present danger. He pleaded that he had given no assistance to Pompey, and hoped to pacify Cæsar, who would halt in Italy and Africa, not doubting but after his departure easily to renew the War. Cæsar sufficiently apprehensive of his Design, gave good words to the Messengers that came the first and the second time, on purpose to deceive him; but to those that were sent the third on the same errand, he objected; amongst other crimes, his ingratitude to Pompey his Benefactor. Using all expedition, on one and the same day he came and fought the Enemy, who distressed him at first with his Horse and Chariots that bore Scythians. But the Legions obtained for him the Victory, and Pharnaces, flying to the Sea, and endeavouring to break into Bosphorus, was repulled and slain by Alexander.

Cæsar overcometh him.

Pharces himself in his Victory.

Revereth in to Italy.

81. In this Victory, though none of the most eminent, Cæsar so much prided himself, as in none more, and that for the celerity of his Expedition; so that writing to Antony at Rome he expressed his Achievement in three words, Veni, Vidi, Vici, I came, I saw, I overcame. He gave the Spoil, which was great, to his Soldiers; and whereas Mithridates had at this Hill Scotus overthrown Triarius, and erected a Trophy in the Places; because it was esteemed wickedness to demolish it, as consecrated to the Gods of War, he opposed against it another over Pharnaces after a certain manner to deface it. He recovered all that Pharnaces had taken from the Romans, or their Friends, and restored them to the former owners, part of Armenia excepted, which he bestowed on Ariobarzanes. He made some means to those of Amisus, by making them free; to Mithridates of Pergamus he granted a Tetrarchy, with the Name of King, and committed to him the War against Alexander, to revenge the treachery committed against his Friends; and that Mithridates might become Lord of Bosphorus. He left Domitius to take order for other matters, and went into Bithynia, thence into Greece, and so sailed into Italy; for, such was his Expedition against Pharnaces, and and his Return, as Dion Cassius hath described it. But Josephus further acquaints us, (which we must not pass over) that taking Syria in his way from Egypt he returned Hyrcanus to the Priesthood in Judea, though Antigonus the Son of Aristobolus (who being let out of Prison by him, and sent home, had been poisoned by Pompey's Party) sued to him for the Government. He made also Antipater (whom Hyrcanus had sent to join with Mithridates of Pergamus with three thousand Horse, and who did good Service in the Alexandrian War) Governour of Judea. And he promoted his own Kinman Sextus Cesar from a Quæstorship to the Government of Syria, which Scipio the Father-in-law of Pompey had enjoyed the year before.

82. Cesar, upon his return into Italy, by all means he could, raised Money, as formerly he had practised. What had been promised to Pompey hexacted, and imposed new Leavies upon other pretended occasions. At Tyre he took away all that was consecrated to Hercules, because they had received the Wife and Son of Pompey in their flight; and from many Princes and Kings he received Crowns of Gold, because of the Victories he had obtained. And this he did, our Writer tells us, not out of any dishonest humour, but because he was at vast charge, and now must be at greater, for the paying of his Armies, setting forth his Triumph, and in other matters, wherein his Magnificence was to be shown. He was intent upon raising Treasure, because, as he was wont to say, there were two things whereby Power was obtained, preserved, and increased, and these were Soldiers and Money, of which the one procured the other; for by Money Soldiers were maintained, and by Soldiers Money was raised. Sometimes he was wont to think and speak after this manner. And when he came to Rome this was the only course he followed. He otherwise offended no Man, but such Gifts as were given him in Gold, Images, or other things, he gladly received, and raised much Money by Loans, not only from private Persons, but also from Cities, and exacted them no otherwise than as due to him, by constraint and force, though he never intended to make restitution, alleging, that he had spent his own Estate upon the Common-wealth, and now was upon necessity to be in debt. He not only herein offended Strangers, but his own Friends, who buying such Goods and Estates as he had published, and hoping he would not exact the price, now found they were mistaken; and he valued not their Indignation. For he pleased them again by Offices and Employments, and the Multitude he obliged, by remitting all the Usury which had been due from the time he undertook the Expedition against Pompey, as also Rent for the hire of Houses, and other ways. That he might gratify many Persons, he designed ten Prætors for the following year, and increased the number of such as served about their Sacred things, above what was prescribed by the Laws. The Colleges of the Pontifices, Augurs, and Quindecimviri, he increased by one added to each, though, as was decreed, he had resolved to have all Offices of Priests in his own Hands. The Horse-men and Centurions of his Army, and such as held lesser Commands, he honoured several ways, and some of them by bringing them into the Senate in the Places of such as were dead.

83. But while these things he did, he was much disturbed by his Soldiers, who though they had been rewarded as they had deserved of him, yet were not contented, and their expectations not being answered, grew mutinous. The greater part of them lay in Campania, whence he purposed to transport them into Africk. They almost killed Sallustius, who was made Pretor, that he might obtain the Senatorial Dignity, and when he fled towards Cesar to acquaint him with their disorder, they pursued, and slew two Senators out-right, or two Pretors, as Plutarch names them, Calpurnius and Galba. When Cesar knew it, he thought first to have sent his Prætorian Troops; but fearing that they also should be drawn into the Mutiny, he staid till the Soldiers came into the Suburbs. Then he sent to know what they would have, and what the reason was of their coming. They answered, they would declare it to Cesar himself; and it being the Custom to wear their Swords in the City, he permitted them to come with them, without their other Arms. With many words they related what Labours they had undergone, what Dangers they had incurred, what Rewards they had both expected and deserved, and now they required to be dismissed, and vehemently urged it; not that they desired to return to a Private Life, being used to War and Spoil, but to terrify him, now involved in the African War. He only replied, Indeed Quirites you speak the truth, for you are exhausted with Labours and Wounds. Without any other Answer he remitted to them all the Military Oath, as standing in no further need of their assistance, and promised Pay and Rewards to those that had served their full time: Herewith they were struck with great amazement.

amazement, especially that he should call them Quirites, and not Soldiers; and fearing some ill thing was determined against them, they desponded, and earnestly sought him to receive them again, promising all obediences, and alone by themselves to dispatch the War. They making these Intreaties, and a certain Tribune, whether at their request, or to gratify Cesar, is unknown, interceding in their behalf, he said he dismissed them all that were there, and moreover all others that had served their time; for he had nothing for them to do. Yet he would reward them, that they should not say he made use of them in his need, and afterwards was ingrateful, although they had refused his Service, and to dispatch the remainder of the War, when they were neither destitute of strength, nor of any other thing.

84. This he craftily spoke, for he had great need of them, and to all he assigned Grounds, partly such as were publick, and partly his own, but in a dispersed manner, lest being in one place they might disturb their Neighbours, or attempt some seditious things. Such Money as he had promised for performance of some notable Facts, he undertook to pay down, or afterward with Interest; and by such disfigurement made them so obnoxious, that they not only not murmured, but gave him thanks. Now, saith he, you have all I owed you, neither will I for the time to come force any of you to the War; but if any of you will assist me in what is behind, I will willingly receive him. Having heard this, they were wonderful joyful, neither was there one who did not give his Name. He selected some he knew most turbulent that were able to live by Husbandry, and received the rest, taking this course also with some other Troops. Such as were most fierce, amutinous, and fittest for mischief, he took along with him out of Italy, and exposed them to dangers in Africk, both thereby to promote his Service against the Enemy, and to rid himself of ill Men. For though he was of a most gentle humour, and desirous to gratify his Soldiers, above all other Mortals, yet he most grievously hated all Mutineers, and most severely punished them. These things happened that year wherein he in effect again was Dictator, though Calenus and Vatinus at the latter end of the year bore the Name of Consuls.

He goes into Africk.

85. In the middle of Winter he passed over into Africk, and thereby coming unexpectedly upon his Enemies, had the better success. For in all his Affairs he used celerity, and gained much by his sudden expeditions, which indeed was the cause why he excelled all Captains of his time in the Glory of Martial Actions. Africk had formerly been no great friend to him, and after the destruction of Carthage he esteemed it an Enemy. For Varus and Juba did there what they pleased, and now Cato and Scipio having joyned with them, they drew in Sicily and Sardinia to their assistance, and hearing there were stir in Spain, sent Cn. Pompey thither, that by the power of the love that People bore to his Father, he might make it their own, and then they might return with him into Italy. Varus at first, as most experienced in Africk, contended with Scipio for the chief Command, but Cato declined it, and it was devolved upon Scipio as the greatest Person in Dignity, and one who for his very Name was acceptable in that Country, where it was thought a Scipio could not miscarry. Cesar perceiving his Soldiers also to be of this humour, carried over with him one Scipio, Sir-named Salutator, and, they not expecting him in Winter, arrived at Adrumetum, not being able to reach Urce with his Ships. At his going alhoar his feet slipped, and he fell flat upon his face, at which his Men were affrighted, as an ill Omen; but he, without any hesitation, stretch'd out his Hand upon the Ground, and grasped it, as having fall'n on purpose, and, kissing it, said, I hold thee, O Africk. Attempting to take Adrumetum, he was repulsed, and driven to another Place called Rafina, where he took up his Winter Quarters, and thence made War. For the following year he centred upon the Consulship and Dictatorship, both the third time, having Lepidus for his Colleague. This Man, as soon as he was declared Dictator by him, he sent from being Pretor into the hither Spain, and granted him a Triumph at his return, though he had overcome no Man, nor so much as fought, only it was pretended he was present at the Actions of Longinus and Marcellus. Lepidus in his Triumph brought in nothing but the Money, of which he had spoiled the Provinces. But Cesar having thus required him, now, as was said, took him for his Colleague.

86. In Africk Fortune now seemed to change her aspect upon his Affairs. His Men going out on foraging, before they had worn off the disorder into which the Sea had brought them, were many of them cut off by Petereus and Labeinus, who laying hold on the advantage, drove them to an Hill, where they might have been all taken or destroyed, but that their Enemies were discouraged by the many Wounds they had received. However, they resolved to besiege them, and perish they must,

Where he is distressed.

Seft. 7. if Cæſar had not relieve them, who now, as he had reaſon, was very melancholick, conſidering that Scipio and Juba were coming with all their Forces, that he had not Strength to grapple with them all, had not neceſſaries wherewith to ſubſiſt, neither could he get away, his Enemies ſtopping him both at Sea and Land. When he was in this perplexity, he was reſcued out of danger by one P. Sittius, who being driven out of Italy, joyned many baniſhed Perſons with him, and paſſing into Mauritania, having obtained of King Bocchus a Band of Men, reſolved to aſſiſt Cæſar in this War, though he never had been gratified by him, nor ſo much as known to him. Yet did he not think he could do him much Service, being at a great diſtance from him, and having but a ſmall Force; but obſerving the time when Juba led his Army out of his Kingdom, he brake into Numidia, and waſted it, together with Getulia, (part of his Kingdom) which conſtrained Juba to return back when he had gone half his Journey. So far was Cæſar from being in condition to defend himſelf from both, that he was not able to grapple with Scipio, eſpecially becauſe his Horſes would not endure the fight, and ſmell of his Elephants, which cauſed him to ſend not only for Soldiers out of Italy, but for Elephants too, to make them familiar to his Horſes. In the mean time the Getuli embraced his friendſhip, the Example of whom ſome Neighbouring People followed, induced by the requital he made them, and by remembrance of Marine, to whom Cæſar was akin. And now Succours came to him out of Italy, though with great difficulty and hazard, both by reaſon of Enemies, and tempeſtuous Weather.

87. He reſolved now to fall upon Scipio, before Juba could come and joyn with him. He beat him from a Mount he had ſeized near the City Usitta, and driving alſo Labiens from another Poſt, blocked up the Place. Scipio was fearful to engage till the coming of Juba, whom, he promiſed alſo Africk that was held by the Romans. This Promiſe ſo wrought upon him, that leaving a Party to oppoſe Sittius, he began his March againſt Cæſar, who in the mean time, by fair Promiſes, drew many, both Romans and Africans, to revolt from Scipio, but by all means he might uſe, he could not oblige him to fight. Scipio alſo attempted to draw off Cæſar's Men, but without ſucceſs, not promiſing them any Rewards, but only moving them to preſerve the liberty of the Roman People. But the Arrival of Juba altered the Caſe. Now they reſolved to fight Cæſar, who declined all Engagements till more Forces could arrive out of Italy, which was but by degrees, for they were raiſed without halt, and Shipping was wanting for their transportation. At length, encouraged by their arrival, he drew out his Army to give Battel, and they alſo drew out and faced him; but yet they engaged not, though they looked on one another ſeveral days, but then retired to their Camps. Cæſar ſeeing they were not to be drawn from their Fortifications, removed to Thapſus, thereby either to fight the Enemy, if he came to relieve it, or elſe to take it deſtitute of Succours. Thapſus was ſituate in a kind of a Peninſula made by the Sea, and a Fen, and a narrow neck of Land gave access to it, wherein was a Lake, the Way lying narrow on each ſide. Cæſar made Fortifications in theſe Straits, and Scipio and Juba endeavourd to cut them off by other Works from the Continent, and where they could not at preſent do this, they placed Elephants to keep off Cæſar's Soldiers, being wholly intent upon the Works. But Cæſar fell upon Scipio's quarter, and drove the Elephants by Darts and Stones upon the Labourers, whom putting to flight, he purſued, and took the Camp. Here- with was Juba ſo ſtruck, that he would neither fight, nor take care to preſerve his own Camp, but fled again into his Kingdom. There none would receive him, and the rather, becauſe they had been defeated by Sittius. Deſpairing then of ſafety, he fought a ſingle Combat with Petruſ, who hoped alſo for no pardon, and they both died together. Cæſar, he being fled, became Maſter of their Fortifications, and made great ſlaughter of their Men, not ſparing thoſe who yielded themſelves. * Then took he the reſt of the Cities, with the Numidians, over whom he ſet Salluſt, not to govern, but pill them as it proved. That part of Libya lying about Carthage, and by the Romans called Africa, was now tiled The Old Province, having been formerly ſubdued; and Numidia, but now brought under, had the Name of The New Province. Scipio eſcaped to Sea, and purpoſed to go into Spain to Pompey, but being caſt upon Mauritania, for fear of Sittius, he killed himſelf.

88. Of the Generals of the Party againſt Cæſar, now Cato only remained, who lay at Utica. This City they perſwaded him to be Governour of, and he could not but be acceptable to the Inhabitants, whom he ſaved from ruine, when Scipio would have had the Place deſtroyed, as having taken Cæſar's part. He had given place to Scipio, as the greater Man in Dignity, but adviſed him to delay, and not to fight

ſo great a Commander as Cæſar was, for which he received ſeveral taunts from him by Letters, as well as when he offered to paſs into Italy with his Forces to draw Cæſar out of Africk. Cato repeated then that he had made him General, becauſe he ſaw he would indifferently proſecute the War, and if he overcame, would not moderately uſe the Victory againſt his Fellow-Citizens, and he declared, that if ſo it happened, he would not ſtay at Rome, but fly from his cruelty, who even now did proudly threaten many Perſons. But the news of Scipio's defeat arriving, put Cato upon other thoughts. He attempted to fortiſie the City, and perſwaded three hundred Roman Merchants, who lived there, to ſtand upon their guard; but they again, out of fear of Cæſar, forſook him; ſo that reſolving to die, and not accept the mercy of the Conqueror, if it ſhould be offered, he laboured all he could to ſave ſuch Senators as were with him in the City. And by his Induſtry he got Ships for them all, and ſent them to Sea. When the three hundred Merchants told him they would ſend to Cæſar to crave pardon for him in an eſpecial manner, and if they could not obtain it, they would fight for him to the laſt breath in their bodies; he thanked them for their good will, but answered, that they ſhould ſend quickly to beg pardon for themſelves, but none for him. His reaſon he ſaid was, becauſe Men that be overcome, and have offeſded ought to make ſure and crave pardon; but for himſelf, he was never overcome in his life; had overcome others as much as he deſired, and in Juſtice had al- ways excelled Cæſar, who was indeed the only Perſon that was now overcome and captivated; that thing now being evident to all the World, which he had always de- nied to have praſticed againſt his Country.

89. The Perſon that was choſen by the three hundred to go and intercede with Cæſar, was Lucius Cæſar his Kinſman, who intreated Cato to help him to make the Speech he ſhould ſpeak in behalf of them all; but in Cato's behalf he ſaid he would kiſs his Hand, fall down on his Knees, and intercede for him. He told him he ſhould not; for if he would ſave his life by Cæſar's favour, he could do it, if he would go to him, but he would not be obliged to a Tyrant for injuſtice. For he ſaid it was in- juſtice in him to take upon him as a Lord and Sovereign to ſave a Mans life, when he had no real Authority to command; But he conſidered with him what to ſay in behalf of the three hundred. When Lucius Cæſar was gone, to whom he recommended his Son and his Friends, he charged his Son by no means to meddle with State- Affairs, becauſe to deal uprightly like Cato's Son, the corruption of the Time and State would not abide it, and if he obſerved the time, he could not do like an honeſt Man. At night he embraced him and his Friends more lovingly than he was wont to do, whereby he made them ſuſpect as formerly what he deſigned. His Son at Supper took from him his Sword, which he miſſed not when he aroſe, but lying down in his Bed read Plato's Dialogue, called Phædo, concerning the Immortality of the Soul. Then, miſſing his Sword, he was very angry it was taken away, and would not be quiet till it was again reſtored to him. When he had it, and felt it to be ſharp, he ſaid he was now where he would be, and laying it down naked by him, took his Book again, and read it over, as was ſaid, twice together. Then ſlept he ſo ſoundly, that his Men in the Antichamber heard him ſnoor. When it grew day, and the Birds began to chirp, he took his Sword, and thruſt it into his Breaſt; but the Wound not diſpatching him quickly, by reaſon his Hand was ſwoll'n with a ſtroak he gave one of his Servants on the Face in his paſſion about his Sword, he fell down upon his Bed, and caſt to the ground a little Geometrical Table; with the noiſe of which, his Servants affrighted, cried out, and his Son and Friends coming in, found him all in Blood, and moſt of his Bowels coming out of his Body. Then did his Phyſician endeavour to put in his Bowels again, and to ſow up his Wound; but he coming to himſelf, thruſt him from him, tore them with his own hand, and enlarging the Wound, immedi- ly died.

90. His death being known, the three hundred Merchants, and all the People of Utica, to whom he had reſtored all their Money in his Hands, were preſently at his Door, called him their Beneſactor and Reliever, and ſaid, That he only was a Free- man, and had an invincible mind. This they did even when they heard that Cæſar was not far from Utica, and neither fear of the preſent danger, nor deſire to flatter the Conqueror, nor any private quarrel amongst themſelves, could keep them from honouring his Funerals; for ſumptuouſly ſetting out his Body, they paid their laſt reſpects to him by the Sea ſide, where in Plutarch's time was to be ſeen his Image, hold- ing a Sword in his Hand. This done, they took the beſt courſe they could to ſave themſelves and the City. Cæſar having heard that Cato ſtaid at Utica, and ſent all o- thers away, knew not what to think of his meaning; but in a little time, hearing he

Sect. 7. had killed himself, it was reported he said, O Cato! I envy thee thy Death, because thou hast enjoyed me the Honour of saving thy Life. But Men doubted for all this what he would have done, and especially by reason of a Book he afterwards wrote against Cato, wherein he heaped up a number of Accusations against him. But some believed he wrote it not out of any malice to him, at least that was deadly, but rather out of civil ambition upon this occasion. Cicero had composed a Treatise in praise of this Person, and called it Cato, which Book was much esteemed, both because of the Eloquence of the Writer, and the excellent Subject which it handled. Cæsar was much offended at it, thinking, that to praise him of whose death he was the cause, was to accuse himself; and therefore he took Pen in Hand, and composed another Treatise in answer to it, which he called Anti-Cato. Both these Books had favourers a long time after, some defending the one for the love they bare to Cæsar, and others the other for Cato's sake. But so died Cato, than whom none was more studious of Popular Government, a Man of a most firm and constant mind, who by his death obtained great Renown with his Country-men, especially those of his own Party, and from the Place where he died, obtained the Surname of Uticensis, the rather to distinguish him from his Great-Grand-father, who was called Censorius from that Office which he bore.

some, and spares more.

91. Cæsar dismissed his Son unhurt, as he did many more who betook themselves unto him. Africanus and Faustus Sylla fled into Mauritania, despairing of pardon, and falling into Sittius his Hands, Cæsar put them to death as Captives. Though L. Cæsar was both his Kinsman, and came voluntarily in to him to beg his pardon, yet because he had been against him all the War, he made him be called to his Tryal, and when he feared to give Judgment of death against him himself, caused the Process to fall, but procured him to be slain privately. And it was his Custom in Fight, or some other way, to bring about the destruction of such as he liked not, or had ill deserved of him, being not willing to punish them all openly. However, when he had taken Scipio's Cabinet, he burnt all the Letters therein contained, without reading them, and pardoned many that had borne Arms against him, either for their own sakes, or at the request of such as interceded for them, giving liberty to every of his Friends and Fellow-Soldiers to exempt one, whom they would name, from punishment. And though Plutarch writes concerning Cato, as we have seen, yet Dio thinks he ought not to doubt but he would have spared him. For he saith he had him in so great admiration, that when as afterward Cicero composed a Book in his praise, he took it not ill he had so done, though the Author had also been in the War against him, but satisfied himself in answering the Book in another Treatise, which was called Anti-Cato. Whatever they thought at Rome of these things, they of the Senate were fearful to be slow in expressing the sense they had either of his Merit, or his Power. They decreed, That for his Victory Sacrifice should be offered forty days; that in his Triumph already granted, he might use White Horses, and the Apparitors be both now had with him, and which he used in his first and second Disastrophis. They created him Master of Manners, as if the Name of Censor was too mean, for three years, and Dictator for ten. They ordered he should sit in the same Seat with the Consuls in Senate, and always speak his opinion first; that in all Horse-races he should distribute the Rewards, confer Places of Magistracy, and other Honours wont to be bestowed by the People; that a Chariot should be set up to him in the Capitol over against Jupiter; that he should be placed upon a Globe of the World with this Inscription, He is a Demi-God, and that the Name of Catalus being obliterated, his should be set upon the Capitol, as if he had finished that Temple for which he intended to call Catalus to account. Many other things they decreed, but these Dio mentions, because he approved and received them, rejecting the rest.

Honours decreed him by the Senate.

He labours to take off their
jealousie.

92. He knew sufficiently, that they were decreed more out of flattery than good will, and was sensible that they were fearful of him that he would abuse his Power, and act with such heat and insolence as Sylla, Marius, and Cinna had done before him. Being returned to Rome, he endeavoured to take off their jealousy by two Speeches he made, the one to the Senate, and the other to the People, promising to treat them no otherwise than as an Indulgent Father is wont to do his Children, and to use his Power for their protection, and not the destruction of such as had fought against him. And as for his late Victory, he magnified it, declaring, that he had thereby laid fo many Countries to the Empire of Rome, that he could furnish them yearly with two hundred thousand bushels of Wheat, and twenty hundred thousand Pound weight of Oyl. By his words they were a little eased of their fear, but they could not fully trust him, till they saw them made good by his Actions. Now Dio tells us, he triumphed four days together, and that with all possible show of Magnificence, over the Gallæ, Ægypt, Pharaces, and Juba, though others mention only three Triumphs, omitting that over the Gallæ. The Spectators were well pleased at the sight, but it grieved them to see Artaxerxes, once called Queen of Egypt, led amongst the Captives, and to behold the Spoils of the Citizens that had fallen in Africa. Yet considering the greatness of the things performed, they had him in admiration, and he was not displeased, but bore well the insolent liberty of the Soldiers, who jeered him for his familiarity with Cleopatra, and his having been abused by Nicomedes, and said, That if he laid down his Power, he must perish by the strictness of the Laws; if he continued it, he must turn Tyrant. But he regarded nothing they said, but touching the matter of Nicomedes. About it he was much concerned, and offered to purge it by Oath, for which he was derided. On the first day of his Triumph his Chariot broke as he passed by the Temple of Fortune, built by Lucullus, and he was forced to make use of another. But he mounted the steps of the Capitol upon his Knees, and he would neither have Chariot placed there, nor the Inscription lately mentioned, of Demi-God. Artaxerxes was dismissed, but Vercingetorix, Dio tells us, with others, was put to death.

He Triumphs

People.

93. He feasted the People with great Magnificence, (Plutarch saith, at two and twenty thousand Tables) adding Wheat and Oyl above the ordinary Custom; to the three hundred Nommi he had promised them a Man, he added another hundred, and to the Soldiers he gave two Sphærica apiece. Hereformed the abuse committed in giving Corn at the publick charge; for finding it to be procured in confusion, and seditionously he cut off about one half of the Expence. The last night of the Triumph, after Supper, he went with his Shoes on, and his Head bedecked with all sorts of Flowers, into his Forum, whither all the People in a manner accompanied him; many Elephants bearing Torches before them. For he had built a Forum which bore his Name, more beautiful than the Roman, though the Roman had this advantage by that new one that it was called the Great. This, with a Temple to Venus, his Progenitrix, as he reported, he dedicated, he set forth Shows, built an Amphitheatre; and in Honour of his Daughter, exhibited Huntings, and Games of Gladiators. Other sorts of Sports there were, and the Sons of Patricians, according to the Custom, played the Tragedy of Troy, and other real Tragedies were acted, many Persons being killed, for which the People were angry with him, as also for the vast expence, wherewith the Soldiers were also so far moved, that angry that the Money was not bestowed on themselves, they had fallen into a Mutiny, had not he himself laid hold on one of them, and delivered him to punishment. And Dio writes, That two other Men had their Throats cut in a way of Sacrifice by the Pontifices; and the Salus in the Campus Martius, though neither Sibylla had commanded, nor any Oracle was extant concerning such a thing.

Which is distinguished.

He makes Laws.

Reforms the Calendar.

94. Now did he make many Laws. He committed Judicature to the Senators and Equites alone, to have Justice daily administered; some Plebeians having been formerly employed herein. Both by Laws and his own observation he repressed the profuse way of living of Rich Persons. And because the City was manifestly exhausted, by reason of multitudes quitting it, he proposed Rewards to those that had many Children. Finding that by his long Command in Gall he had had opportunity to aspire after Domination, and to establish his Power, by a Law he ordained, that no Pretor should have command above a year, nor a Consul above two years, from the execution of his Office. And whereas the form of the year was much now out of order, the Months being observed according to the Revolution of the Moon, he reduced it, Dio tells us, to that state in which it stood in his time, intercalating sixty and seven days, though others fallily speak of more. This account he himself had learnt at Alexandria, although it varied so much from the form of a Year, that every Alexandrian Month consisted of thirty days, and they added five days to every year. Others have written, That in framing this Account, which after him hath been called Julian, he used the skill of Sosigenes, an excellent Mathematician of Alexandria, for Astronomical Calculations, and of Flavius the Scribe, in rectifying the Calendar. Now those five days, and two others besides, which he took from one, he fitly added to the other Months; and that Day which ariseth out of the parts of a Day, he added to every fourth Year, three Years being omitted; so that now, saith Dio, there can be no error as to the Hours of a Year, except very small, so small, that every one thousand four hundred and sixty one Year shall need the Intercalation, but of one Day. How true this is, let them that use the Gregorian Account, if they should think it worth their while, consider.

Sect. 7.

95. Cæsar, though he did all these things, yet was so wise as to do nothing on his own Head, without communicating his Designs with the Principal of the Senate, and sometimes with the whole Order. As hereby he declined ill will, so he procured it by relieving condemned Persons, particularly such as were found guilty of ambitious seeking for Offices, for making unworthy Men Senators, and especially for harbouring Cleopatra in his own House, who was come to Rome with her Husband; and he valued not the infamy, but entered them amongst the Kings, that were the Friends and Allies of the Romans. But the pleasure he took in such Society was disturbed by News out of Spain, where Cn. Pompeius, Son of Pompey the Great, swayed all as he pleased, having ingratiated himself with the Soldiers by his obliging demeanour. Cæsar hoping to dispatch this War by his Officers, had sent a Fleet thither from Sardinia, and after that an Army, but his Captains were discouraged, and stood at gaze, expecting and requiring his coming. And when he saw it was necessary, he was there before either they or the Enemy in the least imagined it, hoping by such expedition to terrify Pompey, who now had laid Siege to a Town called Uti. Cæsar endeavoured to divert him by besieging Corduba, but there fell sick, and when he came to raise the Siege, durst not abide his coming. Having recovered his Health, and received more Forces which followed him, he abode as well as he could the Inconveniences of Winter, and want of Provisions, being now, though Dictator, made Consul again for the following year; for Lepidus assembled the People, being then Magister Equitum, which Title, being Consul, he assumed contrary to the practice of their Fore-fathers.

He goes into Spain.

96. Cæsar having no hope of taking Corduba, it was so well Manned, thought, and laid Siege to Atrenga, which he heard was full of Corn; and Pompey thinking it strong enough to hold out, and not willing to expose his Soldiers to the cold, came not to relieve it; so that the Town-men yielded. Being Master of this, other Cities submitted themselves to him; and Pompey, wandering up and down, and fearing all the rest would revolt, resolved to come to a Battle. Both Armies had Auxiliaries of Spaniards and Moors, but the Romans alone sustained the Charge; for those on Cæsar's side were excited to do their utmost by hope to put an end that day to all their labours; and they with Pompey fought out of desperation, most of them expecting no pardon, as having had their Lives formerly given them when they were overthrown with Afranius and Varro. And with so great animosity they fought, that had not Bogud, who stood with his Men without the Battle, turned himself to fall on the Camp of Pompey, they had either all died upon the Spot, or Night must have taken up the Controversie. But Labiens, when he perceived the Design of Bogud, leaving his Place to go to oppose him, Pompey's Men thought he fled, and let fall their courage so much, that though afterward they saw their error, yet could they not recover their former condition, but fled into the City Munda, or into their Camp. Such as got into the Camp valiantly resisted the Enemy, and were not slain till they had killed as many of the Assailants. They that got into the Town held it long out, and it was not taken till they were all destroyed by frequent Sallies. So great slaughter was made of Romans in the Battle, that at night when Cæsar's Soldiers were to raise a Wall to keep them in that none might escape, they made one of dead Bodies. How true forever this Story is, related by Dio, others affirm this the greatest Battle that was fought in this Civil War. That Cæsar's Men were so diffident, that he was glad to run himself into the Crowd, and ask them if they were not ashamed to be beaten and taken Prisoners, and to yield themselves to the young Boys, meaning Pompey's two Sons. That with much ado, and not without all the Force he could make, he got the day, killing thirty thousand of his Enemies, and losing a thousand of his own best Soldiers. When the Fight was over, being in his Tent, he told his Friends, that he had often before fought for Victory, but now for the saving of his own Life. Some say his Army had run, but that he snatching a Target out of a Soldier's Hand, went and engaged the Enemy himself, and had two hundred Darts thrown at him; whereat his Officers being alarmed, went on, and got the Victory.

Fights with Pompey's Sons.

Very hardly gets the Victory.

And Cæsar's friends to him.

97. After this he had all the Cities of Spain given up to him, whence he raised as much Money as he could possible, not abstaining from things consecrated at Gades unto Hercules. Cn. Pompey, after a conflict with Cecinnus Lento, wherein he was worsted, got into the Woods, and there perished. And so ended this Civil War, by a Battle fought on the day of the Bacchanalia, as Plutarch writes, who adds, that some reported that it was on the same day four years that Pompey went out of Rome to begin it. A War so destructive to the Roman People, that Cæsar before his going into into Spain, making a Census, found at the Lustrum but one hundred and fifty thousand Polls of Citizens; whereas at that before had been found three hundred and twenty thousand. Whether the great danger he escaped made him over-joyed, and this excessive Joy transported him above his usual and common temper; but whereas after his other Victories in the Civil War he neither sent Messengers nor Letters, as rather concealing and grieving at the ruin of his Fellow-Citizens, now he did it as if he had overcome some barbarous King or Nation. More than this, he triumphed, and yet not content with this, and giving a Dinner again to the People, as in a common Festivity, he gave the Honour of Triumpling to Fabius and Pedius his Lieutenants, who had done nothing by their own Conduct. But the laughter they moved made some amends, for they made use not of Ivory, but Wooden Images and Vessels in their Pomp. This gave extraordinary great offence, and more than any thing he had done before, when the Spectators considered that he made all this noise for having destroyed the Sons of the greatest Man in Rome, who had been overcome by Fortune, and had plucked up his Race by the Roots. It was odious that he should triumph for the Calamities of his Country, and rejoice at a thing for which he had but one excuse to God and Man, viz. That he was compelled to do it.

At his return he gives great offence.

Rebours,

And Sovereign Power given to him.

98. But now again the Senate goes to work, and considers not what it was he deserved, but what the State of Affairs required they should do for his further Honour. And many extraordinary things they voted. Amongst others, that he should have the Name of Deliverer, and so he was entered in the Falsh. That a Temple should be erected to Liberty; And that he should have and enjoy the Title of Imperator, not only in the ancient sense, as it was common to him, with others who obtained it after Victories, nor as it gave merum Imperium, or an absolute Command; but they conferred it on him now first of all, in that meaning as a Steward it belonged to such as had Sovereign Authority, and as proper to himself. To that flattery they proceeded, that they commanded his Sons and Nephews to be named Imperatores, though he had no Son, and was old; although indeed from this Julius proceeded the Name of Imperator, as also that of Cæsar, and as a peculiar Name of Sovereign Authority was derived down to all Imperatores, (Emperors, as we call them) who enjoyed them both joyed together. Other things they decreed, which made him a Sovereign Prince or King in effect. They subjected all Magistrates, even Plebeian, to his Power; made him Consul for ten years, and ordained that he alone should command the Armies, and raise Money.

S E C T. VIII.

From the Aboluteness of Julius Cæsar, to the end of the second Triumvirate, and the Aboluteness of Octavius Cæsar, or Cæsar Octavianus.

The space of fifteen Years.

1. CÆSAR, before he came to the City, entered his fourth Consulship alone, but did not bear it all the year, but after his return divested himself of it, and created Consuls Q. Fabius and C. Trebonius, of whom it happened, that Fabius died the last day of his Magistracy, and Cæsar substituted C. Caninius for the remaining hours; whereupon Cicero jested, writing in one of his Epistles, That during this Consulship of Caninius no Man dined; yet no harm was committed in it, for he was wonderfully vigilant, who in his whole Consulship never slept. Thus bold did Cæsar make with the Laws and Customs of his Country, in abdicating the Consulship of his own accord, without being commanded by an Edict to do, and in the matter of Caninius he seemed to play with so serious and noble a Dignity. But from this time forward it grew cheaper, and yet few held it an whole year, and some more, some fewer Months and Days as it happened. This Dio observes, who adds, That in his time scarcely any was Consul for an whole year, nor above two months, with a Colleague. But in other things they differed nothing from the ancient Custom, and the number of years was reckoned by their Names who were Consuls at the beginning.

Fourteen Pretors and forty Quæstors.

Nine hundred Senators.

Adiles made Treasurers.

Sixteen Pretors.

For what Cæsar was commended.

2. So he ordered the Consulship. Other Magistrates he pretended he would not meddle with, but leave them to the People to be named according to the ancient Custom, but it was but a pretence; for he made them, and without any fortition they were sent into the Provinces. In other Offices the same number was observed, but fourteen Pretors and forty Quæstors were made. For he had no other way to gratify those to whom he had promised great matters, and this caused him to admit many into the Senate without any distinction, whether the Man was a Soldier or a Libertino by original; so that the number of Senators by this means arose to nine hundred. Many also he brought into the Ranks of Patritians, Consulares, and of those who had born other Offices; which became a Custom with those who were afterwards Emperors. Nay some that were called to Judgment for corruption, he absolved not without suspicion of taking Money, which was increased in that he publicly sold publick Places, as well Sacred as Profane. To his Friends he gave away much both in Money and Lands, which was pleasing to them that made their ends: Others took it very ill, and testified their resentment, as they might, by word of Mouth, or by Libels. The management of publick Money was now translated from the Quæstors to the Ædiles, and afterwards returned no more unto them, but at length was committed to Persons of Pretorian Dignity. Of these Ædiles of the Treasury two were this year created.

3. For the following year Cæsar was Consul again with Antonius, and sixteen Pretors were made, and so continued for many years. The Tribunal being taken out of the middle of the Forum, and put into another place, where it afterward continued, the Statues of Sylla and Pompey were restored and placed by it, which caused Cæsar to be very well spoken of, as also that he granted the Glory and Inscription of the Work to Antonius. He made some Laws, and extended the Pomerium, and yet in such Actions seemed only to imitate Sylla; but in that he fully forgave them that had born Arms against him in the War, and granted part of their Estates to their Sons, he thereby greatly taxed the cruelty of Sylla, and obtained a Name not only for Valour, but for Clemency; it being a difficult thing indeed for one and the same Man to please the People, and be commended for his carriage both in Peace and War. He was praised also by some for restoring the two ancient Cities of Corinth and Carthage, which had miscarried at the same time, by sending Roman Colonies thither, and continuing to them their old Names. While Cæsar was doing these things, the People of Rome were earnestly desirous, that the death of Craffus, and the loss of that Army should be revenged, and they had great hope to subdue the Parthians. But

The Month of Adiles called July.

Cæsar imprudently receives too many Honours.

But that in Cæsar's absence the City might not be without Magistrates, nor if it chose them it self, fall by that means into seditions, they resolved to name all sorts of Officers for three years; for so long they reckoned the Expedition would hold. Of them Cæsar, by virtue of a Law, was to name half, but indeed the whole. This year six Ædiles were made; of whom two Patritians called Cereales, and four Plæbeians; which number continued till the time of Dio. Sixteen Pretors were created, and all the Magistrates designed that were to serve the following year, and for the next the Consuls and Tribuni Plebis, but none for the third as had been intended. For these two years, Cæsar being still to be Dictator, named two that should be his Magistrates Equitum, whereof Octavius a Youth was one, and for himself he appointed Dolabella to be Consul. Antonius being Consul to the end of the present year, and Lepidus having given him the Government of Gallia Narbonensis, with the neighbouring part of Spain, he made other two Magistrates Equitum in their room. For by this means he satisfied those to whom he was obliged. Therefore to the College of fifteen Priests he added one, and three to that which consisted of seven Persons.

4. Cæsar being now Consul the fifth time, with M. Antonius (whom he much favoured, and promoted, for that in his Tribuneship he was too much stood for him) to shun (a) envy in the City, thought upon making War upon the Getae and Dace, which had made inroads into Pontus and Thrace. About this time young Cæsar, the Son of Cæsar, (by (b) Strabo called Suacendarius) by the Daughter of Deiotarus the King or Tetrarch of Galatia (to whom Pompey gave Armenia the Less, which Gift the Senate having confirmed was taken away by Cæsar, because he took part with Pompey) came to Rome to accuse his Grand-father. He was sent by his Father and Mother, together with Phidippus a Physician, and Deiotarus his Slave, who was corrupted by their promises to feign an accusation against his Lord, that he would have killed Cæsar when he entertained him in his Tetrarchy. Deiotarus, Father, and Son, who reigned together, had at that time four Ambassadors in the City, who offered their own Bodies to Cæsar for the safety of their Masters. But Cicero being mindful of the friendship and familiarity he had had with the old Man, made an Oration for him in Cæsar's House, wherein he premised, that it was so unusual a thing for a King (a real King; for as for the Kings of Lacedæmon, who were called to account by the impudent Ephori, they were indeed no Kings, having nothing but the Title, and therefore this can make nothing against this truth) to be questioned for his Life, that before that time it was never heard of. Deiotarus being acquitted by Cæsar, put to death his Daughter as she had deserved, together with her Husband Cæsar Suacendarius, that noble Chronographer, concerning whom Gerard John Vossius is to be consulted, in his Treatise of Greek Historians. Cæsar in his last Consulship, to (c) gratify Hircanus the High-Priest, and Ethnarchus of the Jews, as also the Nation, granted to him to enjoy, and govern the City of Jerusalem as he pleased, which he might also fortify with Walls. To the Jews he granted also a freedom from the charge of Portage and Toll, with an abatement of the publick Revenue in the second year of letting it out to Farm. In this second Julian year his Colleague (d) M. Antonius procured by a Law, that the Month Quintilis should in honour of his Name be after it called July.

5. Cæsar prepared himself to go against the Parthians, but was sent to another World by the Fury of certain Persons who envied him his Honours, and bore it ill that he was greater than themselves; and thereby out of concord raised new Seditions, and procured more Civil Wars to the Roman State. Their pretence was by cutting him off to restore the People to liberty; whereas, in the opinion of our Historians, they both wickedly destroyed him, and cast the Common-wealth again into Seditions, when it began to make use of the most proper sort of Government, the Sovereignty of the People having a famous Name and Repute, upon the account of equality, but having nothing else agreeable with the Name and Repute. On the other side he affirms, that the Name of Monarchy might be unpleasant to the Ear, but that it is for the benefit of all to have the Government in the Hands of a single Person; it being an easier matter to have one good than many, and less harmful to have but one, than many bad ones to command. But so matters went at this time the great ones envied Cæsar, and he through their cunning drew more envy upon himself. They heaped Honours upon him to make him odious, and to appear ever-bigger, and he was so imprudent as to receive them, when he had as much before as amounted to Sovereign and Absolute Authority, imagining that as he became worthy of them, as is incident to all Persons that receive flattery. They improved this against him to the utmost, and still added more and more by the weight of them to destroy him. They voted that he should always wear even in the City a Triumphal Robe; that he should always sit in a Curule Chair, except at the celebration of Games; for then he should sit on the Bench with the Tribuni Plebis; that he should hang up Opima Spolia in the Temple of Jupiter Feretrius, as if he had killed some General of the Enemies with his own Hand; that his Lictors should use Laurel; that having finished the Latin Ferie, he should from the Albanian Mount enter the City in a Chariot. Besides, they gave him the Name of Pater Patrie, stamped Money with his Image, ordered publick Sacrifices on his Birth-day, and his Statue to be set up in all Cities, and in all Temples at Rome. At the Rostra they erected to him two Statues, whereof one was adorned with a Circus, and the other with an Obdional Crown, as if he had rescued his Fellow-Citizens from destruction, and delivered the City from a Siege. Moreover they raised a Temple to new Concord, and therein commanded an Annual Feast to be kept, upon this account, that he had restored Peace unto them.

6. Cæsar having accepted of these Honours, they put him upon filling up the Pontifical Fornix, and digging through the Isthmus of Peloponnesus, and building a new Curia, which should be called Julia, as was one Tribe, as well as the Month on which he was born named Julius. They made him Censor alone for his Life; and gave him the same privilege as the Tribuni Plebis enjoyed, that who ever injured him either by word or deed, should be esteemed guilty of Sacrilege, and of a peculiar crime; and if he should have a Son he should be made Pontifex Maximus. When he had received these things very willingly, they added to them, that he should make use of a gilt Chair, and they erected to him such a Statue, as had been formerly raised to the Kings. A Guard was appointed him of Equites and Senators; every year they ordained that Vows should be made publicly for his Health, that an Oath of swearing by his Fortune should be framed; that what ever he should do should be confirmed; that every five years should Feasts be celebrated in his Honour as to an Heroe. Moreover they decreed a third sort of College of Priests, who should celebrate the Lupercalia to be instituted and called Julii; that one of the Days of the Shows of the Gladiators should be consecrated to him, whether held at Rome, or elsewhere in Italy. These things also pleasing him, they commanded his Golden Chair and Golden Crown set with Gems (which Honour was wont to be given to their Gods) to be brought upon the Theatres by the Multitudes; they openly gave to him the Surname of Jupiter, and ordained a Temple to be built to his clemency, and made Antonius the Chief Priest in it to preside as some Flamen Dialis. While they decreed these things, they permitted a Sepulchre to be built for him within the Pomerium, and these Decrees to be written in Pillars of Silver with Golden Letters, which they placed under the feet of Jupiter Capitolinus; by which they sufficiently admonished him, and that openly, to think himself but a Man. At first they decreed him Honours, which they thought he would bear with modesty; but after that they found he rejoiced in them; though he refused some, they heaped them one upon another, some out of desire to flatter him, and others out of design that they might expose him to censures. For there were found such as would have it permitted to him to lie with what Women he would, for he made use of many, though now he was above fifty years of Age. But the greater part did it upon design that being brought into greater envy and reprehension, they might the more easily work his destruction, which the event did manifest. And yet was he altogether secure, not imagining they meant him any harm; and therefore he accepted not of the Guard of Equites and Senators, but removed the Armed Attendants upon his Person.

7. But having incurred odium by accepting of these Honours, another thing happened, either through his unadvisedness, or by accident, which made the Load insupportable. On a certain day when in the Senate many other, and the greatest Honours were decreed to him, and that by consent of all, except Cassius and his Party (the ill will of whom towards him was sufficiently known; and yet his clemency was such, that he bore with them) the Senators came in their Body to him, to tell him what they had decreed, as he sat in the Porch of the Temple of Venus, for they voted in his absence, that it might appear that they were not compelled) and he rose not up, but sat still when the Senate presented it self. Dio tells us, That this he did, either through some fatal error, or not minding what he did for joy; or how it's uncertain; but it raised exceeding great prejudice and indignation against him, not only in the Senators, but the rest of the People also, and gave the most ground for excuse to those that murdered him. For as for that Excuse, which after-afterward was brought in his behalf, that he was then troubled with a Loofeness, and durst not rise for fear it should come upon him, it was not believed, because afterward he went to his House on foot; but they concluded he so demeaned himself out of pride, and they hated him upon that account, when they themselves had made him proud by heaping so many extravagant Honours upon him. There was another thing still which increased that suspicion they had of him, which was, that he suffered himself to be created Perpetual Dictator; and this added so much to the fury of his Enemies, that now they conspired against him. To push him further on; and to turn his very Friends against him; amongst other devices, they gave him the Title of King, and so published him. This he indeed refused, and rebuked such as saluted him by it; but for all that, doing nothing whereby he shewed that he took it ill, they privily put a Diadem upon his Image that stood by the Rostra. This was removed from it by C. Epidius and L. Cestius Flaccus the Tribuni Plebis; and for that he was so far moved in choler against them, that though they did nothing to his disparagement, but praised him to the People as not desiring such Honours, he hardly contained himself from doing them mischief. But when afterward, as he returned on Horse-back, (in Ovation on the Latin Ferie) some saluted him and called him King, and to which he said, That he was not King, but Cæsar, and these same Tribuni Plebis setting the Man that first gave him the Title, a Day to answer it; he was greatly enraged against them, as designing something against his Person, but yet he deferred the revenge. At length these same Persons, by a publick Writing, complained that they were not suffered, neither was it safe for them to act freely in behalf of the Common-wealth. For this, in the greatest displeasure imaginable, he brought them into the Senate, accused them, and demanded Sentence against them, and there were not wanting who moved it should be Capital; yet he spared their Lives, but by the assistance of Holvinus Cinnus their Colleague, deprived them of their Tribuneship, and turned them out of the Senate. Of which they pretended to be glad; for now being eased of the danger and burthen of their Office, they could in safety be lookers on.

8. This opened the Mouths of his Enemies wider than ever; that whereas he ought to have punished them who called him King, he fell upon the Tribuni Plebis. And the suspicion of his affecting the Title was confirmed by another thing which shortly after happened. In the Solemnity of the Lupercalia, as he sat at the Rostra in his Golden Chair, adorned with a Royal Robe, and a Royal Crown, Antony with his Collegues the Priests, came and saluted him King, set a Diadem on his Head, and told him that the People by him presented him with it. Cæsar only answered, That Jupiter alone was King of the Romans, and sending the Diadem into the Capitol, did not blame them for so doing, but caused it to be registred in the publick Acts, that he had refused the Kingdom offered him from the People by their Consul. This caused a Belief, that the thing was done by agreement, and that Cæsar desired the Title, but would be compelled to receive it. Such is the Account given us by Dion Cassius concerning the hatred which he incurred, and those things which procured his sudden death, with whom other Writers agree: Plutarch attributes the main cause of his being mortally hated to his earnest desire after the Title of King, and thence, he saith, his Enemies took the Advantage, though it was pretended by some of his Friends, that it was written in the Sibylline Books how the Romans might overcome the Parthians, if they made War against them under a Kings Conduct, otherwise they were unconquerable. He adds, That when his Flatterers saluted him with that Title, as he returned from Alba, the People was offended; and he was angry, saying he was not King, but Cæsar, and every one keeping silence, he went home very sorrowful. That many Honours being decreed to him in Senate, the Consuls and Prætors, accompanied with the whole Body, went to him into the Forum, where he sat at the Rostra, to tell him what they had done, but he declined to rise up to them, as if they had been private Men; saying, that his Honours had more need to be cut off than enlarged. That this did not only offend the Senate, but the People also, to see him slight the Magistracy of the Common-wealth; so that all that might depart went away very sorrowfully. Thereupon he arose and went home to his House, and tearing open his Bosom, made his Neck bare, and cried to his Friends, that he was ready to offer his Throat to any that would come and cut it. It was reported, that afterwards to excuse his folly, he imputed it to his Dilecte, saying, That such

The main cause of his being mortally hated.

Scct. 8. such as had the Falling-sickness were not themselves, when standing on their Feet they spake to the People, but were seized with a trembling of the Body, giddiness, and a sudden dimness of sight. But this was not true; for he would have risen up to the Senate, but Cornelius Balbus, one of his Flattering Friends, would not let him, bidding him remember he was Cæsar, and let them reverence him, and do their Duties.

9. Concerning the Lupercalia, Plutarch premitteth, that in old time this Feast was said to be the Feast of Shepherds or Herd-men, and that it was much like to that of the Lycians in Arcadia; That at this time in Rome it was celebrated by several young Noble-men, and some Magistrates that governed them, who ran naked through the City, striking in sport them they found in their passage with Leatheren Thongs, Hair and all on, to make them give way; That many Noble-women, as well as others, went on purpose to stand in their way, and put forth their Hands to be stricken, perfwading themselves, that being with Child, they should have good Labour, or being barren, that it would cause them speedily to conceive. Cæsar sitting at the Rostra, to behold the sport in a Golden Chair, and Triumphal Robes, Antony now Consul being one of them that ran the Course, the People making him a Lane, came to Cæsar, and presented him with a Diadem wreathed about with Laurel. Hereupon there arose a Cry of rejoicing, not very great, made only by a few appointed for the purpose. But Cæsar refusing the Diadem, all the People shouted for Joy. Then did Antony offer it him again the second time, and there was a second shout of Joy; but still by a few; but when he refused it again the second time then all the whole People shouted. Cæsar having made this Experiment, found that the People did not like of it, and thereupon rising, commanded the Diadem to be carried into the Capitol. Plutarch adds further, That when the Tribunes had pulled the Diadems from his Statues, and sent to Prison those who first called him King, the People followed them, rejoicing at it, and called them Brutus, in memory of Brutus, who expelled Tarquinus. That Cæsar was herewith so offended, that he deprived them of their Tribuneships, and accusing them, spake also against the People, calling them Brutus and Cicero; whereupon they betook themselves to M. Brutus, who was defended from the former Brutus, was of as Noble a Family as any in Rome, and Son-in-law of M. Cato. Dion Cassius writes, That he was not descended from that ancient Brutus the Enemy of Tarquin, who had no Children but the two Sons, Youths, whom he slew. Plutarch confesseth there was such a Report; and it was said that this M. Brutus was descended of a mean Family. But he cites the Authority of Posidonius the Philosopher, who wrote, that Junius Brutus slew indeed two of his Sons, who were Men grown, but that there was a third Son, but a little Child at that time, from whom the Family was derived; as also, that of this Family there were certain Famous Men in his time, who in Stature and Countenance much resembled the Image of Junius Brutus.

10. However, the Enemies of Cæsar made use of the descent, as serving their purpose to excite him to an Act which might be suitable to that Original. To this purpose they wrote frequent Letters, sometimes called him by Name, and said they wanted another Brutus. Under the Statue of the ancient Brutus they wrote, That they wished he lived; and upon the Tribunal of Marcus, where he exercised the Office of Pretor, Brutus thou sleepest, and art not Brutus. Cæsar had been kind unto him as well as merciful, having not only pardoned him after the Battle of Pharsalus, but preferred him to the Pretorship, and designed him Consul the fourth year after, being confident that he would not be transported by ambition, or any other passion, to do any thing ingrateful or dishonourable. But these Papers and Speeches having moved him, Cassius, who had married his Sister, took the advantage to perswade him against the Tyrant, as he termed him; not only being an Enemy to the Power of Cæsar, but also his Person. For he contended before him with Brutus for the Pretorship, and having heard them both, Cæsar confessed that Cassius had the juster Cause; but said that Brutus should have the Place. He hated him for denying him the first Place, and would not thank him for the second, though he made him the second Pretor. And it began also a quarrel betwixt him and Brutus, though upon this occasion, knowing how fit a Person one of his Reputation would be to patronize the Fact, he reconciled himself unto him; his Friends agreeing to the Conspiracy, so as Brutus would become the chief. Brutus his thoughtfulness about this Affair did disturb him in the night, though he carried it wonderful cunningly in in the day, and did so distract him, that Porcus his Wife perceiving it was some extraordinary matter, and that he would not reveal it, because he thought her not able to bear Tortures, if it should come to it, gave her self a Wound in the Thigh, and convincing him that she could endure pain, got it out of him, and confirmed him in his resolution, as the Daughter of Cato. Many of the Conspirators, if not most, had been some way or other obliged by Cæsar. They were above sixty in number, and generally of Pompey's Party; but Decimus Brutus, one of his own Party, was drawn in, who had received from him extraordinary Kindnesses, and should have been Confidant the second year following.

11. The matter was in great danger of coming out, though the constancy of the Conspirators was very wonderful, and Cæsar himself was so secure, that he would believe nothing, but punished such as went about to tell him any such thing. They distrusted the Success, and the greatness of the Enterprize caused them to defer it till they perceived that the Quindecimviri, who said it was predicted in the Books of Sibylla, that a King was to subdue the Parthians, would make the report to the Senate, and require a Sentence which might be agreeable to the Prediction. This startled them, especially Brutus and Cassius, and others who being Magistrates were to be for it, without either contradiction or silence, and caused them to put their Design in execution. It was resolved it should be done at an Assembly of the Senate, for thither Cæsar would not fail to come, and there they might also meet him without suspicion, all the Noblest and chiefest Persons of the City being present. The Place was to be a Porticus joyning to the Theatre of Pompey, in which were Seats to sit on, and wherein the City had dedicated the Statue of Pompey for his care and charge. The Time should be on the Ides, or fifteenth of March, for luckily had the meeting of the Senate been on that day appointed; so that it seemed to be resolved above, that Cæsar then should die in revenge of Pompey's death. When the Day was come the Conspirators met at the House of Cassius, to bring his Son into the Forum, who that Day was to put on his Toga Virilis, and thence they came in a Troop to the Place, and expected the coming of Cæsar. But such had been the Dreams of himself and his Wife Calpurnia, and such Omens had happened with ill Prefages in Sacrifices, and the Gestures of the Birds, that he thought not to go out of his House, being also indisposed, but to send Antony to adjourn the Senate. The Conspirators fearing the Consequence of this delay, sent away to him Decimus Brutus his great Friend, as he was accounted, (and so great a Friend by Cæsar himself, that in his last Will and Testament he had appointed him to be his next Heir) to draw him into the Snare. He laughed the Sooth-sayers to scorn, and told Cæsar he would affront the Senate, or make them believe he did so, considering that by his commandment they were assembled, ready to grant him all things, and to declare him King of all the Provinces out of Italy, in which he should wear his Diadem in all Places both by Sea and Land. He asked him what the World would say, if the Senators should be told, that they must depart, and come again when Calpurnia should have better Dreams? He urged, that they would think and speak of him as a Tyrant; and if he could not be reconciled to the Day, that he would go himself in Person, and dismiss the Senate. With this he took him by the Hand, and treacherously brought him out of his House.

'Who draws him into the Snare.

12. In his way some that met him endeavoured to reveal the Conspiracy, and amongst the rest one put a Bill into his Hand, containing the whole Matter; which he had learnt being familiar with Brutus his Confederates. Perceiving him to give all the Petitions that were presented him to his Men about him, he prayed him to read it himself, and that speedily, for it contained things of weight, which concerned him nearly. He took it of him with much ado, (for he got near to him, notwithstanding the Crowd, which others could not) but could never read it for the Multitude of Persons that saluted him, but held it still in his Hand, till he came to the Place of the Assembly. However this happened, whether by reason of the diversion he had by the Crowd, or his own neglect; so secure and careless he was, that seeing one who had bid him beware of this Day, he jested at him, and asking him what was become of his Predictions, said the Day was come, and he was safe; to which the Man replied, That indeed it was come, but not ended. Some of the Conspirators would have had Antony and Lepidus also slain; but for Antony, Brutus, who indeed most generous of any of them, interceded, hoping, he said, he would become a better Man, and joynt with them for Liberty, when he should see Cæsar taken.

Sect. 8. taken away. And it was agreed, that left by killing many they should give occasion to say, that what they did was not out of love to the publick Liberty, but for Rule and Domination, that they should not be killed, and they pretended they would be satisfied with Cæsar's Death. Now Lepidus was with the Army in the adjoining Country, but Antony was in Town, and they resolved that he was by no means to be suffered to be present. Therefore when Cæsar went into the House, Decimus Brutus (Dio saith Trebonius) took him aside, and diverted him from going in with a long Story.

And divers
Antony.

13. Cæsar coming in, all the Senators stood up to do him reverence. Being fate, they came about his Chair, and Cimber Tullius first applied himself to him, pretending to petition him to call home his Brother from banishment. He denying his Suit, and putting him off till another time, they all came about him, and began to move him, but he rejecting them, and in displeasure putting them away from him, Cimber took his Gown and pulled it from his Shoulders, which was the Sign given to his Companions. Cæsar cried out, that this was violence, and then Cæsa standing behind him, struck him on the Neck with his Sword, but the Wound was not great nor mortal. Cæsar turning straight, catch hold of his Sword, and, some say, struck him in the Arm with his Writing Instrument, and both cried out, Cæsar in Latin, O vile Cæsa, what dost thou, and Cæsa in Greek to his Brother, Brother help me. Then did Cæsar endeavour to break from them, but was hindered by one stroak after another, for they compassed him in on every side, and he could turn him no where but he was stricken at by some, and still had naked Swords in his Face, and was hacked and mangled among them, as a Wild Beast taken by Hunters. Seeing this, and that Brutus amongst the rest made at him, who gave him a Wound under his Belly, he struggled no more, but covered his Head with his Gown, and with his Left Hand drew his Skirts down to his Knees, that he might fall decently; and down he fell at the Base whereon Pompey's Image stood, which all ran of gore Blood, till he was slain. The Report was, that he had three and twenty Wounds upon his Body, though none mortal but the second on his Breast; for it was agreed amongst them, that every one should give him a Wound, because all their Hands should be in the Murder, and divers of the Conspirators were hurt, so many striking at one Body. But to violent and bloody a Death came this great Man, one of the greatest Spirit and Presence of Mind that we can read of, and yet of a courteous and merciful Disposition, in the fifty sixth Year of his Age. He who had fought fifty Battels, and procured the Death of a Million and one hundred ninety two thousand Persons, as Pliny reckoneth, in that Senate which he himself for the most part had chosen, in the Court of Pompey, and at the Feet of Pompey's Statue, so many of his Officers looking on, but not stirring, with such confusion were they struck at the fight, by the hands of most Noble Citizens, many of whom he had to his utmost gratified; and so lay he, the Tumult and Confusion being so great, that for some time not a Friend nor Slave came near his Body, till at length it was by three of his meanest Slaves put into a Litter, and carried home, his Arm hanging out.

Lib. 7. c. 15.

14. So great a Man he was, that Plutarch * being judge, there was none of the greatest, and most admired Captains, to whom the Gallick War alone did not demonstrate him equal in Commendations, both as General, and as a Soldier. For, whether we consider the Fabii, Scipios, Metelli, his Contemporaries, or those that went before him, as Sylla, Marius, and both the Luculli, and even him whose Glory for all Warlike Abilities reacheth to the Skies, Pompey himself, the Actions of Cæsar excel all their Exploits. For, sometimes he obtained greater Glory, for the inconvenience of the Places wherein he made War, sometimes for the greatness of the Countries which he subdued, sometimes for the multitude and strength of his Enemies overthrown, sometimes for the perfidiousness and barbarism of the Nations subdued, sometimes for clemency shewed to the Conquered, or other-whiles for his Liberality towards his Fellow-Soldiers; but always in respect of the number of Battels, and of those that were slain. For having carried on the War in Gall not fully ten years, he took above eight hundred Cities, subdued three hundred several sorts of People, and having engaged at several times with three Millions of Men, killed the third part, and took the other alive. So great was the affection of his Soldiers

Sect. 8. diers to him, and their care to please him, that whereas otherwise they were nothing better than others, yet being invincible for his credit, they would not refuse any danger. This disposition in them he first bred, and then maintained, by conferring Honours and Rewards upon them, wherein he spared nothing; then by undertaking all dangers with them, and refusing no labour. His boldness indeed, and courage, considering that it proceeded from incredible desire of Glory, they admired not so much; but his labour and toil which he endured above his strength did astonish them. For, he was of a thin habit of Body, pale and tender, had a sickly Head, and was subject to the Falling-fickness, or Epilepsie, which first took him at Corduba. But he took not an occasion of laziness from his want of health, but by Expeditions, most difficult Journeys, slenderness of Diet, and by continuing abroad in the open Air, fought to drive away his Disease, and keep his Body healthful. Most commonly he slept as he was carried in his Chariot or Litter, so that his sleep was not idle. On the day time he was carried about the Forts, Cities and Camps, with a Boy sitting by him, who wrote down what he dictated, and a Soldier with a Sword standing at his Back. He made so great Journeys, that in his first Expedition from Rome, in eight Incampings he came to the River Rhodanus. From his Childhood he had learn'd and practised tiding, so that putting his Hands behind him upon his Back, he would sit an Horse in his full speed, which was very much for one that had his Disease. Moreover, in that Expedition he exercised himself so, that riding, he would dictate several Letters to two Secretaries or more. He was a Man ambitious of Power, and unsatisfied with any thing on this side Sovereignty, but Victory pleased him, not revenge nor cruelty, in which respect Cicero, to note his ambition, and yet acknowledge his goodness of Nature, compared him to Pisistratus.

15. The Conspirators conscious of the greatness of the Fact, fearing the worst, secured themselves in the Capitol, it being in the Senate strongly debated, how it should look upon the thing, and consequently upon them. But for Antonius the Consul (who also resolved when he should be able, to punish it, though now he betrayed no such intention) the Fact had been approved of, as done upon an Usurper and a Tyrant, though they had not long before taken a Solemn Oath for his Preservation, and decreed such vast Honours to him. Antonius by putting them in mind, that if he were judged deservedly slain, all his Acts were to be null'd, and consequently the assignment of several Offices, which he had of late made to several of them, effected that no more was done than to decree an Amnestie or Oblivion for all that was past, for which Cicero much laboured. The Offices were confirmed with this reason entered, because it was requisite for the good of the Commonwealth, and the day following the Senate meeting again, decreed Provinces to the Murderers, viz. to M. Brutus Crete, Africa to Cassius, to Trebonius Asia, to Cimber Bithynia, and Gall about Pactus to Decimus Brutus. After this, Cæsar's Testament was opened, wherein he made Heirs three: Nephews of his Sisters, C. Octavius of three parts in four of his Estate, (not of half only; as it's found in Livy's Epitome) and L. Pinarus and Q. Pedius of the other fourth part. C. Octavius he adopted into his Name and Family, and most of those that killed him he named amongst the Guardians of his Son, if one should be born to him. As second Heirs, if the former should not possess the Inheritance, he named Decimus Brutus and M. Antonius. He also in his Will gave no small matter to the Romans, to be divided Man by Man; as Plutarch writeth. This moved the People out of measure to indignation against the Conspirators, Antonius the Consul vehemently stirring up the multitude in his Funeral Oration. They were driven to that rage, that after the burning of the Corps they were hardly dissuaded from firing their Houses, and they tore in pieces one Cinna, whom they mistook for another of that Name that was one of them.

16. Now the series of Affairs bringeth us to Cæsar Octavianus, the adopted Son of Julius. He was Grand-son to his Sister Julia, which Woman was Wife to M. Antinius Balbus, and by him had a Daughter that was married to C. Octavius. He was born in the Consulship of Cicero, and lost his Father (who governing Macedonia, died suddenly before he could stand for the Consulship) when but four years old. He accompanied this his great Uncle in the last Spanish War, who ever kept him close to him in their Travel, and was now sent

His Mother and Father-in-law Marcus Philippus, were unwilling he should take the Name of Cæsar, as subject to much envy; but after some pause he relolved to the contrary, and assuming the Name of Cæsar Octavianus, made use of the good affections of his Uncles Friends in Greece, who accompanying him to the City, he was met by a vast number of others from Rome. Here, after he had accepted of the Adoption, and confirmed it by the Authority of the Pretor as the Custom was, he went to Antony, whom he expected to have his Friend and Assistant in prosecuting his Uncles Enemies. But after some waiting, he entertained him with great contempt, and though he had got a great quantity of Cæsar's Money, yet he denied to let him have any, fearing he should grow into too much esteem. Cæsar hereupon fold his own Inheritance to pay the Legacy given to the People, which procured him much love, his Uncles (or Fathers, as now he must be called) old Soldiers flocked to him, whom he accepted of out of fear of Antony, who now every day became more odious, both to him, to People and Senate.

17. The Senate suspected Antony as intending to set up himself, and he intended nothing more, for which cause he relolved to have some Province assigned to him, wherein he might get Power. To curry favour then he propounded to be considered Sextus Pompey, who yet remained of the Sons of Pompey the Great, (that beloved Man) that in requital for his Fathers Estate confiscated, he might have an allowance out of the Publick, and command of the Seas, with that Navy he formerly had. This being received with great applause, was enacted; and so Pompey was called back into Sicily, where he afterwards waged a great War against Cæsar. Antony periwaded Dolabella his Colleague, (a young Man whom Cæsar having ordained to be Consul after his departure out of the City, when he was dead, took the Office, and inveighing against his Benefactor, would have had the day of his death titled the Birth-day of the City) though he loved him not, to ask Syria, not of the Senate, but the People, hoping that after him he should not be denied such a request. The difference increaseth betwixt him and Cæsar, he desired to have the fix Legions which lay in Macedonia, and obtained them, deceiving the Senate by a false rumour, that the Gætes hearing of Cæsar's death, had invaded that Province. He baited them, by preferring a Law against any one's being Dictator. It was his design to bring these Legions over into Italy to awe and command all, and that he might effect this, he preferred by force a Law for changing of Provinces, and thereby procured to his Brother C. Antonius Macedonia, which formerly had been assigned to M. Brutus, and to himself the nearer Gall, (or Gallia Cisalpine) which before was given to Decimus Brutus.

18. The Senate would in no wise grant this, whereupon he betook himself to the People. When he had brought over his Legions, part of them revolted to Cæsar, who now out of fear went up and down Italy, gathering Soldiers out of the Colonies his Father had planted. With a considerable Army at length Antony marched into Gall, whence he commanded Brutus to be gone, who gave way to him then, but departed to Mutina, resolving there to stay and endure a Siege, for that he had some considerable strength, and expected Assistance. Here Antony straightly besieged him, which the Senate hearing of, by Cicero's working especially, (who now began to speak and write his fourteen Orations, in imitation of those of Demosthenes, called Philippics) declared him an Enemy to the State, which proved a means for the bringing in of and preferring of Cæsar Octavianus. For though the Senate cared not at all for him, as being generally of Pompey's Faction, yet they relolved to make use of him for his Armies sake, and therefore erected him a Statue, made him a Senator, though but nineteen years old, decreed, that he should be considered towards preferment as ten years older, and gave him equal Power with Hirtius and Pausa the Consuls, whom now they sent to relieve Brutus. They took Bononia; but Antony being bold, for that he had got the better in some skirmishes, went and met Pausa, whom he overthrew, but returning carelessly into his Camp, was worsted by Hirtius. A little after a great Battle was fought near Mutina, wherein Antony was quite defeated, and fled to Lepidus then Proconsul in the further Gall. Brutus* and Cassius; now in Greece, but his Soldiers, moved by the difficulty of the Journey, revolted, the six new raised Legions to Cæsar, and the four of old Soldiers to Antony. He then purposing with a small Attendance to pass through Gall, was taken at Aquileæ, and betrayed by Capernus Sequanus, Governour of the Country, who sent his Head to Antony. Before this, Trebolenus, another of his Complices in Cæsar's death, excluding Dolabella (whom the Senate had judged an Enemy) from Pergamus and Smyrna, was taken by him in the latter Place, and after grievous torments, had his Head cut off, which the Soldiers kicking about as a Foot-ball, did so abuse, as no Face was to be seen on it. Not long after the Death of Decimus Brutus, Mimmius Blesius, another of the Conspirators, was slain by his Slaves, whom he had gelded in a great rage.

19. Now the Senate having no need of young Cæsar, slighted him exceedingly, decreeing the Honour due to him unto Brutus, whom he had relieved, giving him very bitter taunts, and denying him a Triumph. Being sensible hereof, and how most of them were of Pompey's Faction, he began to tamper with Antony by Letters, as also with Lepidus, for a Conjunction, and sent four hundred Soldiers into the City, in the Name of the Army, to demand the Consulship for him. Hereat the Senate straining hard, one Cornelius a Centurion laying his Hand upon his Sword, said, This shall do it, if you will not. Then called he Antony and Lepidus into Italy, whereat the Senate much startled, and too late blaming their own rigidity, decreed him Consul, and whomsoever he would take to himself. So he invaded the Consulship, a month and five days before he was twenty years old, and took Q. Pedius for his Colleague. Then by a Law was Fire and Water forbidden to all that had an Hand in the death of Cæsar, and their Goods were sold. The Senate was now so changed, either through good advice or fear, that in stead of slighting, they advanced him above all example. They relolved, that after his Consulship he should take place of all Consuls, and though formerly they were displeased with his levelling Forces, being a private Man; now they desired him to add to his Army, and decreed to him the Legions of Decimus Brutus. The City was committed to his care, and Power given him to act what he pleased, though without the pre-script of the Law, which he retained fifty six years till his death. Not long after came Emilius Lepidus and M. Antonius into Italy, whom he met about Bononia, and after a three days conference entered into a Confederacy with them, which is famous by the Name of the Triumvirate.

The terms of this Combination were, That Cæsar, for the remainder of the Year, should leave the Consulship to Ventidius, who formerly in the Social War, when a Boy, was led in Triumph, and after that rubbed the heels of * Mules for his living. That a new Authority of three Men should be erected to take away civil dissensions; which they three should execute for five years with Consular Power, (for, the Dictatorship was waved, because of a Law lately preferred against it by Antony) with Authority to dispose of all Offices for that Term. That Antony should have, as a Province, all Gall, except that of Narbon, which Lepidus was to have with Spain; and to Cæsar was Africa, with Sardinia and Sicily, assigned; other Places beyond the Seas being left to another time. They agreed further, That their Enemies should be destroyed, wherein the Case of Cicero moved the greatest Controversie. For Antony would not meddle, except he in the first place should be slain; Lepidus was content, but Cæsar stood much against it, yet on the third day he assented, an exchange being made; for he yielding up Cicero, Lepidus permitted his Brother Paulus, and Antony L. Cæsar, his Uncle by the Mother's side, to be profcribed. Lastly, it was agreed, That Lepidus should be Consul the following Year, in stead of Decimus Brutus, designed formerly by Julius Cæsar. He guarding Rome and Italy, the other two were to make War upon Brutus and Cassius, who now (though at first without any Decree of the Senate) had seized on Macedonia and Syria. Cassius in Laodicea besieged Dolabella, who being judged an Enemy by the Senate for the death of Trebolenus, when the City was taken caused his Page to cut off his Head, and so ended his Life, being a Man of no great solidity. Sect. 8. back Friend to him in the Senate, reigning amongst the Fathers and the People with his Eloquence.

The effects of
it 21. The first effect of the Triumvirate was a Proscription of some three hundred Persons of Equestrian and Senatorial Ranks. Though the pretence was to revenge Cæsar's Death, yet many were murdered for their rich Estates, others out of malice, and some for their convenient Houses and Gardens. Amongst those of greatest note was Varro, who now living to see and feel a second Irish, yet escaped with his Life. Cicero the Man most aimed at by Antony for opposing him to vehemently in the Senate, upon the Triumvirs their coming went to Sea; but the Winds being contrary, and because he could not endure the shaking of the Ship, he returned, saying, He would die in his Country often preferred by him. Being weary both of his Flight and Life, he came to a Village a little more than a Mile distant from the Sea. Here his Servants, terrified by several Prodigies, partly by persuasion, and partly by Force, put him again in his Litter, and were carrying him back to the Sea, when hearing of those that came to seek for him, he caused the Litter to be set down, and quietly stretched out his Neck to Popilius Lenus, whom formerly by his Oratory he had saved from Condemnation. He ill-favourably enough cut off his Head and Hands, which he presented to Antony, and for so doing received a great Reward.

After the Head had been sufficiently gazed on by him and his Wife Fulvia, (who set on her Knees, pulled out the Tongue, and pricking it with Needles, otherwise shamefully shewed her spite) it was to the grief of all Men set up in the Pleading Place, or Rostra. To such an end came this most Famous Man, the Father of Roman Eloquence. He was born at Arginum, on the third of the Nones of January, in the 648 year of the City, C. Attilius Serranus, and Q. Servilius Cæpio, being Consuls, the same wherein Pompey the Great was born, on the Calends of October. His Father was of Equestrian Rank, and issued, as some said, from Tullius Attius, a Noble King of the Volsi. He first deserved the Triumph of the Gown, and the Laurel of the Tongue. And as Cæsar the Dictator wrote of him, he obtained a Laurel greater than all Triumphs, (though he had once decreed to him for his good Service in the Field) by how much the more 'tis a greater and more excellent thing to enlarge the Bounds of Roman Wit, than of Empire. He died on the seventh of December, when he had lived sixty three years, eleven months, and five days. His Brother Quintus and his Sons were slain, but his own escaped; for that he had sent him before-hand unto Athenæ.

And many others. 22. All Places in the City were full of Slaughters. The ordinary rate of one Head brought to the Triumvirs, if by a Free-man, was one hundred thousand Sejces; if by a Slave, half so much, with the Liberty of the City. This corrupted many, so as forgetting both Duty and Natural Affection, they betrayed those for whose preservation they ought to have laboured. Yet now many rare, and admirable Examples, of the Love of Wives to their Husbands, and of Slaves to their Masters, appeared; fewest of Children towards their Parents. Yet Oppius his Act seemeth to stand for many, who, Æneas like, carried out his old and decrepit Father, and conveyed him to the Sea, sometimes leading, and sometimes carrying him on his Back, till they both escaped into Sicily, whence afterwards returning, the People, out of a sense of his Piety, made him Ædile; and for that he wanted Money to set out the usual Games, the Artificers willingly wrought for him without Wages, and the Spectators by a Contribution made him rich. Of such proscribed Persons as escaped, some fled to Brutus and Cassius, who received them kindly; but most of them to Sextus Pompey now in Sicily, who sent out Vessels to hover upon the Coasts for them, and furnished them, when came over, with Necessaries. But the Triumvirs wanting great Sums for carrying on the War against Cassius and Brutus, by reason that few would buy Confiscated Estates, condemned also, though not the Persons, yet the Goods of many Rich Women, as well as Men.

23. Cassius, after he had got Syria into his Power, thought of making an Expedition into Egypt against Cleopatra, (who now was going with a great Power to the Aid of Cæsar, and his Followers) but was recalled by Brutus; for that Antony and Cæsar (who having attempted something against Pholony in Sicily, put it now off till another time) were coming against them with forty Legions, whereof eight had already passed the Ionian Sea. Therefore leaving

And Cassius and Brutus take advantage of their Treachery.

Syria to his Brothers Son with one Legion, he sent some into Cappadocia, who killed Ariobarzanes, as one that had conspired against him, and brought him a Mass of Money. Exacting Money with much rigour, he came into Asia, and meeting Brutus at Smyrna, they consulted about the War. Brutus moved that they should pass over into Macedonia, and there encounter their Enemies; but Cassius prevailed that the Rhodian and Lycian should first be reduced, who refused to contribute any thing, and were powerful at Sea. It seeming good not to leave any Enemy at their back, this was performed, and vast Sums of Money by that, and other means raised. The Xanthians standing out, as they had done in former times against Cyrus and Alexander, were scarce any of them left alive; and the Rhodian had little besides their Lives left unto them.

24. After this, both the Armies met at Philippi, that City of Macedonia, to which, being built by Philip to restrain the Thracians, as we have formerly shewn, St. Paul wrote his Epistle. Here appeared on either side nineteen Legions. Antony and Cæsar brought into the Field thirteen thousand Horse; but Brutus and Cassius twenty thousand, who coming thither first, incamped on a high and convenient Ground near the Sea, whence they could have Provisions in abundance. The other Party was exceedingly straitened for Necessities, having only Macedonia and Thessaly open to it, for that Pompey cut off all intercourse from Africa, as Marcus and Emobarus from Italy, by their Navies. This made Antony desirous to fight above measure, which the Enemy knowing well enough, refused to engage, till Antony making a way through a Fen to intercept his Provisions, and a Work being raised by Cassius against him, this procured a Fight, wherein Cassius had the worst on his part, and his Camp was taken by Antony. On the other side Cæsar's Wing was worsted, and his Camp also taken by Brutus. Cassius departing to an Hill not far off, expected the event of the Fight on his Partners side, and because, for the Dust, he could not discern what Horse it was that made towards him, sent Titinius to discover. He being received with joy by those that were bringing Tidings of Victory, stayed so long, till Cæsar, fearing the worst, and that the Messenger was intercepted, killed himself, or caused his Libertus, or Freed-man, to cut off his Head. Scarcely was it laid, when Titinius coming, followed him by his own Hands, whom, as he said, he had killed by loitering.

25. Brutus presently caused his Collegues Body to be buried out of fight, left the Army should be dejected; and then had no mind to fight, desiring rather to starve the Enemy, who now was in desperate condition by want of Necessaries, till fearing a defection, for that some had revolted already, or till being forced by the earnestness of his Soldiers he led them out to Battle. Both Parties, though Country-men, were so greedy of engaging, that they neglected to use any mislive Weapons, and betook themselves to their Swords, fighting with great animosity, till at length Brutus his side was born down, and put to the rout. He escaped to an Hill, where remaining all night, when in the morning he saw no way of escaping, (Antony having made him sure, left he should renew the War) he set his Swords point to his left Pap, where the motion of the Heart is felt, and forcing it into his Breast, expired. This was the end of these two Men, by the same Weapons, as some write, wherewith they killed Cæsar, who had given them their Lives, and received them into favour after the Battle of Pharsalam. While they sought liberty by his death, by that very means they lost that which they accounted such, being indeed no other than a liberty for the common sort to run into extravagancies, and for particular Men to abuse their credulity, and by flattery to procure Power, which they then would improve (even Pompey himself, as well as Sylla, Cinna, Marinus and Cæsar) further than their Commissions extended. With them perished the hopes of that called a Common-wealth, which thenceforth never was more seen. As for the succeeding Bickerings which the Triumvirs had with young Pompey, they were but inconsiderable in comparison of this War with Cassius and Brutus, who having under their Power all the Roman Empire from Macedonia to the River Euphrates, with above twenty Legions, twenty thousand Horse, two hundred long Ships, and infinite Sums of Money, so long as they remained, the Common-wealth seemed (though not at Rome) as yet to be surviving.

26. Cesar being indisposed, (for he had not his health this Expedition, and therefore was not in the first Fight) returned into Italy. Antony went into Asia to gather up Money for the payment of Largeffes promised to the Soldiers. Here he squeezed out of the poor Inhabitants that little which was left them by Cassius and Brutus, the Followers of whom he also reforted as he met with them, except such as had an hand in Cesar's death. In Cilicia he met with Cleopatra Queen of Egypt, on whom he presently doated, having formerly had much affection for her when yet a Girl, at such time as he accompanied Gabinus into that Kingdom. Thither he now followed her, having first sent a Party of Horse to plunder Palmyra, a Town situate near Euphrates, and laid most heavy Tributes and Impositions upon the Provinces. After Cesar had recovered, according to their agreement at parting he set himself to divide Lands to the Army in Italy, which hereby was put into a great combustion, the number of Soldiers being so great, that multitudes of Inhabitants were turned out, and many Towns emptied to give place to those new comers, who committed many outrages, and had not purchased those Lands by any Service to the State, (as was complained) but by serving to inthrall it to the Dominion of three Men. Fulvia, the Wife of Antony, and Lucius his Brother, now Consul, envied Cesar this popularity with the Soldiers, and contended earnestly that they ought to settle the Soldiers of Antony, which was granted. But herewith not contented, they resolved to profanate him with War. She, for that the desired her Husband might be recalled thereby from Cleopatra, concerning whom she had too much cause to be jealous of him; and he, out of desire to innovate, pretending an endeavour to suppress the Triumvirate, and to reduce the ancient form of Government, and trusting much to the strength of his Brother.

27. Much ado was made to reconcile them, but to no purpose. The ancient Possessors of the Grounds flocked to Lucius, and the new ones to Cesar, to whom Salvidienus coming out of Gall with great strength, Lucius went to oppose him, but was diverted by Agrippa, and reduced to such straits betwixt them two, (though Ventidius and Astinus, two of Antony's Captains, were not far off) that glad he was to betake himself for security to Perusia a strong Town, where he was closely besieged by Cesar and his Party. He stood out very courageously, till forced by famine to yield to mercy; then coming out first, and casting himself into Cesar's Hands, he interceded for his Soldiers, and desired all the blame might be upon himself: He was received honourably, and his Soldiers were pardoned at the desire of their Enemies. The Town was to be plundered, but by a mad-man, who set his own House on fire, and therein perished, it was burnt down to the ground. About this time was the first Eclog of Virgil written (who now was some twenty eight years old) during the division of those Lands, as clearly appeareth from it: The above-mentioned L. Antonius and P. Servilius Isauricus being Consuls, in the 713th year of the City, and the third of the Triumvirate.

28. After the Perusian War (for so 'tis called) Cesar suspecting Antony's affection towards him; to strengthen himself seized on Spain and Gall, though his Provinces, taking occasion at the death of his Lieutenant, whereby being forty Legions strong, he was able to grapple with him if need should require. But having no Shipping, he was at a loss as to Sea-matters, and therefore married Scribonia the Sister of Libo, Father-in-law to Sextus Pompey, from whom he hoped by this alliance if need were to obtain Peace. Antony this Spring moved from Alexandria, where he had lived all Winter very loosely with Cleopatra, as against the Parthians, who now under conduct of Labienus had over-run Syria as far as Tyre. Though this Town was set upon by them, and he pretended he would relieve it, yet he did not, alledging a necessity of going to the War against Pompey, who now hindred all Provisions from coming to the City, and thereby caused a great dearth: And he again excused himself why he came no sooner to that against Pompey, because he was retained by the Parthian War. Sailing then into Asia, he had news of the event of the Perusian War, and blamed much his Wife and Brother; whence passing into Greece he met with her, and his Mother Julia, whom Pompey having taken now sent safe to him. Thence he sailed over the Ionian Sea, where Enobarbus delivered up all his Fleet and Forces to him; and so they came to Brundisium, where they were kept out by a Garrison placed there by Cesar.

29. This made such a breach betwixt them, that Antony blocked up the Town, and procured Pompey from Sicily to invade Italy. Cesar came to Brundisium, where the old Soldiers being unwilling to fight against Antony, the Army laboured to reconcile the Triumvirs, which Cocceius, friend to both, at length effected with much labour; Pollio on Antony's side, and Mecenas on Cesar's, as Delegates making up the breach. All offences were mutually to be forgiven, and for that Marcellus, Husband to Octavia Cesar's Sister, was now dead, and also Fulvia Antony's Wife, for grief that he neglected her, Antony married Octavia. Then was the Roman Empire divided betwixt them, the Bounds of their Dominions being Cadizopolis, a Town of Illyricum, all from it Westward being to Oceby Cesar, and all Eastward Antony. Africk was left to Lepidus, who now was even no body, and having offended Cesar, had been confined by him to that Province. The War against the Parthians was judged to Antony, and that against Pompey (who must needs now be suppressed) unto Cesar. Antony sent Ventidius into Asia to restrain the Parthians, who now had made an incursion as far as Ionis. But out of Sardinia did Menodorus Pompey's Admiral the second time eject Helennus Cesar's Captain, whereupon Cesar refused to hearken to Antony, when he moved him to be reconciled unto Pompey. Both the Triumvirs (or rather now the Dunnevis) being come to the City, were received with most lamentable complaints of Poor People, ready to starve for want of Provisions, which Pompey hindered from coming, from the East by Sicily, from the West by Sardinia and Corfica, which he had in his Power, and from Africk by his Navy also, which then was most powerful at Sea. Cesar could not be drawn to make Peace with him, notwithstanding the loud Cries and Prayers of the Multitude, which obstinacy drew him, and Antony (rescuing him) into such danger, as both of them were near stoning. At length being forced to it, and Pompey being persuaded, they met, but Pompey expecting to be admitted into the Power and Place of Lepidus, the Treaty came to nothing. Yet the pressure of the Famine brought them together again, and amongst other things it was concluded, That Pompey retaining all the Islands he had already, and Peloponnesus over and above, as long as they should hold their Power; and having liberty to be Consul, and to discharge the Office by any of his Friends, he was to leave the Sea open, and pay to the People what Corn was due out of Sicily. The prescribed Persons, except such as were guilty of Cesar's death, had now all liberty to return. The day following, Consuls were designed for four years. First Antony and Libo, then Cesar and Pompey, next Enobarbus and Sosius, and lastly, Cesar and Antony, who then (it might be hoped) might restore the Government to the People. Then did Antony and Cesar return, and were most joyfully received. And this Year being the 714 of the City, did they procure Herod the Great to be declared King of Judea, in the first year of the 184 Olympiad, C. Domitius Calpurnius the second time, and C. Astinus Pollio being Consuls.

30. Antony departed toward the East again for the Parthian War, which hitherto Ventidius his Lieutenant had managed with good success, having got several Victories, wherein Labienus, who brought them into Syria, and Pharnapates, (or Phraates, or Burzapharnes, being called by several Names) the greatest of their Captains, with Pacorus Son to Ordes the King, were slain. After this he repelled them in Media and Mesopotamia, and besieged Antiochus Comagenus in Samosata, whom he suffered, upon promise of one thousand Talents, to send Ambassadors unto Antony, who now drew near, and for that the Siege was likely long to continue, by reason of the desperate resolution of the Defendants, granted him Peace for three hundred Talents, accepted but of two Hostages, and those inconsiderable ones; and he gave him leave to put to death Alexander, who had formerly revolted to the Romans. This by (a) some he was thought to do for fear of the Army, which was angry at his ill usage of Ventidius; though others say, he honoured him according to his deserts, who thought (b) a Man of an obscure extract, now first of all others triumphed over the Parthians. Antony having settled the Affairs of Syria, departed to Athens, where he spent the Winter with Octavia. But the (c) Peace with Pompey continued but a short time. The cause of the breach (whatever secretly was aimed at) was pretended to be, for that Antony being to quit Peloponnesus, would do it but upon this condition, that Pompey should give him satisfaction for such Monies

But Pompey liked not of any such condition, and therefore rigged a new Fleet, and provided himself of Forces, perhaps giving credit to Metrodorus, who would tell him, that the present state of Affairs was no true Peace, but rather a cessation of Arms. He then renewed his Piracy, which renewed the former grievances, and made the People cry out, that the matter was only altered from three Tyrants to four. But Metrodorus revolted to Cesar, bringing in with him Corsica, Sardinia, and three Legions, and then Antony was called to Brundisium to consult about the War. Thither he came at the day appointed, but Cesar keeping not his Word, he stayed not for him, either not liking the breach of the Peace, or for that he envied Cesar all that Power he saw him have; for still they suspected and grudged each other. But Cesar being provided, set out to Sea, as to invade Sicily, and was beaten back by Pompey, though he took him at unawares, who heard nothing of the Revolt of Metrodorus, till all of Cesar's coming. Afterward his Ships lying at Anchor, were extremely battered, and most of the Men were cast away.

31. Cesar fortified the Coasts of Italy, for fear lest Pompey should make an invasion, which he, not knowing how to improve a Victory, was never wont to attempt. Then wanting all manner of Provisions for the War, he sent Mecenas to Antony, who refusing not to join with him, this cheered him, together with a Victory got by Agrippa in Aquitaine; many Cities, and private Persons also promising aid. Antony came to Tarentum with three hundred Ships, but whether there was something else betwixt them, or for that he was now furnished, he slighted his help, Cesar excused himself that he met him not, which the other took in ill part, yet sent for him again. For having laid out much upon the Fleet, he intended to exchange it for some Italian Legions, to be used in the Parthian War, it being difficult for him to raise Men in Italy, which was subject to Cesar, though by their last agreement both were left free there to make their Levies. Octavia coming over to her Brother, agreed them, who then made the exchange, and because the time of the Triumvirate set by the Senate was almost out, prorogued their Power for five years longer, without any consideration had of the suffrages of the People. So Antony departed into Syria, Cesar deferring his Expedition into Sicily until the following year.

32. He determined to invade Sicily from three several Quarters: Lepidus, who then joined with him, was to invade it from Africk, Taurus from Tarentum, and he himself from Puteoli. Pompey resolved to oppose him so many several ways, but at this time it needed not; for Cesar's Navy was the second time wracked by a Tempest, which so puffed up Pompey, that he stiled himself Neptune's Son. But Cesar gave not over the Enterprize; for the same Summer having recruited his Forces, and mended his Ships, he put forth to Sea, and then, though on Lepidus his part were lost two Legions, overthrew Pompey's Fleet; but was again worsted, and yet landed twenty one Legions, and two thousand Horse, besides five thousand lightly Armed. No great or memorable Battle was there on Lands, but Pompey sent to his Enemy, to know if he would fight by Sea, fearing his Land-Forces. He accepted of his offer, and then finally defeated him, having sunk twenty eight of his Vessels. The rest were either taken or broken, seven-teen only escaped, and at the fight of his overthrow this Land-Force yielded to Cesar, so that with his seventeen Vessels he fled to Antony; from whom he expected protection, having restored formerly his Mother tale to him, when in such a condition. Messana still stood out; but the Garrison at length yielded to Lepidus, who granted to the Soldiers, to draw them to his Party, the Plunder of the Town equal with his own. Having now by the addition of these Forces twenty two Legions, and a strong Body of Horse under his Command, he pleased himself with thoughts of getting all Sicily into his Hands, to which he pretended a right, as first invaded by him; and he sought to hinder Cesar all he could from the possession of it.

33. Cesar expostulated with him for his ingratitude; but to no purpose. Then found he means to draw away all his Army from him, which now was something averse to Civil Wars, and satisfied of the greater worth of Cesar, being moreover incensed against their General, for making Pompey's Soldiers partakers with them in the plunder of Messana. Yet though his Soldiers would have killed him, did he save them alive, but outed him of all Power, and banished him; so that thus fell one head of this Tricipitina. Pompey not being pursued by Cesar, craved protection from Antony; yet sent to the Parthian, in case he should not be received by him. Then thought he of seizing upon Syria, and the Parts adjacent, upon a rumor of Antony's being overthrown; whereupon he was pursued by his Party, and at last taken and killed at Midasia, a Town of Phrygia, as Dio writeth, but as Florus and Appian at Miletus, in the fourth year of his Age, fourteen years after the death of his Father. Cesar at his return restrained Robberies in the City, setting Watches therein, and admitted things in the ancient way by annual Magistrates. He burnt all Letters written in time of War, promising he would restore the Common-wealth as soon as Antony should return, who, he knew, would also lay down the Magistracy, all Civil Wars being ended. He was therefore received with lucky acclamations, and had a Perpetual Tribuneship bestowed on him; as invited by this Honour to lay down his other Power. Concerning this he wrote privately to Antony, who, whilst Cesar was thus employed about Pompey, had called Cleopatra into Syria, and there given her Phoenicia, Celestria, Cyprus, a great part of Cilicia, with part of Arabia Nabathæa, and so much of Judea as brought Bethsamm. Then sending her home, he marched into Armenia, where yet he could do nothing (for desire of her) like himself; but ever thought of returning to her, which shortly after he did; but was much troubled in his Passage by the Parthians, to whom his Army had revolted, but that they killed such as first passed over to them.

34. The Year following, and that wherein Pompey was slain, he was solicited by the King of Media in conjunction with him to make War upon the Parthians; but was hindered by stir which happened betwixt Cleopatra and Octavia his Wife, who now returning to him out of Italy, met with Letters at Athens to stop her there, he pretending necessary avocations by War. Cesar then would have had her come to his House, but she would go to her Husbands, where she educated both his Children and her own, as became her. Then did Antony return into Armenia, where he caught the King by a wife, and brought him in Triumph into Egypt. Now would he be called Father Bacchus, as Cleopatra was, who now was stiled by him Queen of Egypt, Cyprus, Africa, and Celestria, Cesar, whom he had by Julius Caesar, being her Partner in these Principalities: But his own Sons by her, Alexander and Pholomy, he named Kings of Kings; betwixt whom he did not only part what Provinces he himself had, but also Armenia, Parthia, and Media, and to Cleopatra their Daughter assigned Cyrene. These things, together with the disgrace of his Sister, provoked Cesar, who made report of them to the Senate and People. Hereby he incensed Men's minds against Antony, who shortly after went into Media, and entered into League with the King thereof. Cesar at the same time sought against several People of Illyricum, and the next year both provided for the Civil War betwixt themselves.

35. Antony in way of recrimination to Cesar, objected his putting Lepidus besides the Triumvirate, and taking his Soldiers, as those of Pompey, to himself, which ought to have been equally free for both; and he challenged his part of the Soldiers raised in Italy. For, Cesar, besides what we formerly mentioned, accused him of taking Egypt as his Province, killing Pompey, abusing Artaxerxes the Armenian King, to the great infamy of the Roman State; but above all, upbraided him with Cleopatra, and what he had assigned to their Children, as also for that he owned Cesar as begotten by Cesar, though to the Senate he had acknowledged him for his own Son. Antony, bewitched by Cleopatra so far as not to be able to rule himself, wrote to the Senate to have those things confirmed, which he had settled upon her and her Children. The two Consuls, Cn. Domitius and C. Sosius, being much for him, were forced to leave the City, and get over to him, who now also having raised great Forces, sent to Rome, to drive Octavia out of his House, and if taking his opportunity he had this Summer invaded Italy, he might in all probability have put an end to the Quarrel. For, Cesar was not yet provided, wanting Money exceedingly, which he now exacted throughout Italy. But this delay herein helped him, that Men's minds were more and more bent against Antony, especially after Cesar had published his Testament, wherein he disposed as formerly, to his and Cleopatra's Children, and ordained, that though he should die at Rome, his Body should be sent to her at Alexandria: It was also reported, that he meant, if his matters prospered, to Hereupon the War was decreed against her, and he was devoted of his Trinovaire, but not declared an Enemy, for fear of those with him. For then must they necessarily have been included in the same capacity, and so driven upon desperate Councils: To them therefore Rewards were promised, if they would forsake him; and hereby was he thought rendered more inexcusable, in that being unhurt he should make War for an Aegyptian woman against his Country. Then did the one draw all the East, and the other the West to his Party. Cesar had ready two hundred and fifty Ships of War, eighty thousand Foot, and twelve thousand Horse. Antony had five hundred such like Ships, very big and stately, with one hundred thousand Foot, and also twelve thousand Horse. The King of the Medes also sent him Aid, which being not best back, and Antony also re-calling his Forces he had left with him for the protection of that Country, the Parthians became Master of that Kingdom, and Armenia also was lost.

38. They sent again to him the first and second time, and he gave up to him Turullius a Senator, and one of the Murderers of Julius Cesar. He putting the Man to death returned no answer, neither the second time, when he sent Antyllus his Son to him with much Gold, which he received. But with her he still dealt, sending Thyffus his Freed-man to her to make her believe that he was in love with her, hoping the might kill Antony, and preserve her Treasures, which the threatened to burn if he came into any danger. Now going down into Aegypt, he sent Cornelius Gallus before him, who seized on Paretonium the chief City on that part near Africa; and Pelusiurn the other strongest Town towards Syria did Cleopatra betray to him, secretly forbidding the Alexandrians to go out against him. Antony once fought prosperously against his Horse, and the second time was beaten; then he sent him a Challenge, which Cesar refused, saying, That if Antony to please there were a thousand ways lying open for his destruction. Wherefore bethinking himself that he could not die with more credit than in Battle, he resolved to oppose Cesar both by Sea and Land; but Cleopatra procured, that both his Navy, and Horse revolted. Hereupon he returned into the City, crying out, That he was betrayed by her for whose sake he had taken up Arms. She being afraid of him, departed to her Monument, and sent some to tell him she was dead, pretending fear of Cesar. Upon which Message, he resolving to follow her, wounded himself in the Belly. The Wound not quickly dispatching him, the sent for him up into her Monument; whither he was pulled up by her self, and two Women, being willing to live now that she was alive, and hoping he might possibly recover. But he shortly after died, willing her as well as the could to provide for her self, and not grieve for him, but rather rejoice; in that he had been the most famous of Men, as also most powerful, and now being a Roman, was not through laziness overcome by a Roman. Such was the end of this Man, who through desire of Fame became the Author of sad Tragedies to his Country, who in the use of his Power greatly abused it, and was not only overcome by a Roman, but also by a Woman; and then so behaved himself, that he could not be excused from laziness, effeminateness, and luxury, all which things checked that goodness of disposition supposed once to be in him, and left Cleopatra little cause to rejoice for any real Glory that might accrue unto him.

Antony killed himself.

39. Cesar endeavoured to get Cleopatra into his Hands, that he might lead her in Triumph. He easily obtained Alexandria, the Inhabitants whereof he pardoned, but put to death Antyllus the Son of Antony, and some others. He viewed the Body of Alexander the Great, and out of Honour to his memory set on it a Golden Crown, and strewed it with Flowers; but touching it, he broke off a little piece of the Nose, and refused to see the Bodies of the Ptolomies, though the Alexandrians much desired it, saying, He had a mind to see the King, and not dead Men. Cleopatra dealt with her Physician to dispatch her, but being terrified by Cesar upon the account of her Children, she gave it over, and did all the could, but in vain, to work upon his affections when he came to see her. Then did she give him an Inventory of her Goods, and he promised her fair things, thinking thereby that he deceived her, though he himself was deceived. For the understanding that she was reserved for a Triumph, prevented it by a voluntary death, as is in the History of her Kingdom related. Cesar made Aegypt a Tributary Province, and would have conferred the Government thereof upon Arius the Philosopher, who formerly had taught him, but he refusing the Employment, he gave it to Cornelius Gallus, a Man of obscure Birth. Cesar the Son of Cleopatra by Julius Cesar, had by his Mother been sent towards India with a great Sum of Money, but at Rhodes his Governour perfwaded him to return, as now being to expect the Kingdom. Cesar consulting what to do with him, Arius, alluding to * that prudent Sentence of Homer, said, 'Ous ἀγαθὸν πολυμαρτυρῶν. To have many Cesars is not good; and so he was sent after his Mother. Whilst these things were doing at Alexandria, was M. Tullius Cicero, Son of the Orator, Consul at Rome (taken in by Cesar to blot out the ignominy of betraying his Father) in the room of Licinius Crassus, where he published Cesar his Colleague's Letters.

The Roman Empire.

CHAP. I.

From the Absoluteness of Octavius, to the Death of Tiberius, containing the Space of 66 Years.

The Grandeur
Empire.

THE Roman Empire had now swallowed up the Macedonian, with such Kingdoms and States as were at all considerable, and Contemporary with it (whereof though some might retain a shew of Liberty, yet were they but in a condition of Vassalage) except the Parthian Kingdom, which as yet acknowledged no subjection, and when it did, being forced thereto for the most part by Intestine Divisions, not long continued in that acknowledgment.

It laboured
weight.

2. This Empire now laboured under its own weight, and, like to some unwieldy thing, staggered, by reason of the turgency of its inward burthen, without any extraneous violence: It was grown up to an Athletick habit, and had already sufficiently manifested the Danger of this Constitution. For, being all Head and no Body, it wanted those Limbs, which by direction from a superior sense, could secure its Progress; or indeed being all Body, and no head, it was void of that influence which effecteth an orderly motion, and is necessary for the subsistence of life it self. The proper fruits of Popular Government were now grown fully ripe. Every one would command, and none would be ruled, yet every man challenging a part in the Supreme Power, none enjoyed it much, and therefore but few were really solicitous for the upholding of it as Popular, any further than some private interests led them. The heady multitude indeed was violently carried on in its desires after the chief command; but some desired it rather that others might not enjoy it, holding this Principle, to oppose all rising, though excellent Persons whatsoever. Others tickled with an humor of ruling, and in intellectuals above their fellows, set themselves to please the Rabble by maligning other men, crying up Liberty and Equality, extolling the justice of the Agrarian, and vaunting of great matters intended to be done by themselves, when in a Capacity. Sometimes their boldness and cunning pro-cared their rite, most commonly some Capitulations, and otherwise Money distributed to the R.ble, when the Step was great. For after that the Romans passed the Seas, more luxury, avarice, and corruption, than of Victory was brought home. They found the same abroad, notwithstanding the repute of their abstinence. They found the land temptations as other men, and made themselves like officers of the manners, as well as the possessions of the conquered. All things were now bought and sold, from the meanest Office to the Confulpir, and the lowest privilege to the right of Suffrages.

lowest privilege to the right of Suffrages.

3. The daily fight of these things corrupted such, as else might have proved just. It seemed a prudent Principle, rather to command, than to be commanded; rather to buy than to be sold, and to get something, rather than (after all things) to be left. The body of the People, who now grew large, the Italians being received to the freedom of the City, and liberty of Suffrages. Hence ambitious men had advantage enough to make parties, and to carry things in the Comitia or Assemblies, having once by indirect practices ingratiated themselves. Having obtained commands afar off, they had opportunity to increase their power, through the distance of place, the credit of their conquests, and the affections of their Armies.

4. The Empire, once obtained, is difficultly laid down, both by reason that man's nature is averse to diminution, and for that something may be committed in height of passion, or through convenience, or otherwise, whereof it might be late to give an account, as neither to lye open and naked to the march, nor to revengeful Enemies. The Empire being now vast, several men at the same time might be found in these capacities, so that jealousies and emulations must hence be lightened, and one strive to reduce the other into order. Further, the largeness of Empire afforded multiplicity of places, always of several, and formations of contrary interests or humours, which would espouse quarrels accordingly, whence never would be wanting sufficient and convenient matter for public combinations.

such circumstances

As Monarchy could only rule,

4. Such was the present State of Roman affairs; and such had been their constitution before the present juncture, which loudly, in the understanding of all prudent men, called for the help of some single Person duly qualified, whose Monarchy could only put an end to the civil dissensions, by removing the liberty of the multitude, which gave occasion to those distempers, by preventing ambitious endeavours of private persons after Sovereignty, which sowed the seeds of discord, and by checking all exorbitant power of particular men, which effectually procured them. Cæsar on the one side considering these things, as also being sensible of the power he already enjoyed, and of the danger he might incur by removing himself to a private life: and on the other, weighing the envy and odium he should contract by the establishment of himself, after he had conquered Antony and Cleopatra, and (having ended his fourth Consulship in the Isle Sardinia) returned to Rome, he asked the advice of his two most inward Counsellors and beloved friends, Agrippa and Mecenas. Vipsianus Agrippa, a man of mean Parentage (which Vipsianus manifesting, he changed into Marcus) and no great endowments, except in what concerned War, though of a well-meaning mind, and a great lover of Cæsar, answered him first, and earnestly advised him to lay down his power, and remit the Government into the hands of the Multitude. His arguments for the most part respected the danger of Cæsar's continuing in power, and the necessity of restoring the liberty of the people.

Multitude. 'His arguments for the union of the Romans to Monarchy, and inforced by examples of others, who had attempted to establish themselves. Against Monarchy itself he could produce little of moment. He would prove that Popular Government was better for the Greeks, who, he said, did nothing that was notable, till they put themselves into that way. He said, there were others also, the condition of whom pleaded for this Government, yet named none. But he especially instanced in the Romans themselves, who being averse to Monarchy, had done all these great things under that form of rule and domination which was opposite to it.

the most robust and poor serve in them. Herely every one minding his own business, and one affording help to another, none would find any defect, and the true power of the People with liberty and safety would be preserved. For, the power of the multitude, he said, being indeed the slavery of every worthy man, was most grievous, and brought common destruction unto all: but this, wherein mobility should ever be preferred, and mens desires considered, would make all alike to be happy. He would have him there created and advoid by worthy persons, to order all things needful, to make War, cease Magistrate, reward, punish, and make Laws; all others being obedient, so that Wars might be made with secrecy, and upon occasion, such as were preferred might be chosen, not by lot, or through the prevalence of their ambition, but for their worth. Thus good men might be honoured, and bad punished without disturbance; and so at length things would be rightly carried, when nothing should be referred to the Vulgar, nor openly be consulted of, nor be committed to intruders, nor come into danger through their ambition. In sum, all would enjoy their own, no dangerous Wars nor wicked Seditions being made.

6. But these evils he proved to be common in a Popular Government, wherein the great ones aspiring to the top, and with money or otherwise purchasing the help of the ordinary sort, disturbed all things. He said, they had now had large experience of these things, and that by no other means could they be ended, than by that whereof he spake; whereof this was an evident sign, that for a long time they had been vexed with Wars and Seditions, by reason of the multitude of men, and greatness of affairs; for that men were so various in Nature and Nations, and inclined with such diversity of affections and desires: and because things hereby were brought to that pass, that with difficulty could they be managed. Now that he spake true, he said, the deeds themselves bore mention: for, as long as the multitude of the Roman People was not great, nor much more considerable than their neighbours, the State was in a good condition, and almost all Italy was subdued by them. But after that passing out of Italy, they went abroad into all Countreys and Islands, and filled all Seas and Lands with their name and power, no good got they by it: but first of all, at home and within the walls, riots being made, they brook the Commonwealth, and afterwards propagated the same mischief into their Armies. Therefore their City, like to some great ship of burthen, filled with a various multitude, and destitute of a Pilot, having been for many ages beaten and tossed with grievous waves, now flooded, and having no stay, was tossed here and there. He desired him therefore, that he would not still neglect her thus conflicting with Tempests (for he saw how much water she had already taken in) nor suffer the fray to be quite broken off (for she was now battered, and could not long subsist) but feeling that the gods had presented him as an Overlcer and Governour to his Countrey, not to cast her off; but as by his means she had a little recovered her spirits, fo, for the ages to come, the might remain in safety by the same means. Having used these arguments drawn from the Thing, he took others from the Man, and shewed him his imminent danger, in case he laid down his power: in the several cases of Pompey, Marius and Sylla. Pompey, he said, having devoted himself of his power, was contemned, and being laid at by his Enemies perished, because he could not recover it. He told him, That his Father (meaning Julius Cæsar) going about the same miscarried. The same had happened to Marius and Sylla, but that they were prevented by death; though some said also that Sylla killed himself to prevent his Enemies: it is certain, that many of his Laws began to be repealed whil he yet lived. In conclusion, he told him, He must expect many such as Lepidus, Sertorius, Brutus, and Cassius. This is the sum of Mecenas's speech in behalfe of Monarchy, whereof the beginning is lost, as also the conclusion of that of Scipio.

7. The foregoing sufficiently evidence, that it was impossible in an humane way to let the Empire to subsist in a Commonwealth to follow; and not only that, but any one considerable Nation, or more (not to speak of one, or a few Cities, or places at present) which must necessarily consist of multitudes of people, diversely qualified, variously inclined, and very unequally possessed of wealth and honours. Such having the Supreme power in their own hands must needs foment several humours. The rich, and honourable, must either not meddle, and be out of countenance watch for an advantage to alter things; or if they do, they will not be content with equal employments. When any extraordinary power is obtained, such enforcements as were formerly mentioned will happen, which being driven on by that ambition which is but natural to all mankind, will drive either fear, or desire, into Monarchy. A civil War especially produceth this, and more especially when the quarrel is betwixt single persons; and yet more especially is it incited by a religious pretence, under which Vizard the greatest deceit hath triumphed, accompanied, or ushered in by a sacrilegious asserting of approving Providence, whereby inviolable Majesty, Order, Propriety, and all things excellent have been contaminated, overturned, and trampled on, and yet a structure erected at length out of the materials of those very things, which formerly were only by the invaders accounted bad, because they stood upon another ground. But not only in a Democratical way is it impossible for one, or more considerable Nations to be governed, but in an Aristocratical also. For if the wealth and propriety of a Nation be diffused, and not limited in the possessions of a few of the chiefest persons, such would find a continual repugnancy in their subjects, others thinking themselves as capable of power as they. Hence quarrels and implacable enmities must arise, and he who shall be best able will at length command the rest, though he ought to have been their fellow subject, and demonstrate a necessity of Monarchical Government.

8. The affairs of the Gracians urged Agrippa to make against Monarchy do much plead for it, and evince the necessity of it. For after that the multitude in the several Cities had rebelliously withdrawn themselves from that obedience, which both the Law of God, and just title of succession challenged as due to their Kings (who as Thucydides acknowledgeth, governed them with Justice and Moderation) how miserably were they enslaved by their fellow Citizens (called by them Tyrants or Tyrants) and forced to submit to Usurpers, who punished them for their disobedience towards their rightful Sovereigns. Never were there such Tumults, Seditions, Civil Wars, Massacres, and Desolations, as in, and amongst those Cities which called themselves Commonweals: Such were the extravagancies of the multitude, that the best men were rejected, and bold, impudent, and fawcy fellows domineered, who being corrupted with Money, bought and sold all that was of consequence, and by their cunning speeches turned, and led the Rabble which way so ever they pleased. As for what Agrippa urged, that they only did things of moment after that the power came into the peoples hands; those things of moment were amongst themselves, and such as made them miserable, they tearing one another in pieces in the Peloponnesian, and other Wars, breathing nothing but rage, malice, and revenge against one another. Nothing of consequence did, or could they do against the Barbarians, as they accounted all besides themselves, till reduced under the Monarchy of Alexander they became instruments in his hands. Common danger engaged them against Xerxes, whose multitudes destroyed themselves; but had it not been for the meer wisdom of Themistocles, want of Order, of Government, and Discretion, had ruined them all in departing into Peloponnesus, and foolishly applying themselves to the fortifying of the Isthmus. Though they several times assisted the Ionians in their Rebellion, yet still at length were their endeavours defeated. Cimon indeed got several Victories, and did notable exploits in a Piratical way, but what effects produced they? The most that was effected at Land was by Agesslaus, but he having not done much, was recalled, for that many Cities having been allured with Persian Gold (which never failed to corrupt the Councils, overthrow the projects, and disturb the affairs of these petty States, by taking off the great Leaders of the Rabble) had conspired against Sparta. But what great matters they could do against Monarchy appeared, in that, first Philip, then Alexander his Son, and their Successors, easily subdued, and kept them under. As for their Colonies, each one usually followed the fortune of its Metropolis, little but Tumults, Banishments, and Massacres do we hear of, or of private mens getting the power over them, for that wanting rightful, and successive Princes, they lay open to the cheats of their fellow Citizens. The particular cases of Coreyra, Samus, Syracuse, and others demonstrate this, and therewith the danger, and infirmity of Antimonarchical Government.

9. But in particular, such were the several constitutions of these Cities, that Aristotle himself liked none of them, as appeareth in his Books of Politicks. The Cretian Commonwealth had its extravagancies, and if a Government may be judged from the carriage, and disposition of the people. In the opinion of Epimenides one of their own Poets, it was most naught. Lycargus by taking away the just, and Hereditary power of the Kings of Sparta, and contrary both to Nature and Loyalty, dissolving the Government of his Forefathers, made but way for many inconveniences in the too great power of the Senate, and otherwise, but especially for the tyranny of the Ephori, five fellows chosen yearly out of the Rabble, who domineered with unparalleled insolence over all. Solus's constitution, after so many changes and alterations wherein no rest could be procured from the time they forsook Kingly Government, gave no such fertile, but that Pisistratus presently after cheating the Rabble over and over, very easily made himself Master of Athens. Their Ostracism frightened all able persons from meddling with the Commonwealth, as also did the Petalism of Syracuse; whereupon their affairs went down the wind, till they were forced to recall the banished, and change still from one constitution to another, never being at quiet, for that the multitude tyrannized in their Assemblies. As for the learning of the Greeks, whereof they so much boasted, they had it either from the Egyptians or Caldeans, who were subject to, and from the beginning flourished under Monarchy; and Pisistratus who was a Monarch (though of his own making) made the first Collection of Books, and thereby brought Learning into Athens and Greece. Finally, the Greeks in their Wars were forced to make use of single persons; and at home in their greatest necessities did they fly to them, as Dionysius of Halicarnassus mentioneth the Hermocrates of Lacedaemon, the Archus of the Thebans, and the Elymnates of the Mityleneans, whom he compareth with the Dictator of the Romans.

10. For the Romans, 'tis a meer mistake of Agrippa. Their affairs never more prospered than under Monarchy, if we consider the small beginnings of the City. Romulus did exceeding much for his time, and so did his Successors in their several ways, with so small a power as such a Colony could produce, inasmuch as revengeful and furious Brutus acknowledged, that no better way of Government could be found out than what they had chalked out to them. The faults in it seem to have been his something too much indulging at his first constitutions a popular humour which might bring him to his end afterwards. Then Servius to curry favour with the Rabble, that they might maintain him in his illegally procured power, diminished the Regal authority, and that of the Senate, which gave the multitude such a scope, as after could they not be reduced into any order. After him Tarquinius the Heir of Priscus might go about to recover this power (for, a little charity may be allowed us, for one who lived in so dark and remote times, and whose Actions were only recorded by his Enemies, seeing we have formerly related his Story as we find it) and thereby might incur that prejudice which, together with the fault of his Son, and the implacable malice of Brutus, procured his Banishment. This may be added as an ill accident, that Romulus dying childless, the Kingdom came to be Elective, which thing must at length bring great inconveniences, so that Experience now hath taught such Kingdoms to continue the Government to particular Families. But Brutus his giving to his Consuls full regal power (though they were two, and Annual) and putting the Sword fully into their hands, together with his acknowledgment of the good Government of all the former Kings, do more than make us suspect his spleen to have acted him most in the change of the power, especially the consequences considered. For, the power of the Consuls being shortly after diminished, or rather enervated by Valerius (whom by flattery of the multitude got the name of Poplicola) the common sort got head, and confounded all things, nothing but changes, and re-changes happening, till at length they quite outed the Patricians of their power, giving them leisure to repent their joining with Brutus, and brought things to that ruin and disorder formerly mentioned, as compelled them to turn about, and by their Lex Regia (hereafter to be spoken of) to devolve all their power upon a single Person.

11. Such and so many were these Seditions and Tumults, that thrice the common sort departed from the Patricians out of the City. And no sooner was the War against their King ended, but the fits began; and these very fits have we proved from Dionysius, to have procured immediately the setting up of another King in effect, for half a year's continuance, viz. the Dictator, to which Officer they were forced to fly in all difficulties. Now it sufficiently appeared, that the want of a King hindered the promotion of their affairs, for, ever when any work was to be done abroad, nay when the Enemy was even at the gates, would the multitude mutiny, and with so much a-do at length could be drawn out, that business was retarded, and thereby their affairs not a little impaired, impaired, the Monarch being wanting, who should have kept both orders in subjection and awe. The weight of Usury and Oppression was the first pretended cause of these stirrings; but from it the multitude passed on from one thing to another, never resting till it had got all Offices of dignity, power, and profit, into its own hands, as hath been at large made out. To effect this, they would one while have Consuls, and another while Tribunes Military, having formerly made Decemviri for the making of new Laws; so that within the space of 134 years, they had 37 changes in the Government, whereof (to make it clear) fifteen were from Consuls to Tribunes Military, and from Tribunes to Consuls, the two grand ones from Kings to Consuls, and from Consuls to Decemviri, and twenty Dictatorships, besides Interregnum many an one, whereby for five days the chief power was in the hands of their Interreges. Thus was the Government tossed to and fro by the multitude, and little was done abroad, by reason of these confusions, nay the City was taken by the Gauls, and razed, all but the Capitol, through the cowardice of their Tribunes, who also being in number three or more, by their several opinions confounded their Armies, and shewed the truth of that speech of Agamemnon in Homer. And this is worthy observation, that when the contention arose about the Consulship, which the Commons would have equally with the Patritians, so incredible were those confusions, that for five years the Tribuni Plebis (those great incendiaries) suffered no supreme Magistracies at all to be created.

An Answer to Agrippa's Argument taken from the Romans.

The Disorders and Tumults arising from their Antimonarchical Government.

Great Confusions were made by single Persons.

12. All the great conquests afterwards were made by single persons, who abroad had alone the command of Armies. And so far was this present kind of Government from being instrumental to them, that it manifestly hindered and obstructed all good proceedings. For, when a Consul's year was out, then must he be recalled, and a Successor sent him, though he was in never so fair a way for the conquering of any Nation, which at length began to be understood, and then was their command continued to them, under the name of Proconsuls, after which time it was, that the great matters were performed; before this the Generals being glad to shuffle up a Peace, lest they should be defrauded of the credit of ending the Wars by their Successors. The main cause of the growth of their Empire (under the all-disposing Providence of God) was the valour and virtue of their Captains and Senators, at that time when Pyrrhus let upon them; the courage also of the Soldiers was extraordinary, so that (as Pyrrhus spoke of himself) a King, whose command and conduct would have been constant and uncontrolled, might have done greater wonders with such men. But as for the Government, so far was it from contributing to justice or virtue, that, even in these times, which their Writers so celebrate for these things, the multitude having by the Hortensian Law wrested this power from the Senate, to oblige all whatsoever by their Placita, the Senate having utterly refused to assist those thieves, murderers, intruders. But the multitude was told of great profit which would accrue to all men in particular, and therefore profit must bear down right, and forces must be sent into Sicily to get footing there, to enrich the virtuous & temperate men; and hence is to be fetched the rise of the Carthaginian Wars (which with what injustice they were managed on the Roman part, hath been seen) and indeed this was the original of all their conquests. The main things performed were done by such, as rather awed the people, than were awed by it, though to obtain their commands, they corrupted the multitude with Money. Marinus, Sylla, Pompey, and Cæsar, after they had successively ingrossed the power, made the greatest conquests. After the overthrow of Carthage especially, scarcely any great command was obtained; but by some great promises under-hand, some new attempts of innovation, or Money distributed to the Tribes. So weak, imperfect, and vicious was the Government.

Hence appears the excellency and necessity of monarchy.

13. These things evidence the excellency of Monarchical Government above the rest; a necessity of it in any considerable Nation or Nations, and in Cities which extend the freedom of Suffrages to their Subjects or Associates, and are considerable for number, power and interest. Single Cities have for some time subsisted otherwise; but if we view those that have been mentioned in this Work, some of them we shall find to have been kept in that way by such strange discipline, and principles of equality and levelling, as were even repugnant to Nature, and destroy that lawful use of such things as were ordained for man's comfort and delight. Such was the constitution of that of Sparta, which yet secured it not not from the tyranny of the Ephori, and when but the use of Gold, Silver, and other things, very lawful in themselves, came up, the Lacedæmonians were sensible of their slavery to such harsh constitutions, and the Government tottered. Again, in others that were left more to their liberty, we see how impossible it was for the People to use it, but for their own destruction, so that for any one place to subsist without such miseries and disasters, is near to a miracle. Monarchy, though it may have its defects (as all things managed by meer men) yet in it self includes more order, certainty, and security, its force being commonly turned outward. It is that which is most agreeable with primitive prudence, when men were not arrived at that ambition and wickedness, which later times have produced. All Nations at first had their Kings from the very first foundation, as is clear in the case of the Greeks, and others; so that they voluntarily submitted to them, at the first leading out of Colonies from the East, being their Captains; and thence we may see that the Government is natural, flowing from paternal rule, and proceeding from that Superiority, which Masters of Families, and Heads of Kindreds might well challenge over others. It is most suitable to the Government of the Universe, which is in God alone, who therefore acknowledged Kings for his Piegegens, and calleth them gods, promising they should be nursing Fathers to his Church, and taking no notice here of other Governments. Hence our Kings owe account to him alone, are Sacrosanct (which term the Romans gave to their very Tribunes, who were inviolable, it being death to injure them in the least, and therefore we may well apply it to Kings) and that perpetually, and are intrusted by him with a Prerogative, which is necessary for the good of their Subjects. For all power flowing from them, it is contradictory for authority to challenge it self, as unnatural and violent, for a derived stream, to oppose the current of the Fountain.

14. But (to return from this requisite digression, whereby an answer is given to Agrippa's Arguments, and Students are directed to make the right and natural use of History) that Mecænas had pressed Cæsar with these urgent reasons, to take the Government upon him, he gave him directions for the management of his affairs. 'First, he advised him to regulate the Senate, placing and displacing according to the worth of persons; and to have a special regard to Nobility and Gentry, to gratify them with employments. To admit none into the Equestrian rank before eighteen years of age, and none into the Senate till 25, before which time the Romans were never accounted of full age. When these had born the Offices of Quæstor, Ædilis, and Tribunus plebis, then being thirty years old, he would have them made Prætors, all which at first were to be Romans alone, lest he should seem suddenly to change the customs of his Country. All these Magistracies he would have of Cæsar's making, and not this power to bestow in any case to the Senate, or People. He counselled him by all means to diminish their ancient power, which else might procure trouble and alteration, but leave them their whole honour and dignity. The way to this was to make them execute their Offices in the City, and not suffer them then, nor presently after, to have any Military command, but for some time to live privately. He would have these Magistracies, to celebrate games, and exercise judicial power in all cases, except that of Murder; for some Judges were to be chosen from amongst the rest of the Senators, but the chief power to remain in these. Then he said, a certain Governour or Mayor of the City was to be made out of the most principal men, who had born these Offices, to join with the rest in governing the City, to receive Appeals, and judge capital Causes, except some afterwards to be spoken of, both in the City, and 81 miles round about. Another of the same rank was to be chosen, who should make inspection into the Stock, Estates and Manners of Senators, and Knights or Equites, both those of under age and others, and as well of women as the other Sex, to correct such things, as being not worthy of punishment, yet being neglected might occasion great inconveniences; and refer the greater matters to Cæsar himself, who was to bear the name of Censor, and the other being a Patritian, and the next in dignity to the Mayor, but that of Subcensor. These two Officers might be, for life, except they committed some fault, or by old Age or Sickness were rendered unserviceable, for no damage could thence arise, the one having no Soldiers, and the other but a few, and who should execute his Office before Cæsar's eyes, for the most part. The other Magistracies would fear to do any unjust thing, being presently to be reduced into a private condition; dition, and others to succeed them in their power. He added, that the Provinces were only to be committed to men of Prætorian rank; the rest being Pro-prætors in order once and again, should arrive at the Consulship, (if they well exercised their former Offices) and then be preferred to greater commands.

Magistrates of Senatorian dignity.

15. 'He further advised him to divide Italy, for 94 miles round about the City, and all the rest of the conquered Countries after such a manner, according to People, Nations, and Cities, as if they were to be governed by single men with absolute power. In each of these Soldiers were to be placed, over whom was to be set one person of Consular dignity, and two more of Prætorian rank; from those there lying appeal to the other, in all cases, except when Officers of the Army were to be animadverted on, who were to be punished by none but Cæsar himself, lest they should thereby be brought by fearing some one more, to attempt something against the Prince. All those who had any command out of the City, were to have their Salaries set as was suitable to the Employment, for that they could not live of their own, and it was not convenient they should spend what they list, as they did at present. They were not to hold their employments under the term of three years, nor longer than five, for in so short a space they could but learn the interests of places, and how to behave themselves, and longer commands made men but proud, and provoked them to attempt new matters. And one great command he said, was not to be given them presently after another, for this would amount to as much, as if they had one continued to them, but after they had been reduced to a private condition, and therein lived at home. Thus much for Senators.

Of Equestrian rank.

16. 'From amongst the Equites, he would have him chuse out two of the most excellent, and make them Captains of his Guard. For to commit that trust to one would not be safe, and to more than two, would not want trouble. Being two in number, if one should be treacherous, the other would preserve him. They were to be such as had been trained up in the Wars, and much exercised in Offices, and to have the command not only of his Guard, but of all Soldiers in Italy, so as to punish and reward them, except Centurions, and such as belonged to Senatorial Magistrates. These Captains of the Guard ought to have their Deputies, and hold their places for their lives, as also the Mayor of the City, and the Subprefect. Besides, out of the next rank of Equites, one should be chosen for Captain of the Watch, and another to take care for provision of Corn, but these for a limited time. The care of the Treasury, Exchequer, and other matters, as well at Rome as throughout Italy, was to be committed to those of Equestrian rank, who were to have Salaries suitable to their condition, being poorer than Senators. He told him the reason why he would have these Offices committed to them, was, for that it was inconvenient to have both the Sword and Money in the same hands, and better that publick business should be managed by many, both that more might reap benefit from it, and learn experience; and hereby his Subjects would love him more, and he would have a sufficient number fit for employment. One Equus would be sufficient at Rome for gathering Money, and one in each Province, who might have assistants out of the Equites, and Cæsar's Liberti or Freed-men. For he told him it was convenient to joyn those with them, that his Servants might get something, and he receive certain intelligence how matters should go. Now if any Equus (or Knight, if we may so call him) should grow so famous by business, as to be thought worthy to be received into the Senatorial rank, his age ought not to be any obstacle: and sometimes some Officers of the Army were to be received into the Senate, provided they had never been ordinary Soldiers, but from the beginning Centurions at the least.

Education of the Children of Senators and Equites.

17. 'He further advised him to educate all of Senatorial and Equestrian rank; whilst they were boys, at School in humanity, and when grown up, in Fencing and Riding, by Masters hired publickly in both places. Forasmuch as it is the part of an excellent Prince, not only that he do well himself, but to take care that all else do so. This would be effected, not by permitting them to do ill, and then correcting them, but teaching them beforehand such things. And he added, That he needed not to fear, that such as were so excellently educated, would attempt innovation; forasmuch as such as were not cultivated by any discipline, but dissolute in breeding and carriage, were heretofore to be suspected, who easily would commit the most wicked and abominable things, both against themselves and others.

18. 'For-

The Militia and Money.

18. 'Forasmuch as by reason of the largeness of the Empire, and nearness of Enemies, it was necessary to have a standing Army, he would have levies made out of the poorest and lustiest young men, who being continually exercised and trained up in Military Discipline, all others were to be forbidden the use of Arms. Then for Money, which he shewed to be necessary for carrying on of Affairs, in all Governments, as well as under Monarchy, he advised him to make it of all publick Things gotten in War, and let it out upon moderate interest: to look well to the Mines, and impose Tribute upon all Subjects, it being reasonable that all should contribute to the expense of that, which tended to the protection and good of all. But there was no danger he said, but men would be willing to pay, seeing most of them should receive it back with advantage; either, by bearing Offices of Magistracy or Government, or serving in the War, especially when they understood that Cæsar himself lived soberly and frugally, not improving the publick expence to any private excess.

Rome to be adorned.

The Provinces to be curbed.

19. 'For the rest, he would have him adorn Rome with all Magnificence, and set it out with all sorts of Solemnities, to make it in great reverence and esteem abroad. No Nation was to have any power in its own hands, nor meet in any publick Assemblies of Debate, for that would procure Disturbance; for which reason neither was the Roman People, he said, to be permitted either to come together for passing of Judgment, to the Comitia, or any other Council, for the enacting of any thing. No City or People was to be suffered to use any excess in Buildings or in Games: none to use any peculiar Coin, Weight, or Measure. None were to send any peculiar message to him, except the matter required his inspection, but have recourse to the Governor of the place, who was therewith to acquaint Cæsar. Ambassadors either from Enemies or confederate Kings or States, were to have Audience from the Senate, that the power seeming to be in the Senate, they might see how many Enemies they should have if the case required, and Matters being dispatched by consent of the Fathers, the Majesty of the Empire would be the more established. All of Senatorial rank he would have impeached before, and judged by the Senate, that Cæsar might escape the envy of Condemnation, and others by so formal proceedings, might be kept in awe. As for any scandalous words against himself, he told him, he should neither hear any accusation, nor punish them. For it was not good, he said, that he should believe, that any one would injure him, who hurt no body, but did good to all; for, faith he, bad Princes only do this, whom their guilty Conferences make credulous. Neither is it fitting to take those things ill, which if true, ought not to have been done, and if false, should be neglected and dismissed: for that many by punishing them, minister greater occasion of worse discourse. His sense therefore of scandalous words was this: that he ought to be higher than all injury, and neither himself to fancy, nor make others believe, that any one durst be so fawcy, but that the same opinion of veneration was had of him, as of the eternal Gods. If any plotted his destruction, he would neither have him himself to judge, nor sentence him, but refer him to the Senate, and if he were convicted, to punish him as lightly as might be, that his Crime might gain belief. But he here excepted such, as having command of Armies, made open Insurrections, who were not to be formally Arraigned, but punished as Enemies.

How scandalous words to be thought of.

How Traitors to be punished.

The Senate to be made use of.

20. 'These things, and most of the rest which concerned the Common-wealth, he would have him propound to the Senate, wherein all the Members should have equal power of Voting, except any of them were accused. If the party indeed were not as yet a Senator, or but of the rank of a Quæstor, all might have voices; but it was against reason that he, who never had been a Tribune of the People, or Ædilis, should pass Sentence upon him that had born these Offices, or that those should do it upon one of Prætorian rank, or such an one upon a Consular person: but it was fitting enough that those of Consular Dignity might judge all the several sorts, and the rest their Equals or Inferiours. Cæsar himself was to be Judge in all Appeals, made from the greater sorts of Magistrates, his Procurators, the Governor of the City, Subprefect, Præfidi, Prætorio, Overseers of Provisions or Providers, and Masters of the Watches: for none ought to have so absolute a power, but that appeal ought to lie from him. Of these he ought to take Cognizance, as also of the causes of Equites, Centurions, or prime Officers, when the Controversie was about Life or Reputation.

H h h h

For

In what Cases Appeals ought to lie to Cæſar.

For theſe Cafes ought to be referred to him alone, and for the fore-mentioned cauſes none other ought to judge them. Yet to the hearing of them he might nominate ſome of the principal men of Senatorial or Equeſtrian rank, or of Conſular, or Prætorian Dignity, that he and they having had hereby experience one of another, he might employ them in other matters abroad. In the Cafes of greateſt conſequence he would not have him aſk their opinions openly, left favouring their friends they might not ſpeak freely their minds; but their opinions were to be written down, and then preſently blotted out, which ſecrecy would procure them to uſe all freedom. He adviſed him in his affairs of Cauſes, Letters, buſineſs of Cities, and Petitions of private men, and in other things of Government, to uſe the aſſiſtance of the Equites. To reſuſe to hear no man's advice, and to look at the Will, and not at the Succeſs, both of Councillors and Soldiers; as, neither, to envy the glory of Military Men. For, many fearing the envy of Princes and States, have rather choſen to loſe than gain in the Wars, to provide for their own ſafety. Wherefore he would not have him (whom eſpecially the event, either as to profit or diſprofit would concern) in word others, and in deed, to envy himſelf.

Military men not to be en- vied.

Rules for Cæſar, General carriage.

Deſerving perſons rather to be reward- ed above than below their merits.

21. He deſired him to ſpeak and do ſuch things, as he would have his Officers to think and practice, for this would more eaſily teach them their duty, Men being led more by Example than Precept, and the Actions of Princes being eſpecially tried into, and more imitated than their threatenings feared. The lives of others he ſhould look into, but not greatly enquire: what Crimes by others were detected he ought to puniſh, but diſſemble ſuch as had no accuſer, and know how to correct mildly, which in ſome caſes doth more good than rigorous Proceedings. To ſhew as for Rewards, he told him, he was to requite deſerving perſons rather above than below their merits; for this was the way to win upon them, and to make them virtuous. He then adviſed him not to admit of any extraordinary Honours from Senate or others: for this would be need- leſs, chargeable, and dangerous. He bade him by virtue ſeek for immortality, not by Temples built unto his name. The gods he told him he was ever, and all over to worſhip, according to the cuſtom of his Country, and compel others ſo to do: and to puniſh Authors of ſtrange Religions, not only for reverence to his gods, but alſo becauſe ſuch things draw men to the uſe of foreign Cuſtoms, whence Conſpiracies, and Bandyings ariſe, which are no whit agreeable with the Government of a ſingle perſon. Neither was he to ſuffer any Magicians; and to have a care of Philophers alſo, who by their foretell- ings often raiſed Seditions. He was to be ſtudious of peace, content with preſent enjoyments, and yet to be ready for War upon all occaſions. Though he muſt uſe Intelligencers and Spies; yet he ought not to be too credulous, and not indulge his Servants or Dependents too much; for all their failings would be imputed to him. He was to right inferior and private men, encourage Arts, and profitable Occupations, as to puniſh idle, and vicious perſons; not to ſuffer contentions, or animoſities to grow, nor peculiar names to be aſſumed, nor any other thing whence diſcord might ariſe. He was to keep an equality in his granting requeſts as much as could be; and therefore not to ſuffer any to aſk him what he ſhould not grant; but to endeavour that none ſhould petition for any thing forbidden. In ſum, he adviſed him never to abuſe his Power, and not to think this a Diminution of it, if he did not do all that he might: but by how much the more he could do what he would, by ſo much to take care to will all things that became him. He bade him always conſider whether he did well or ill: whether by ſuch an action he procured love or ill will, that he might do and forbear accordingly. He told him, That though he heard no body blame him, yet ought he not to conclude, that therefore he did well; nor to expect that any ſhould be ſo mad as openly to upbraid him. This no man would do, though moſt extremely injured. Nay, many, ſaith he, are conſtrained openly to commend thoſe by whom they have been wronged, left they ſhould be thought to blame them. But 'tis the duty of a Prince not to gueſs at the affections of others from their words; but from thoſe things which 'tis moſt probable that they think of.

22. Theſe, and other like things he would have him do; for many things he ſaid he paſſed over, becauſe all could not be ſpoken at the ſame time. One thing he would ſay, which was the ſum of all, either ſaid or to be ſaid. If he would do all thoſe things, which if he were a ſubject he would have his Prince do to him, he ſhould in nothing offend, proſper in all things, and lead both a ſafe, and moſt happy life. For how could not all but look upon him, and love him as a Father, and Preſerver, when they ſhould ſee him modeſt, of unblameable life, and excellent both in Peace and War; when he ſhould neither diſgrace nor injure any one, but carry himſelf humbly: not exact Money from others, whiſt he himſelf flowed with wealth; not afflicting others whiſt he was luxurious; not puniſhing others whiſt he himſelf was looſe and licentious; but in all things as it were ſharing with them: Therefore relying on that defence which would be great in thy ſelf if thou hurtſt no man; Believe me, ſaith he, thou wilt have no body, either hate thee, or deſire any thing againſt thee, which being ſo, thou muſt needs lead a pleaſant life. For, what can be more ſweet, what more happy, than for one with virtue to enjoy all humane good things, and to be able to confer them upon others? In conſequence, thoſe, and other things heretofore ſpoken being conſidered, he bade him yield to him, and not contend Fortune, which had preferred him, picked out from amongst all others, to be chief. Now, if taking in reality to himſelf alone the Sovereign power, he feared the Name of a Kingdom as odious, he might omit that, and order his matters under the other of Cæſar: if he deſired other titles they would give him that of Imperator, heretofore given to his Father: they would adorn him alſo with ſome other venerable note of Honour, ſo that he might enjoy all the Privileges of a Kingdom without the envied name thereof.

Cæſar follow- ed the advice of Mæcenas.

To take the title of imperator, and ordereth general Matters.

23. Mæcenas concluded with theſe words, whoſe advice Cæſar followed, though he greatly commended them both for wiſdom, copiouſneſs, and freedom of ſpeech: yet he did not preſently ſet upon all thoſe things which he offered, left if on a ſudden he ſhould attempt to change the conſtitution of the State he might fail in his endeavours: therefore ſome things he changed out of hand, others afterwards: and ſome things he left to be perfected by his Succeſſors, which he thought might be better ſetled through the advantage of time and opportunity. He uſed alſo the induſtry of Agrippa in the proſecution of theſe deſigns no leſs than if he had adviſed him to this courſe. In this ſame year, and his fifth Conſulſhip, he took the name of Imperator; not in that ſence wherein anciently it was wont to be given for Victories obtained (for ſo he had it given him often both before this and after) but in reſpect of chief Command, or Authority, as it had been decreed to his Father Julius, and his Sons and Poſterity. There was he made Cenſor with Agrippa, and amongst other things belonging to that Office, purged the Senate, into which many Equites and unworthy Plebeians had crept during the Civil Wars; and increaſed it to the number of a thouſand. Two perſons, viz. C. Chælius and C. Furnius he put into the rank of Conſulares; becauſe being deſigned Conſuls they had been prevented by others. He alſo ranked certain Families amongst the Patricians; becauſe moſt of thoſe had periſhed in the Wars. He commanded that no Senator without his leave ſhould paſs beyond Italy, which is at this day obſerved, ſaith Dio. It being unlawful for any of that rank to travel, except into Sicily, or Gallia Narbonenſis, whither any that had Eſtates in thoſe Provinces might go without leave; becauſe thoſe Countries were in quiet and deſtitute of Arms. Cæſar alſo conſidering that many Senators and others truſted him not; left they ſhould attempt new matters, he gave out that he had burned all the Letters found in Antony his Officers: and indeed ſome of them were loſt, but moſt of them he very carefully kept, and afterwards made uſe of them as he had occaſion. He ſent for Antiochus Commagenus, who had treacherouſly killed his Brother, ſent on an Embaſſy to Rome, and put him to Death, being condemned by the Senate.

Mæcenas Ex- aſſum.

24. Cæſar in his ſixth Conſulſhip, together with M. Agrippa his Colleague made a Læſtrum 41 years after the laſt Celebration of one (by Cn. Lentulus and L. Gellius) and herein were ceſſed 4063000 Polls of Roman Citizens. He celebrated Games alſo, which had been decreed in memory of his Victory at Actium, and it was ordered they ſhould be renewed every fifth year, four Colleges of Priests taking care of them, viz. the Pontifices, Augurs, Septemviri, and Quindecimviri by courſes. He cauted other ſorts of Games and Exercices to be made at his own coſt, borrowing Money; ordered that two perſons of Prætorian rank ſhould yearly overſee the Treaſury, gave to the people four times as much Corn as they were wont to have, to ſome Senators he gave Money, ſome of this rank being fo poor, that they could not bear Offices belonging to them. All Engagements and Debts to the Exchequer he made void that ſtood good before the Battle at Actium.

excep

except what concerned Buildings. He suffered no Sacrifice to be offered to Egyptian gods within the Pomerium, took also care for repairing of Temples. And because many unjust things had been ordained during the late Seditions and Civil Wars, especially in the Triumvirate, he made them all void by one Edict and caused them to cease from his sixth Consulship. Being in the eyes and mouths of all for these things, he considered how he might increase his reputation, and confirm his single power by the consent, and without the constraint of the people. Being then Consul the seventh time, when he had prepared every Senator before-hand, whom he knew to be well affected towards him, he came to the Senate-house, and there read a set Speech which he had written down fitly for this purpose.

Preceding in a set Speech to the Senate, a desire to lay down his Power.

25. 'Herein he first exceedingly magnified with much affected Art, the things he was about to do, and then signified, That though he had such opportunity to establish himself as no man ever had more, yet did he now devote himself of all power, and restore all unto them, Arms, Laws, and Provinces: and not only such things as he had been intrusted with, but he gave them besides what he himself had further acquired. This then his gift he much illustrated by his self-denial, shewn as well formerly as at present, being very sorry that ever there had been occasion for the Commonwealth to use him. He spake of the Justice and Prudence of this Resignation, and boasted of the glory of it, which he avowed to exceed the Conquests of Gall, Mysia, Egypt, or Pannonia, the Victories over Pharnces, Juba, or Phraates, the expedition into Britain or the passage of the Rhine, and all the difficulties of the Civil Wars. He demanded if any could be found that excelled him in greatness of mind, who had so many Cities, Nations, and Soldiers at his back, and whom none durst oppose? Horatius, Mucius, Curcius, Regulus, and the Decii, who ventured their lives for glory, were not comparable to him, for as much as by this Resignation he exceeded both them, and all others in glory. And shewed hence that the gallantry of Spirit found in the ancient Romans was not extinct. Having discoursed much in this vein, he concluded with his advice to the Senate how to manage Publick Affairs, telling them, That if they followed it, they would be happy and thankful to him, who refusing them from Seditions, had brought them into that estate: but if they did not punctually observe it, they would make him repent of what he had done, and cast themselves again into manifold Wars, and great Dangers.

26. Cæsar having read his writing, the Minds of the Senators were marvelously affected. Some there were who knew his design, and therefore agreed with him; the rest either suspected his intent, or believed him. Of these some admired his craft in concealing his purposes; others were troubled at his design: some at his cunning; and others at his refusal of the Government. For there were some who hated the Popular form as turbulent, and approving of the change, were well pleased with Cæsar's administration. Yet the product of these several affections was the same; for neither they that believed he spake as he thought, could rejoice; those that wished he were reduced to a private condition, being yet fearful how things would go; and they that desired he might keep his power, being sorry for the loss of their hopes. Neither could they that believed him not reprehend him, because to some will, and to others courage was wanting. No man yet, whether he believed him, or believed him not, durst commend his Speech, for that some liked it not, and others feared to do it. Wherefore having often interrupted him whilst speaking, when he had done, they all sought him with many words, that he would alone undertake the Government, and by many Arguments compelled him at length to accept of the Sovereignty. Then that his Person might be preserved, they presently decreed the pay of his Guard to be double to that of other Soldiers.

Thereby con-
firmeth it.

Divideth the Provinces between the Senate and himself.

27. Cæsar by this Artifice pretending that he would lay down his Power, effected that it was confirmed to him, by Senate and People. Yet that he might seem to be Popular, he said, He would not govern all the Provinces, nor obtain perpetual Power over such as he should take care of; therefore the weaker, because they were more quiet, he left to others: the most powerful which had appearance of most danger (having an Enemy near at hand, or likely to be turbulent) he kept himself, under pretence that the Fathers might enjoy their Power fairly, and he himself undergo labour and dangers; but by this device he rendered the Senate really helpless, and weak, and engrossed to himself the Militia. To the Senate and People was left Africk, Numidia, Asia, Greece, with Epirus, Dalmatia, Macedonia, Sicily, Crete, Libya called Cyrenaica, Bithynia, with the neighbouring Pontus, Sardinia,

India, and that part of Spain called Hispania Batica. Cæsar kept the rest of Spain, all Gall and Germany, as also Celestria, Phœnicia, Cyprus, and Egypt. Over these Provinces he assumed the Government but for ten years, within which time he undertook to reduce them into order, adding with a certain juvenile kind of boasting, that as soon as ever he could quiet them, he would quit his Power. Then did he let over the Provinces of both sorts, men of Patrician Dignity, but over Egypt one of Equestrian rank only, for the causes above rehearsed. To Senators he allotted by themselves Africk and Asia, and the rest of the Provinces to Pretorians. He forbade either to take this employment within five years after they had born Offices in the City. They held their Governments but for a year. And as soon as Successors were sent them, they were presently to depart the Provinces, and not loiter in their return, but come to Rome within three months. The distribution of the Provinces was made on the Ides of January, as may be gathered from Ovid, who thought also that Cæsar Octavianus had the Surname of Augustus given him the same day, which indeed was the fourth day after, as appeareth from Conjorinus.

Surnamed
Augustus.

28. For, the Provinces being divided, and all things settled, it was debated in the Senate, whether he ought not to be called Romulus, because he had founded the Empire; but the other more venerable name of Placens, propounded by Mucianus Plancus, at length seemed best; for, Sacred Places and Temples consecrated by Augustus, the Romans termed Augusta. Cæsar though he much desired that of Romulus (saith Dio) yet perceiving he should be suspected of affecting the Kingdom, omitted it, and was surnamed Augustus, as greater than the Nature of Man could make him. For those things are called Augusta, which are most worthy of Honour, and most Sacred; wherefore the Greeks express it by Σέβας, as if thou shouldest say Venerable. Thus Cæsar alone got the whole Power into his thow shouldest say Venerable. Thus Cæsar alone got the whole Power into his hands, having both Money (for though he had his own separate from the Treasuries, yet did he use this at his pleasure) and the Militia in his own hands. When forty, yet did he use this at his pleasure) and the Militia in his own hands. When his ten years were out other five, and when they were expired, five more, and these ended, ten more, and ten more after them were added; so that he had his Authority still continued for his life; for which cause his Successors, though they had the Power settled on them for life, yet at the end of every ten years solemnized as it were the renewing of it. As soon as Cæsar had but made his Oration about resigning his Command, and distributing the Provinces, many Honours were conferred on him, as that Laurel should be planted before his Gates in the Palatium, and upon those trees Oaken Garlands hung, as for him who was a perpetual Conqueror of Enemies, and Preserver of Citizens. The House of the Emperor also was wont afterwards to be called the Palatium or Palatine bill, and there was his Prætorium; his House also received some Dignity from the Mount itself, because Romulus there lived: therefore though the Emperor, saith the Historian, live elsewhere, yet is his House called the Palatium or Palace. But after he had done those things which he promised, then was he called Augustus by the Senate and People. From this day forward began the Imperial Power and Authority to be in the hands of one man, which the Greeks called Monarchy. Yet the Romans derived the Epochs of their Augusti from the Kalends of January of this year, as Conjorinus writeth, who compareth with the 265 year of this Æra, the 283 of the Julian ordination. This seventh Consulship of Augustus Cæsar, and the beginning of his Monarchy, fell out in the 727 year of the City, the second of the 188 Olympiad, the thirteenth of Herod the Great, 25 before the Birth of Christ, A.M. 3978, he himself, as it's said, the seventh, and M. Vipsianus Agrippa the third time being Consuls.

29. On this manner all the power of the People and Senate was transferred upon Augustus, saith Dio. For this notable translation and change in the Government there was a Law made, which is famous by the name of Lex Regia, after which it's convenient to make a little enquiry, for the better information of Students in this great affair. A Law may be so (and is so) called, either for that a King made, or preferred it, or because it was made and enacted concerning a King, or Kingly power. In the first fence, such Laws as were made by Romulus and his Successors the ancient Kings of Rome, are by Lawyers called Leges Regiæ, whereof Dionysius Halicarnassensis hath recorded many, and of which several have been already mentioned in their due places; and in the (2) Code is yet extant a Law called Lex Regia, concerning the Burial of a woman with Child, so called, because enacted by some ancient King. But in the later acceptation it is to be understood this Law, whereby Regal (and that absolute) Power was conferred upon Augustus by the Roman People. The Law it self is not now extant in terms, nor exemplified in any Author still remaining, yet it is mentioned by Justinian in his (b) Institutiones, who there writeth (speaking of several sorts of Law) that whar Nat. Div. pleaseth the Prince, hath the vigour of a Law; so farasmuch as by the Lex Regia, which was made concerning his Power, the People granted to him all its Command and Authority. In the (c) Pandectis he also mentioneth it, well-nigh in these very words; in a third (d) place also expressing it to the same purpose, that by an old Law called Lex Regia, all the Right and all the Power of the Roman People was translated into the Emperor's Authority; therefore it is otherwise called Lex Imperii, and Augustum privilegium. As for Commentators upon both Institutiones and Pandectis, with other parts of the Civil Law, nothing is more acknowledged by them all, as they have occasion.

30. But as for the interpretation of this Law, some difference there hath been amongst Expofitors, who lived since the Civil Law was restored in the West. For some there have been ever since that time, who rightly understood all manner of Power and Authority, to be so by the Roman People transferred upon the Prince by that Law, that they affirmed the People thereby deprived and made destitute of all Power and Authority. Others thought Power and Authority indeed was given to the Prince to make Laws, but so that by this concession the power of the People was in no sort diminished, and the force of Plebiscitum's and Senatusconsultum's, as well future as past, was the same as formerly; so that Prince, People, Senate, and Commons, had equal Authority in this Matter: both these Opinions being held, as appeareth from Acurfius, Hefstien's, and others. But the later of them seemeth thence to have risen, that they mistook this Lex Regia (called also corruptly Lex Remia) for the Hortensian Law, or rather thence, as a late (a) learned Man judgeth, that the Professors and Students of the Civil Law, which was newly restored, were fearful, lest by asserting the true Power of the Emperors, they should give offence to such People and Cities, as then lived in a course contrary to such a Prerogative, and thereby injure their newly restored Profession. And hence might that most known Controversie arise, concerning the Power of the Prince, from this Law, betwixt the Martianians and Bulgarians. But as for that conceit about the Hortensian Law, it was enacted by Q. Hortensius the Dictator, in the 468 year of the City (not the 422, as that same learned Man hath it) and the 284 (not the 330) before the Birth of Christ, upon the third separation of the Commons, and 259 before the enacting of the Regal Law. The purport of it was, that all Quirites or Romans should be bound by the Plebiscita, or the Decrees of the People. Hence, as we formerly observed out of Pomponius, concerning the Original of the Roman Laws, the Authority of making Laws was the same, though the fashions differed, although the same thing in effect, was done long before the Hortensian Law, viz. by L. Valerius and M. Horatius the Consuls, who got it enacted by a Law in the Centuriate Comitia, that what the Commons resolved on in their Tribes, or Tributa Comitia, faith Livy, but in their Curia or Curiate Comitia, faith Dionysius, should bind the whole People; which thing we having formerly omitted in its own place, here supply, having yet observed, that a Law was also prepared by Q. Publius Philo the Dictator, 111 years after the other, to the same purpose, and 211 before the Lex Regia.

31. Now strange it is, that Acurfius and others, should wrest any thing of the Hortensian Law, and apply it to the Lex Regia, or rather make them all one, as he doth, expounding the Regia thus; scil. lata ab Hortensio mirabili Oratore, although he acknowledged, as necessarily he must, that the Hortensian Law made only express mention of the Power of Senate and Commons. It's not easy to guess what he meant by so strange a conceit; but this interpretation is made of it by *one as able to judge as any, that as the Hortensian Law concerning the Regal Right, that is, the Right of Regiment or Government, gave to the People and Senate (of which two orders or estates then the Roman Body politick consisted) equal Power and Authority; so when the Prince came to be joined as a third party, in like manner an equal Power should be granted to him, as to the other two, and that from the fence of the same Law. And those of this opinion interpret Justinian (who faith concerning the Plebiscita, that from the Hortensian Law they began to be of no less value than Laws, and also the same of the Senatusconsultum, that because the People was so increased, that it could not easily meet to gether for making of Laws, that therefore the Senate was consulted) as though the same Power remained to Senate and People still under the Emperors as before, They strangely disputed also, whether the Power so granted by the People to the Emperor, might not be revoked, as that which is given to Delegates from the Delegators. And this is all that can be imagined, as meant by those Men concerning the Hortensian Law, as to the subject in hand, though it be strangely wrested to their design, and maketh nothing for their purpose.

32. For nothing is more certain than the former opinion, viz. that the people by the Lex Regia were wholly deprived of all Power and Authority in making Laws. This is clear from the words of Justinian formerly cited, which clearly signifie that the whole Power and Authority of People and Senate was transferred upon, and yielded or granted to the Emperors by this Law. And he (a) elsewhere declared, that his sentence standeth for Law, and bindeth all under his command, which is indeed the very composing of the body of Law, as from him it is transmitted to us, sufficiently demonstrateth, wherein he by his sole Authority repealeth what he pleaseth, and enacteth anew what seemeth good to him, without interposition of any other Authority; which he could not have done (nor his Predecessors) as to the Plebiscita and Senatusconsultum, though he might as to the Principales Constitutiones, except he had had that Power which formerly belonged to People and Senate, and they were devolved of all. (b) Constantine challengeth to himself alone Authority to judge betwixt Law and Equity. Ulpian wrote, that all the Power and Authority which they had, the People placed upon, and in the Emperor, by the Lex Regia, and the most learned, and accurate (c) Expofitors of more later times agree with him herein, rejecting the Hortensian Law utterly; as having any thing to do in this matter of the Regal Law. In the Latean Palace at Rome, or the Capitol, is extant (d) a Table of Brass, wherein is to be seen a fragment of this Law renewed, as to Vespasian, confirming many things of Sovereign, and sole Authority, as descending upon him from his Predecessors, and enacting, that what he had done, decreed, or commanded, before this ratification, should be held and taken for as good Law, as if the People it self had done, decreed, or commanded it. For, though he might make use of this Ratification, yet his right was as strong before; there being no such custom as some have thought, that particular Princes had particular and several Laws made for their Authority, that one for Augustus respecting himself, and Successors, as is clear from Justinian, who never mentioneth any other, nor speaketh in the plural number.

33. If we fetch an explanation of the Lex Regia from Historians, we shall find that though they mention it not in words, yet they give that Supreme and absolute Power to Augustus, which devolveth the Senate and People of all Legislative Authority, and sheweth that his command (and that of his Successors) was as large as could be transferred upon a Prince that was to govern persons of free condition without Tyranny. Suetonius faith, that he received perpetual Tribunitial power (which could obstruct all proceedings of Senate and People) and perpetual regiment of Manners, and of the Laws. Dio faith expressly, that *all the power of People and Senate was transferred upon him; and that all things were managed merely as the Emperor pleased, though all other Magistrates, except the Censors were preserved. And that the Emperors may appear to have so great Power, faith he, not by force but from the Laws; all things which under the Popular Government were of greatest force (and that by Universal consent) together with the names, they take upon them, except Dictatorship. For they are often Consuls, and when without the Pomernium, are called Proconsuls; and they bear the name of Emperor, (not only such as have obtained victories, but all of them) to signify their plenary and absolute power; in the room of King and Dictator, which being taken away they never assume, but confirm the force and matter of them by the title of Emperor. Accordingly they have the power of raising Men and Money, making War and Peace, commanding all things effectually, both at home and abroad, putting to death Equites and Senators, even within the Pomernium, and doing all other things, which a Consul and other Magistrates, who had absolute power, might do. As Censors also they have Authority to inquire into our life and Manners, to make the Census, admit persons into the Equestrian or Senatorial rank, and remove thence according to their pleasure. And in as much as they are inaugurate in all Priesthoods, admit Priests into the Colleges, and over one of them (if there be two or three Emperors at one time) is Chief Priest, it is that they may have all religious things and sacred in their own hands. As for the Tribunitial power, which every eminent Emperor was wont to have, it inableth them to interpose against any thing that may be done contrary to their pleasure, and they are thereby Sacrosanct, or Inviolable, so that if any one injure them by the least, not only deed, but word, they may put him to death without process as Piacularly Criminal. The Emperors count it unlawful to be Tribunes, because they are Patricians, but they receive Tribunitian power as large as ever any enjoyed; and as renewing it yearly with the annual Tribunes, the years of their reign or power, are counted accordingly. These things, as they were established in the Popular Government, do the Emperors, together with the names, rake unto them, that they may appear to have nothing but what was freely conferred on them.

34. But they have another privilege (so Dio proceedeth) which never was universally granted to any Roman. For the Emperors are loosed from the Laws; by which thing alone, liberty is given them to do those which we have related, and all other things. After this manner, with these names which were used in the Popular State, they receive all the power of the whole Commonwealth, and the Kingly also, shunning only the name. For, the titles of Cæsar and Augustus add nothing of peculiar power unto them: but the one signifieth the succession, and the other the splendor of their Dignity. As for the name of Fathers, though it giveth them such right over their Subjects, as Parents have over Children; yet at first it was given only for honour, and to admonish them to hold their Subjects as dear as Children, and these them as Parents. These are the titles which the Emperors according to the Laws and Customs use even in our days, and in our age, all these are at the same time given to them, except that of Censor; but in times past they were severally according to the Laws decreed to them. The name also of Censor, some of them according to the ancient custom have received, and Domitian bore it all his life; but now it is not so. For, the Emperors of our time having the thing it self, are neither chosen to the Censorship, nor bear the name of the Office, except during the Census. But 'tis thus the Commonwealth was changed into a better form and order; for it was utterly impossible it should subsist under the power of the people. Thus far Dio, excellently, according to his custom of relating the principal matters of State. It clearly appears from him, how absolute the Power of the Emperors was, and how without any co-ordinate Power of People or Senate in any respect. The main of their Authority lay in the title of Imperator; assisted by the Tribunitian Power, which two, (nay the former of them) make good our Exposition of the Lex Regia, without the other titles which they might take upon them for popularity, and to prevent the pretences of others, though their Authority was large, and strong enough without them. Our Author concludeth this discourse with an Assertion to that Truth we formerly asserted against Agrippa.

35. The same night that Cæsar received the surname of Augustus, a considerable sign (as it was accounted) of his confirmation hapned. For Tiber so overflowed, that all the lower parts of Rome were Navigable, which the Fortune-tellers interpreted to signifie his great advancement, and that he should have the whole City in his power. Now many sought to flatter him, but the inducements of Sextus Pacuvius (or Apudius) exceeded all, who being Tribune of the People, after the custom of the Spaniards, consecrated himself to him, and caused others to do so. Having now obtained the Government by consent of the People, he set himself more effectually to look after it, and made several Laws. Yet did he not all on his own head, but propounded many things to be debated in publick, that if any were displeased he might amend them: he desired all, freely, and openly, to deliver their opinions; and being moved by their reasons changed something: but he especially desired to be advised by the Consuls, or his Colleague, if he himself bore that Office. Of the other Magistrates he made choice of one out of each sort, and out of the Senate fifteen chosen by lot, who were for six Months to be his Counsellors; that hereby he might seem to communicate his designs to the rest. Some things he brought down to the whole Senate; but he thought it fitter to consult with a few persons at leisure about the greatest affairs. He called also these men sometimes to decide causes: although the Senate still heard certain matters, and gave answer to the Ambassadors of Kings and States as formerly. Although the Comitia, or Assemblies of the People were sometimes held, yet nothing was done but according to the pleasure of Augustus. He partly named Magistrates, and left others to be created by the People; only taking care that no unworthy persons by indirect practices advanced themselves. This was the general course of Augustus his administration, saith Dio.

36. This same year, perceiving the High-ways lying out of the City to have been for some time neglected, and thereupon travelling to be very troublesome, he left the rest to be repaired by certain Senators at their own charge, and he himself took care of Flaminia; because upon it he was to draw forth his Armies. And it was presently repaired, and for that work performed, Statues were erected to him on the Bridge of Tiber, and at Ariminum. The rest indeed were mended afterwards, but the Senators were not hasty to do it at their own cost, and whether the Expence was defrayed by Augustus himself, or the Publick Treasury, our Author cannot well tell; for he and his Successors seemed to have had the same Treasury with the State it self; and therefore it could not easily be discerned; but sometimes the one happened, and sometimes the other. Also Debts and Donations seemed common to him and the People. These things dispatched, he led away his Army from the City, with purpose to transfer the War hither into Britain; but coming into Gall, there he was stopped by the fair words of the British Ambassadors, and the Disorders he found in that Country, which were wont to be followed by Civil Wars. He made a Census of the Inhabitants, took order for Matters of Publick concernment, and for reformation of Manners: And thence he passed into Spain, and settled that Province.

Cornelius Gal-
and Ruin.

37. For the following year, Augustus the eighth time bore the Consulship with Statiilius Taurus. Agrippa by several publick Works got himself Reputation, and the love of the People; while Cornelius Gallus by a contrary course of Actions incurred Odium, and procured his own Destruction. He was so ingrateful to Augustus, that many things he talked against him, and many horrid things he did; and yet he caused Statues to be erected to himself, almost through Aegypt, and his Acts to be inscribed upon the Pyramids. Of these things being accused by Largus, who had been his Companion, he was noted with Inimicy by Augustus, and prohibited to inhabit in his Provinces. After this, others also fell upon him, and laid such Crimes to his charge, that the Senate condemned him to Banishment, and his Estate to be forfeited to the Emperor; and for this, Sacrifice was offered by the Fathers; but he overcome with Sorrow, prevented the Condemnation by a voluntary Death: Such end had Gallus by his Folly, whom when those that were formerly his Acquaintance and Flatterers law falling, they contributed to his Ruin with all their might. As for Largus, Dio tells a Story how one Præcilius meeting him, stopped his Nose and Mouth with his hand, thereby signifying to the by-standers, that it was unsafe to breath in his presence. Another went to him and took Witness that he was utterly unknown to him, which Largus confessing, he caused it to be written down, as now secure, that being unknown to a Knave, he could not load him with any Calumnies. However the Example of Gallus gave not such warning as to cause all men to abstain from intemperate Speeches.

38. This same year, Polemo King of Pontus was received amongst the Allies and Confederates of the Roman People, and Senators had the first Seats in the Theatres allotted to them throughout his Kingdom. For all the good words lately given Augustus by the British Ambassadors, there was nothing yet agreed on, and therefore he now thought of an Expedition hither, but was stopped by the Rebellion of the Salassi, Cantabri and Astures, whereof the former lived under the Alps, and the other two Nations inhabited the Champaign of Spain, as far as the Pyreneans, the most fortified places of which they held. Augustus now having entered his Ninth Consulship with M. Silanus, sent Terentius Varro against the Salassi, who easily overcame and forced them to receive Conditions. He required of them a certain Sum of Money, and pretended to nothing else, but sending his Soldiers all over to Collect it, he seized by that means upon all the youth, and sold them on these terms, that they should none of them be free before the twentieth year. The best part of their Land was bestowed on the Prætorian Cohorts, and a City new built, on which was imposed the Name of Augusta Prætorianorum. The War against the Astures and Cantabri, Augustus himself undertook, and they being inferior in Number and strength, plaid least in fight, and took their Advantages upon the Mountains, which so perplexed him, that he fell sick upon it, and giving over the Prosecution of the War to C. Antistius betook himself to Tarracon. And Antistius well behaved himself, and brought the War to an issue, not for that he was himself a more able Soldier than Augustus; but because they despised him, gave him Battle, and presented him with Opportunities to overcome them. The War being ended, he dismissed the Emerit Soldiers, and Commanded them to found a City in Lusitania, by the Name of Augusta Emerita. And this was must not forget, that while he lay at Tarracœ discontented at his own ill success, yet at the same time he received great Honor from the other Ends of the World. For having begun there his Ninth Consulship, Ambassadors came to him out of India, sent by King Pandion, to whom other Writers adde others from the Sythians, Garamantes, and Bactrians.

39. To Julia in stead of his Father's Kingdom, he now gave certain Regions of Gerulia, most of which were reduced to Roman Customs; as also certain Countries of Bœothus and Bogudes. Amyntas being dead, he did not deliver over his Kingdom to his Sons, but made it a Province, and thenceforth Galatia, together with Lycœonia, began to have a Roman Prefect; and the Towns of Pamphilia formerly subject to Amyntas, were restored to their liberty. About this time M. Vinicius by Defeating and Punishing some Germani who had killed certain Romans that came into their Country to Traffick, obtained also for Augustus the Title of Imperator; and for this and other Achievements, Triumphs were decreed to him, which he refused. Yet upon the Alps was erected a Triumphal Arch, and Power was given to all to wear Garlands, and the Triumphal Garments. Having finished these Wars after this manner, he shut again the Temple of Jove, which had been opened upon account of them. Agrippa at the same time adorned the City with several Works at his own proper charge, and amongst the rest he perfected the Pantheon. Dio tells us, that perhaps it was so called because it received the Images of many gods in those of Mars and Venus; but he rather thinks it took that Name from its arched Roof, whereby it resembled Heaven. Agrippa would have placed in it the Statue of Augustus, and put his Name to the Work; but he refusing as well the one as the other, he put that of Cæsar deceased within the Pantheon, and those of Augustus and himself in the Porch or Entry. All this proceeding from kindness to him, and love to his Country, Augustus took well, and honored him upon occasion for it. Being sick, and not in a condition to celebrate the Marriage of his Daughter Julia with Marcellus his Sister's Son, he procured him to do it at Rome in his Absence. And the House upon the Palatine Hill being burnt which formerly had belonged to Antonius; but since had been granted to Messala and Agrippa; he bestowed Money on Messala, but received Agrippa into his own House.

40. Augustus being Consul the tenth time with Norbanus, on the Calends of January, the Senate by Oath approved his Acts; and now being on his way to the City, whence he had been detained long by Sickness, and having promised a Donative of an hundred Denarii to every man, but denied to pay it till the Senate should consent, and the Fathers freed him from the necessity of Laws, so as being of full Power, he might do all things according to his own will. After his return other things were done to honor him. It was decreed that Marcellus should have place in the Senate amongst those of Prætorian Rank, and might stand for the Consulship ten years sooner than it was permitted by the Laws. And in favour of Tiberius, it was ordained that he might stand for any Office of Magistracy five years before the time; and shortly after the one was made Quæstor, and the other Ædilis. Now for these two Persons thus honoured, we have seen who this Marcellus was, and must inquire after Tiberius. We must know then that the first Wife of Augustus was Scrubonia, which had been Married to two Persons of Consular Dignity, and by one was a Mother; for as for the Daughter of Servilius Isauricus, he was only contracted to her when young; and Claudia the Daughter of P. Clodius by Fulvia, though he Married her, yet he dismissed her untouched. By Scrubonia he had a Daughter called Julia, and shortly after Divorced her for the perversity of her Manners, as he wrote. Then did Nero, who had followed L. Antonius to Perusium, but afterward was reconciled, freely yielded unto him Livia Drusilla; though he had one Son already by her, which was this Tiberius, and she was big with another; who being born three months after she had Married Cæsar, was called Drusus. By Livia he had no Children but Abortive. His Daughter Julia, as we said, he Married to Marcellus, the Son of his Sister Octavia.

41. The Cantabri and Astures presently after the departure of Augustus, rebelled, and were presently after reduced to obedience to their Coft. And Arabia the Happy was invaded by Ælius Gallus, having then Sabos for its King, by order from Augustus, that if the Arabians let him pass, he should agree with them, but make War upon them if they used any force or violence. At first, none appeared to make any opposition; but it proved a very tedious and troublesome Journey, by the Treachery of Syllæus the chief Minister of Obodes, King of the Nabatæans, who had taken upon him to Conduct Gallus. Besides, the Deiert, the heat of the Sun, and the badness of the Water, so afflicted the Soldiers, that the greatest part of the Army miscarried. This Disfate being like to none of those that were then known, lay in the Head; and as Dio describes it, that part being dried, destroyed many out of hand; and in such as escaped Death, it ran through the whole Body into the Feet, and there so held them, that no Remedy would give them ease, except they drank Wine and Oil mingled together, and therewith anointed themselves, which only very few could do, neither of the Ingredients growing there, nor being brought along by the Romans. By the Assistance of this Disfate, the Barbarians recovered such Towns as had been taken from them, and expelled such as remained alive out of the Country. However in the Opinion of some, he did extraordinarily well, and had well succeeded, but that he was betrayed by Syllæus. But Dio tells us, that these were the first, and he thinks the last of the Romans that proceeded so far in Arabia in an hostile manner, peircing as far as Athlala (or Athlala) a famous City.

42. The following year, being the DCCCXXXI of Rome, had for Consuls, Augustus the eleventh time, and Calpurnius Pison. Augustus fell so grievously Sick, that no hope there was of his Recovery, and therefore he disposed of all things; as being to leave the World. Calling to him the Magistrates, and the chief of Senators and Equites, he named no man his Successor, though all imagined it would have been Marcellus; but having spoken his Mind concerning some points, he delivered to Piso a Book, wherein he had made a Catalogue of the Armies, and Publick Revenues; and his King to Agrippa. But when nothing he could use would relieve him, Antonius Musa, by cooling Baths and Potions; restored him to Health; for which he had much Money given him, both by Augustus, and the Senate, as also the use of a Gold Ring (for he was but a Liberus or Freedman) and Immunity was granted not only to him, but to all of his Profession for the time to come. But that it might appear that this Musa arrogated to himself what was the work of fate and fortune, it happened not long after that Marcellus falling Sick, and ordered by him after the same manner, died under his hands, and had a publick Funeral, with other Honours. But Cæsar being recovered, brought the Testament he had made into the Senate, and would have shewn it to the World, that he had designed no Successor; but the whole Assembly was against the reading of it. However, it caused great wonder in all men, that he should not name Marcellus his Nephew, and Son-in-law, whom he so tenderly loved, and honored, especially in the discharge of his Office of Ædilis; but that before him he should rather prefer Agrippa. But he could not trust to the young years of Marcellus; and he had a mind either that the People should recover its liberty, or to prefer Agrippa to the Supreme Power, whom, though he knew to be extraordinarily beloved; yet he himself would not advance him. Being recovered, he found that Marcellus was displeased with Agrippa, and therefore to prevent all quarrels and contentions betwixt them, he sent away Agrippa for Syria. Yet he went not into Syria himself, but still using more Moderation, sent thither his Legates and staid at Lesbos. Thus writes Dio of his Moderation; whereas Suetonius accuseth him of Passion, and commends Augustus for bearing with him, in that being moved with a light suspicion of Rigour, and because Marcellus was preferred before him, he left all, and went to Mitylene, in the Isle of Lesbos. By this it appears that the dissatisfaction of these two Persons was mutual, and that Augustus had much ado to please them both.

43. Now he made only ten Prætors, because he had no need of more, and these to hold for several years. Then did he retire, and resigned the Consulship; for both he and others, having since the settlement of the State, held that Dignity an whole year, he would have the course altered, that many might enjoy it; and therefore he went out of the City, that he might not be hindered from laying it down. This was very much commended in him, as also that he subrogated in his place L. Sestius, a Person that had always favoured the cause of Brutus, had assisted him throughout the War, still revered his Memory, kept his Images, and was so bold as to commend him; but Augustus not only not hated, but honoured him for his Friendship and Fidelity. The Senate affected with these his Actions, in way of acknowledgment, decreed that he should be Triumphant for life; that as often as the Senate met, he might report matters, though he was not Consul; that he should always enjoy Pro-Consular Power, neither should he lay it down when he came into the City, or have any need to renew it; nay, that he should have greater Power in the Provinces, than the Governors themselves. Thence came it to pass that he and his Successors, as by a certain Law, enjoyed the Tribunal, and the other Powers. For as to the Name it self, neither Augustus, nor any other bore that of Triunus Plebis. And Dio verily believed that the Fathers did not do this out of Flattery, but in Sincerity; for he dealt with them in all respects as free persons. So when Triunates himself, and Ambassadors, came from Pbraates for composing their Differences, he introduced them into the Senate, and the hearing of the Cause being committed to him, he would not deliver up Triunates to Pbraates; yet the Son of Pbraates whom he had formerly received, he sent back, that in exchange he might have the Captives and Military Ensigns returned, which were taken in the Overthrows of Craffus and Antony. This same year, a certain Ædilis Plebis dying, C. Calpurnius succeeded him, who had been Ædilis Curulis; such a thing as never before had been heard of. In the Ferias, there were every day two Præfets of the City, where of one had not attained to ripeness of Age. The death of Marcellus by some was imputed to Livia, who could not endure he should be preferred before her own Sons; yet the Sickness of the year rendred it doubtful, by which a great multitude was swept away. This our Author thinks was betokened by a Wolf found in the City, by Fire, and Tempest, and the overflowing of Tiber to such an height that the Bridge called Pons Sublicus was born down, and Rome continued Navigable for three days.

44. The next year, had for Consuls M. Marcellus, and L. Aruntius, accompanied with so many discouraging Accidents, and so great a Plague, that the Grounds in Italy were left untilld. The Romans grieved with both Plague and Famine, imagined they proceeded from no other cause, than that they had not this year also Augustus for Consul. Therefore they required that he should be made Dilatator, and kept the Senate so long in the Court, till they decreed it; threatening else to set it on fire. They repaired to Augustus, with four and twenty Æfces, beseeching him to accept the Dilatatorship, and to suffer himself to be made Procurator of Provisions, as formerly Pompey had been. Though unwilling, he accepted of the last Employment, and caused for every year two Persons to be chosen, who had five years before discharged the Prætorship, to distribute the Corn. But he would by no means admit of the Dilatatorship, and when he could no other way restrain the People, he tore his Robe, being so wife as to decline the Odiu and Envy, when he had already both the Honour and Power that was larger than that which they offered to him. He made the same refusal when they would needs create him perpetual Censur; for he would neither accept of that Honour, but named two Censurs, which were Paulus Æmilius Lepidus, and L. Munatius Plancus. And these were the last Censurs of private men, which now also Dio faith, was predicted to them. For, their Tribunal the first day they entered their Office, fell down, and was broken; and thenceforth were no Censurs created like unto them. And though they bore the Office, yet did Augustus do many things belonging to it. Some Meetings he took quite away, and others he Reformed. He required the Prætors to take care of the Celebration of all Games; yet so that something should be allowed them by the People. But by an Edict ordained that none should in particular bestow more upon them than others did; as also that without Command of the Senate, none should exhibit the show of Gladiators; nor often than twice in one year, nor more Gladiators than one hundred and twenty.

45. To the Ædilis Curulis he committed the charge of Extinguishing Fires, allowing them six hundred Slaves for that Service. And because that Equites, and many Illustrious Women danced in the Orchestra, he forbade not only that the Children of Senators, which already had been Prohibited, but their Grandchildren, and those of the Equestrian Order, should do it for the future. In these matters he carried himself like a Legislator, and an Emperor; but in other things he so far humbled himself, as even to plead for some of his Friends that were called to answer. So it happened, that a Day was assigned to one M. Primus to give an Account, who being Governor of Macedonia, had made War upon the Odrysi: He pleading sometimes that he did it by order from Augustus, and otherwhiles from Marcellus; Augustus, without sending for, came into Court, and being asked by the Prætor, whether he had ordered him to make War, denied it. Hereupon did Licinius Murena, who undertook the defence of Primus, revile revile him, and demanded of him what he did there, and who called him thither; to which he answered, That it was the Commonwealth. This took so with those of iointer Judgments, that they commended him for it, and gave him leave to assemble the Senate as often as he pleased; but others had ill thoughts of him, and some there were who not only acquitted Primus, but conspired against Augustus. The Ringleader of them was Fannius Cæpio, and Murena was, whether truly or falsely, accounted Guilty, who had indeed a very intemperate Tongue, and would use it against any one, even to the uneasiness of the Hearers. These absenting themselves were Banished, and a little after put to Death, Murena receiving no relief from Proculus his Brother, nor from Mecænas the Husband of his Sister, though in great esteem with Augustus. However, these Conspirators were absolved by the Votes of some of the Judges, which caused him to make a Law, that none should secretly give Sentence in behalf of those Criminals that did not appear, but that all such should be Condemned without hearing. And he shewed that he did it for the publick good, and not thereunto incited by Passion. The Father of Cæpio manumitted one of those Slaves, who fled away with his Son, because he assisted him to his power when he was seized; and another for that he betrayed his Master, he caused to be led through the Town, with a Writing which expressed the cause of his Punishment, and to be nailed to a Cross. This Augustus did not take in any evil part.

46. At this same time he resorted to the People Cyprus, and Gallia Narbonensis, as not needing the Protection of his Arms, and thenceforth Proconsuls began to be sent into those Provinces. Now also did he Dedicate a Temple to Jupiter the Thunderer; and the Cantabri and Assures about this time Rebelled, the latter being provoked by the Insolence and Cruelty of Carisus, and the former by their Example. They were quickly reduced, the greatest part of the Cantabri killing themselves, as not enduring to outlive their Liberty. At the same time the Ethiopian that inhabited about Ægypt, upon Conduct of their Queen Candace, wasted all Regions as far as the City Elephantina, where when they heard that C. Petronius the Governor of Ægypt was coming against them, they endeavoured to make a Retreat, but were found out and Deceived by him; and upon this occasion he was drawn into their Country. There did he order his Affairs very well, taking, amongst others, the Royal City Tamape, which having Demolished, and a Garrison left in another place, he retreated with the greatest part of his Army; being not able to proceed for the heat and sand, nor having convenience there to stay with all his Forces: yet hearing that the Ethiopians, whom he had left in Garrison, were Attacked, he returned and relieved them, and constrained Candace to receive terms of an Accommodation. While these things passed, Augustus went into Sicily, to settle Affairs there; and thence to pass into all Provinces, as far as Syria, and do the like.

Rome fell into Sedition.

47. He being absent, the People of Rome fell into Tumult, upon Creation of the new Consuls, and thereby shewed that the Commonwealth could not continue under Popular Government. One place of the Consulship was reserved for Augustus, and M. Lælius bore alone the title at the beginning of the year. When he had declared his refusal, Q. Lepidus, and L. Silanus became Candidates, and used such means to compass their Ends, that wife men desired that the Emperor would return to Rome. Yet did he not return, but sending for the Candidates, rebuked them for their Extravagant seeking of Voices, and Commanded them both to be absent from the Election. But this did little good, it procured not more orderly or quiet proceedings, so that very difficultly, at last was Lepidus created Consul. Hereat Augustus was much disturbed, and it not being possible that he should always be at the City, he found a Necessity of making a Governor to prevent these Disorders. Agrippa he thought the fittest man, and to gain him more awe and Authority, he caused him to Divorce his Wife, though she was his Sister's Daughter, and to marry Julia, and he sent him presently thither to consummate the Marriage, and take the Government. Amongst other Arguments which suggested to him this course, the laying of Mecænas, moved him, who being consulted about this Affair, gave this Answer, That he had already made Agrippa so great, that there was necessity he should be his Son in Law, or be taken away by Death. Agrippa composed the Disorders in the City, and banished out of it the Egyptian Rites and Ceremonies, which again had crept into it, forbidding by an Edict, that they should be celebrated within half a Mile. But he could not appease the Tumult about making a Præfets of the place for the Festivals; and so the year passed over without that Officer.

48. Augustus having settled Matters in Sicily, where he made Syracuse and other Cities, Roman Colonies, passed over into Greece. There he bestowed Cithæra on the Lacedæmonians, and honoured them with his Company, because they had harboured Livia with her Husband and Son when they fled out of Italy. Some reported, that he took Ægina and Eretria from the Athenians, because they had favoured the Cause of Antony, and Commanded them to admit of none to be Citizens for Money. From Greece he failed to Samus, and there wintered. In Spring, when M. Apuleius and P. Silius were Consuls, he passed over into Asia, and settled Matters in Bithynia, and other Provinces he passed through, with no less care, than if they had belonged to himself, and not to the People. Remarkable it is, that he condemned those of Cyzicus to slavery, because they had Whipped, and put to Death some Roman Citizens, and in Syria he inflicted the same Punishment upon the Tyrians, and Sidonians for their Faction. In the mean time, Phraates having performed nothing of what he was obliged to by Agreement, now fearing that Augustus would be upon him, sent to him the Military Ensigns, and all Captives, some few excepted, who out of shame killed themselves, or lurked about in Parthia, and he received them with the same apprehensions, as if he had overthrown the Parthians in War. Having recovered these things without bloodshed, upon that account he both caused Sacrifices to be offered, and Commanded that a Temple should be decreed in the Capitol to Mars the Avenger (in imitation of that of Jupiter Feretrius) in which, Military Ensigns might be hung up. This he afterward finished, and rode on Horseback in way of Triumph into the City, and was honoured with a Triumphal Arch; Being constituted Curator of the ways about Rome, he caused to be made the Milivium Aureum, and appointed Persons of Pretorian Rank, Overseers of the ways, who were attended with two Lictors apiece. At the same time Julia brought Agrippa a Son named Cains, on whose Birth-day a perpetual Sacrifice was decreed to be made with some other things: and privately the Ædiles added Games on Horseback, and Hunting to the Birth-day Solemnities of Augustus.

49. While these things were doing at Rome, he settled the Affairs of the Provinces according to the Prescript of the Roman Laws. He permitted the Confederates to use their own Customs, neither determined he to take any thing from them, or get more by War, being content with what already was gotten, and accordingly he wrote to the Senate, and at that time he undertook no War at all. Yet some Alterations as to Governors he made in some Countries, and the People of Armenia the Greater accusing Artabazes, and desiring to have his Brother Tigranes then at Rome; he sent Tiberius to drive away the former, and bring the latter to be King amongst them. Before Tiberius arrived, Artabazes was killed by the Armenians, and then did he perform nothing answerable to the preparation that had been made; yet he boasted of this matter, as having something notably performed, especially Sacrifices being upon this account decreed: and now began he to have Imaginations in his Head that he should be Emperor, because coming to Philippi noises were heard in that place where the Battle had been fought, as out of a Camp, and Fire was seen to break out from an Altar built formerly by Antony, where he was incamped. Augustus being returned into Samus, gave liberty to the Inhabitants, as a reward of his Entertainment, and dispatched many other Affairs. Many Ambassadors came to him; and now the Indians confirmed by a League, that Peace which formerly they had desired. Amongst other Presents, Tigers were sent by them; which sort of Beast, in the Opinion of Dio, was then first seen, both by Greeks and Romans. There was also a Man without Arms, who did all feats with his Feet and Toes, as if they had been Hands and Fingers. One of the Messengers, Zarmar by name, either weary of his life, or out of vain glory, mounted voluntarily the Funeral Pile, and thereon was burnt.

50. For the following year, C. Sentius was Consul, and Augustus once more refused the reserved Place. Thereupon again happened Tumults, and the slaughter of several Persons at Rome, inasmuch that the Senate gave Sentius charge of the City. He being not willing to undertake it, they sent Messengers to Augustus with two Lictors, who seeing that there would be no end of these mischiefs, if he observed former Rules, designed Consul Q. Lucretius, one of the Messengers, who had been a proscribed Person, and then went for Rome: At his return, various things were voted by the Senate to honour him, of which he accepted nothing, saving that he permitted an Altar to be Erected to Fortuna Redux, and the Day of his his Return to be put amongst the Festivals, and called Augustalia. The Magistrates and People however being resolute to go out and receive him, he Entered by Night. Notwithstanding, they decreed that he should be Magister Morum for Five years, and for that term have the Dignity of Censor, but that of Consul for his life; that twelve Fastes should ever be born before him, and that he should sit in a Curule chair betwixt the Consuls. They earnestly desired him to make Laws, and amend all things as he should think convenient, offering to swear to obey them. And this he did, but refused their Oath, knowing, that what was pleasing to them, they would do without swearing, but nothing else, though obliged by never so many Oaths. Agrippa, now from the Government of the City, went into Gall, where the Invasion of the Germans and other things caused a Disturbance; which having quieted, he passed over into Spain, where was great need of his presence. For, the Cantabri that there had been taken in War and sold for Slaves, cut the Throats of their Masters, and getting together, fortified several Places, and set upon the Roman Garrisons. Against them Agrippa marched, but ere he attacked them, had a Content with his own Army, wherein some Veteran Soldiers being harried with Wars, and standing in fear of that Martial Nation, refused to obey him. Attempting it by several means, he brought them again to obedience; which having done, he had a sharp Contest with Men who had served the Romans, and learnt their Skill, and despaired of Pardon if they came once more into their power. He suffered great Inconveniences; but at length having lost many of his Soldiers, and fixed Ignominy upon many others of them for their ill demeanour, particularly forbidding the whole Legion called Augusta, to use that Name, he destroyed almost all the Cantabri that were of Military Age; the rest he disarmed, and brought them down from the Mountainous places into the Champaign. Yet of these things he neither gave account to the Senate; nor accepted of the Triumph decreed him by Augustus, governing himself by the wonted moderation of his Mind. Augustus took it in very good part, as also his bringing the Water formerly called Frigidanis, into the City at his own proper Charge, to which he gave the name of Augusta. On a time when there was scarcity of Wine, and the People thereof complained, the Emperor said that Agrippa had sufficiently provided that they should not die of Thirst.

51. So modestly did Agrippa behave himself, when in the mean time certain other Persons were of a quite contrary behaviour. For some there were who were so confident as to desire a Triumph, though their Achievements were no greater than the cutting off of some Robbers abroad, or suppressing some Seditious in the City, and they obtained what they fed for, and therein pride themselves; so facile was Augustus herein at the beginning of his Administration, as also in granting the honour of public Sepulchre. But as for Agrippa, in a manner he promoted him to the Empire. For perceiving the Common-wealth in such a condition as to require great Care and Vigilancy, and fearing Designs against his own Person, as there was some reason he should, and against which, as he said himself, there was little defence in that Breast-plate he wore when he went into the Senate; and frequently at other times, he prorogued his own Authority for five years more, his Tenth now drawing to a Conclusion, in the Consulship of the two Lenulus, Publius and Cneus. Moreover, he conferred on Agrippa power almost equal to his own, in other respects, and that of a Tribune for five years. For so many years he said were sufficient for them; and yet long after he took more, that his Imperial Authority might Continue the other ten. These things done, he began a scrutiny into the Senate, and to avoid the Odium of chusing all the Members thereof himself, he selected certain Persons who should name five apiece, out of which number he elected one; and into the Places of such as were abroad, he caused others to succeed by lot. But finding some deceit to be used in this way of Sortion, he would no further use that course, but made choice of the rest himself, to the number of Six hundred. At first he had determined to have but Three hundred Senators according to the ancient Custom, being glad to find so many Persons that deserved that Dignity: but all of that Rank were displeased at it; for by this means it would come to pass, that more would be removed than should continue in the Senate, and thereupon every Individual person was more afraid to lose than in hope to obtain the Dignity. He resolved therefore upon the Number of Six hundred, but yet the matter did not end there.

52. For several unworthy Persons came to be Members, and one Licinius Regulus took it in so high disdain, that he should be struck out of the List, when his own Son, and others he thought far more unworthy, were put in, that in open Senate he tore his Clothes, made himself naked, and reckoning up the Services he had performed, showed the Stars of the Wounds he had received: One Articulatus Petrus being chosen in, and his Father put out, made it his request that he might surrender his Place to him. Augustus moved with these and other Circumstances, made another Scrutiny; but neither did this remove Complaints, but several found themselves still aggrieved and unjustly dealt with: To them then he gave this Promise, That amongst Senators they should sit at Feasts, and behold the Speltacula in the same Habit; and have liberty to sue for Places of Magistracy; and most of them were afterward taken into the Senate again, only a few remained in a middle state and condition betwixt the Senate and the People. After this he punished certain Persons for Conspiring against himself and Agrippa. He hated Lepidus for other reasons as well as for that his Son had conspired against his life, and had received punishment for it. Yet would he not put him to death, but put several disgraces upon him. He caused him to come out of the Country into the City and be present at Assemblies, to expose him as a laughing-stock to the People, considering what Power he had formerly enjoyed; and he appointed him the lowest place amongst all the Consulares. Antistius Labeo, to whom Augustus had given power of Chusing the Senate, having taken him into that Order, he charged him with Perjury for so doing, and threatened to punish him. But Labeo answered, That he thought he had done no unjust thing to retain him in the Senate, whom he suffered still to enjoy the Dignity of Pontifex Maximus: At which answer the Emperor remitted his Choler, having both privately and publicly made a show of desiring that Place, and yet he thought it was not to be invaded in the life-time of Lepidus. So seasonable was the reply of Labeo, as also was his Answer another time in the Senate, when it was moved as a fitting thing that Each of them should attend Augustus in his turn to protect his Person. Not daring to contradict it, nor deigning to approve it, he said He was sleepy and tired, and was not fit to watch at his Chamber.

53. About this time he enacted several things in order to a Reformation of Customs and Manners. Such as by Bribery fought after Offices, he barred from them for the space of five years. He imposed greater Mulcts upon such of both Sexes as would not marry, and proposed greater Encouragements for Procreation of legitimate Children. And because the Males of the Patrician Rank exceeded far in number the Females of that Order, he gave leave to any, provided they were not Senators, to marry Libertæ or Freed Women, and made such conjunctions legal. But great Complaint was now made to him of the Immodeest Manners both of Young Men and Women, as the greatest hindrance of Matrimony; and they Earnestly desired that he would also consider how to redress this disorder, thereby twitting tacitly himself for having to do with many Women. At first he answered, That he had taken care for things most necessary, and that other matters could not be so easily provided for; and some way or other he was brought to say, That they ought to Command their Wives, and use such Admonitions as he did to his Livia. Then were the Senators much more importunate, and desired to know what Admonitions they were. To whom replying very unwillingly, he instanced in some particulars concerning Clothes and other Ornament of Women, about going to public Meetings, and the Modesty of himself and his Wife, little caring how ill his Actions suited with his Words. It was become a practice for Persons to betroth to themselves such as were but Children, and after that to take the profits of their Estates though no Marriage followed thereupon. He Commanded, That No Sponsalia or Contracts should be good, which were not Consummated by a Marriage within Two years; that is, That such as would receive the Profits of a Virgin's Estate, should betroth her at Ten years of Age at least, that of Twelve being the legitimate time of Marriage for Women, as then judged of Maturity. He further Ordained, That for Celebration of Games, but one Præfett of the City should be made. And because now the Sibylline Books were worn and decayed with Age, he employed the Pontifices in Copying them out with their own Hands, that no others might have the opportunity of reading them. To all that were worth ten Myriads, and to whom it was lawful to stand for Offices, he gave liberty to do. That was the first value he made of the Estates of Senators, which afterwards he enlarged to Five and twenty Myriads; and to some Persons that lived well and wanted these sums, he gave money to make them up. And he permitted Prætors to take the treble of what was allowed them for Games out of the Treasury. This procured that although there were not some wanting who were displeased at the Rigor of his Laws; yet all Indignation ceased, because he had done this, and recalled Pyrlades a Stage-Player, who had been driven away by the Factions in the City. This Pyrlades being chidden by Augustus, for brawling and contending with Bathyllus, of the same Profession, and one that was familiar with Mecænas, is said to have given him this wife Answer, It conduceth to thine Interest, O Cæsar, that the People be diverted by being intent upon us.

54. In the following year, being the DCCXXXVII of the City, C. Furnius, and C. Silanus were Consuls, and a Son was born to Agrippa, and called Lucius, whom together with his Brother Caius, Augustus adopted before they came to Man's estate, that he might be more safe from Conspiracies. Such as triumphed, he commanded that in memory of what they had done, they should cause some work to be made of the spoils taken in War. He celebrated now the Secular Games the fifth time. He commanded that Orators should receive no Reward for Pleading Causes, under pain of forfeiting fourfold of what they received. Such Judges as were yearly chosen by lot, he Prohibited in the year of their Administration to enter the Houses of those that had Causes depending before them. And because Senators were negligent in coming to the Senate, on such as were guilty of this neglect, without any reasonable cause, he imposed a greater Mulct than formerly had been usual. Having ordained these things, and finding his preference in the City troublesome both to himself and others, while he sometimes executed and sometimes neglected his own Laws, he resolved, as Solon formerly had done to Travel, and the next year when L. Domitius, and P. Scipio, were Consuls, he went into Gall, pretending thither to be called by Tumults and Wars. Some there were who suspected that he went away, that without noise he might enjoy the Company of Terentia, the Wife of Mecænas, which Woman he so loved, that on a time he made her contend with Livia for handiwork. Before his departure, he dedicated the Temple of Quirinus, which had been rededicated, having adorned it with Seventy six Pillars, so many years as he lived, so that some believed he wittingly designed the number: The Government of Rome and Italy, he committed to Taurus; for he had sent Agrippa into Syria, and Mecænas now was not so acceptable to him because of his Wife.

55. About the same time Commotions were raised by some Nations inhabiting the Alps, by the Pannonians, and those of Noricum, all which were without much trouble composed, as others in Dalmatia, and Macedonia, and Spain. In Thrace M. Lollius giving assistance to Rhymetalces, the Uncle and Tutor of the Sons of Cotys, overcame the Belli, and after him C. Lucius upon the same account, making War against the Suromatae, overthrew them, and drove them beyond Ister. But that War was of great effect Consequence, which drew Augustus from the City against the Germans; for the Sicambri, Uffetæ, and Tenchteri having first nailed to Crosses some Roman Citizens, then waited Gall, circumvented a Party of Horse sent against them, and overthrew Lollius the Governor, upon whom they were drawn by those that fled. Yet upon report of Lollius his further Preparations, and of the coming of Augustus, they returned home, and gave Hostages for their peaceable demeanor. Yet though he had no War to raise, did he spend the remaining of this year and the following, wherein M. Drusus Libo, and L. Calpurnius Piso were Consuls, in settling the Affairs of these Countries. For besides the stir raised by the Germans, great complaints were made against the Administration of Licinius, who being a Gall by Original, and taken by the Romans, had become the Slave of Julius Cæsar, and being manumitted by him, been preferred by Augustus, to the oversight of that Country. He managed the Roman Dignity with Barbarick Avarice, and confounded all things, to make them subservient to his humour. To that height of Impudence he arrived, that the Galls being to make Payments every Month, he would needs reckon fourteen Months to the year, affirming, that December according to its name, was really the tenth, and that there were two that followed called Augusti, viz. an eleventh and twelfth, wherein Money must also be collected by the Galls. Augustus knew not how to carry himself, but sometimes accused, and otherwhiles excused him, being ashamed he had made choice of such a Governor. But Licinius by a Trick he used, came off, and deluded the Galls. Perceiving Augustus to be incensed against him, and that he should be punished for his Villanies, he brought him to his House, and there showing him great Treasure, called him Lord, and told him, That upon design he had gathered it for the use of him, and the Romans, left the Galls furnished with it, should have revolted; and having kept it for him, he now delivered it into his hands.

56. At the same time Drusus and Tiberius, with good Success managed several Wars against such as Rebelled against the Empire; These were the Rhetii, who inhabiting the Country betwixt Noricum and Gall, at the Tridentine Alps, both infested the adjacent Territories of Gall, made Incursions into Italy, and offered violence to such Romans as passed through their Coast. Nay, such was their Custom, that they put to Death all Males they took for Captives, not only those they found in view, but such as were in their Mothers Bellies, whom they pretended they could discover by a certain Art they had of Divination. Drusus with no great difficulty, defeated them near Trent, and obtained Prætorian honours; but for all that they were so bold as to invade Gall, and thither Tiberius was sent against them. Now both Brothers set on them at once, and broke into Rhetia, partly by the indeavours of their Legates, and their own Preference; Tiberius passing the Lake by Boats, destroyed such Forces as they had abroad, constrained them to submit, and because the Nation was populous, they carried away the greatest part thereof that was fit for War, and left the rest to Till the Land. Now it will not be amiss to follow the Example of Dio, and from him to relate that in this year died Vedius Pollio, a man famous for nothing performed, being a Liberinus by Original, and of the Equestrian Order, but remarkable for his Wealth, and his Cruelty. He kept that sort of Fifth called Mulleis in a Pond, and when his Slaves offended him, such as he Condemned to Death, he was wont to cast into the Pond to fat these Fishes, being learnt to feed upon that sort of food. On a time he invited Augustus to a Feast, and it happened that one of his Slaves who waited at the Side-board, brake a Crystal Glass, for which Offence he Condemned him to the Mulleis; not at all moved by the presence of him he entertained. The Boy cast himself at the Feet of Augustus, who interceded for him; and when Vedius would not yield, desired that he might see all his other Glasses which were of so great a value, which when brought, he caused them all to be broken. He left to Augustus a good part of his Estate, particularly a Village called Panslypas, betwixt Naples and Puteoli. He required that some Publick Work might be erected for the use of the People, and upon this pretence, Augustus caused his House to be pulled down, with design indeed, that no Monument of him might be left in the City. There he built a Porticus, but upon it set not the Name of Vedius, but of Livia; which was done afterward. Now did Augustus send many Colonies into Gall and Spain; restored the Inhabitants of Cyzicus to Liberty; was bountiful to them of Paphus, who had been formerly distressed by an Earthquake, and permitted them to call their City by the Name of Augusta. This indeed was ordinarily performed by Augustus, and the Senate; and the Senate itself was wont in way of Honours, to give Surnames to Cities; though afterwards they themselves made choice of what, and as many, as they pleased.

57. The Pannonians much about this time Rebelling, were reduced to Obedience; the Ligures Comati, who hitherto had inhabited the Maritim Alps, in free condition, were reduced into Slavery, and Matters were settled in the Cimmerian Bosphorus, which tended to Defection. This was effected by the Conduct of Agrippa, in whose Name a Supplication was decreed; but though a Triumph was decreed him, he refused the Honour; neither at the beginning did he write any thing of it to the Senate. And in the Opinion of Dio, this Example of his was afterward taken, and observed as a Law, for, those that came after did not by Letters certify the Senate of what was done, neither did they Triumph, as formerly; no Triumph being indeed decreed to them, being only graced with Triumphal Honours. As for Augustus, he had by this time dispatched the Affairs of Gall, Germany, and Spain. Much Money he had expended, and much he had received: Liberty and Freedom of the City from some he took, and to others gave it; and having left Drusus in Germany, he returned to Rome, when Tiberius and Quintilius Varus were Consuls. The Senate having met, had ordered an Altar to be consecrated in the Court it self for his return, and Voted that such as became Supplicants to him, when he was within the Pomerium, should obtain Impunity. Neither of these Honours would he receive, neither would he permit the People to come out and meet him, but entered the City by Night, as he was wont to do most commonly, that he might not be troublesome. The day after his Return, he assaulted the People in the Palace; ascending the Capitol, he took the Laurel from about the Fagces, and laid it at the Knees of Jupiter; and on the same Day, he gave to the People gratis the use of Baths, and Barbers. After this, he caused the Senate to be Assembled, but having got a Cold, he spoke nothing, but gave a Paper to the Quæstor to be read, wherein was related what he had performed; the Term of the Militia was determined (or how many years Soldiers were to serve before dismissal) and what Moneys they should receive, when Emeriti for the Grounds they so earnestly desired. This he did to keep them from Mutining. The Prætorian Cohorts were to serve Twelve years; the rest Sixteen; and more Pay was received by the former, than by the latter. At present by this course he took, the Soldiers were neither fully contented, nor yet moved by any Indignation, as not despairing of their Fortunes.

58. We have seen how careful Augustus was for Modelling and Reforming the Senate, but his indeavours therein did not answer Expectation. He thought he did well to raise the value of a Senator, and this had such operation, that it so far kept out mean and insolvent Persons, that few could now be found that were able, at least willing, to undertake the Employment; and many swore themselves off from it. There was now a want of Persons to discharge the Offices of Judicature, and other Duties; and therefore the Fathers in his Absence made a Senatus-consultum, that twenty Persons should be chosen out of the Body of the Equites, and not to be thereupon made Senators, except some Office afterwards discharged should make them capable of that Dignity. That these twenty should succeed into the room of the former twenty six; of them three should judge in Capital Matters; other three look to the Coining of Money; four should Oversee the Ways of the City; and ten more be employed in such Judicial Proceedings as formerly were devolved by lot upon the Centumviri; as for those who took care of the Highways without the City, and four that were sent into Campania, they were now abrogated. Besides this Senatus-consultum, they decreed that because none would lightly sue for the Tribuneship of the People, some should be chosen by lot out of them that had been Quæstors, and had not yet attained forty years of Age. Augustus now surveyed the whole Senatorial Order, and omitting such as had passed their five and thirtieth year, compelled all the rest that had Estates of value to receive the Dignity, if they were not maimed in their Bodies; which he himself viewed.

59. For the value of Estates, he took the Oaths of the Parties; as also of such as bore Testimony on their behalf, and required an account both of their Poverty, and of their Lives. As for private Matters, he rebuked Tiberius for placing Caius in a Seat next to himself, at the Votive Games he made for his safe Return, and chid the People for applauding him for so doing. Lepidus being now dead, he took the Office of Pontifex Maximus, and upon occasion hereof, when the Senate was about to decree certain things in honour of him, he professed he would receive none of them, and when they were importunate, he rose and went out of the Court. Neither were their Decrees approved, neither did he receive a Publick Dwelling; but because it was requisite that the Habitation of the Pontifex Maximus should be publick, he Commanded part of his own House to be so accounted; and gave the House of the Rex Sacrorum and the Vestal Virgins, it being near their Dwellings. One Cornelius Seneftius being blamed for the evil Conversation of his Wife, said in open Senate, that he had Married her, Augustus both knowing and advising him to it. Hereat he was moved with very great Passion, but without any more to do, halted out of the Court, and shortly after again returned; and this he told his Friends he did it, left if he had staid he should have been provoked to some act that might have been inconvenient and severe.

60. Agrippa was returned out of Syria, and honoured with a Continuation of Tribunitial Power for other five years. Thus rewarded he sent him into Pannonia, where now a War grew hot, with greater Power than any other employed out of Italy. He undertook the Expedition when Winter now came on, wherein were Consuls M. Valerius Messala Barbatus, and P. Sulpicius Quirinius, and so afflicted the Pannonians with the very noise of his March, that they ceased to rebel. Hereby prevented as to Action he returned, and in his way fell sick in Campania. Augustus as soon as he heard it, made what haste he could to come to him, but found him dead. He brought his Body into the City, and placing it in the Forum, commended him by a Funeral Oration, a Curtain being drawn betwixt him and the Beire: What the meaning of this should be, our Author cannot tell us. Some thought it was, because Augustus was Pontifex Maximus; and others, because he Executed the Office of Censor; but he affirms both the one and the other fort to have erred therein; for neither was the Pontifex Maximus forbidden to look upon dead Bodies, nor the Censor any time, but when he made a Lustrum, or concluded his Office: then indeed if he beheld the Body of a dead-man before the Solemnities of the Lustrum were performed, all he had formerly done were refuted. Then did Augustus carry him out into the place whither he himself was afterward conveyed, and buried him in his own Sepulchre; although Agrippa had a Monument of his own granted him in the Campus Martius. But such was the End of this Person, the best Man without Controverſie of his Age in the Opinion of Dio; the Friend of Augustus, and that to the great advantage both of Emperor and Empire. As he used his utmost Endeavour to serve him; so the Honours and Advantages he received as Rewards, he employed in well deserving of other men. Hereby it came to paſs, that he was neither troublesome to Augustus, nor obnoxious to the Envy of others; so Confirming his Authority and Domination, as if he seemed chiefly to desire that form of Government; and yet to obliging the People that he was esteemed as most Popular of all others. At his Death he bequeathed them his Gardens and a Bath, which was called by his Name, giving certain Grounds to Augustus for this use. And he not only gave to the People these Grounds, but distributed to them Money man by man, as if Agrippa had left it to them. Indeed by his death a great Estate came to Augustus, and amongst other things the Chersonesus at the Helleſpont, our Author wondering how Agrippa came by it. However, Augustus could not forget him of a long time, but honoured him amongst the People, and caused his Son born after his death, after him to be called by the name of Agrippa. This Name, Pliny faith, was first given to them that were born with the Feet forward, as one should say, Born hardly, or with much ado. And in this manner (he writes) as they say, M. Agrippa came forth of his Mother's Womb, the only Man, almost, known to have brought any good Fortune with him of all that were after that sort born. Yet he was much pained with the Gout, and passed all his Youth and many a day after in Bloody Wars, and in danger of a thousand deaths. He was unfortunate in his Children, and especially in his two Daughters, the Agrippinae, who brought forth two Sons pernicious to the whole Earth, namely, C. Caligula, and Domitius Nero, Emperors. He died in the One and fiftieth year of his Age, tormented with the Adulterie of his Wife, and oppressed with the intolerable Servitude, in which he lived under her Father.

61. Augustus mourned much for the death of Agrippa, yet would he not suffer any thing instituted by the Antients to be omitted; and though none of the Nobility would be present at Games, Yet he himself solemnized those of the Gladiators, which were also often celebrated in his Absence. Being now made the Corrector of Manners for other five years, (for this Office he also took, as the Imperial Power it self, to a limited time) he commanded that Senators should when they came to the Court, or to his presence, burn Incense; both that they might carry themselves religiously, and come together with less trouble, such a Ceremony, as a Token of their Meetings, being used. The Province of Asia standing now in need of help, being much distressed with Earthquakes, he paid the Annual Tribute due from it, out of his own money, and assigned it a President, not chosen by Suffrages, but by Lot, for two years. It happened that Apuleius and Mecenas being blamed in a Court of Judicature, in a Case of Adultery, not that they were guilty of it themselves, but because they undertook the Defence of an accused Person, he came into the Court, and sitting down on the Bench, only gave warning to the Accuser, That he should not traduce his Kindred, and his Friends, and then arose and departed. For these and Other things they gathered Money amongst themselves and honoured him with Statues, and permitted what never formerly had been lawful to any, That upon his Birth-day unmarried persons, of both Sexes, might amongst the rest come to see, and be present at the Feast. Now Agrippa was dead, whom Augustus had loved for his Virtue, nor any Relation he had to him, and it was necessary he should have some one to assist him in the Government, Superior to all others in Power and Dignity, the better to avoid Conspiracies: He was forced to make choice of Tiberius, his own Grandson not being yet grown up. He caused him to quit his Wife, being the Daughter of Agrippa, by a former Marriage, though she had a Child living by him, and another in her Belly, and to Marry Julia; which done, he sent him against the Pannonians, who after the death of Agrippa, delivered of their fear, returned to their their wonted Rebellious humour. He made use of the Scordisci their Neighbors, who observed the same way of Fighting, and after much mischief done both to Country and Inhabitant, subdued them, took away their Arms, and led away the younger sort into other Regions. For these Performances, the Senate decreed him a Triumph, but Cæsar would not suffer him to make use of the Decree, but in room thereof conferred on him Triumphal Honours.

The Success of the two Brothers, Tiberius and Drusus.

62. The same thing that befell him, happened to his Brother Drusus. The Sicambri, and their Associates, encouraging themselves upon the Absence of Augustus, and for that the Galli bore the yoke of Servitude very unwillingly, had begun another War. Drusus upon pretence of a Festival celebrated at Lugdunum, at the Altar of Augustus, secured the chiefest of the Galli, and thereby prevented the great mischief that would have followed upon their Conjunction with the rest. Then being intent upon the Germans, when they should pass the Rhine, he repulsed them, and invaded the Territories of the Ossetæ, near the Island of the Batavi, as also the Country of the Sicambri, and wasted them to a great extent. After this, passing down the Rhine into the Ocean, he subdued the Frifii, and by a Lake passed the Borders of the Chauci. Here he was in Danger, by reason that upon fall of the Tide, his Vessels were left upon dry ground, but by the Industry of the Frifii, who supplied him with foot, he escaped, and Winter approaching came to Rome, where he was made Prætor of the City, though he had already obtained Prætorian Honours, in the Consulship of Q. Ælius Tubero, and Paulus Fabius Maximus. In the beginning of Spring he returned, passed the Rhine, subdued the Ossetæ, and thence by a Bridge crossing the River Lupia, invaded the Sicambri; and through their Country pressed into that of the Cherusci, and as far as the River Wesargis, which he might better do; because the Sicambri had with all their force at this time fallen upon the Chatti, who of all their Neighbors had alone denied them aid. And he had also passed the Wesargis, but that want of Provisions, the approach of Winter, and a swarm of Bees seen in the Camp, deterred him. Returning into the Country of his Friends, he was near destruction by the Circumvention of his Enemies, who having done him much Damage, shut up him and his whole Army in a trait and hollow place; and he was only delivered by their temerity, who contemning the Romans as already vanquished, rushed upon them without any care or orders, and gave them advantage to Charge, and put them to Flight. After this they durst not approach, and Drusus then contemning them, built a Castle to restrain them at the confluence of Lupia, and Aliso; and another in the Country of the Chatti upon the Rhine. For these Achievements it was decreed that he should have Triumphal Honours, enter the City on Horse-back, and his Prætorship ended, obtain Proconſular Power. He had been saluted by his Soldiers, as also his Brother Tiberius, with the title of Imperator, but it was not given them by Augustus. However the Games which Drusus exhibited as Prætor, were discharged with great Expence, and the Birth-day of Augustus was celebrated in the Cirque, and other places of the City with Huntings; for which, though there was no Decree, yet was it yearly done by the Prætor. But those Solemnities called Augustalia were then first celebrated by virtue of a Senatusconsultum, and continued till the time of Dio.

63. But as if there had been an Emulation betwixt the two Brothers, who should do best, Tiberius now brought under, and forced to submit the Dalmatians and Pannonians, who encouraged at his Absence, had again Rebelled, invading them both together, and removing the War as occasion offered. For this the same Honours were decreed to him as to Drusus, and thenceforth Dalmatia, as requiring careful Watch, and the Defence of Arms, both in respect of it self, and the Neighbouring Pannonia, was committed to the charge of Augustus. Much about the same time Vologesus a Thracian, of the Nation of the Bessi, the Priest of Bacchus, who was worshipped by them, by a vain show of Religion, associated many to himself, by their help raised a Rebellion, and killed Rhaciporis, the Son of Cotys. Still using a Pretext of his Religion, without Battle, he deprived Rhymetaces of his Army, pursued him, brake into the Cherronesus, and there did much mischief; about the time that the Sialetæ also invaded Macedonia. L. Piso, who now governed Pamphilia, was commanded to make head against them, who first received loss from the Bessi, but engaging with them again, obtained to considerable a Victory, that wasting the Country far and wide, most of all these Nations submitted, and others that stood out by force of Arms, he constrained to undergo the yoke. For these things performed, a Supplication was decreed, and that that he should have Triumphal Honours. While Matters thus succeed in the East, Augustus employed himself in making an Inventory of his whole Estate, as if he had been a private man. Again, he surveyed the Senate, and perceiving that the Members thereof were slow to meet, he ordained that for the future a Senatusconsultum might be made, by fewer than Four hundred; which Number formerly was required to be present.

Dion Cassius
of Augustus.

64. Now again both Senate and People contributed Money for making of Statues; but none he would permit to be erected, but only to Publick Safety, Concord, and Peace. Yet still would they go about it upon all occasions, and at length on the First of January, they repaired to Augustus himself, and every one gave him more or less, which he restored to them with advantage; not only one Patricians, but others also. Here Dion Cassius tells an odd Story; How he had heard that being moved by some Oracle or Dream, every year on a certain Day, he received some Silver by way of Begging from such as he met with; he adds, That whether we will believe it or no, so it was reported. This same year, to be sure, he Married Julia his Daughter to Tiberius, and his Sister Octavia being dead, he caused her Body to be laid publicly in State, in the Sacratory of Julius, where he made a Funeral Oration, a Curtain being drawn, as formerly. Drusus publicly changed his Senatorian Robe for a Mourning Gown, and then her Sons in Law carried her away; yet would not Augustus admit all things that were decreed in her Honour. Now first after Merula, the Flamen Dialis, or Priest of Jupiter was ordained. And for as much as the Tribuni Plebis, and Ædiles, who were to look to the keeping of the Senatusconsultum, were wont to trust their Apparitors, and thence much Error and Confusion happened, they were delivered into the Custody of the Questors. It was also decreed, that the Temple of Janus should now be shut; but this was hindered by the Daci, who when Ister was frozen, passed over the Ice, and made Depredations in Pannonia; besides this, the Dalmatians not enduring the Exaction of Tribute, cast off the yoke. These Motions were quelled by Tiberius, who was gone with Augustus into Gall. And the Germani, and amongst those the Chatti, who not content with the Territories assigned them by the Romans, had joynt themselves with the Scamabri, Drusus either infected or reduced to Obedience. Both the Brothers now returned with Augustus, who had spent most of his time in Gallia Lugdunensis, to Rome; these things being performed in the Consulship of Julius, and Fabius Maximus.

Drusus Dies.

65. In the following year, wherein Drusus and T. Quintus Crispinus were Consuls, Drusus having invaded the Territories of the Chatti, wasted them as he passed; and having defeated them in Battel, proceeded into the Country of the Suevi, and thence turning to the Cherisci, crossed Visurgis, and wasted all as far as the River Albis, which falling from the Pandalick Mountains, flows in a great Stream into the Northern Ocean. Having in vain attempted to pass this River, he erected Trophies, and retreated; For, a Woman (our Historian tells us) of greater Dimensions than Humane, met him in the way, and calling him by Name, demanded of him, Whether his boundless Ambition would carry him; She told him, the Fates did not permit that he should see all Quarters; and bade him be gone for the Period both of his Life and Actions approached. The death of Drusus he will have usher'd in by this and other Prodigies, which according to his Custom, he particularly relates; for he died in his Return, before he reached the Rhine. Liuy, who extended his History just so far, wrote that he died of a fall from his Horse. It seems he lay Sick so long, that Augustus, who was at no great distance from him, as Dio writes, sent with all speed for his Brother Tiberius, who at his coming found him alive, though drawing on: He conveyed his Body to Rome, Centurions and Tribunes carrying it at the beginning, and afterwards the chiefest of the Cities. It being placed in the Forum, there he was commended by Tiberius in a Funeral Oration, and again by Augustus in the Flaminian Cirque; because it was not lawful for such as had led forth Armies to enter the Pomerium of the City, before they had used such Ceremonies as were required by virtue of the ancient Custom. He was by the most considerable Equestes, and others of Senatorian Rank, carried into the Campus Martius, where being burnt, the Ashes were laid up in the Sepulchre of Augustus. The Surname of Germanicus was given to him and his Sons, besides the Honours of Statues and Triumphal Arches, and of a Monument upon the River Rhine.

66. Tiberius also for having in the life-time of Drusus suppressed the Dalmatians and Pannonians, who had made some small offers to stir, entered the City on Horse-back,

Horse-back, in a sort of Triumph, and gave a Collation to the People, in the Capitol and other places, and Livia and Julia entertained the Women. The same Solemnities were prepared for Drusus, and Holidays were again to be kept for his Triumph, when all these Expectations were blasted by his Death. Livia his Mother, to comfort her, was also honoured with Statues, and reckoned amongst such as had thrice brought forth. For though Fortune was not so favourable as to give three Children to all Married Men or Women, yet the Law first made by the Senate, and afterward confirmed by the Emperor, gave the Privilege obtained by three Children to some of them, so that they should not be liable to the Multitude imposed upon Barren People, and a few things excepted, they might obtain all the Advantages due to them that had a numerous Issue. Augustus applying himself to Publick Affairs, ordained that on certain Days the Senate should be assembled, whereas formerly nothing had been herein defined, and therefore many took the Advantage to be absent. To prevent this, he appointed certain Days in every Month, on which it should be necessary for all obliged by the Laws to be present. That no just excuse might be pretended, he took order that no Judicial Proceedings, nor any other thing should hinder them. Now also he determined what number should be present at passing Decrees, according to the Nature of the Senatusconsultum; and again he increased the Multitude, imposed upon such as absented without a Cause. But, as usually it happens, the multitude of Offenders seemed to plead for Remission of the Multitude, and therefore he commanded, that when many offended, every fifth man, as it fell by lot, should be certainly punished. To be sure he Published in a List the Names of all the Senators; which Custom continued till the time of Dion Cassius.

Augustus appoints certain Days for the Senate to meet on.

66. Such Care was taken by Augustus, to constrain Senators to Assemble and give their Suffrages. If it happened that so many did not meet together, as was needful, (for when the Emperor came thither, the List was always called over, and most commonly on other days) they that were present consulted of Matters before them, and what they resolved, was written down; but it did not obtain the force of a Senatusconsultum, but was called the Authority of the Senate, showing only what the Opinion was of those that met. The same course was observed when they suddenly Assembled, either in a Place, or at a Time not usual nor lawful, or called by some Edict that had no Authority to back it, or if the Tribunes of the People contradicted; for though in such Cases no Senatusconsultum could be made, yet the Senate would not have its opinion to be concealed, which afterwards being in due form ratified, obtained the name and force of a Senatusconsultum. This Custom was observed in those days, though in the time of Dio, he saith, it was in a manner abolished, as also what Augustus ordained concerning Prætors, to whom he gave liberty of Voting in the Senate; because they took it ill that in dignity preceding the Tribuni Plebis, they should have no Voice. As he now gave it them, so time afterward took it away. But Augustus before he enacted these things, caused them to be written down and exposed in the Senate, giving liberty to any two that came in to read them, to find what fault they could, and propound other Rules. Here it will not be amiss to add what Suetonius hath written concerning this Subject. He tells us, that before Augustus his time, the Number of Senators was rude and deformed, being above a thousand, some of them most unworthy, as being after the Death of Cæsar, taken in for favour or reward, and therefore by the vulgar they were called Orcini. Then Augustus by two Scrutinies, restored the Senate to its ancient lustre, in one of which, one man chose another amongst themselves, and the second was made at the choice of himself and Agrippa, at which time it was thought he wore a Breastplate under his Robe, and had ten of the most Valiant Senators, all his Friends, standing about his Chair. Cordus Crematius wrote that at that time no Senator was admitted, but alone, and his Robe being first searched. Some he compelled to excuse themselves, but to such he granted the Senatorian mark in their Habit, the right of sitting to behold Sports in the Orchestra, and of of Feasting publicly. That such as were chosen and approved, might more Religiously, and with less trouble execute their Offices, he ordained before any fate down in the Senate, he should first Supplicate at the Altar of that God, in whose Temple they met, with Wine and Frankincense; as also that a legitimate Senate should be held, but twice in one Month, viz. On the Calends and the Ides; that in the Months of September and October (Months of Vintage) it should not be necessary that any should be present; but such as were chosen by lot, being

being a sufficient number to do the work. Moreover he procured that the Acts of the Senate should not be Published.

67. As to what he writes concerning Feasting in Publick, granted to such Senators as excused themselves, we must know that upon three Accounts the Romans used Publick Feasts. One was at the Funeral of some Eminent Person, Vide Donatus <sup>to 1.</sup> Another when they Sacrificed, and then there were Persons called Eponones, sometimes three; and otherwhiles seven in number, who took care of those Epulae or Feasts. The third was after some Victory, as was often practised by Julius Caesar, and others; and at this sort of Feasts chiefly Senators were entertained. From what both Dio and Suetonius write concerning the Incense, we may observe that the Senate was not wont to Assemble but in some consecrated place, as in the Temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, of Jupiter Stator, erected over against that of Vesta at the foot of the Palatine Mount; that of Concord near the Capitol; of Tellus or the Earth; of Apollo; and Castor and Pollux. To foreign Ambassadors the Senate was wont to give Audience in the Temple of Bellona, without the Walls; as also to such Magistrates as returned from the Provinces, and were not yet to enter the City before something was performed. Sometimes indeed the Senate Assembled in the Campus Martius, and in other places, but these were also Inaugurate and Consecrated; at least ordinarily it could not Assemble but in such. For the time when the Senate met, of old it might meet on any days but the Dies Comitiales, because then the Comitia of the People being held, the Senators could not be absent from them; nor were not to be hindered from giving their Suffrages. Neither could the Senate meet on unlucky days, because then no Sacrifices could be offered, which were requisite as we see. Neither when it Thundered, or Winds and Tempests raged; nor when both Consuls were absent from the City, at least till the ninth day from their Absence. And some think, that because the Comitia were dissolved if any were taken with the Comitial Disease or Epilepsy, the same was observed in the meeting of the Senate. Seeing then that on all other days the Senate might lawfully meet, some there are that admire how Augustus, a man loving Business, should be for its Assembling but twice in a Month, at the beginning and middle. But their wonder ceaseth when they consider, that having taken upon himself the whole Government, he did it with design that the greatest Affairs might first be debated by himself and his Councillors, whom, as Suetonius in the same place affirms, he chose by lot every six Months for this very purpose. The truth is, he had transferred all the Power to himself, both of Senate and People, and he would have them do nothing but what he pleased, though he pretended that he took this course that things might be transacted with more mature Consideration and Advice. Indeed adventuring upon so high and dangerous an Enterprize, as the changing of the Government, he used all the Cunning he could to cover his Designs, and he was to pretend all Modesty and Self-denial imaginable. This made him shun all needless and invidious Ceremonies and shadows of Respect, so long as he was possessed of the Substance; and even to make a shew of waving the Substance it self, as a burthen too heavy for his no way ambitious Shoulders; at least of a resolution to be the publick Drudge, only for a certain and limited time. And yet he was content they should please themselves, sometimes in fancying, that they honoured him in giving him Titles, and Voting he should have such and such Powers, when he was already possessed of the Supreme. Let us hear what Dion Cassius further writes of these matters.

68. He desired to appear so popular, that one of his fellow Soldiers praying he would undertake his Cause; and he saying that because he was hindered by business, he would send him an Advocate; when the man replied in Anger; That he did not serve him in this fashion when he wanted his help, not sending one in his room to do it, but in his own Person undergoing all dangers for him, he went into the Forum and pleaded his cause. In like manner he assisted another Friend he had, at the Bar, having communicated the matter first to the Senate, and he saved him; and not only not prosecuted the man's Accuser, though he had used great liberty in his discourse, but being called to account for his ill manners, absolved him. He appointed Questors on the Sea Coast near Rome, and in other places of Italy, there to preside; which course he observed many years: but he himself would not enter into the City because of the death of Drusus. The Year that followed, wherein C. Asinius Gallus, and C. Marcus Censorinus were Consuls, he came to Rome, where he found both them and other Magistrates accused for having having procured their Places by Money. Yet did he dissemble the matter, and made no Inquisition, having resolved to punish none by hearsay, nor to pardon any that was manifestly convicted. But of such as would stand for any Office, he took money by way of pledge; and if they were found to use any Bribery, they made sport of it. This was commended as laudable, but so was not another thing by all sorts of Persons. The Laws forbad that a Slave should be tortured to confess any thing against his Lord. He therefore commanded that such Slaves should be sold to himself or the Publick when occasion required, that the propriety being altered, they might be Examined against those who were not now their Masters. Some Complained that the Law was eluded by this changing of Lords; and others said it was necessary to be done, for that many in confidence that their Slaves could not be questioned, were encouraged to conspire against him and the present Power. Not long after he pretended he would lay down, and the second Ten Years being over, was brought, unwilling, to receive the Government for other Ten.

War in Germany.

69. He undertook a War against the Germans, but slaying himself at home employ'd Tiberius, who passing the Rhine, all the Clanns sent their Ambassadors and begged Peace, except the Cantabri. Augustus refused to accept of their submission, except the Cantabri were concerned in it; and neither when they joyined would he grant them Peace, but disposed through several Cities the Ambassadors of the Cantabri, who being many and most considerable amongst them, would not endure the Uneasiness of it, but killed themselves. So the Peace continued unmade, and the Barbarians were quiet, though to purpose afterward they avenged themselves. Augustus gave money to the Soldiers, not upon the account of Victory, though he himself received and gave the Title of Imperator to Tiberius; but because in this Action Caius was first trained up to Military Exercises, Promoting now Tiberius to the Imperial Power in the room of Drusus, and gracing him with the Name, he made him Consul the second time, and commanded him according to the ancient Custom to expose his Letters to view, and honoured him with a Triumph: For he himself would not Triumph, but rather chose that on his Birthday perpetual Games should be solemnized with Horses. He enlarged the Bounds of the Pomerium, and named the Month Sextilis, after himself Augustus. Others would have given this Name to September, because in it he was born; but he preferred Sextilis, because in it he was first made Consul, and obtained many notable Victories: So writes Dio. And the same reason of his preferring Sextilis before September, is given by Suetonius, who mentions this passage as relating to his new modelling or reforming of the year. And this he did, he tells us, as Pontifex Maximus, which Place he resolved never to take from Lepidus while living. When he was dead he took it, and for a first Essay, he caused all the Fortune-telling Books, both Greek and Latin, which either had no Authors known, or those of no reputation, to be fought out and burnt, above Two thousand in number. The Sibylline Books he only retained, and those choicely selected, which he laid up in guided Repositories under the Basis of Palatine Apollo. Then he adds, That the Year being regulated by Drusus Julius, but afterward through negligence disordered and confused, he restored it to its former Course; and in this reformation chose to give the Name of August to the Month Sextilis. After this he tells us what further he did about the Superstition of the Romans, as his honouring the Vestal Virgins, and restoring several Ceremonies in order to it, amongst which were the Secular Games. But as to the reformation of the Year, Pliny and others relate, how in the space of Thirty six years, twelve days were intercalated; whereas there ought to have been but nine. He therefore Commanded that Twelve years should pass without any Leap-year at all, that so these three days might be swallowed up, which increased by the over-hastiness of the Priests. For the naming of Sextilis after him Augustus, a Decree of the Senate passed; and also one of the People, Pacuvius one of the Tribuni Plebis propounding the Law; in which, concerning which Macrobius in his Saturalia, is to be consulted.

The Month Sextilis, called August.

The Death of Mecenas.

70. Augustus was well enough pleased with these things, but grievously afflicted with the death of Mecenas, who was serviceable to him in several respects. He held him so faithful that he committed the Government of the City to him, though but of Equestrian Rank for a long time; and he found him useful to him when he was transported with immoderate Anger, to allay his Passion, and reduce him to a more quiet mind. Of this Dion Cassius gives us one instance. It happened, that when Augustus sat in Judgment upon accused Persons, Mecenas himself was present in Court, and perceiving that He would condemn many of them, being not able to come at him for the Croud, he wrote these words, Rise up at last Executioner; and as if it had contained some other matter, cast the Paper into his Lap; which having read, he presently arose without fentering any of them. And he was not at all displeased, but rejoiced that his Friends would take the liberty to reprove him, when his own Nature or that of the Matter before him inclined him to Anger. This is taken as a great Evidence of his Virtue, that though he opposed the extravagant desires of Augustus, yet he was held by him amongst his familiar Friends, and withal approved himself well to all other Persons; and having such Interest in the Emperor, that he obtained for many of his Friends, Honours and Places of Magistracy; yet was he not so ambitious as to accept any Dignity himself, being contented with the Equestrian Degree. But what Dio attributes to his Humility, Others do it to his desire of Ease and love of Pleasure, though indeed more that of a Virtuoso than Senfualist. And herein he was much encouraged and humored by the Poets, of which he was a great Patron as of all Learned Men. Whoever reads the Poems of Horace, wherein he so much commends a retired life, and refuseth troublesome greatness, cannot but fancy them sitting together, hugging themselves, and laughing at the follies of such as bustle and make a stir a little while, and prefer not the real enjoyment of a short life, before being hurried out of the World in a Crowd of Cares and Business. It's agreed, that he loved to live within his Fortune. Cilnius was the ancient Name of his Family, and Arretium in the Tyrrhenian Coasts the place of it. Pliny tells strange passages of him, as that he never was without an Ague; and for three years before his death never slept a quarter of an hour together. But Dio adds, That for the reasons related, Augustus was grievously afflicted for his death, and this made him love his Memory the more, that though Mecenas was angry with him about his Wife, yet he left him his Heir, and excepting Only a few things, left it in his power to be kind to his Friends. Mecenas first made use of a swimming place furnished with warm Water, and invented certain Notes or Characters for speedy writing, which he communicated to many by the means of Aquila his Freedman. This Year also wherein Augustus mended the Calendar, Horace the Poet died in the Fifty seventh year of his Age; His familiarity with Cæsar and Mecenas is sufficiently known. His Life is written by Suetonius.

Horace dies.

71. Tiberius on the Calends of January of the DCCXLVII. Year of the City, wherein he himself and Cn. Piso were Consuls, called together the Senate into the Court or Forum of Ollavius. He undertook the Repairing of the Temple of Concord, thereon he set his own Name and that of Drusus. After this he Triumphed, and this being over, he dedicated the Temple of Livia together with his Mother. Then did he Feast the Senate in the Capitol, and Livia the Ladies apart by themselves. A little after he went into Germany where some Stirrs were made, but nothing memorable was performed in that Country all this Year. A great Fire happened about the Forum, which consuming many Buildings, was said to have been procured by those that were deeply in Debt: Who conceived themselves much injured, as if this would ease them of their Burthens; though they were deceived, getting nothing thereby. But it produced this Effect, That from amongst the Plebeians were constituted certain Officers called Curatores Vicorum, who were permitted on certain days within the Extent of their authority, to wear the Robe of a Magistrate, and to have two Lictors go before them; and to them were assigned the Slaves which formerly had attended the Ediles for quenching of Fires. And now was the City divided into Fourteen Regions, the Government of which was assigned to these Curatores Vicorum, the Tribuni Plebis, and the Prætors by Lot.

Rome divided into Fourteen Regions.

72. The following Year had C. Antistius Vetus, and D. Lælius Ballus for Consuls. Caius and Lucius being Educated in an high condition, in no wise imitated the modesty of Augustus his Father by Adoption. They not only lived more delicately, but grew insolent upon their Fortune; insomuch that Lucius on a time going to the Theatre, and there being received with Applause which some gave him with a willing mind, and others out of Flattery, was puffed up to that degree of Pride, as to ask that the Consulship might be given to his Brother Caius though yet a Boy. Augustus hearing of it was angry, and wished that never any such Necessity might lye upon him, as he had found formerly, that the Consulship should be given to one under Twenty years of Age; but for all this his Son's pressing him to it, he answered, That the Office was to be discharged by a man, that could take care that he himself offended not, and could resist the Extravagant desires of the People: At length he gave the Priesthood to Caius, and leave to go into the Senate, and be present with Senators at Shows and Feasts. However, Tacitus writes, that he earnestly desired that both of them not being yet Seventeen years old, should be called Princes of the Youth, and Design'd Consuls. Yet Dion adds, that to make them something more modest, he granted to Tiberius the Tribunitial Power for five years; and committed to his care Armenia, which had revolted. This he did to no purpose, for he offended both them and Tiberius; them, because they thought themselves undervalued; and him, because he feared their Indignation; and therefore he betook himself to Rhodes, under colour of Study, and he took not all his Attendants with him, but did withdraw himself from their view and their Actions. Some say left his Glory should dim the Lustre of the two rising young Men. Others thought that Augustus his Children being grown to man's estate, he quitted now, as it were, the Place and Possession of the second Degree, so long held by him after the Example of Agrippa, who when Marcellus was admitted to publick Offices, went to Mitylene; that being present, he might not seem either to withstand or detract from them, and thus Account he gave of his withdrawing; yet a long time after. Some yet there were who thought he did this because of his Wife Julia, whom he could endure no longer; it's certain that he left her at Rome. Others imagined he took it ill that he was not adopted Cæsar; and some fancied he was sent thither by Augustus; because he used some Treachery toward his Sons.

Tiberius withdraws to Rhodes.

73. However we are further told, That dissembling the Cause of his Resolution, he asked leave of Augustus his Father-in-law, (both in respect of his Wife and himself) to depart. Neither would he yield to his Mother, that humbly besought him, nor to his Father-in-law, complaining that he also was forsaken by the Senate, and when they resolutely detained him, he eat nothing in four days. At length having got leave, he went down presently to Ostia, not speaking a word to them that went with him, and kissing very few at his departing; yet he opened his Will, and read it before his Mother and Augustus. As he failed along the Coast of Campania, hearing that Augustus was Sick, he stayed a little, but hereupon a Report being raised that he tarried upon occasion of greater hope, he failed to Rhodes almost, in foul weather. He went and asked like a private man in all respects, except in this, that he compelled the Pharisees to sell him a Statue of Vesuvius, which he Dedicated in the Temple of Concord. He contented himself with no great House, and as little a Country place, being much taken with the pleasantness and healthfulness of the Island, since he landed there, in his return from Armenia. He walked sometimes into the Places of Exercise, without either a Lictor or Viator, conversing with the Greeks almost on equal terms. Nevertheless Paterculus, his Flatterer, writes, That all Proconsuls and Legats going into the Provinces, coming thither to visit him, always submitted their Faciès, although in this privacy, and protested that this Retirement of his was more Honourable than his living in the Principality. And yet as Suetonius tells the Story, Sometimes, even in Rhodes, he exercised the Power of the Principality itself; for, being a diligent Hearer of Theodorus the Gadarean (a Rhetorician, who desired to be called the Rhodian) and of other Professors, it happened that the Readers differed, and the Difference in Opinion procured a hot contest and quarrel in the School. Hereupon he interposed, and being thought to be Partial, was reviled by one of the contrary Faction, who used such Language, that Tiberius provoked therewith, went home like a private man, but speedily came abroad again like a Publick Magistrate with his Apparitors, and calling before him by voice of a Crier the Person that reviled him, commanded from the Tribunal that he should be carried to Prison.

Where he lives privately.

74. Augustus reduced the undetermined Number of them that were to receive Corn from the Publick to Two hundred thousand, and some reported that he gave to every one Sixty Drachmes. When he exhibited the Speltacula, he brought the Flaminian Water into the Cirque, and in it Six and thirty Crocodiles were killed. Now first of all he instituted two Præfects of the Prætorian Guards. When he entered his twelfth Consulship with Lucius Sylla, he brought Caius, being now come to man's estate, into the Court, and designed him Princeps Juventutis, or Prince of the Youth, and made him Præfect of a Tribe. That this title of Prince was given him by the Equites, who gave him also Silver Spears, he himself shewed in the Breviary of his Acts, wherein he mentioned also that the Senate and People designed both Caius and Lucius Consuls, to do him Honour, though they were but fifteen years old, that they might enter upon that Office, after five years to be reckoned from the day that they were to be brought into the Court. In his Thirteenth Consulship he brought his Son Lucius into the Court, and conferred the same Honours upon him, that he had done three years before upon his Brother Caius, which the Coins do testify, in which are the Effigies of Caius and Lucius with Bucklers and Spears, and this Inscription, Caius and Lucius Cæsars, the Sons of Augustus, designed Consuls, Princes of the Youth. Thus he honoured the Sons, but found Cause to treat the Mother quite after another fashion. He found their Mother, and his Daughter, Julia arrived at that Excess of wantonness and Prodigality, that even in the Forum, and at the Rostra she held her Meetings and Junketings by Night, abusing these Courts with Lascivious Acts, in which her Father had made the Law against Adulteries. He had believed formerly that she lived no strict sort of life, but did not think she had been so wanton and Notorious, having the same misfortune with other Princes to be least acquainted with his own most intimate Concernments. Now was he seized with so extraordinary a Passion upon full Discovery of her wickedness, that he could not contain his grief within his own doors, but Communicated his misfortune and the disgrace of his Family with the Senate; not being there present himself, but by a Writing which was read by the Quæstor. For he kept himself from Company a long time for very shame, and thought of putting his Daughter to Death. At last he banished her to Pandataria, an Island of Campania, whither her Mother Scorpionia did voluntarily accompany her, who had been divorced from Cæsar, that day she was Delivered of her, in the Consulship of L. Martius, and C. Sabinus. So that Julia was Eight and thirty years old at this time, as some observe. Her Husband now at Rhodes was not loath to hear these things, and that a Divorce was sent her in his Name by Augustus his Command; yet, as he thought it his duty, he begged of him by frequent Letters to Pardon her, and though she deserved very ill, yet that he would grant her whatsoever he had given her.

Banished her Mother.

Armenia Re-
vuls.

75. Augustus in this great misfortune was diverted by being necessitated to cast his thoughts upon Armenia. Pompey had only laid this Servitude upon them of that Country, to receive their Governors from Rome, and Augustus had set over them Artabazdes (or Artabazes) with this title. Him they now expelled, set up Tigranes in his room, and called in the Parthians to assist in maintaining what they had done, who leaving the Alliance of the Romans, laid hold on Armenia. Augustus hearing of the Revolt, and of the Conjunction, was much concerned, and doubted what course to take. He could not manage the War himself by reason of his old Age. Tiberius had withdrawn himself, neither durst he trust any of the more powerful Citizens of Rome. Caius and Lucius were young and unfit for such an undertaking; but necessity urging, he made choice of Caius. He had indeed before this brought them, though young, into some charge in the Commonwealth, and being designed Consuls, sent them about the Provinces, and Armies. He made Caius Proconsul, and Married him, thereby to procure him more Esteem and Friends to give him Council. His Wives Name was Lollia Paulina, the Daughter, or Niece of Marcus Lollius, whom he appointed the Governor of his Youth. It is said that Caius behaved himself variously in this Expedition, so as to afford matter both for commendation and dispraise; but through the Greatness and Majesty of the Roman Name, he quieted all things. At first Phraates King of Parthia was no whit terrified, although Augustus in his Letters had not called him King, but only by his Name; but proudly Writing back again, called himself King, and Augustus nothing but Cæsar. But when he knew that Caius was come into Syria, and suspected that his Subjects out of the hatred they bore him, would not be quiet at home, he obtained a Peace from him, but upon this condition, that he should leave off pretensions to Armenia. And now Artabazes being dead of a Disease, Tigranes sent Presents to Augustus, and not Writing himself King, begged the Kingdom. Augustus moved herewith, and fearing the Parthian War, accepted of his Presents, and Commanded him with some hope to go into Syria to Caius; and the Armenians thought it more profitable to be reconciled to the friendship of the Romans, and to live in their own Country, than to join with the Parthians, lose their Country, and have the Enmity of the Romans.

The birth of
sus Christ.

76. Augustus having again quieted all Nations, and shut the Temple of Janus the third time; having ordained a general Taxation throughout the Empire, that he might know the State and worth thereof, having also refused the name of Dominus or Lord with great earnestness, which he forbade about this time even his Children and Nephews by an Edict to use towards him, the Lord and Heir of all things came into the World, in the fulness of time, revealed by the Angel Gabriel to the Prophet Daniel, for the fulfilling of the Promises made concerning the Seed of the Woman, which should break the Serpents head. Great difference there is in assigning the Year of the World, wherein our Saviour was born, by reason of the difficulty of computation arising from the several Versions of the Scriptures, the intricate and uncertain Successions of the Judges, the variety of the forms of years, and the several reckonings as to parcels of such as are related in Scripture. A great help for the regulation of these things, is afforded from Prophane History. But it beginneth but with Cyrus, whose History, as to the restoration of the Jews, pretereth us with the first certain note of conjunction (he being so named both by holy and prophane Writers, but not Nebuchadnezzar) and yet the duration of his Reign is also uncertain. Yet as from all these Opinions weighed together, a good account may be given in another place, more proper for the length of it, as to the Year of the World, so the Evangelist teaching us, that in the Fifteenth year of Tiberius, Christ was about thirty three years old, it must needs follow, that Augustus reigned Fifteen years after his Birth; so that if we count (as some do) the Reign of Augustus from the death of Julius Cæsar, it lasted fifty seven years, and then must Christ be born in the forty second of it. But if we follow them (as the order of this Work doth) who with more reason fetch the beginning of his Empire from the death of Antony, and the Conquest of Egypt, then Christ's Birth fell into the twenty eighth year thereof, and according to the computation which we most approve, into the 4003 year of the World, the 752 of the City, and the third year of the 194 Olympiad, wherein Cæsar Augustus himself the thirteenth year, and M. Plautius Silanus were Consuls. Although Cyrenius (who was Consul ten years before, and is called elsewhere P. Sulpicius Quirinus) might not formally be President of Syria (which Office, as others say, was now obtained by Quintilius Varus, the Successor of Saturninus, who as yet was not departed out of the Province) yet being set over this Taxation by Augustus in that place, this Title might well be given him, though he then governed Cilicia, as Herod is by Iosephus said to be constituted Procurator of all Syria, though it had its Officers, who were to act by his assistance and direction. Herod had now reigned 37 years and odd months, and being deluded by the Wife Men, (whom he willingly suffered to search out Christ, that he might destroy him) killed all the Children in and about Bethlehem of two years and under; which Cruelty was but agreeable with his disposition and constant practice. Here, that we may describe his Affairs, we must make a little digression, and take them where we formerly left them.

A Digression
of Herod.

He maketh a very Aristobolus.

77. After he had obtained the possession of his Kingdom, he put to death forty five of Antigonus his Friends, having procured him to be beheaded, as we formerly shewed. Then did he prefer to the High-Priesthood one Ananel an obscure man, neglecting Aristobolus the Son of Aristobolus the King, and Brother to his own Wife Mariamne; and Antony desiring to see this Youth, for the fame of his Beauty, he fearing the Roman might advance him, to slay him at home, gave him the Priesthood, and excused his neglect to fend him, by the inclination of the Jews to rebellion. Perceiving him then to be in extraordinary favour with the Jews, and that his Mother Alexandra (which he kept very close because of her restless spirit) plotted the escape of her self and Son into Egypt, a year after, as he was swimming, he caused him to be drowned, and though Cleopatra accused him hereof to Antony, yet by Presents he made his Peace. In the Civil Wars he sided with Antony, who having Forces sufficient, desired him to chastise the Arabians, that denied the Tribute imposed on them. This he did, and though at first his attempts miscarried, yet in another Battle he quite overthrew and brought them under. After the overthrow of Antony, he had little hope that his own matters would go well. He murdered Elycanus, who only survived of all the Males of the Royal Family, and whom he had recalled from Babylon, whither he was carried by the Parthians. He took the advantage of the Old man's intent to flye into Arabia, through the importunity of his Daughter Alexandra, who promised him great things, if Herod should miscarry under the power of Augustus. Then providing as well as he could for the worst, in case it should happen, he went went to Rhodes to visit Cæsar, from whom he concealed not the love he bore to Antony, but with notable courage declaring it, withal signified that he was ready to serve him as faithfully; which he wrought upon the Magnificent Prince, that he liked him extremely, and confirmed him in his Estate. After Cæsar's return out of Egypt into Syria, he entertained him, and as he thereby procured the reputation of a noble and heroic spirit, so also an addition to his Kingdom. Yet was he unfortunate at home, having commanded several times, That if any thing happened in his absence, they should make away his beloved Wife Mariamne. She hearing of it, used him frowardly, whereat being enraged, he was throughly persuaded to put her to death, by his Sister Salome; which envious Woman feigned false accusations against her. But after the deed was done, having extraordinarily loved her, he fell even mad, and thereby into a great sickness, for that casting off all Government, he departed to Samaria, then called Sebaste, in honour of Augustus.

Killeth his Wife Mariamne.

Growth cruel.

Repaireth the Temple at Jerusalem.

78. Alexandra in the mean time endeavoured to get the strong places of Jerusalem into her hands; wherewith he being acquainted, ordered her to be put to death, and then returning to the City, grew exceeding cruel and distastful. The prejudice was increased by his making Games in honour of Cæsar, and hanging his Theatre with Trophies, which the People sorely distasted, as being by their Religion principled against Pictures. Ten men conspired against him, but were discovered and put to death. Not long after he redeemed his credit by liberality in a great dearth, and married the Daughter of Simon, whom he preferred to the Priesthood, having displaced Jesus the Son of Phabes. Then did he employ his time and Treasure in Sumptuous and Royal Buildings, as that of Cæsarea amongst the rest, formerly called the Tower of Straton; and he built a Temple to the honour of Augustus, who had again enlarged his Dominions, and bestowed a Tetrarchy at his desire upon his Brother Pheroras. To the People, which was ready to mutiny, because of his Idolatry, he released the third part of their Tributes, to please them, forbad all their Meetings, punished severely such as were obstinate, and bound the rest to him by an Oath. After this, taking down the Old Temple of Jerusalem, he built another much more stately and magnificent (being a work of most admirable Beauty) in the space of Nine years and six months; during which time, it's said, that it only rained on Nights, lest the Work should be hindered. In the dedication he sacrificed 300 Oxen, and the rest of the People according to their abilities. He made a Law, That Thieves which broke Walls should be sold for Slaves, out of the Kingdom. This the People ill resented, as against their Religion, which not only provided otherwise concerning Thieves, but would be broken also by these men, who must necessarily serve Idolaters. Now he himself fetched from Rome Alexander and Arifobulus his Sons by Mariamne, whom having sent thither to be bred, Augustus had kindly entertained. These Youths were reared by Salome and Pheroras, as intending to revenge their Mother's death, and therefore they resolved they must not live, especially he that was encouraged by the success he had had against their Mother. And they presented her with an opportunity of accusing them, seeming indeed not to be well affected toward their Father, desiring the Kingdom, and exclaiming greatly against the authors of their Mother's Ruine. Herod troubled hereat, called to Court Antipater his Son, begotten when he was a private man, that opposing him against them, he might make them more careful of their behaviour. But thereby were they more incensed, and Antipater making use of his time, got more and more into his Father's affections, who commended him in especial manner to Cæsar, (though he had not a thought at first of making him his Heir) and sent him to Rome to procure the Emperor's favour.

Accuseth his two sons begotten of Mariamne unto Cæsar.

79. Antipater improving his Father's displeasure against his Brothers, wrought for them this, that he carried them to Augustus then at Aquileia, and grievously accused them of an intention to poison him. Yet the young men by their tears, and Alexander's refutation of the calumny, so moved Cæsar, that he reconciled them; and for that Herod had given him three hundred Talents, & been very liberal, as his custom was to be in all places, unto the people of Liberty, he bestowed on him half of the profits of the Mines in Cyprus, and gave him leave to leave which of his Sons he pleased his Successor; or if he would, to distribute his Kingdom amongst them all, which Herod presently would have done, but Cæsar would not permit it. In his absence the Inhabitants of Trachonitis, a considerable part of his Dominion rebelled, and were reduced by his Captains. After his return he made a Speech to the People, and named to succeed him first Antipater, and then his Sons by Mariamne; which naming a Successor before-hand, when the Inheritance is uncertain, hath ever wrought great inconvenience to both parties. After he had opened David's Sepulchre to search for Treasure, (as John Hyrcanus had done before him) where he found none except very costly attire, and Ornaments of Gold, 'tis observed, that his Family fell into a very sad condition, nothing being heard but complaints and accusations one against another. The greatest part of Antipater's malice fell upon Alexander, and the Court hereby was filled with tortures and slaughters. Herod suspecting all, and trusting none, put many to death, and those of his most intimate Friends, and committed Alexander to Prison, being captivated by so great a fear of an untimely death, that he was almost ready to run mad. These things were diverted by the rebellion of the Inhabitants of Trachonitis (which Countrey Cæsar, having taken it from Zendorus, gave unto him) who again revolting, were protected by Syllaeus an Arabian, that began to marry his Sister Salome was rejected, because he would not turn Jew. Saturinus and Volumnius, Presidents of Syria, resolved he might by force of Arms chastize these Rebels; whereupon he entered Arabia, and having formerly destroyed their Families, which they left in their Corn Countrey, took a Castle they held there. Syllaeus now being at Rome accused Herod unto Cæsar as having wasted all Arabia; and he so far believed it, that he twice denied his Ambassadors audience. The Rebels and Arabians hereupon did him much injury, which he was glad to put up for the present, but sent Nicholaus Damascenus to plead his cause.

80. He first joined with the Ambassadors of Aretas King of Arabia, in accusing Syllaeus, thence came to lay open his Forgeries against Herod, to whom Augustus was throughly reconciled, and had given him Arabia too, but that he received from him other Letters, containing another complaint against his Sons. For whilst he was thus out with Cæsar, the former stirs were renewed in his house by means of Eurycles a Lacedemonian, who winding himself into Alexander's acquaintance, betrayed him first to Antipater, and then to Herod himself. He denied all accusations, except that he intended with his Wife to fly to Archelaus King of Cappadocia, her Father; but Cæsar being consulted, as we said, willed Herod to call a Council at Berytus with the Roman Presidents, Archelaus of Cappadocia, and the rest of his Friends and Nobility thereabout, and do as he should be advised. He called all but Archelaus, and in an Assembly of 150 men declared most furiously against his Sons, not producing any proof at all, further than that they intended to fly, and not suffering them to be present to answer for themselves; He only required the suffrages of the Assembly to countenance his private resolution, which the major part giving (though Saturinus and his Sons gave an indifferent Sentence) he, acted by fury, and unnatural madness, caused them to be strangled at Sebaste. Antipater, after the death of his Brothers, quickly plotted the destruction of his Father, and for that he was hated by all men, procured some esteem by his Gifts, and drew Pheroras into the Conspiracy, to the issue of whom the Pharises promised the Kingdom. For refusing to take the Oath of Allegiance, they were fined by Herod, to whose Kingdom they prophesied destruction, and happiness to the Family of Pheroras, because his Wife payed their Fine. Herod getting out these things by the means of Salome, put the principal of the Pharises to death, with others, and urged his Brother Pheroras to put away his Wife; which he refusing to do, he banished him his Kingdom. Pheroras then departing into his Tetrarchy, died shortly after, being visited by Herod, who buried him honourably at Jerusalem. Antipater standing in fear of his Father, wrought by his Creatures at Rome to be sent for by Cæsar. But this availed nothing; for in his absence all came out, which confirmed Salome's words (to which the King in this matter had given but little credit, knowing her to be too free in accusations) and brought vengeance upon him, notwithstanding all his craft, for the Murder of his Brethren.

A grievous Conspiracy against him.

81. Pheroras his Wife being accused of poisoning her Husband, her Maids were tortured, and in their pain gave some suspicion of the conspiracy, which was more cleared by one Antipater that had the ordering of Antipater's affairs, who confessed that his Master had compounded a poison, and delivered it to Pheroras to be given to the King in his absence, and that it was kept by Pheroras his Wife. She confirmed the fame, declaring that the Poison was bought in Egypt by Antipater's procurement, that it was committed to her charge, and how; that when her Husband was Sick, and Herod came out of Kindness to visit him, being overcome with his love he forbade her to give it him. Amongst the Accessories was Herod's own Wife, the Daughter of the High-Priest; he was put away, her Father depofed, and Matthias the Son of Theophilus preferred to his place; Herod also her Son was put out of the King's Testament, wherein he had bequeathed the Kingdom to him after his death. In the mean time Bartholus the Freed-man of Antipater returning from Rome was tortured, and confessed that he had brought with him a Poison to deliver to Pheroras, where-with the King might be certainly and speedily difpatched in case the other should fail. Antipater returned ignorant of these passages, for that almost every one was his Enemy, and before his Father and Quintilius Varus, though he fought to cover his wickedness, all things were made plain against him, whereupon he was committed to close Prison. Shortly after Herod himself ficked, and became exceeding teafy and wrathful, as well for these things, as for that he thought the People was glad of his misfortunes, having at the instigation of the Doctors of their Law, cut down an Eagle of Gold of great value, that stood over the Portal of the Temple. But his Sicknefs more and more increased.

He fickednefs.

82. His Difcufe was strange and fearful. He burned with an inward heat, which pierced and tormented him in his Bowels. He was also vexed with a ravenous and insatiable appetite, and an Ulcer in his Entrails, with a strange and furious Colick. His feet were swollen with moisture, and a shining kind of flegm, his Stomach being no less afflicted. His body rotted, and was full of crawling Worms, which afforded an intolerable stench; besides, he was held with a filthy and troublesome Priapism, a strong Convulsion of his Nerves, and shortness of Breath, being generally judged thus to be punished for his infinite Impieties and Sins committed against the Majesty of God; and doubtless his intention to kill Christ, with the innocent blood of the Infants cried loud. He used all means for recovery, and went over Jordan to the hot Baths of Callirhoe. Thence returning to Jericho, a Melancholick humour seized on him, which rendered him unfociable, and displeased with all men. Perceiving now that he should die, and supposing that the Jews would much rejoice in his death, he shut up many of the chiefest of them in the Hippodrome, and gave in charge to his Sister Salome, and her Husband Alexas, that as soon as he was dead, they should cause them all to be killed, that a Lamestation might accompany his Funeral. Before his death he received Letters from Cæsar, who gave him leave to deal with his Son as he saw occasion. Antipater yet believing that he was dead, plotted how to escape and seize on the Kingdom, but his Jaylor with whom he dealt revealed it to Herod, who commanded one of his Guard instantly to kill him; and to such an end came he for the Murder of his Brethren, and the sad Tragedies he had raised in his Father's House. Herod having attempted to kill himself, died some five days after his Son, in the seventy second year of his Age, twenty seventh after his getting possession of the Kingdom, and twenty ninth after he had been declared King by the Romans; 'tis uncertain how long after the Birth of Christ, but as is supposed not above two years, in the first of the 195 Olympiads, the 754 of the City, Caius Cæsar and L. Æmilius Paulus being Consuls. Salome and Alexas, before his death was thoroughly known, to their great honour discharged those that were locked up in the Hippodrome.

He kills his Son Antipater, who had procured the Death of his Brothers, and plotted, as against his Father's life.

83. Herod not long before his end renewed his Testament, wherein he ordained his Son Antipas Tetrarch of Galilee and Peræa, having before this appointed him his Successor in the Kingdom, for that he was incensed against Archelaus and Philip, by the means of Antipater. Now he made Archelaus King, gave the Province Gaulonitis, Trachonitis, Batanea, and Peneade to Philip, left Salome very well, and gave great Legacies to Cæsar and Livia his Wife. Archelaus at first was much cried up by the People; but afterwards the multitude calling to mind the death of Matthias, and his Confederates whom Herod had slain for breaking down the Eagle, fell into Sedition (many flocking out of the Countrey to the Passover) and demanded justice against divers of his Officers; but this tumult was settled by the slaughter of Three thousand men about the Temple. Then went Archelaus to Rome, not daring to take upon him the title without the leave of Augustus, to whose disposal his Father had referred his Testament. Many followed, and spoke against him, being affected better towards Antipas, the Jews also sent their Ambassadors, with whom joined 8000 of their Countrey-men then living at Rome, in a Petition to Cæsar, that they might be joynted to Syria, and live under Roman Governors without any King. At length Cæsar came to this resolution, to give half that Dominion, which Herod enjoyed, unto Archelaus, viz. of Idumæa, Judæa, and Samarita, with Cæsarta, Schafet, Joppe, and Jerusalem: the other half be divided betwixt Antipas and Philip. The former had the Countrey lying on the further side of Jordan and Galilee, with 200 Talents of Annual Revenue. Philip obtained Batanea, Trachonitis, and Auranitis with 100 Talents. Archelaus had 500 Talents of yearly Rent out of his Countrey. Whilest these things were in hand at Rome, grievous Seditions tore the Jews in pieces at home; for they being now destitute of a King, several took upon them that title: Sabinus, who super-intended the affairs of Cæsar there, gave the occasion, by pilling the people, which now at the Feast of Pentecost gathering together from all quarters, sought to shake off that yoke. After great slaughters, at length all was quieted by the coming of Varus from Antioch, who led the first Legion in Garrison at Jerusalem.

84. The Succession being settled by Augustus; a young man, and a Jew, born at Sidon, counterfeited himself Alexander the Son of Herod by Mariamne, affirming, that both he and Aristobolus were delivered by a Friend, who had it in charge to see them Executed, others being killed in their rooms. He deluded thousands of Jews inhabiting Melus, as also them at Rome, by whom he was received as their King. But he could not deceive Cæsar, who made him confess the forgery, and because he had promised him pardon, if he would acknowledge the deceit, for that he had formerly laboured with his hands, he condemned him to the Gallies, and put the man to death who persuaded him to turn counterfeit. As for Archelaus, he tyrannized for ten years, and then being accused by the Jews, Augustus sent for him to Rome, where his Cause being heard, he banished him to Vienna in Gallie, and confiscated his Goods. After this Cyrenius being sent into Syria to succeed Varus, valued the Goods of each Inhabitants, and seized the Estate of Archelaus. This Cesse or Valuation of their Estates, gave occasion to a great Sedition, by the means of one Judas a Gaulonite, Sedoc a Pharisee, and his Confederate, alleging that this Description was no other than a manifest token of servitude, and extorting all to maintain their liberty, to no purpose. For Judæa now having no more Princes of its own, was governed by Deputies, of which Coponius being the first, was shortly after succeeded by M. Ambrius, and he by Ammius Rufus.

85. Now that we may return to Roman Affairs, it will be convenient to inquire after Tiberius, and see how the former humour of Retirement holds him. The time of his Tribuneship being over, he fairly confessed, That he went away merely to shun all suspicion of Envy betwixt him and the two Brothers. And he requested that seeing there was no danger of that, now that they were grown Men, and next to the Emperor in Authority, he would give him leave to see again his Friends, with whom he had a very great desire to be. This would not be granted, but instead of leave he was bid lay aside all care of those whom he had so resolutely left. Against his will therefore he staid at Rhodes, and by his Mother's Intreaties scarcely obtained to be there as Legatus to the Emperor to cover the Ignominy; in the mean time, living not only privately, but in danger and fear, lurking in the middle of the Island to shun the Compliments of them that sailed by. When Caius went to the Armenian War, he crossed over to Chius, to present his Service to him, and purge himself from all suspicions, and he was very humble both to him and his Attendants. So writes Dio, though Paterculus a great Flatterer of Tiberius talks of Caius his giving all honour to him as his Superior. Suetonius speaks of his going to meet him at Samos, and that there he found him much alienated from him, through the false Accusations of Marcus Lollius, being also come into suspicion by the means of some Centurions devoted to him, who going to the Camp, seemed to tempt the Soldiers to Innovations. Augustus dealt softly with him as to tell him plainly of it, upon which he continually implored him to send one to him of what Rank or Quality soever he pleased to be an Observer of his Words and Actions. Now left he off his usual riding, and other Martial Exercises, and laying aside the Habit of his Countrey, reduced himself to the Pallium and Crepide; and in this condition he continued almost two years, every day more condemned and hated, inasmuch that the Inhabitants of Nemausus defaced his Pictures and Statues, and in a familiar Banquet mention being made of him, one of the Company rose up and promised Caius, that if he would but speak the word, he would bring him the Head of that Banished Man. Not so much through fear now, as manifest danger, he was moved both by his own, and his Mother's interest to solicit his Return. But Augustus resolved to do nothing in this Affair, without the consent of Caius.

He is permitted to Return

The Death of Lucius,

And of Caius Caesar,

86. It happened luckily for Tiberius that Caius Caesar fell out with M. Lollius, about this time; and if the Parthians told true, just cause he had for so doing. They discovered his perfidious and subtle Councils, how he took Bribes of the Kings, and Robbed all the Countries of the East, whereupon he renounced Friendship with him, although his own Wife the Daughter or Neice of this Lollius is said to have got a Gown in this Expedition to set with Pearl that it was valued at four hundred Sestertia. The Death of Lollius happened not long after their falling out, and most say by Poison which he took, and he being dead Quirinius was made Governor to Caius, who served Tiberius at Rhodes, being a good Friend to him, as Lollius was the Author of the ill will betwixt him and Caius Caesar; if Tiberius himself was to be believed. Now then the case was al-tered, that by Caius his Permission Tiberius was recalled; but with condition that he should bear no Office in the Commonwealth, and accordingly being come to Rome, he gave himself wholly to ease, doing some private Court-duties, but meddling with no Publick Bu-nifess. Not long after it happened, that Lucius Caesar being appointed to go to the Armies in Spain, died at Marcellis suddenly, being a man of no fame; after whose death, if we believe Paterculus, his Grandfather Augustus would have adopted Tiberius, but he fearing the Envy and Power of Caius vehemently resisted it. But Caius and his fear, were both shortly after removed out of the way. For he received a wound in Armenia, being incited by Treachery to the Wall of a Town by one who pretended a Revolt, after which he performed no great matters. Then he began in Body to be less able, and in his Mind less disposed to be profitable to the Commonwealth. And he wanted not the Company of such Men as by their Flattery fomented his Vices, by which means he was come to be of that humour, that he had rather spend all his time in any corner of the World, than return to Rome, though his Grandfather courted him by Letters, and at last grieved at his Resolution, advised him but to return into Italy, and he should do what he pleased. With much Reluctancy then he complied, and put himself upon the way, but being brought by shipping into Lycia, he died at Limyra, a City of that Country, twenty two Months after his Brother Lucius. The Bodies of both Brothers were brought to Rome by the Tribunes of Armies, and the silver'd Bucklers and Spears they received from the Equites when they came to be Men, were hung up in the Senate-House. But thus we see the end of both the Brothers, concerning whom this must be added, That they were taken out of the way, as a suspicion went, by the Arts of Livia to make room for her Son Tiberius.

Augustus again regulates the year.

87. Augustus his third ten years being ended, undertook the Government, unwilling and by constraint, for ten more; and now being more gentle and un-willing to exasperate the Senators against him, he would offend none of them any more. It happening that his Palace was burned, and many offering him much Money to Repair it, he accepted only an Aureus from a Body or Corpora-tion, and a Drachme from a private man; and by an Aureus or golden Coin, Dion Cassius tells us, he means the Nomisma, that was twenty five Drachmes in value, as certain Greek Authors took it, whom he had read out of his love to the Attick Dialect. When his House was Re-edified, he would have it be counted Publick, either because the People contributed Money towards it, or because he was Pontifex Maximus, and would live both in a Publick, and his own Dwelling. He made Tiberius Nero his Partner in the Tribuneship, which he also eagerly re-fused both at home and in the Senate House; some say for five years, and others for ten. Another cast of his Office he gave again as Pontifex Maximus, in set-ting right the Roman Calendar. The third Intercalary Day being superfluous, which had increased by the Default of the Roman Priests, was in the Month of February omitted; but afterwards he commanded that one Day in the beginning of every fifth year should be intercalated according to the Institution of Caesar, for the perpetual observation of this Order, he caused it to be Engraven in a Table of Brass. And thence afterward the Accounts of Times took their rise, this course being constantly observed till the change made in the Calendar by Pope Gregory the Thirteenth, in the year MDLXXIX, just an hundred years ago. But left the Fairs kept by the Romans every ninth Day should fall upon the Kalends of January, one Day was often added in the end of the prece-dent year, over and above the Custom, and taken away again in the year following.

following, that the course might agree with the former Institution of *Ju-*lius Caesar.

Flatteries.

88. About this time the People, whether out of kindness to him or his Daugh-ter, earnestly requested him to restore her: He answered, That fire and water should sooner meet than that she should be restored. Yet after some five years Confinement, they forced him to let her come out of the Island into the Con-tinent, but he could never be brought to recall her all together; and when the People still intreated him for her, and were very urgent with him, he used this Imprecation openly, That they might have such Daughters, and such Wives. But he was very kind to her Husband, though the People affronted him for her sake; so as Ælius Catus, and Sentius Saturninus, being Consuls on the fifth of the Calends of July, he adopted him, swearing before the People, that he adopted him for the Commonwealth's sake. But the same day he also adopted M. Agrippa Posthumus, the Brother of Caius and Lucius, and fearing that Tiberius elevated with his condition, should make disturbance, before he adopted him, he caused him to adopt Germanicus, the Son of his Brother Drusus, although Tiberius had a Son of his own, of his Brother's Name. Tiberius upon his Adoption, was immediately sent into Germany, where three years before, a War had broken out, and with him Vallius Paterculus, the Historian (formerly a Tribune of the Castrorum) served in quality of Prefect of Horse, as succeeding his Father in his Places, and for eight years was, as he telleth us, the Spectator of Tiberius his Heavenly Actions, either in that place, or as Legatus, and as far as his meanness could reach, an Assistant in them. After this, he tells his Reader, or rather Tiberius, how glad-ly he was received by both Cities and Soldiers in Germany; how of the Soldiers one said he had served under him in Armenia; and another in Rhetia, and another had received from him a Donative in the Fidelicit, another in Pannonia, and a third in Germany. Upon the first entrance into this Country, he saith, the Canninefates, Attuadi, and Bructeri were subdued, the Cherusci were received, and the River Visurgis afterward rendered famous by the overthrow of the Romans, passed over, Caesar taking upon himself the most difficult part of the War, and leaving the more easy to Sentius Saturninus, who had been formerly in *Ger-*many Legatus to his Father. This year's Campaigne continued till the Month of December, and thereby, as he words it, procured the Emolument of a vast Victory.

89. Now if you believe him, the Piety of Tiberius drew him back to Rome for defence of the Empire, though the passages of the Alps were in a manner choaked up with snow, and the time at the beginning of Spring brought him back into Germany, in the middle whereof, at the Head of the River Julia, he had appointed the Winter Quarters. The Historian falls into a Rapture con-sidering how great things, requiring how great a Volume, they did the follow-ing Summer under his Conduct. All Germany was over-run. Such Nations were subdued, as were almost unknown by any Names, and those of the Chabaci yielded themselves in a humble posture before the General's Tribunal. The Longobardi were distressed, being more fierce than the very German ferocious. In con-clusion, he tells us, that from the Rhine, as far as to the River Albis, which flowed by the Borders of the Senones and Helveti, the Roman Army passed with Ensigns display'd, and thither also by wonderful good fortune, through the care of the General, and due observation had of the time, came the Fleet, out of the unheard of, and formerly unknown Sea, up the Albis, and after Victory obtained over many Nations, with great plenty of all things, joyned with the Army of Caesar; a thing which never before had been conceiv-ed in hope, never before in fact attempted. The fawning of this Writer is in-deed intollerable, neither can nor ought we to relate his extravagant flourishes; but he saith, that his Caesar being Conqueror of all Nations and Places whither he came, with a Conquering and untouched Army (except at one time, and that to the great loss of the Enemy, who did something by fraud) reduced the Legions into their Winter Quarters, and went to Rome with as much speed as he had done the preceding year. Indeed nothing now in Germany remained which could be overcome, except the People called Marcomanni, who by Persuasion and Con-duct of Maroboduus, forsaking their former Seats, and retiring into the inner Countries, had taken up the Grounds of the Herzynian Wood, and through his management, had arrived at a considerable, nay, emulous greatness. Maroboduus was now to be feared, having so placed himself as to have Germany on his left hand, and before him Pannonia; at his right, and behind him the Noric, at all which Coasts he might make an Impression. Neither could Italy be secure, the beginning of his Territories being not much distant above two hundred Miles from the Alps. This Man and this Country did Tiberius resolve, to fall upon the following year from several Quarters. Sentius Saturninus had Orders, that through the Territories of the Catti, cutting down the Hercynian Woods, he should bring the Legions to Boiohemus; for so the Region was called, which Maroboduus inhabited; and Tiberius himself attempted to lead the Army that served in Ilyricum, from Carnuntus, a place bordering on the Kingdom of Noricum against the Marcomanni. But Fortune sometimes breaks, sometimes delays the purposes of Men. Cæsar had prepared the Winter quarters at the Danube, and the Design was to be executed when Pannonia grown insolent with ease, and Dalmatia trusting to its strength, by content Rebelled, drawing all the Nations of that Tract into the Conspiracy, and making up eight hundred thousand Men.

Pannonia and
bel.

90. With part they determined to invade Italy, and with part Macedonia, under Conduct of two Batones and Pinnetus. In Pannonia both the Roman Discipline and Language was known, and also Learning was common, and there was a familiar Conversation. This gave them the Advantage, that no Nation managed such a matter with more Discretion and Expedition. The Roman Citizens and Merchants were slain upon and slain, and many Soldiers cut off in places at great distance from the Emperor. Macedonia was overrun and wasted with Fire and Sword, and so great a fear thus struck into the Minds of men, that Augustus Cæsar himself trembled at it: Levies therefore were made, the veteran Soldiers were recalled every where to their Colours, and both Men and Women were compelled to find Soldiers even though Liberines, the Prince being heard in Senate to say, That without much care was used, in ten days, the Enemy might face Rome: both Senators and Equites promised their utmost endeavours. Tiberius was appointed General. Paterculus was designed Quæstor, and though not yet a Senator, made equal to Senators; and now being designed also Tribunus Plebis, he led part of the Army delivered by Augustus, to his Son. Being afterward Legatus, what wisdom he then could not but observe in the Conduct of Tiberius, he declares in way of Rapture. After that, he relates how Mellala Governor of Ilyricum, with the twentieth Legion half full, though surprized with the Rebellion, dejected and put to flight the Enemy. How that part of their Forces, which opposed it self to Cæsar, not daring to engage, seized on the Claudian Hill, and there fortified it self. Another that met with the Army which came from the Transmarine Provinces, under the leading of A. Cæcina, and Sylvanus Plautius, Men of Consular Dignity, put the Auxiliaries of Thrace to flight, falling upon them ere the unwary Captains thought of an Engagement; and had not the valour of the Roman Soldier exceeded the Courage and Abilities of their Officers, the whole Party had miscarried; but when many Centurions and Tribunes were lost, and much hurt received, the Legions exhorted one another to play the Men, and wrested the Victory out of the Hands of the Rebels.

Reduced.

91. Thus this War was full of Difficulties at first, but was in three years concluded by Tiberius. Pannonia first asked Peace. Bato and Pinnetus both came into the hands of the Romans, the one being taken, and the other yielding himself, and though the Dalmatians were hard to be overcome by reason of the difficult situation of their places, the fierceness of their Natures, and their great Abilities in Matters of War, yet they were not long after reduced, being almost ruined. While Tiberius was here in Germany, the Ambassadors of the Parthians having delivered their Message at Rome, were ordered to repair to him; being sent by the Nobility to desire to have for King one of the three Sons of Ptolemaeus, that remained Hostages at Rome. Hereupon Vonones was preferred before the rest, and being aided by Cæsar, was joyfully accepted by the Parthians for some time. In the mean while, that we may return into Italy, Paterculus tells us, That Agrippa, who had been adopted the same day that Tiberius was, by his natural Grandfather, and for two years before had given sufficient notice how he would prove by his wonderful pravity of mind, being inclined to run headlong into mischief, alienated from him the affections of his Father and Grandfather Augustus; and his Vices every day increasing, he had such an end as he deserved. His end followed afterward, and was brought about by Tiberius, whom Paterculus flatters, as such a virtuous and deserving Person as scarcely ever the like, writing a Panegy-rick

rick to him, rather than an History to another Reader. But we are told from other hands, that Augustus did proscribe his only Nephew M. Agrippa Posthumus, who was unlearned indeed and joolish, fierce out of a proud conceit of his strength, but yet found Guilty of no Crime; and that confiscating all his Goods to the Military Treasury, he banished him into Planasia, an Island near to Corfica.

92. But Augustus after he had adopted Tiberius and Agrippa, thinking himself strengthened by such an Addition, went about another Purging and Modelling of the Senate. Few now quitted it of their own Accord as formerly, but some were cast out whether they would or not. That he might not seem to do this as Cæsar, to do the work and solemnize the Lustrum, he took Præconfular Power. Several Young men both of Senatorian and Equestrian Dignity, fallen to decay without any Crime, he recruited. Taking notice how many Slaves were now Manumitted, he ordained of what Age both the Lord and the Manumitted Person should be, and other Rules to be observed both by Patrons and others toward Manumitted Persons. In the mean time was discovered a Conspiracy against him, the chief Author whereof was found to be Cn. Cornelius Cinna Magnus, the Nephew of Pompey the Great by his Daughter. He knew not what course to take; for if he put them to death, he feared he should not thence free himself from the Plots of others; and if they were not punished, it would encourage others to do the like. He was not able to rest Night nor Day by reason of these anxious Cares, till Livia his Wife, took notice of his trouble, and got the matter out of him. Dion Cassius relates, a Conference betwixt them, whether real or framed by himself, but the issue of it was this, that Augustus moved by her Arguments to methods of Clemency, only corrected the guilty Persons by words, and so dismissed them; nay, he designed Cornelius to be Consul. And the Historian tells us, That by so doing, he so far obliged all men to him, that thenceforth not only no more Conspiracies were made against him; but not the least suspicion was had of any; but so by the means of Livia, was Cornelius preserved, though he was suspected afterward to have procured the Death of Augustus himself. In the Consulship of the said Cornelius, and Valerius Mellala, horrible Earthquakes happened, and Tiber so swelled, that it brake down the Bridge, and made Rome Navigable for seven days; the Sun was eclipsed, and there was a Famine. The Senators and Equites began to behold the Circenian Games apart, which was afterward observed. And the Nobility being backward to give their Daughters to be Festal Virgins, a Law was made, that those of Liberine condition might become Preits in that College, and a Dispute being made about it by many, some were chosen by lot in the Senate, their Fathers being present; but not one was taken in to be a Festal.

93. At this time the Soldiers grievously complained of the scantiness of their Pay, and the rewards they received for their Service, and the more for being apprehensive of impending Wars, and none would bear Arms beyond the term allotted to warfare. Hereupon it was Decreed that to the Frætorian Cohorts should be given after they had served sixteen years, Five thousand Drachmes, and to others after the service of twenty years, Three thousand, man by man. At this time were maintained three and twenty Legions of Roman Citizens, or as some affirmed, twenty five, whereas in the days of Dion Cassius, when he wrote his History, only nineteen remained, which he mentioneth in particular. Namely, the second Legion Augusta, which wintered here in the upper Britain, Three that bore the Name of Tertia, viz. One in Phænicia, called Gallica; another in Arabia, called Cyrenatica; and a third called Augusta. There was fourth known by the name of Scythica in Syria; a fifth Macedonica in Dacia; two fixths viz. one in Lower Britain, called Vidrix, and another in India, named Persea; there was a seventh in Upper Myfia, and called Claudia. An eighth was Augusta in the Upper Germany. Then two Decimæ; one called Gemella in the Upper Pannonia, and another in Myfia. An eleventh in the Upper Myfia, had the Name of Claudia, both it and the former having received the Name from Claudius, because they did not Rebel against him in the Sedition of Camillus. A twelfth was Fulminifera in Cappadocia. A thirteenth Gemella in Dacia. A fourteenth Gemella in Upper Pannonia. A fifteenth was Surnamed from Apollo, and lay in Cappadocia. A twentieth Valeriana and Vidrix had their Stations in the Upper Britain. These were the Legions of Augustus remaining when Dio wrote, the rest being either Distended, or by him and other Emperors mixed with other Legions, whence the Names of Gemella are thought, to have been derived.

94. And because he had undertaken to speak of the Legions, he further tells us, He thinks fit to mention such as were afterwards inflamed by following Princes, that those who desired to know their Originals, might understand it better in one continued discourse; Having the same Reason as he to inform the Reader, we shall follow him herein. Nero then instituted the first Legion called Italica, Wintering in the Lower Myfia: Galba the first Auxiliary in the Lower Pannonia, and the seventh in Spain. Vespasian the Second Auxiliary in the Lower Pannonia, and the fourth Flavia in Syria. Domitian the first Minervia (or Athenienfis) in Lower Germany. Trajan the Second Ægyptia, and the Thirtieth Germanica, to which he gave his Name. Marcus Antoninus the Second in Noricum, the Third in Rætia, which were also called Italica. Severus the First and Third Parthia in Mesopotamia, and the Second Meda in Italy. So many Legions Dio took notice of, besides that of the City and the Prætorian in his time. Under Augustus Twenty three or twenty five were maintained (he adds) and many other Auxiliary Companies of Horse and Foot, and Sea-men, of which he knew not the certain number. The Guard (saith he) of the Emperor's Person, consists of Ten thousand divided into ten Parties. Six thousand are appointed for a Guard to the City, divided into four Companies. Then are these the Strangers, Horsemen, called Batravi, from Batavia, an Island in the Rhine, the Inhabitants of which excel in the Art of Riding; of them and of the Evocati he confesseth he knew not the Number. Augustus then began first to use them, when he called together the Veteran Soldiers of his Father against Antony, and so kept them; and they continued to be a peculiar Body, bearing Sevens as the Centurions. Upon these Accounts wanting Money, he consulted the Senate concerning the Establishment of a perpetual Revenue, whence without injuring any Person he might maintain and reward his Soldiers. They buying themselves herein, and no man of his own accord seeking to be Ædilis, some were chosen by Lot from amongst the Questors and Tribuni Plebis, and constrained to Execute the Office, as often at other times was practised. Thus much Dio writes concerning the Legions and other Forces of the Empire, which indeed grew and increased, and again decreased as the State had need they should. Some reckon in Galba's time One and thirty Legions. In the Court of the Capitol was found a Stone, having the same Number of them as Dio, with some variety in the Names. As for the Evocati, we scarcely know what they were; but Lipfus points us to a certain place in Suetonius, which he thinks to make out the signification of the word. Speaking of Galba his being saluted Emperor, and of his Lifting up a numerary Soldiers above the former Army, and chusing a Council resembling a Senate, to which he would have things of consequence referred, he adds, That he made choice of Young Men of the Equestrian Order, who retaining the use of Golden Rings, were called Evocati, and were to watch about his Bed-Chamber in the room of Soldiers.

95. But such were the Forces Augustus thought fit to raise and maintain; it was another thing to procure the Money. In the Consulship of M. Æmilius Lepidus, and L. Arruntius, and the DCCCLIX. of the City, no Revenue could be found out whereon to fix the Expence which should be approved by all sorts of persons, who yet were vexed that there should be such need of inquiring after it. Augustus then for himself and Tiberius brought in Money to a Treasury which he named Military, and committed the Charge thereof to three Persons of Prætorian Rank chosen by Lot, and that for Three Years, who should be attended with two Litlors, and other Servants; which Ceremony was observed for several years, but in Dio's time they were chosen by the Emperor, and had no Litlors. But Money being thus paid in by him, and he promising to do it every Year, several Kings and People also subscribed; for as for private persons, though there were also that offered, he would receive nothing. For all this Revenue would not in the least answer the Expence, and there being still need of constant supply, he engaged the Senators every one in particular to find out a way, and deliver it in Writing to be considered of by him; which he did not therefore do, because he found out none himself; but that they might be brought to approve that course which he was resolved to follow. Many being propounded, but none approved, he ordained that the Twentieth part of Inheritances and Legacies, those excepted which were left to the near of Kin and to the Poor, should be brought into this Military Treasury; and he did it, as having found this sort of Payment in the Commentaries of Cæsar. Indeed there had been formerly mention made of this thing,

c. 10.

it was put off till this time. But so was the Revenue increased, and then Augustus ordered three Persons from amongst the Consulares to be chosen by Lot, partly to Contract, and partly to take away Expences.

A great Famine at Rome.

96. But these things were no whit pleasing to the Romans, who were besides at this time afflicted with a grievous Famine: It was so urgent, that the Gladiators and saleable Slaves were sent away to Eighty miles distance from the City, and as well Augustus himself, as many others sent away their Servants; non-term was proclaimed; Senators were permitted to go whither they pleased: And left the Senatusconsulta should thereby be of less force, it was decreed, That such as should be made by those that continued at Rome, should be valid. Men of Consular Dignity were appointed to Oversee the Corn and Bread, so that a certain quantity thereof should be sold to particular Persons. Augustus gave as much Corn gratis to those who were wont to receive it from the Publick, as they were wont to have; and yet all this being too little, he would not suffer them to Ear publicly on his Birth-day. And whereas the City was in several Quarters much defaced by Fires, he appointed a Watch of the Libertini in seven places to prevent them, and over this Watch set a Person of Equestrian Degree; and though he did not intend they should Continue, yet finding them very serviceable, he thought fit to Continue their Employment; and when Dion Cassius lived, those Libertini who had Charge also of the Walls, and received publick Wages. But the Common sort now harraided with Famine, Tribute and Fires, was much iraged, and openly talkt many things Seditiously, and desired a Change, and many Libels were thrown about by Night, one P. Rufus being reported to be chief Author of these Misdemeanors. But the Suspicion light upon others, and indeed Rufus himself was absent, and not in Capacity to be Mover of such matters, but others under his Name went about to make an Alteration. An Inquisition was decreed to be made into the Offence; Judges were appointed, and had Salaries allotted, and some were accused as guilty. But the Tumults ceased not in the City till the Scarcity being over, Germanicus Cæsar, and Tiberius Claudius Nero, the Sons of Drusus, in honour of their Father, set forth a Show of the Gladiators. The People was pleased that this was done in memory of Drusus, as also that Tiberius, when he dedicated the Temple of Castor and Pollux not only set upon it the Name of Claudius, (for so he called himself after he was adopted into the Family of Augustus, instead of Claudius) but of Drusus also; for it was his custom, whilst he managed Wars abroad, to come to the City as often as he might, partly to do some business, but chiefly out of fear lest Augustus should prefer any other in his Absence. This Year the Governor of Achaia dying when but half of his time was out, one part of his Province lying within the Isthmus, was assigned to his Questor, and the other part to his Legatus. Herod of Palestine being accused by his Brethren, was banished beyond the Alpes, and part of his Dominions were made publick. Of this we shall hear from other Hands more fully than from Dio.

Provinces.

97. At this time he tells us there were many Wars. Into many Countreys Invasions were made by Rovers, inasmuch that Sardinia for several years had no Senator to govern it, but had Soldiers and Officers of the Equestrian Rank. Not a few Cities attempted to Revolt, so that the Provinces belonging to the People of Rome, for two years were governed not by such as were chosen by Lot, but by Suffrages; whereas such for many years were wont to preside over the Provinces of Cæsar. The Isauri began with Depredations, but proceeded to a War, and were overthrown. The Gæuli not enduring to be subject to Juba, rose up against him, wasted his Borders, and killed many Romans, whom he employed together with his own Army, and thereupon they were so Elevated and made such work for Cornelius Cossus, that for subduing them he obtained Triumphal Honours, and the Surname of Gæulicus. Several Expeditions were made into Germany, and by Tiberius as well as others, who pierced as far as Vesurgis and Albis; and yet no very memorable thing was done, though both Augustus and he received the Name of Imperator from the  Germans, and C. Sentius who governed that Province had Triumphal Honours; because out of fear of them the  Germans had twice made Peace with the Empire. They did not deserve to have it granted, having violated their Faith, but the Affairs of Dalmatia and Pannonia were now so unsettled, and required such speedy Correction as wrested it from the Romans. The Dalmatians not enduring the burthen of the Tributes laid upon them, having been formerly of the Dalmatians and

formerly inclined to rebel, were now encouraged to perfect their Resolution, because that Valerius Messalinus (so he calls him) the Governour of both Countries, was gone to the War which Tiberius now the second time made in Germany. At first some few rebelled, at the suggestion, especially, of one Bato Dysidatus, and overthrew the Romans that went against them, by whose Example the rest broke out into rebellion. Then the Breuci, a People of Pannonia, taking for their Leader another Bato, went to Sirminum, which was held by a Garrison of the Romans; And might have taken it, but that Cæcina Severus, who governed the Neighbouring Myfia, hearing of their Motions, met with and defeated them at the River Dranus. Notwithstanding the Victory, yet many of the Romans having fallen in the Battle, the Rebels hoped they might recruit by the assistance of their Friends, to procure which, they bent their utmost endeavours. In the mean time, Bato the Dalmatian, made an Inroad as far as Salona, where he received a great Bruise by a Stone, and returning without having any thing performed, sent others on the same Errand, who wafting all the Maritime Tracts as far as Apollonia, in several Encounters with the Romans, both gave and received Deaths.

98. Tiberius having notice of these Disorders, and fearing the Rebels might invade Italy, sent before him Messalinus, and then followed with greater Forces out of Germany. Bato though not fully recovered of his Bruise, met and fought with Messalinus, and had the better of him; but afterwards was Circumvented and beaten, and then he betook himself to the other Bato Breucus, and they jointly seized on the Hill Alma. There they were worsted by Rhymetates the Thracian, whom Severus had sent against them, and afterward sustained the Violence of Severus himself; and when he was called away into Myfia by the Daci and Sauromata, there infesting that Country, and Tiberius with Messalinus stayed at Siscia, they took the advantage, and invading the Territories of the Allies of Rome, drew many into Rebellion with them. Tiberius came up with them; but they refused to give him Battle, and wandered up and down wafting all things in their passage with Celerity, to which their Skill in the Country and the lightness of their Habit did Contribute, Winter now drawing on. Some of them again invaded Macedonia, but were set upon and defeated by Rhymetates and Rajcypolis his Brother, and the rest having their Territories depopulated, when Q. Cæcilius Creticus and A. Licinius Nerva Silanus were Consuls, left them and retired to Places more fortified by Nature, whence they made Incursions upon occasion. Augustus having notice of these passages, suspected Tiberius as out of design to have a Command, drawing out the War in length, when he might put an end to it. Thither he sent Germanicus, now bearing the Office of Quæstor, and with him Soldiers not only ingenious, but Freedmen, many of whom he redeemed both from Men and Women with Victuals sufficient for Six Months. As he made this Provision for the War, he put off the Choice of Equites, which was wont to be performed in the Forum, and vowed to Celebrate the Ludi Magni upon some Prophecies pretended to be uttered by a certain inspired Woman. And though he knew well enough she was a Counterfeit, and acted a part out of Design, yet the People being exceedingly perplexed both by reason of the Wars, and of a Death which again oppressed them, he made a show as if he gave credit to what she said, and did all he could to give satisfaction to the Multitude.

99. The charge of Provisions he again committed to two Consulares, to whom he allowed Lictors. When there wanted Money for carrying on Wars, and maintaining of night-Watches, he settled a Tribute consisting of the fiftieth part of price given for slaves; and he forbade the Money which the Quæstors were wont to lay out upon the shows of Gladiators to be expended. Now that he sent Germanicus, and not Agrippa to the War, our Writer tells us; the servile Disposition and Humour of Agrippa himself, was the cause, who spent his time in Fishing and at Sea, and thence took upon him the Name of Neptune, fell out into Extravagant Passions; railed at Julia as his Step-mother; and not seldom accused Augustus as guilty of retaining his Father's Estate: when he would not be reclaimed, he was proscribed by Augustus, his Estate was confiscated to the Military Treasury, and he himself banished into Planasia, an Island near to Corfica. Now Germanicus was got into Pannonia, and all the Forces marched thither; but the two Batones observing the time when Severus came from Myfia, suddenly fell upon him as he incamped himself in the Volcan Fens, and worsted him, after which the Romans were dispersed to invade the Enemy in several Quarters. No great great matters were performed by other Parties; yet Germanicus overcame in fight, and much damned the Macæi, a Nation of Dalmatia. The year following in the Consulship of M. Furius Camillus, and Sextus Nonius Quintilianus, both Pannonians and Dalmatians desired Peace, being distressed by Famine, and a Difease thence arising, from their feeding on Herbs and Roots, to which they were not accustomed. They desired it by their Ambassadors, and yet still made resistance through the procurement of them who expected no Security from the Romans. As Germanicus was besieging a certain strong City, and could not take it, one Pulio an Eques and Germanus by Nation, cast a Stone at the Wall, which broke and disordered the Battlement, that a man leaning against it, it fell down; and this so affrighted the Defendants, that they fled into the Castle, which afterwards they yielded up with themselves. Bato the Dalmatian treated with Tiberius; and the day after being brought before him, as he sat on the Tribunal, Tiberius asked him, For what Reason they would revolt, and continue in Rebellion so long against the Romans? He answered him thus, Tou your selves are in fault, who appoint to the keeping of your Flocks not Dogs nor Shepherds, but Wolves. But so Dalmatia, partly by force of War, and partly by Composition returned into Obedience to the Romans.

100. At this time Augustus gave the Senate leave to take Cognizance of most things in his Absence, and obtained from appearing in Publick. And as in the preceding year, when Disturbances were great, he himself made all the Magistracies: now such as he would have advanced, he commended to the People. He was during the Wars in Pannonia and Dalmatia so intent upon them, that for better Correspondence, and to give Directions, he betook himself to Arminum, whither when he went, Vows were made, and at his return Sacrifice was offered, as if he had returned from the Field. About the same time, Bato the Breucus, having betrayed Pinnus, and for a reward received the Kingdom of the Breuci, was taken by his Namesake, the other Bato (who it seems for all his meeting with Tiberius, was still his own Man) and put to Death as he went about the Garrisons to require Hostages: He had him delivered up by some that held a Castle whither he had entred, and carrying him to the Camp, condemned him. After this, still many other Pannonians rebelled, but Silvanus had the better of them, and Bato seeing no hope to be remaining in Pannonia, fortified the Passages out of that into Dalmatia with Guards, and wafted this Country. The Pannonians seeing also their Territories harried by Silvanus, received terms, though they could not for some time be restrained from Robberies; to which these Nations were extremely addicted. Tiberius against Winter, wherein Q. Sulpicius Camerinus, and C. Poppæus Sabinus were Consuls, came to Rome, and was met by Augustus in the Suburbs. He brought him into the Septa, and saluting the People from the Tribunal, performed what was wont to be done at celebrating Victories, and particularly exhibited the Spēlactula by the assistance of the Consuls. The Equites now were mightily concerned to have a Law abrogated, which had been made concerning unmarried Persons, and such as had no Children. He therefore called before him such of them as were Batchellors, as also those that were Married, and had Children, each fort apart and by themselves.

101. Finding the Married fort to be far inferior in number to the unmarried, he was troubled thereat, and first spoke his mind unto them, if our Historian doth not make his Speeches for him, to this purpose. He applauded them both, for serving the ends of Nature, and of civil Society. Shewed how Mankind was ordained, Male and Female, by Conjunction, as it were, to prevent Mortality; and how without Children, as the Species it self could not subsist, so no Commonwealths could be supplied, either with Men for War, or Civil Employments. He told them they alone deserved the Name of Men and of Fathers, and as such he both praised them, and would prefer them as occasion should serve, to such Offices as they might transmit to their Children. And to some of them he presently gave rewards; and promised to do the same to others of them. To the Batchellors, he made a Speech quite contrary, affirming, He was, marvellously troubled because of them, whom he knew not by what name to call. Not by that of men, for they performed no manly things; not by that of Citizens, for the City might come to an end and perish for all them; neither by that of Romans, for they intended to destroy the Roman Name. But by what Name soever they called themselves, or whoever they were, he said an unusual thing had happened to him upon their Account. For he was wont to leave nothing undone, whereby to make of them a great multitude, but now he was, as fory to see them so many, and could have wished the number of them to, whom he spake before, to have been as great, and that they had either been joined with them, or not seen by him: forasmuch as without having regard to the Providence of the Gods, or the forecast of their Ancestors, they purposed to abolish their Nation, destroy the Roman Name, and put an absolute end unto it. What seed or remainder, saith he, of Mankind would be left, if all People should imitate you? and the beginning of mischief proceeding from you, you were justly to sustain the blame of Universal Ruine. And if none shall follow your example, for this very cause all must hate you, seeing you neglect that which none other do, and introduce such Rules and Courses of living, as if all would imitate them, Mankind must fall and be lost; but if it hate and disapprove them, you must be condemned. He affirmed, That all Crimes laid together, would not equal theirs. For they committed Murder in not suffering those to be born, which ought to proceed from them; they were guilty of Impiety, in forcing the Names and Honours of their Ancestors to cease; they were Sacrilegious, in abolishing their Kind, which proceeded from the Immortal gods, and destroying Humane Nature, the greatest thing consecrated to them; and in this respect they, overturned their Temples, and their Altars; they dissolved the City in not obeying its Laws; betrayed their Country by making it barren and unfruitful; nay, utterly demolished the City, in depriving it of Inhabitants. For a City consists not in Houses, Porticus's or Forums void of Inhabitants; but in Men.

102. He farther bad them consider what Romulus their Founder would think of them; and if he would not be angry to purpose, when he compared his Original with their course of life, who refused to beget Children even by lawful Marriage. And what those Romans that were with him would think, recollecting that they ravished Virgins that were Strangers; whereas these their Posterity would not love those that were of the same stock with themselves; that they entered into War to procure an Offspring, and these would not endeavour to have Children by their fellow Citizens. He urged the case of Curtius, who died, that the Romans might not want Marriage, and of Hersilia that followed her Daughter, and shewed to the Citizens Nuptial Rites. In truth their Ancestors, he said, in behalf of Marriage, waged War with the Sabines, and that Peace was made, which they by their celibacy did break and dissolve. And to what purpose, and with what design? to live in celibacy as the Vestal Virgins? If so, they ought to be punished as well as they, if they did not preserve their Chastity. He told them, they ought not to be displeased, at what he said, for if they were displeased with his words, he, and their fellow Citizens had much more reason to be displeased with their Actions. Therefore if they found themselves touched, he advised them to repent, that in stead of reprehending, he might commend and thank them for the time to come, as owning what a good Legislator ought to establish. He told them, That before his time it was not lawful for any to neglect Marriage and Posterity; Laws having been made against it at the first founding of the Commonwealth, and the Senate and People having since that, ordained many things against it. That he had increased the Multitude of unmarried Persons to render them Obedient, and appointed such Rewards to the Obedient, as never formerly had been proposed, as an Incentive to any Virtue; that if nothing else, yet these Advantages might provoke them to Wedlock, and the Procreation of Children. But for their parts, they neither desiring the Rewards, nor regarding the Penalties, but as if they lived in no Society or Commonwealth, gave out that they made choice of a Life that was free and void of trouble, without Matrimony or Children; whereas in so doing they were no better than Thieves and Robbers, and the most savage Beasts. For really they were not so far taken with any solitary kind of life, as to live without Women, or not to have a Bedfellow or Companion at the Table, but by this course studied how to gratify their wanton Lust and Appetite.

103. Yet he had permitted them to cohabit such Virgins as were not quite ripe for Marriage, that pretending to the title of Sponsæ, who would shortly celebrate the Nuptials, they might the more look after their Families; and he had allowed the Marriage of Libertine to those that were not Patricians. Neither had he put them upon any haste, having given them first the space of three years, and then of two. But neither by threatening, exhorting, deferring or intreating, had he gained any thing. They could not but perceive how many more they were than the Married men, whereas they ought to have produced as many, nay, as many more in their Progeny. By what other course was the Nation to be continued? How could the Commonwealth be preserved without Wives and Children, except they expected the Fable to be fulfilled of Persons rising out of the Earth? For shame he bad them esteem it the greatest wickedness after the Extinguishment of the Roman Stock and Name; to deliver over their City to Strangers, whether Greeks or Barbarians. Shall we, saith he, for this reason, manumit our Slaves because we would have many Citizens? Shall we give freedom of the City to our Associates, that it may be filled with People, and you, who from the first Original are Romans, having reckoned up the Quintii, Valerii, and Julii, resolve together with your selves to destroy all such Names, and Families? I am ashamed with words to let forth what it is that you practice. Therefore put a stop to your madness, and now at length consider, that many of us being consumed with Wars and Diseases, the City cannot be safe, except it be supplied with a flock of Children. Yet let no body think I am ignorant that there are some difficult and troublesome Occurrences in Marriage and Procreation of Children; but you ought to consider, that there is nothing good that hath not some bitterne mixed with it; that the greatest and most excellent enjoyments have many sad and harsh things joynt with them, which if you would decline, you must not desire the good themselves, seeing we cannot attain to sincere Virtue or Pleasure, except labour be used to attain them. Though Marriage trimony have its Inconveniences, yet compare the Advantages and them together, and you shall find them over-balanced by far, not only as to the Conveniences which the thing in its own Nature affords, but as to the Rewards also proposed by the Laws, of which a little part doth allure some men to undergo Death it self; and these ought to induce you all to obey me. And it's a shameful thing, if for the same reason you will not marry Wives, and bring up Children, for which others will not stick to give their lives. I thought fit (Citizens), for I hope you are now persuaded to retain this Name, and to accept of those of Husbands and Fathers) thus to expostulate with you, unwillingly truly, but out of necessity; not as an Enemy, or one that hates you, but out of love and desire to have many like your selves; so that inhabiting lawful Houses, and having our Habitations full of a Roman Offspring, we may approach to the gods, with our Wives and Children, and Communicating with one another in all Publick things may converse together in the enjoyment of them. For how can I be said to govern you, if I suffer always some part of you to be diminished? How can I be called any more your Father, if you beget no Offspring? Therefore if you really love me, and have given me the Name of Father, for Honour, and not out of Flattery, do your endeavour to become Husbands and Fathers; so that you may be partakers of it, and I my self may not bear it in vain. Having spoken in this manner to both sorts, he increased the Rewards of such as had Children, and made a difference by setting a Multitude upon Bachelors, yet so, as he gave them the space of a year to consider; and such as would obey him should be free from the Multitude. Nay, he was so kind, that whereas by the Law called Lex Voconia, Women were Prohibited to come to any Inheritance above a certain Sum, he loosed some from that Obligation; and bestowed upon such as had vowed perpetual Virginity, the same Rewards as upon Mothers. In order to these things, was framed the Law Pappia Poppæa, preferred by M. Pappius Mutilus, and E. Poppæus Secundus, who being Consuls for part of the year, neither of them had either Wives or Children; by which very thing Dio suggests how necessary it was that that Law should be made.

104. While these things were done at Rome, the Romans that with Germanicus, marched against Rhaetium, a City of Dalmatia, received loss by Fire, wherewith the besieged did surround them, and retired themselves within the Castle. Several Towns were taken, yet many still held out, and a Famine being by this means occasioned in Italy, Augustus sent Tiberius again into Dalmatia. He perceiving the Soldiers were impatient to finish the War, though it were with danger to the State, that being together, they might be able to plot new Matters, divided them into three Parties, whereof one he committed to Silanus, another to M. Lepidus, and with the third he and Germanicus went against Bato, Silanus and Lepidus without difficulty overcame their Adversaries in Battle. Tiberius over-ran the Country, and still pursued Bato, till he besieged him in a Castle called Anderium, which was extraordinarily fortified by situation, and that Provision they had made within for such extremity. Nay, they laid Ambucado's to stop the besiegers from forage, so that Tiberius besieging them, in a manner was befieged. He knew not what to do, the Siege being troublesome and dangerous, and yet he thought it would be very ignominious to raise it, and the Soldiers fell into a Mutiny, with such a noise that the Enemy who watched under the Castle out of very fear retired from their Station. Tiberius being partly pleased and partly angry at what had passed, both rebuked and commended his Army, and yet not daring to stir, he kept himself quiet till such time as Bato sent and desired Peace, and his Allies being not persuaded to embrace it, he forsook them, and refused to give them any relief upon demand. Hereupon Tiberius despised them that kept the Castle, and resolving to Storm it, moved his Men by Arguments to mount the Precipice on which it stood, and by constant Supplies to encourage them, that part of the Defendants having issued out and betaken themselves to the Woods, were pursued and knock'd on the head like so many Sheep, and those in the Castle yielded it up upon Conditions, which Tiberius performed. After this Germanicus took a Fort called Arduba, and Postumius reduced other places. Now did Bato send his Son Sevea to Tiberius, and offered if he might be accepted to deliver up himself and all his into the Power of the Romans. Having received his Faith, he came by Night into the Camp, and being the day after brought before Tiberius, sitting on the Tribunal, he did not at all deprecate his own Punishment, but stretching out his Head as to be cut off, used many words to excuse his Companions, and being again asked by Tiberius, why they had Rebelled, and so long continued the War? He answered, That the Romans themselves were the cause of it, who sent not Dogs nor Shepherds, but Wolves to keep their Flocks. Thus Dio by degrees and order of time, what Paterculus tells in short.

105. After this fort was this War composed, with small advantage on the Roman side, much Money being expended, many Legions being maintained, and but very little booty got. But Germanicus brought the News of the Victory, for which the Title of Imperator was added to Augustus and Tiberius, a Triumph decreed them, and two Triumphal Arches in Pannonia, on which Trophies were to be placed. To Germanicus were decreed Triumphal Ornaments, as to others of the Captains, and Prætorian Honours: they voted that first after the Consulares, he should give his Opinion, and being loosed from the Laws, might stand for the Consulship sooner than usual. It was farther decreed, That Drujus the Son of Tiberius, though he had no part in the War, might before he was taken into the Order, come into the Senate, and having executed the Quæstorship, speak his Opinion before those of Prætorian quality. Such things were decreed, but News brought out of Germany, spoiled all the Sport of the Triumphs. The Romans in that Country held several Places, but not altogether, but as they were brought into subjection by chance here and there, and therefore in Histories, no mention is made of them. But however in those places they had their Winter Quarters, and built Towns; the Barbarians admitted of their ways and Customs, and met with them at the Forum, yet so as not to forget their own Customs, and the liberty of their Country. Now was Quintilius Varus sent to govern there, one born, if you will hear Paterculus, rather of an illustrious than a Noble Family, a Man both as to Body and Mind addicted to rest, and accustomed to the idleness of the Camp, rather than Action, but not a Contemner of Money, as Syria bore witness; which being Rich (as President) he entered Poor, but left it Poor coming away Rich. He thought the Germans as tame as Sheep, and having nothing but the Voice and Members of Men, though they could not be conquered with the Sword, yet might be tamed by Laws. He therefore spent his time amongst them in Careless, and deciding Controversies, yet even then he would Command them as Roman Slaves, and exact Money of them as from Subjects. The Germans could not brook his management of Matters, and the rather because the chiefest of them were sensible of the loss of the Supreme Command, and impatient to have it restored to their Country. But seeing many Romans to live about the Rhine, and many amongst themselves, they durst not break out into open Rebellion, but so humoured Varus as ready to obey him in all things. They pretended great Controversies amongst themselves, and drew him from the Rhine to the Territories of the Cherusci, and the River Wesurja.

106. There living securely in perfect Peace, they persuaded him that without the assistance of the Soldiers, he might hold them in that Subjection. And he was so silly as being in an Enemy's Country, not to keep together his Men, and in one place, but distributed many of them to several weaker People of Germany, who desired to have them upon pretence of securing the Garrisons for seizing Highway-Men, and conveyance of Provisions. There was a young Man, Noble in Birth, Valiant of his hand, of quick apprehension, and of a prompt Wit, for a Barbarian, by Name Arminius, the Son of Sigimer, Prince of that Nation, who by his very Eyes and Countenance discovering the ardour of his Mind, had formerly been a diligent Attendant in the Roman Wars, and had obtained the Jus Civitatis, and the Equestrian Degree: He well knowing, that no man can sooner be ruined than he who hath no apprehension of danger, and that the most frequent beginning of Calamity is Security, abused the Sottish humour of the General, who conversing with him every day, and being told of Plots that were to be against his Person, would not believe the Informers, but bad them have a care of themselves. Then by Conspiracy did some of the furthest Germans make an Insurrection, with design that Varus going to suppress it, might pass through the Territories of those he supposed his Friends, and be the more liable to Destruction. They had so ordered their Affairs, that he should have no Forces at hand to rescue him, and those Romans that they had received in several places, as was said, they put to Death. Then did they set upon him as he went through a Wood, which was very difficult to pass, when he had not the least apprehension of any mischief, but marched in his Rear very disorderly.

The Defeat of Varus, and the Legions. 107. Abundance of Rain falling, took away from the Romans the use of their Arms; so that more Germans pouring themselves upon them, they were cut down and slain: Varus and other of the Principal Officers left they should fall into the Enemies Hands, killed themselves. This being understood, none of the Soldiers made any resistance, but either followed their Example, or cast away their Arms, and exposed themselves to the Sword. Now were both Men and Horses killed without any opposition, and all the Romans had either been slain or taken this day, but that the Germans hurried away to take the Booty; whereby it came to pass, that the most hardy escaped, and the Trumpeters founding, it being now dark, the Enemy believed that some Succours were sent to them by Arprenas. This belief restrained the Germans from pursuing, and Arprenas indeed as soon as he had notice, halted to their relief. But thus were cut off in a manner three Legions, as many Alæ, and six Cohorts; an overthrow the greatest of all the Romans received since that of Craffus from the Parthians. This was the most valiant Army they had, and the chiefest for Discipline, Strength and Experience, as Paterculus, who then lived assures us, who adds, that the General had a greater mind to die, than to fight, stabbing himself, as his Father and Grandfather had done before him. Of the two Prefects of the Camp, as L. Eggius gave a good example of Valour, so Cecinius afforded as bad, who after that most of the Soldiers were cut off, became the Author of yielding, and chose to die rather as a Malefactor by Punishment, than in Battle. But Voluminius the Legatus of Varus, being otherwise a quiet, and an honest man, deserted the Foot, and ran away with the Alæ of Horse to the Rhine, which fact fortune it self revenged; for he did not survive the deserting; but himself perished a Defector: The Body of Varus when half burnt, the furious Enemies tore in pieces. His Head was cut off and carried to Maroboduus, who sent it to Cæsar, and at length it was honoured with the Sepulture of his Family.

108. When Augustus had the News of the Defeat, he was afflicted in an extraordinary manner. He had in all his life-time, as Suetonius tells us, but two great overthrows, and they were both received in Germany, viz. that of Lollius, and this of Varus; that of Lollius brought more Infamy than loss, but this of Varus he terms almost extirpable, three Legions with the General, the Legati, and all the Auxilia being cut off. Upon notice of it, he set Guards up and down the City, that no Tumults might be raised upon this occasion, continued the Government to the Præfects of Provinces, as by their experience most fit to keep the Associates in order. To Jupiter he vowed the great Games if he restored the Commonwealth into a better condition, as had been done in the Wars of the Cimbri and Marci. It was reported, That he was so far dejected with the loss, that he let his Beard and the hair of his Head grow for several Months; sometimes would knock his Head against the Doors, and roar out, Restore the Legions, Quintilius Varus; and he observed the Day of the Defeat every year, as a Day of Mourning. Dio tells us, he feared the Germans and Galls would be in Italy, and was sensible that their Roman youth was inconsiderable; and the Auxilia of the Associates were much distressed. Yet he set himself all manner of ways he could, and as the present posture of Affairs would permit, to prevent mischief. For as much as such as were of the Military Age would not give their Names to the Service. Some on whom the lot fell, he punished by Confiscation of their Estates, and branding them with Infamy; and this not being effectual, but that many yet disobeyed, some he punished with Death. Then gathering by lot from amongst the Veteran Soldiers, and the Libertini, as great a Force as he could make, he dispatched it away under Command of Tiberius into Germany. And there being many Galls and Germani at Rome, some upon the account of Travel, and others serving in the Guards, he alarmed and sent them out of the City. These things he did, and the usual Sports, and other things were omitted. But hearing afterwards that some Soldiers survived the Defeat, that a Guard was put upon Germany, and the Enemy durst not pass the Rhine, he was freed from his terror, and began to examine the matter. He suspected that so sudden and great a mischief came by the Anger of their gods, declared by Prodigies both before and after, which Dio relates.

809. Tiberius made an Invasion into Germany, together with Germanicus, who had the Power of Proconsul. Some Parts of it they wasted, but subdued no Nation thereof; fighting not one Battel, nor engaging with any Enemy, for, whatever Paterculus may talk in commendation of Tiberius, Dio writes, that they were in heavy fear of another overthrow, and stirred not far from the Rhine, but kept themselves somewhere thereabouts till Autumn, at which time having celebrated the Birth-day of Augustus with Games, and by the help of the Centurions, having had the Exercises of Horfemen, they returned into Italy. Now at Rome, Dryus Cæsar the Son of Tiberius was Quæstor, and sixteen Prætors were made, for so many stood for the Office, and Augustus in this conjuncture of Affairs, would disgust no man, though in many years that followed there were but twelve. He forbade Fortune-tellers either privately or before others to predict the Death of any man, nor that he was solicitous concerning himself, for he publicly exposted to view the Scheme of the Heavens, under which he was born. He also required of all that were subject to his Command, that they should not give any Honour to any of the Governors in the time of their Administration, nor within sixty days after their departure, because many by virtue of the Honours and Applauses they received in the Provinces bore themselves high, and did very bad things. To Ambassadors at this time three Senators gave Answers. And, which was accounted wonderful, Equites were permitted to fight in the Exercises of the Gladiators, some of them counting it no Ignominy; and an Edict having been published to restrain them: notwithstanding they were resolute, and the more, because their Combats were greedily beheld, and Augustus himself was present with the Prætors who distributed the Rewards.

110. After this Germanicus bore the Office of Consul together with C. Capito, though he had not yet executed the Office of Prætor, and did nothing worthy of Memory, but only over-balanced his Colleague. But Augustus now grown very old, by Writing recommended Germanicus to the Senate, and the Senate to Tiberius. He himself being not in a condition, did not read the Writing, but Germanicus, as he was wont to do. Having made an excuse about the German War, he desired of the Senate that they would not salute him at his own House, nor take it ill if for the time to come he did not publicly converse with them, for it had been the Custom frequently to salute him, especially when the Senate was held, in the Court, and Forum, as he went in or out, and as he sat or lay in the Palace, not only of Senators, but Equites, and some Plebeians; yet for all this did he not cast off the care of the Commonwealth. For he granted to Equites a Right to stand to be Tribuni Plebis, and he commanded an Inquisition to be made after Libels, which being found in the City should be burnt by the Ædiles, and out of the City by the Governors of the several places; and he inanimadverted upon some of the Authors of them. And whereas it was found that of many Persons that were Banished, some lived out of the places to which they were confined, and others too delicately there where they were appointed to abide, he ordained, that none of those to whom Water and Fire were forbidden, should remain in the Continent, or in any Island which was not fifty miles distant from the Continent, Cos, Rhodes, Sardinia, and Leibes excepted, though Dion Cassius knows not for what reason. He forbade they should pass over any whither, or have any more Vessels than one of Burthen, containing a Thousand Amphoræ; and two for Sailing; neither above twenty Slaves or Freed-men; nor possess above fifty thousand thousand Nammi; in case of Disobedience, he both threatened to punish the Exiles, and such as assisted them in the breaking of these Laws.

111. When L. Munatius, and C. Silius were Consuls, Augustus undertook, unwilling, the Government for ten years, now the fifth time. He Prorogued the Tribunitial Authority to Tiberius; he granted to Dryfus his Son, Power to stand for the Consulship in the third year, though he had not born the Prætorship; and not coming now into the Senate himself by reason of his old Age, he desired to have twenty Councillors for a year assigned him, whereas formerly he was wont to have fifteen for six Months. It was Decreed that whatever he resolved upon with those, the Consuls, and Consuls designed, his adopted Nephews, and others he at any time assumed, after deliberation, should be of the same force and virtue as if they had been Voted in the Curia. These things were ordered by a Senatusconsultum, though he had the Power before, and as he lay upon his Bed he would give Judgment. The Payment of a twentieth part of Inheritances lately mentioned, seemed generally a grievous burthen, and some firs it was feared would happen upon it. Hereupon he sent a Writing to the Senate, wherein he desired they would consider and find out some other ways of raising Money; and this he did not to abrogate that way of Tribute, but that they finding out no one more convenient, it might be established by them, though unwilling, and the Odium be taken off from himself. But because if Germanicus and Dryfus should speak their Opinions, the Senate might think they spake as he directed them, and so might leave the matter undiscussed, he forbade them to give any Vote at all. The Debate in the Senate was very high about it, and by Letters he was told, that some would endure any thing sooner than the twentieth part, whereupon he transferred the Payment upon Lands and Houses, and speedily without shewing how it should be paid, sent Officers up and down to take an account of the Wealth both of Cities and private Men, that out of fear of greater expence they might submit to the twentieth part. And his Design had its Success. But now in the Augustalia, or Games celebrated upon Augustus his Birth-day, it happened that a Mad-man sat down in the Seat of Julius Cæsar, and taking away his Crown, put it upon his own Head; and in the Opinion of Dio, it did really portend (as it was imagined) something to Augustus; for in the following year wherein Sex. Apuleius, and Sex. Pompeius were Consuls, going into Campania, and having exhibited the Speculaculum at Naples, he died at Nola.

112. His Wife Livia was suspected by some as having set him forward to another World. For not long before, he had gone without her knowledge into the Island to his Nephew Agrippa, and he seemed now to be reconciled to him, which the fearing might amount to as much at length as to deliver up the Empire into his hands, was thought to poison some particular Figs, as they grew in the Garden, and to avoid suspicion, to have her self eaten the whollom ones from the same tree. His Death is said to have been foretold by some tokens the year wherein he died. He made his third Consul, in the Lustrum whereof were found Four Millions and one hundred thirty seven thousand Polls of Roman Citizens. Celebrating the Lustrum in the Campus Martius, with great concourse of People, an Eagle they say flew about him several times, and directing her flight to a Chappel, sat down over the Name of Agrippa, at the first letter. Augustus considering this, commanded Tiberius to make those Vows, which it was the Custom to make for the following Lustrum. For though the Tables were written and ready, yet he refused to undertake that which he should not perform. About the same time the first Letter of his Name on his Statue in the Capitol was struck out by a Thunderbolt. Hereupon the Fortune-tellers said, he should live only One hundred days longer, which was signified by the letter C. and was to be reckoned amongst the gods, Æsar the rest of the Name in the Hætruscan Language, signifying a God. In the mean time he wrote a Breviary of his Actions, which he commanded to be cut in Brass and set before his Mausoleum. His time being come, he sent for his inward Acquaintance, and spoke what he had a mind to recommend to them, and told them this, That he received Rome made of Brick, but left it of Marble; by which expression, Dion Cassius tells us, he did not mean the Elegancy of the Structure, but the firmness of the Empire. Some say he called for a Looking-Glass, caused his hair to be Combed, and his wrinkled Cheeks smoothed up. Then like an Actor upon the Stage, he asked his Friends if he had performed his Part well, and upon their answer yea, he said Plaudite, and so died in the embraces of his beloved Wife Livia, bidding her remember their Marriage, and farewell. He died in the same Room as did Othavius his Father, and on the same Day (August the Nineteenth) on which he entered upon his first Consulship, having lived Seventy six years, all but thirty five days, having held the Monarchy from the Battle at Actium, as Dio computes, forty four years, wanting thirteen days, in the Seven hundred sixty seventh year of the City, the second of the One hundred ninety eighth Olympiad, the fifty seventh after the Death of Julius Caesar, and the fifteenth after the Birth of Christ, Sextus Pompeius, and Sextus Apuleius being Consuls.

His Character.

813. He was the Founder of the Roman Monarchy, his Uncle having been rather the chalker of it out. He obtained it with the Destruction of many Persons, and spared none to make way for his Purposes. Faults he had. He deceived Pompey under colour of Peace, and Lepidus under a show of Friendship, as some observed. He drew on Antony with the Treaties of Tarentum and Brundisium, and with the marriage of his Sister, which deceitful Alliance, they say, cost the other his life. A Peace followed this, but a bloody one, as witness the Death of Lollius and Varus, and in Rome it self of Varro, Egnatius, and Julius. It was objected against him, that he took Nero's Wife from him, and asked the Opinion of the Pontifex in a Scoff; Whether there might be a lawful Marriage betwixt them, she being still with Child by her former Husband. They forgot not the lasciviousness, and Riot (so Tacitus writes) of L. Atedius and Vedius Pollio, and to be sure not the demeanour of Livia, whom they esteemed a burthenfom, nay intollerable Mother to the Commonwealth; and to the House of the Cæsars, a dangerous Stepdame. They added, that there was no honour left for the gods, seeing he would himself by the Priests and Flamines be worshipped in the Temples, with all the Ornaments belonging to their Deities. They judged that Tiberius was designed Successor, neither out of love to himself, nor care of the Commonwealth, but out of a deep insight into his lofty and bloody disposition and design, that being so unequally compared with him, he might win glory afterward to himself. For though not many years before, he had uttered Honourable Speeches in the Senate concerning Tiberius; yet when he moved for the Tribuneship to be again renewed to him, he interlaced in his Speech some things concerning his Attire and Behaviour, which in excusing of him seemed to turn to his Reproach. But on the other side we have seen how kind and Popular he was. His Defects cannot be excused; but they must needs be heard, who in his Commendation alledge, that the Empire he bounded with the Ocean and other Rivers at a great distance, that the Legions, Provinces, and Navy were conjoynd in Peace and Unity, Justice was administred in the Cities, the Allies treated with Civility, the City beautified with sumptuous Buildings, and if rigorous dealing had been used against some few, it was setting of Peace and quietness in the whole.

CHAP. II.

From the Death of Augustus, to that of Tiberius.

The Space of Twenty and two years, seven Months, and odd Days.

1. THE Death of Augustus was not presently known. For Livia fearing Tiberius being as yet in Dalmatia, some stir might happen to his disadvantage, concealed it till his coming. So Dio tells us most Audaciously, concealed it till his coming. Though there were not wanting, who wrote that Tiberius was in his Sickness, and received something in Command from him. Tacitus makes it a doubt, whether Tiberius found him alive or dead; For Livia had beset the House, and gave out words sometimes as if he recovered, and having made all sure as the time and occasion required, the same rumour, which not long before gave hopes of Augustus his Amendment, now published his Death, and that Nero was in possession of the Empire. The Body of Augustus was by the Principals of the several Cities born from Nola to Rome in Courte; it was received by the Eques, and brought to Rome in the Night. The day after, the Senate assembled, to which the other Senators came onely in the Equestrian Habit, and the Magistrates in the Senatorian, except the Prætor. Tiberius and his Son Drusus came in common Mourning, and offered Prætexta. Tiberius the Trumpeter. The Senators sat in their Incense at their coming, omitting one on the Bench of the Prætorians, and the usual places, but the Consuls lower. Impunity was granted to Tiberius, for having touched, which was by Law forbidden, and accompanied the Body. Then did one Polybius a Libertus of Cæsar, read the Testament of Augustus, it not being thought fit that a Senator should read it; wherein he left most he had to Tiberius and Livia: For he had desired of the Senate, That he might have leave to give her more than was permitted by the Laws. He gave Legacies to many private persons, to those of the Prætorian Guards, and every Inhabitant of Rome. To the Sons of such as had left him their Heir, he commanded that the Inheritances should be restored; which indeed had been his practice all along. He was kind to the Children of other men, but his own Daughter he would not reduce into her Country; nay, he forbade she should be buried in his Sepulchre, though he left her something by his Will.

The Body of Augustus brought to Rome.

His Will read in the Senate.

And four other Writings.

2. Besides his Will, four Writings more were produced in the Senate. In one he had left Instructions concerning his Funeral. In another, an Enumeration was made of his Achievements, which he commanded should be cut in Pillars of Brass, and exposed before his Sepulchre. The third Writing contained an Account of the Number of the Forces, of the Publick Revenues and Issues; of what Money was in the Treasury, and other things belonging to the Publick Government. In the fourth he gave advice to Tiberius and the Commonwealth. Amongst other things it was his Opinion, That many Slaves should not be manumitted, lest the City should be pestered with a croud; nor many be made free of the City, that they might perceive a difference betwixt themselves and their Subjects. Then he would have them commit the Government to those that were most qualified for it, and not to put too much upon one man, lest he should turn Tyrant, or in his Ruin the Commonwealth might receive danger. He charged them to be content with their present Fortune, and not to desire to enlarge the Bounds of the Empire; for it being difficult to keep so much as they had already got, they would probably by endeavouring to get more, lose what they had already. And that this was his Opinion, he testified not only by Words but Actions; for though he might have brought many Barbarians under, yet he never would. His Funeral was performed in great State, and an Eagle let loose from the Pile as to carry his Soul to Heaven. Livia, and with her the chiefest of the Eques continued in the place five dayes, to gather up his Bones and put them into the Monument. Men mourned for him according to the Custom not many dayes, but Women an whole Year; as had been decreed. Indeed few really mourned for him at present, but afterwards all found reason to do it, whilst they had the sad occasion to compare him and his Successor together. But now at present, Temples were erected to him, and a Summe of Money was given by Livia to Numerius Atticus a Senator, and one of Prætorian Degree, for having seen that He saw him ascending up into Heaven, as Proculus antiently had said of Romulus.

Tiberius was by birth a Patrician, had liberal Education, and a Wit more than ordinary. He made no show of aiming at such things as he desired, and would use discourses contrary to his design; denying what he desired, and seeming to consent to what he disliked. By the practice of him and his Mother, Agrippa Postumus was Murdered ere the death of Augustus was known. He had secured the Sovereignty sufficiently by strong Hand, though he played the Dissembler most egregiously, refusing the Government so long as till the Senators fell down at his feet, and besought him to accept of it; whom he answered with ambiguous words, and at length complaining that a miserable and intolerable Servitude was imposed on him, received it as by constraint, and yet so as he seemed to signify that he would again relinquish it. Indeed there was cause for him to say, as he did, that he took a Wolf by the Ears. For Clemens the Slave of Agrippa had got a considerable party together, under pretence of revenging his Lord's death: Scribonius Libo secretly plotted his own advancement, and the Legions both in Germany and Illyricum mutined, the former chusing Germanicus for their Prince, who earnestly refused to accept of their Offer, and at length quieted them with much ado, as Drusus did the other in Pannonia, they being frightened into obedience by a total Eclipse of the Moon, which fell out on the 27th of September, five hours after Midnight. Clemens was apprehended, and Libo not effecting any thing, was in the second year accused to the Senate. Tiberius in the mean while looking carefully to himself, notwithstanding these motions, obtained the Supreme Power, betwixt which and his rule with Augustus for two years there was this difference; That his former Command extended only to the Armies and Provinces subject to Augustus, but this to the City it self Mistress of all. Formerly he had Tribunitial and Censorian Power; but now he became Monarch, and was loose or exempt from all power of Laws, as Augustus before him. For he had not together with him when living, so equal authority as afterwards L. Verus had with M. Antoninus the Philosopher; which two first governed the Commonwealth upon equal terms; but such like as Antoninus Pius had with Adrian, who also adopted him, and made him his Collegue in the Proconsular power as to Provinces, and in the Tribunitial power at home. And therefore Suetonius telleth us, that Tiberius first assembled the Senate by virtue of his Tribunitial Office only.

Tiberius at first dissembled his Vices.

Envieth Germanicus.

4. Tiberius at first carried himself (as ever in some cases) very cunningly, cloak-ing with marvelous dissimulation those enormities which afterwards appeared. For some time he counterfeited incredible patience, stooped too low in his complementing of Senators and Magistrates, rejected all high Titles and Honours (not enduring the name of Dominus or Lord) and consulted the Senate continually, not doing little or much without its consent; nay, suffering some things therein to be carried against his mind; he was also at first very temperate in his diet, and exact in reforming manners, by degrees falling into his natural humour. From the beginning he was much afflicted with the fame of Germanicus, his Brother Drusus his Son by Nature (begotten of Antonia the younger, Daughter of Antony the Triumvir, by Octavia the Sister of Augustus, concerning which Antonia, Pliny re-porteth that she never spate) and his own by adoption; who now prosperously carried on the War in Germany. Within two or three years a very plausible occasion presented it self for the calling of him back from those Legions which were so much at his devotion. For it hapned then that the Partians were in great commotions about their Kings. Phraates had twenty seven years before for his own security sent four of his Sons as Hostages to Rome, through the procurement of his Wife Thermusa an Italian woman, which having been formerly his Concu-bine had then a Son by him, and that this her Son might obtain the Crown, got the rest to be sent out of the way, and then they two murdered the King.
This Bastard called Phraataces reigned; but being hated by the People for his Paricide, was not long after slain, and then was set up one Orodes of the Family of the Arsacide, who being also hated for his cruelty came to the same end. Then sent the Partians for one of the Hostages, and Vonones the eldest was dismissed by Tiberius. But they counting it a disgrace for any to reign over them, who (as they termed it) had been a slave to Caesar, rebelliously cast him off, and called in Ariabannus, who then reigned, in Media, and was also one of the Arsacide or the Blood Royal of Parthia. He at his first entrance was repulsed by Vonones; but the second time overthrew him, and got possession of the Kingdom. Vonones retiring into Armenia sent to Tiberius for aid, who, for that Artabanus threatened hard, and the principal of the Armenians were of his faction, did not think fit to make War upon him: therefore Vonones yielded himself to Creticus Silanus, who governed Syria, and Artabanus let Orodes, one of his own Sons over Armenia. At the same time Antiochus King of Commagena dying, a contention arose betwixt the Nobility and Commons; the former would have the Countrey reduced into the form of a Roman Province, but the people were for a King. Now also Philopator King of Cilicia being dead, his subjects were divided upon the very same grounds. Syria also, and Judæa being weary of their burthens, desired a diminution of their Tributes.

5. Tiberius now persuaded the Senate that the abilities of Germanicus were requisite for quieting the East, whereupon the Provinces beyond the Seas were decreed to him, with larger power than had been granted to any that governed them, either by lot or the gift of the Prince. Germanicus was often importuned by Tiberius upon this ground to return, yet intent upon his business he first subdued several Nations in Germany, and by the overthrow of Arminius obtained great glory, which was something obscured at last by a Shipwreck. It was the design of Tiberius to expose him unto danger and treachery; therefore he removed Silanus his friend, and put Calpurnia a troward man into his room, to whom he gave in charge some secret thing as many believed. Germanicus, being thus expelled to compose the affairs of the East, as * one truly termeth it, placed Zeno the Son of Polemo King of Pontus over Armenia. Q. Perantius a Knight, had the oversight of Cappadocia, which was made a Province; for Archelaus the King thereof courted not Tiberius enough when he was at Rhodes, and therefore was called to Rome, and there kept till his Death. Q. Servatus also was set over Commagena. Artabanus sent to Germanicus about renewing the league, and good correspondence, desiring that Vonones might not be kept in Syria, nor suffered by his Messengers to sow discord amongst the People, offering him also leave to come to the bank of Euphrates; to which he answered, as became the State and himself. This year died Levy the Historian, who was born at Padua; and also Ovid the Poet, having remained a banished man in Pontus several years, whither the displeasure of Augustus confined him, either for that he had seen him do some unseemly thing which he would not have known, or for publishing his wanton books concerning Love, as he hints himself. This was the 771 year of the City, the nineteenth after the birth of Christ, Tiberius Augustus the third, and Germanicus Caesar the second time being Consul.

6. Germanicus the year following made a Voyage into Egypt, to view it for the rarity of its Antiquities, for which he was chidden by Tiberius, as going without his leave. Thence returning into Syria, he was most shamefully, and without any measure affronted by Piso, and at length died of a lingering Disease at Antioch, being thought to miscarry by the fraud of Tiberius, and the Ministry of Piso, who plainly said, That he must either displease Father or Son. But the fruit he reaped in pleading thus the Father; was but unpleasing; for returning to Rome the year following, he escaped narrowly tearing in pieces by the People, and being condemned by the Senate, killed himself. For Germanicus there was an universal mourning, not only in Rome and the Provinces, but also amongst Barbarians and Enemies themselves. He was a Person excellently accomplished, and of a most sweet disposition, whereby he became the love and delight of the People, and Augustus long debating with himself whether he should not leave him his Successor, at length caused Tiberius to adopt him, who 'tis thought, being restrained by fear, and reverence of him, after his Death broke out into such courses as made the other more mislead and glorious. By his Wife Agrippina (the Daughter of Agrippa and Julia) he died Father of three Sons, viz. Nero, Drusus, and Caius; and of as many Daughters. He died in the thirtieth fourth year of his Age, and that which followed his second Consulship, M. Junius Sallustian, and C. Norbanus Flaccus being Consuls.

7. Three or four years after was Tiberius punished in his own kind by the poisoning of his own Son Drusus, and so by his greatest Favourite Ælius Sejanus. This man being the Son of Seius Strabo a Roman Knight, when very young, followed Caius the Nephew of Augustus, and afterwards by divers Arts wound himself into the Affections of Tiberius, who used him as his most inward Counsellor, or Minister of State, and erected to his honour his Statue of Brafs in the Theatre. Now he thought of no less than the Empire it self, as a step to which, he poisoned Drusus the Son of Tiberius, having brought Livia the young man's Wife to a compliance with him by his filthy dalliance, and corrupted Lygdamus the Eunuch to betray his Trust. Drusus had the year before the Tribunitial Power conferred on him; but for that he was none of the most towardsly, was little regarded by his Father, who as soon as his Funeral was over, returned to his wonted Employments, forbidding any longer vacation upon his account. The Inhabitants of Ulm sending their Ambassadors something too late to condole his death, he answered, that He also was sorry for the death of Hector their excellent Countryman. Tiberius after this commended the two Sons of Germanicus, Nero and Claudius, to the Senate; which done, Sejanus began to strike at them, though at first through the fides of their Mother, labouring to bring them all into suspicion and hatred. The first advantage he took was from the Prayers of the Priests, who made Vows for their Health, as for that of Tiberius; for he took it hainously, that they here in should be made equal to him. Then did he provoke them, and never ceased till he caused them to be declared Enemies by the Senate, after which he starved them to death, using also their Mother most injuriously, for that she was not sparing of her Tongue in reprehending and upbraiding him. Now was Tacfarinas, who had maintained a tedious War in Africa, slain by Dolabella. As for Tiberius, by the persuasion of Sejanus, he withdrew into the Isle Capreae, and thence forward minding nothing, gave up himself to all sorts of enormities.

8. For, casting off all care of the State, being out of fight, he returned to his natural disposition, not looking to the supply, either of Army or Provinces; suffering Armenia to be seized on by the Parthians, Mesia by the Dacians and Sarmatians, and Gall to be wasted by the Germans. He instituted a new Office for the management of Pleasures, unto which he preferred a Knight, T. Calpurnius Priscus. He held such in greatest esteem, and bestowed Offices on men that were most for his turn that way, being given up to such beastliness as is incredible, and not to be mentioned. He was excessively covetous, both as to getting, and keeping what was unjust. He was so unprofitful to his Mother, as he refused to come at her, when living; and when dead, he neglected to bury her; neither would he perform her Will, but persecuted her Friends; but she was justly rewarded (though as to him unjustly) having over and above other wicked practices, being suspected to have had an hand in the death of Germanicus. So cruel, and filthy he became, that he verified the Character given him, when but young, by Theodorus Gadareus his School-master, that he was καὶ τὸν ἀνθρώπου καὶ τοῦ θεοῦ διὰ τὸν αἵμα. Having chosen Twenty of the Principal Men of the City to be his Counsellors, he scarcely left two or three of them alive, Sejanus being found out, and punished justly for his wickedness. Amongst others that were innocent, he spared not the familiar Friends of his Mother, Nephews, Agrippina or Sejanus. No day either holy or prophane was free from slaughters. Every offence little or great was Capital. Many were condemned with their Wives and Children. Rewards were propofed to Informers, and all Testimonies taken for true. Simple death he accounted nothing, and therefore invented painful waies; especially after he knew how his Son Drusus died, he neither spared any person nor sort of Torments. Caius the Son of Germanicus he cared not for, as suspecting him; and Tiberius his Grandson by Drusus he despised, as conceived in Adultery.

9. In the Twelfth year of Tiberius was Pontius Pilate sent into Judea to succeed Valerius Gratus, the fourth Governour after the banishment of Archelaus, the Son of Herod to Vienna. Coponius was the first, M. Ambrius was the second, Annius Rufus the third, and Gratus the fourth. Pilate at his first entrance set up the Images of Cæsar at Jerusalem, which moved the Jews to Sedition; but overcome by their intreaties, he removed them to Cæsarea. He being now Governor of Judea, Herod Antipas Tetrarch of Galilee, his Brother Philip Tetrarch of Ituraea and Trachonitis, and Lysanias of Ablene, Annas (who, formerly having had the Office, though displaced by Gratus, yet for his authority still carried the name) and Caiaphas (otherwise called Joseph, whom lately Gratus had placed in the room of Simon, by him deposed also) being High-Priests, in the Fifteenth year of Tiberius entering, John Baptist began to Preach and Baptize in the resemblance and spirit of Elias. Amongst others he Baptized Christ himself, of whom he was the fore-runner. His Ministry is thought to have commenced on the Tenth day of the Seventh Month, which was Penitential, and so great a Fest, that the foul which did not afflict it self, was to be cut off from amongst it's People; and was also Expiatorie, wherein the High-Priest (the Type of him before whose face John was sent) entred into the Holy of Holies alone, with blood expiating the sins of the People, this being also the same day wherein by Trumpet the Jubile was proclaimed.

10. Jesus now about Thirty years of age, being baptized of John in Jordan (and owned for the Messiah and Son of God, by the descending of the Holy Ghost in the form of a Dove, and resting upon him, as also by a Voice from Heaven) was led of the Spirit into the Wilderness to be tempted of the Devil. After his temptation he returned in the Power of the Spirit into Galilee. Going into Galilee he received Andrew and Simon his Brother, the day following called Philip of Bethsaida the City of Andrew, and Simon surnamed Cephas or Peter by the Lord. On the third day being invited to a Marriage in Cana of Galilee, he turned Water into Wine, this being his first Miracle, and by it his glory was manifested, and his Disciples believed in him. Afterward he went down to Capernaum with his Mother, his Brethren, (or Kinsmen) and Disciples, where they abode not many days. Then came he to the exercise of his Ministry, the Acts whereof are distinguished by four Passovers. Amongst the four Evangelists which describe them, Matthew alone hath neglected the order of time, which is constantly observed by the rest, except in the History of John's casting into Prison, as Luke hath recorded it.

11. Jesus having ascended to Jerusalem at the time of the first Passover, cast buyers and sellers out of the Temple, wrought Miracles, and instructed Nicodemus in the mystery of Regeneration, and Faith in himself. Leaving then Jerusalem, he went into Judea with his Disciples, where abiding, he baptized by the Ministry of them; John then baptizing in Amon; for he was not yet cast in to Prison. A certain question arose about Purifying, betwixt some of John's Disciples and the Jews. John instructed now his Disciples concerning Christ the last time, as they told him of his ads with some emulation, and not long after he was cast into Prison, for reprehending Herod the Tetrarch his Incest with his Brother Philip's Wife. Jesus hearing of his Captivity, and that the Pharisees took notice that he baptized more by the hands of his Disciples, departed out of Judea (where he had remained some Eight moneths) and came into Galilee. In his passage through Samarita he discoursed with a Woman at a Well near unto the City Sychar, the Inhabitants of which by her means he brought to the acknowledgment of himself, four moneths before Harvest, or the Passover, about the middle of the Ninth Month called Ab. Having stayed two days at Sychar, he proceeded, and returned the second time into Galilee out of Judea after his Baptism, being received with great respect by the Galileans, who had seen what he did at Jerusalem. Preaching in their Synagogues here, he also healed at Cana, the Son of the Nobleman that was sick at Capernaum, which was his second Miracle in Galilee. Having wrought Miracles at Capernaum, he went to Nazareth, where he had been brought up, and expounding the Prophet Esay concerning himself, they first admired, and then cast him out, and would have thrown him down headlong, but he passed away through the midst of them.

12. Leaving then Nazareth, he taught at Capernaum, where they were astonished at his Doctrine, and cast out an unclean spirit that was first commanded silence. Departing out of the Synagogue into the house of Simon and Andrew, he cured of a Fever Simon's Wife's Mother. At Sun-set he healed sick Folks brought to him, and cast out Devils, first put to silence. In the Morning he went out into a desert place to Pray, and the multitudes endeavouring to detain him, he answered, He must also Preach in other places; and coasting through Galilee, he Preached in their Synagogues, and cast out Devils. Then taught he the People out of Simon's Ship on the Lake of Genesareth, and helped them to a miraculous draught of Fishes; whereupon Simon Peter, Andrew, James, and John, being commanded to follow him, he maketh Fishers of men. Then going through all Galilee healing and teaching, his Fame spread through Syria, and multitudes flocked to him. In a certain City he healed a Leper, which though forbidden, yet moved his Fame, and such Companies now followed him that he could not enter the City, but taught without in desert places, and prayed. After a few days he returned to Capernaum, and teaching in his own house he healed the Paralitic, who was let down in a Bed, and forgave him his sins before the Pharisees. Thence going towards the Sea he taught, and passing by called Levi or Matthew, then sitting at the recit of Custom, by whom being feasted, he defended his Disciples against the Pharisees, for eating with Publicans and Sinners, and for not fasting. And it came to pass, that on the second Sabbath after the first (that is, on the second Sabbath of the new year, instituted after their return out of Egypt, and beginning with the Month Nisan or Abib) Jesus passing through the Corn-Fields, defended his Disciples, who plucked and eat ears of Corn, against the Pharisees, and explained the Doctrine of the observance of the Sabbath.

Passover.

13. After these things there was a Feast of the Jews, (that is, the second Passover John 4. of his Ministry) and Jesus went up to Jerusalem, where on the Sabbath-day he healed one who had layn 38 years diseased at the Pool of Bethesda, for which thing, and because he had called God his Father, the Jews went about to kill him, and he opposed against them his most Divine Apology. Departing thence, in the Synagogue, on another Sabbath, he healed a man that had a withered hand, for which the Pharisees and Herodians presently fought to kill him. Jesus knowing this, departed to the Sea, where teaching the People, he commanded a little Vessel to wait on him, because the multitude crowded him. In these days he spent a whole Night in Prayer upon a Mountain, and when it was day, made choice of Twelve, whom he called Apostles. Going down into the Plain he healed the Sick, and coming home, such was the press, that they could not eat, whereupon his Friends came to take him; supposing he had been besides himself. When he had seen the multitude he ascended into the Mountain, and his Disciples coming to him, there he Preached his long Sermon, first speaking to the Apostles, and then to the multitude. Having ended all his words in the audience of the People, he entered into Capernaum, and healed the Centurion's Servant ready to die. The day following he raised from the dead the Widow's Son in the City Naim, whence his Fame was spread abroad. Then sent John his Disciples from Prison to him, to ask Whether he was the man, or they must look for another; who being departed with an answer, Christ took occasion to speak of John, and upbraided the Cities, acquiescing in the Will of his Father as to the revealing or hiding the things of Salvation. Then Simon the Pharisee inviting him to Dinner, a Woman that was a sinner washed his feet with her tears, which defending against Simon, he forgave her her sins. And it came to pass, afterward, that he Preached through every City and Village, his Disciples being with him, and certain Women ministering to him, amongst which was Joanna the Wife of Chusa, Herod's Steward. Then healed he a man possessed with a dumb and deaf Devil, and defended himself against the Pharisees, who said, that he cast out Devils by Beelzebub Prince of Devils. To the Scribes and Pharisees demanding a sign, he only giveth that of Jonas, and his Mother and Brethren asking to speak with him, he declareth who are his nearest Relations. On that day going to the Sea, he taught the People from the Ship in the Parable of the Sower and others. On this same day when it was Evening, he would they should pass to the further side, and having dismissed the multitude, when in their passage a great Tempest arose, he chiding the Winds stilled the Sea, and saved his Disciples then in danger. Coming unto the further side into the Country of the Gaderens, or Gergesens, which lyeth over against Galile, two Dæmoniacks met him, exceeding fierce, (whereof Mark and Luke mention but one) out of which he casting the Devils, permitted them to enter into the Swine. The Gaderens hereupon desiring him to depart out of their Coasts, he (having dismissed the man who desired to be with him, and upon refusal, Preached throughout Decapolis what things Jesus had done for him) returned by Ship unto the further side, and so to Capernaum his own City.

14. And it came to pass, that when Jesus was returned, the People gladly received him; for they were all waiting for him. And being by the Sea-side, he answered the Disciples of John, inquiring why his Disciples fasted not, seeing they, and the Disciples of the Pharisees fasted often. Whilst he spake, he was brought to heal the only Daughter of Jairus; and as he was going down, a Woman that had an issue of blood Twelve years, was by touching the hem of his Garment made whole. Passing thence, he cured two blind men, whom he charged with threatening to say nothing of him; but in vain. As they passed away, a man possessed with a dumb Devil was presented unto him, whom he healed, the company admiring, and the Pharisees blaspheming. Then going about to all the Towns, he Taught and healed, and coming into his own Country was contemned again by his Country-men, as he taught in the Synagogue on the Sabbath-day, they calling him Carpenter, though they admired him. Going about the Villages he taught, and pitying the multitude because the Harvest was great and the Labourers

ers few, he bade his Disciples Pray for Labourers into the Harvest. Then sent he out his Twelve Disciples two and two, commissioned with Power to preach and heal. Having made an end of commanding them, he went and Preached in their Cities: and the Twelve went about the Villages, teaching and healing every where. Now about this time was John Baptist beheaded, through the procurement of Herodias, which being told unto Jesus by his Disciples, who buried him, alter the return of his own, he went with them by Ship into a desert place called Bethsaida. The multitude hearing of it, got thither before him, where he taught and healed them. And Jesus went up into a Mountain, and there sat with his Disciples, and the Passover was nigh. It being late, he having Compassion on the multitude, fed the number of Five thousand men (besides Women and Children) with five Barly Loaves, and two small Filches, whereof twelve Baskets full of fragments were taken up. When they would come and take him by force to make him a King, he caused his Disciples to pass over to the other side opposite to Bethsaida, and towards Capernaum. Having Prayed in a Mountain apart, he came towards his Disciples, walking upon the Sea, when they had now rowed Twenty five or Thirty Furlongs, and were troubled with a contrary Wind. They being affrighted at him, he made known himself, and saving Peter (who had desired he would bid him come to him on the Water) when he was sinking, he passed over with them. Coming into the Land of Genesaret, they brought all sorts of diseased persons to him, desiring they might touch but the hem of his Garment, which as many as touched were made whole. The day after his passage came the People which he had left on the further side to Capernaum to seek him, where in the Synagogue he Preached concerning the Bread of Life, ascribing himself to be it against the murmuring of the Jews. Many now of his Disciples departed from and walked no more with him. And though the Twelve refused to depart, yet he declared that one of them was a Devil, meaning Judas Iscariot, who should betray him, being one of the Twelve.

The third Passover.

15. After the Third Passover of his Ministry, the Scribes and Pharisees that were come from Jerusalem came to him, and complained that his Disciples eat with unwashed hands; To whom he answered concerning their abolishing God's Commands by their Traditions, and taught the multitude what he declared to his Disciples, that Not what entereth in, but what cometh out, defileth a man. Departing into the Coasts of Tyre and Sidon, he cast the Devil out of the Daughter of the Syrophenician Woman, because of the greatness of her Faith. Passing thence to the Sea of Galile through the midst of Decapolis, he healed a deaf man, who had an impediment in his speech, and ascending into a Mountain healed many. In those days a great multitude having stayed with him three days, he fed them to the number of Four thousand Men, besides Women and Children, with seven Loaves, and a few little Filches; and seven baskets full of fragments were taken up. Taking Ship presently, he came into the Parts of Dalmathia, or the Coasts of Magdala. The Pharisees asking a sign, he sighed deeply in his Spirit, for that these Hypocrites could discern the face of the Sky, and not the signs of the times; and refusing to give them any other sign than that of Jonas, he left them, and returned by ship to the further side. His Disciples having forgot to take Bread, and brought but one Loaf with them, he bids them beware of the Leaven of the Pharisees: and of Herod; and expounded his meaning to be of the Leaven of Doctrine. Coming then to Bethsaida, he cured a blind man by degrees without the Town. Passing thence into the Towns of Cæsarea-Philippi, he asked his Disciples concerning the opinion which men had of him, and then what they themselves thought; To which for themselves Peter answered, That he was the Christ; which thing he forbade them to declare, foretold his Death and Resurrection, called Peter Satan, for checking him about his Sufferings, and foretold his Transfiguration, which after some six days was fulfilled. The day following coming down, he cast out a Devil out of the Lunatick, which his Disciples could not eject. Passing thence, they journeyed through Galile, which he would not have known, and taught his Disciples that he must die, and rise again; which they understanding not were troubled, and afraid to ask him. Being arrived at Capernaum, the Lord paid Tribute-money, and taught his Disciples Humility by the example of a little Child; speaking also against offending one's weak Brother, and forgiving one another seventy seven times by the Parable of the King's two debtors. John telling him that they had seen one casting out Devils in his Name, he said he was not to be forbidden; and again spake against offending weak ones, and bade them them beware that no Member offended them. After these things Jesus walked in Galilee, for he would not walk in Jury, because the Jews sought to kill him. Now the Jews Feast of Tabernacles (the Scenopagia) was at hand. His Brethren, or Kinsmen, willed him to go up that his Disciples might believe in him; but he refused to comply with them therein who themselves believed not, and went up after them, not openly, but as it were in secret. When he should be received up, he stedfastly set to comply not openly, but as it were in secret.

10. When the time was come that he should be received up, he stedfastly fet his face to go to Jerusalem. The Samaritans not receiving him, he checked his Disciples, who would have had fire called down from Heaven upon them. Several in his passage desiring to follow him, he gave answer to them all. After these things he went out Seventy Disciples before his face, two into every City and Place where he would come. And in the midst of the Feast when the multitude was buisie in laying inquiring about him, he came, and taught in the Temple. Some were sent to lay hold of him. On the last and great day of the Feast, when he spake of Faith in himself, a great difference arose, and the Messengers that were sent to apprehend him, with Nicodemus, defended him against the Pharisees. Departing into the Mount of Olives, he returned early in the morning, and refused as a Judge to condemn the Woman taken in Adultery. In the Treasury he spake much concerning many Truths, concluding with before Abraham was, I am; whereupon the Jews took up stones to cast at him; but he hid himself, and passed away through the midst of them. Passing by, he saw and cured a man that was born blind, who for vindicating him was cast out of the Synagogue. He then Preached concerning the true Shepherd, Sheep, and Door, as also of Thieves and Mercenaries, which caused a division amongst his hearers. The Seventy then return with joy, and a certain Lawyer asking him what he should do to inherit eternal life, he sendeth him to the Law, and to declare who is our Neighbour, speaketh the Parable of the man that fell amongst Thieves. After this he was entertained in the house of Martha, which ministred to him, while her Sister Mary hearing his Word was preferred before her. And it came to pass that after he had done praying in a certain place, one of his Disciples desired him to teach them to Pray, as Jobn also taught his Disciples; therefore he preferred the second time the same Lord's Prayer, adding arguments for constancy and firmness of Faith. He cast out a Devil which was dumb, and proved against the blasphemers that he did it not by Beelzebub. While he said these things, a certain Woman said, Blessed is the Womb that bare thee, and the Paps that gave thee suck, to which he answered. The multitude gathering about him, he said, that Generation sought for a sign, but no sign, but that of Jonas the Prophet should be given it, saying, that the Queen of the South, and the Ninevites, should condemn it in judgment. Dining with a Pharisee who had invited him, and wondered that he washed not, he spake against their Hypocricie, and denounced all Woes against the Expofitors of the Law. He bade his Disciples beware of the Leaven of the Pharisees (Hypocricie) and not fear those that could kill the body. He refused to be a Judge betwixt a man and his Brother about the Inheritance, and thence took occasion to speak against anxious Cares of the World, bidding them be ready against the uncertain time of their Lord's coming.

11. The next day he would Jesus of the Galileans, the bloud of whom read against the uncertain time of their Lord's coming:

 17. There being some that told Jesus of the Galileans, the blood of whom Pilate mingled with their Sacrifice, he took thence occasion to press repentance, and spake the Parable of the barren Fig-Tree. On a certain Sabbath he healed a Woman that had a spirit of infirmity Eighteen years, which act he defended against the Ruler of the Synagogue, and compared the Kingdom of God to a Grain of Mustard-seed, and to Leaven. Journeying towards Jerusalem to the Feast of the Dedication, he Taught through the Cities and Villages, who bade him be gone for fear of Herod, he gave a courageous answer. Being invited to eat in the house of one of the chiefest Pharisees, he healed one of the Droopie, defended it, and spake the Parable of those that were invited to a Feast, instructing the Pharisee who had invited him. One of the Guests saying, that Blessed is he that shall eat bread in the Kingdom of God, he took occasion to speak the Parable of the great Supper, and the excuses of such as were invited. To the multitude following him he Preached concerning the denial of life it self for his sake, propounding the Parable of the Wise and Foolish Virgins, and the King going to Babel. Upon the Phari-
sans and Sinners their coming to hear him, the Pharisees murmured, and he spake to them the Parables of the lost sheep, the goat, and the Prodigal Son. To his Disciples he also spake that of the Unjust Steward, which applying, the Pharisees who

who were covetous derided him, whereupon Preaching against them, amongst other things he spake the Parable of the Rich man and Lazarus. Speaking to his Disciples against offences, he also teacheth that we must forgive our offending brother. The Apostles desiring him to increase their Faith, he speaketh of the power of that Grace, and by the Parable of the servant theweth, that when we have done all we can we are unprofitable servants, having done but what we ought. Passing through Samaria and Galilee, towards Jerusalem, he healed the ten Lepers, whereof one only returned and praised God. To the Pharisees asking him when the Kingdom of God should come, he answereth, and declareth to his Disciples, that the day of the Son of Man should be like to those of Noah and Lot, but he must first suffer many things. To incourage his Disciples to Pray, he spake the Parable of the unjust Judge: and to some that thought themselves righteous and despised others, that of the Pharisee and the Publican.

18. At the Fest of Dedication, when it was Winter, Jesus walking in Salomon's Porch, to the Jews, who had him tell them plainly whether he was Christ or not, he answered, that He and his father are one, whereupon they taking up stones to throw at him, he defended his Divinity by his works, and the Scriptures, and escaped when they fought to take him. Passing beyond Jordan into that place where John baptized, he taught and healed, many believing on him, and answered the Pharisees tempting him, that it is unlawful for a man to put away his wife, except for Adultery. Now admitted he infants, though his Disciples rebuked such as brought them, and as he was passing thence to come into the way, he answered the young Rich man that asked him what he should do to inherit eternal life, and bad him tell him all he had, and give it to the poor, then to follow him. Hearing that Lazarus was sick, he abode in the place where he was two days, and then coming to Bethany, after he had been dead four days, raised him from the dead. Hereupon Caiphas Prophecying that he was to die for the people, they resolved to put him to death; which he understanding, went into the City Ephraim, and there taught. Ascending towards Jerusalem, he went before his Disciples, who were amazed and afraid. He now told them of his Sufferings, which they did not at all understand; and the Sons of Zebedee asking to sit on his right and left hand in his Kingdom, he gave them a repulse, and improved it to the Teaching them all humility. Coming near to Jericho he healed a blind man. In Jericho he called, and was entertained by Zacharias, and passing thence restored sight to two blind men, whereof one was Bartimeus; when they drew near to Jerusalem, they thinking that the Kingdom of God was near, he spake the Parable of the King, who going a journey committed ten Talents to his servants to be improved till his Return. The Passover being now at hand, many went up to Jerusalem, to purify themselves, and Jesus, six days before it, came to Bethany, where they made him a Supper. Lazarus sat at Table with him, but Mary anointed his feet, and wiped them with her hair. Many of the Jews came, not only to see him, but Lazarus also, upon which account, for that many believed on him, the Chief Priests consulted also to kill Lazarus. Going towards Jerusalem, when he was come nigh to Bethpasse and Bethany, at the Mount of Olives (on the twenty ninth of March) he sent his Disciples for the Ass's Colt whereon he rode to Jerusalem. When he came near the City he wept over it, foretelling its final destruction. Out of the Temple he cast Buyers and Sellers, where the Children cried Hosanna, and many believed on him, the great ones studying how to kill him. Certain Greeks who were come to the Fest desiring to see him, he Preached concerning his Passion, and had a voice from Heaven answering his Prayer, which some thought to be of an Angel, and others of Thunder. It being late, he went to Bethany with the Twelve. Notwithstanding, the multitude had been so many works, yet they believed not, that the Saying of Elijah might be fulfilled. Yet many of the Chief Priests believed on him, but durst not confess him, for the Pharisees. Jesus cried, and spake concerning Faith in himself.

19. The next morning as he returned he hungered, and cursed the barren Fig-tree: He cast Buryers and Sellers again out of the Temple, and suffered nothing to be carried through it. Whilst he taught concerning Faith in himself, the Chief Priests consulted how to kill him, fearing the People. At evening he went out of the City and returning in the morning, his Disciples found the Fig-tree withered; whereupon he took occasion to Preach concerning the power of Faith. As he taught in the Temple, the Chief Priests, and Pharisees, and Elders, asked him by what Authority he did these things: to whom he answered with another question concerning

John's Authority, spake the Parable of the two sons, asking them, whether did the Will of his Father: and that of the husbandmen, who killed the heir of the vineyard, applying them to these men, who now studied how to apprehend him, but feared the People. Again, he spake to them the Parable of the marriage of the King's Son, and the Excuses of the invited, with the Want of the Wedding-garment. Then the Pharisees sent some to entrap him in his Talk, who asking him whether it was lawful to give tribute to Cæsar? admired his Answer, and left him. On that day the Sadducees asked him concerning the woman married to seven Husbands, whose he should be at the Resurrection: to which having answered, and asserted the Resurrection, a Lawyer tempted him, asking him, which is the greatest Commandment? Having answered him, he asked the Pharisees whose Son Christ is? and no man could answer him any thing, nor durst thenceforth ask him any more questions. Then speaking of the Scribes and Pharisees, he pronounced eight Woes against them, and upbraiding Jerusalem with her cruelty and obduracy, foretelleth her destruction. Sitting over against the Treasury, he saw a poor Widow cast in two mites; and going out to his Disciples, who admired the Structure, he foretold its ruine. His Disciples asked him on the Mount of Olives, when these things should be, concerning the Sign of his coming, and the end of the World; he answered largely, advising them to watch, for they knew not what hour their Lord would come, illustrating his Doctrine by the Parable of the Ten Virgins, and the talents committed to the servants, to traffick. And he described the last Judgment by a Severing of goats from the sheep. By day he taught, at night he went to the Mount of Olives, and all the People came in the morning to hear him in the Temple. When he had ended these Sayings, he said to his Disciples, You know that after two days is the Feast of the Passover, and the Son of man is betrayed to be crucified. The great ones assembling in the house of Caiaphas the High-Priest, consulted how to kill him; but they said, not on the Feast-day, lest there be an uproar amongst the People. Jesus being in Bethany in the house of Simon the Leper, a woman poured Ointment upon his head, which he defended against his Disciples, foretelling his Burial. Then entered Satan into Judas, who offered himself, and coveted for Money to betray him.

20. In the Fourth Passover Jesus himself, Our Passover, was offered, and an end thereby was put to all Sacrifices, which were but types of this. Some think that he did not this time eat the Paschal Lamb, but only unleavened Bread and bitter Herbs, such as were used by those that could not come up to the Sacrifice, being in another Country. For a learned Man distinguisheth betwixt adage Siouyou and paschal Siouyou, which later was performed by those that were a far off, in memorial of the thing, it being unlawful to kill the Lamb any where out of Judæa. Now Christ would not sacrifice, because he himself was now to be offered. That he did not do it, appeareth, because as soon as he came into the house he sat down; and this many of the ancient Greek Fathers did believe. These words of Christ, with desire I have desired to eat this Passover with you before I suffer, the same learned Man expoundeth as meant, that he hastened to that Supper because the time of his death was at hand, which would take from him the liberty of celebrating the adage Siouyou. It being granted that he kept the Passover a day before the Jews observed it, (2) another contendeth that Christ kept it on the true day, and that the Jews receding from the Law, put it off till the following day, or the fifteenth of the Month Nisan, being the Sabbath, lest they should be debared of working for two days together. But the other opinion is more probable, which holdeth that he anticipated it, being as the true Passover, to be offered up on the true day of killing the Passover, which fell out on the day preceding the Sabbath, and not on the Sabbath day. It clearly appeareth in Scripture, what things our Lord did and suffered for unworthy Sinners, after he had eaten this Supper, though the order of the former passages concerning his Preaching be obscure, and therefore we have more largely described them. Being betrayed by Judas into the hands of the Chief-Priests, and by them delivered up to Pilate the Governour, he, convinced of his innocence and their malice, sought how to deliver him, till they told him, that if he did it he was not Cæsar's friend; whereupon fearing to be accused to Tiberius, of Protecting one who affected the Kingdom, he condemned him, and delivered him to the Soldiers to be Crucified. This was about the sixth hour, or a little after Noon, at what time a great darkness arose, for the Sun was obscured, and so continued till the ninth hour, or three of the clock. Then Christ to shew the bitterness of his torment cried (yet) with with a loud voice, Eli Eli Lamasabachani, and receiving the Vinegar, after he had commended his Soul into the hands of his Father, gave up the Ghost. Thus he who was in the form of God, and counted it no Robbery to be equal with God, made himself of no reputation, and suffered Death, even the (most ignominious) death of the Cross for ingrateful men.

21. Some think that the darkness which happened at our Saviour's Passion, was only in the Land of Judæa. But others, finding that the Evangelists mention * the whole Earth, conclude that this Eclipse was Occumenical or Universal, Luke 23:44. expressly saying, That the Sun it self (the eye of the whole World) was darkened. Some conceived that the Sun was darkened by the interposition of the Body of the Moon, whereof (a) Dionysius the Areopagite (as he calleth himself) was an eye-witness, at what time he and Apollonides the Philosopher being at Heliospolis, observed the Moon suddenly to cast her self before the Sun (though it was not the time of Conjunction) and again from the ninth hour to the evening, opposing her self to the middle line of the Sun. If so, it was an extraordinary miracle, the Moon being now at the full (as b) St. Augustine observeth it to have been ever at the Passover) and consequently at the greatest distance from the Sun, out of which De lib. 1. c. 15. respect others seem to have held, that the Sun was darkened, not by the interposition of that luminary, but the retention of his beams. That the darkness was Universal, appeareth from the Records of Heathen Writers, which, as (c) Orosius (c) Orosius (c) lib. 7. c. 4. faith, besides the Evangelists, mentioned the greatness of the Eclipse. And (d) Tertullian writing to Pagans faith, You cannot make this wonder supposed, seeing your own Calendars have remarked it, and your selves retain the testimonies thereof in your own registers. Amongst Greek Authors, Phlegon (e) Trajanus the Freed-(e) Phlegon (e) Trajanus the Freed- man of Adrian the Emperour, in his Work of Olympiads or Chronicle, which consisted of sixteen Books, clearly spake of this Eclipse, writing in his thirteenth Book, that in the fourth year of the 202 Olympiad, the greatest Eclipse happened that ever was known; for, at the sixth hour of the day it was night, so that the Stars were seen in the Heavens.

22. That Christ was put to Death in the reign of Tiberius by Pontius Pilate (a) (a) Anst. Cornelius Tacitus writeth, an Author guilty of Ethnic ignorance, and prejudice. (a) Cornelius Tacitus writeth, an Author guilty of Ethnic ignorance, and prejudice. But (b) Josephus the noble Jewish Historian giveth him an honourable testimony, (b) Josephus the noble Jewish Historian giveth him an honourable testimony. writing, That At the same time there was one Jesus a wise man, if it be lawful to call him a man; For he was a worker of wonderful works, and a teacher of those which willingly receive the truth. He had also many followers, not only Jews but Gentiles: and he was believed to be Christ. And whereas by the malice of our Princes, Pilate condemned him to be crucified, yet notwithstanding they who first loved him have persevered. For he appeared to them alive the third day; the Prophets having foretold in their writings, these, and many other wonderful things concerning him: and to this day the People from him called Christians hath not ceased. This he relateth, after he had spoken of that Sedition which happened because of Pilate his bringing in of Cæsar's Images. Some from amongst our selves have not given credit to this relation, thinking it to be foisted in by some Christians, for the greater honour of our Religion. But as the pia fraudes supposed to have been used by the Primitive Christians, are rather incredible than otherwise, by some, who either pedantically, and out of ostentation seek for applause from the prejudice of their own cause (as one hath done of late in reference to the matter in hand) or as out of a melancholick and distrustful humour question the evidence of the truth; so is there no reason that this testimony should be condemned amongst them. For Josephus maketh mention of John Baptist, giving him large commendations, and relateth also that he was beheaded; though he assigneth the cause to have been out of jealousy of him, and left he should make some commotions through his popularity, which likely enough might be some cause, especially the malice of Herodias considered, which woman would not be wanting to fill his head with suspicion, although the main reason was his reproving of the incest. He also maketh mention of James the Brother of Alphaeus, whom he calleth the brother of Jesus Christ, how he was put to death at Jerusalem, saying, that all good men were sorely troubled at it; and clearly expresseth himself dissatisfied in it, writing, that Annas, who commanded the Murder to be done, did ill, and this he saith not only because the Judicial power was taken away from the Jews, as is evident from the course of his words.

23. It is hence clear enough, that Josephus was not in the number of those whom Herod Agrippa could have pleased in the killing of the other James, the brother brother of John; and truly amongst the Jews, such as were not extremely malicious against Christ, were something inclining to him, if we consider the temper of that People. It cannot therefore be said, that Josephus was so inveterately despightful against Christ and Christians, that, as some have thought, he utterly passed over the story of Christ upon that account. This Principle would have induced him to rail rather than to be silent, to bespatter the Christian generation, rather than to say nothing, or especially to seem displeased at their sufferings. It's true, he was with the younger Agrippa, but almost a Christian, and therefore we rather follow the translation of Jerome, which rendereth his words credebatur esse Christum, than to take them as Eusebius and Rufinus have them, and as they are found in the present copies, ὁ χριστὸς ἦν, Christus hic erat. But some there were amongst the learnerd sort of Jews, who knew not really what to blame as to Christ, may they believed in him, only they desired still to keep the Law, such was their tendency, and expected a Messiah to reign at Jerusalem. But Josephus lived to see Jerusalem utterly destroyed, and thereby an occasion for such an advantage taken away; and affliction maketh men more seriously to consider things; so that he might be favourable enough towards Christ himself though as to the Law he might still be pertinacious, as many of them were. Eusebius writeth, that the Verbes of Sibylla were accounted by some as feigned by the Ecclesiasticks, but not a word of this matter.

24. The Jews had great expectations of the Coming of the Messiah, at that very time when the Lord Jesus was upon Earth. They knew that the Prophecies of old respected that season: they understood well enough the words of Daniel, and that the Scepter was departed from Judah, when they had no Judiciary Power as to life and death left amongst them. This expectation was so great, that it possessed the whole Eastern part of the Empire, though it was understood in the same sense only, as by the carnal sort of Jews; amongst whom how many in counterfeits do we read of, which at that time presumed upon it? Hereupon, though Christ came in an humble way, yet his Miracles caused a reverence and esteem of his Person, say they durst not but think well of him as the Messiah (how long dost thou make us to doubt?) till confounded by the spiritualness of his Preaching, offended at his opposition of their Traditions, and Pharisaical Tenets (as contrary to their Law, which they thought must necessarily endure forever) and especially moved (the greatest of them) by their corrupt interests of profit and applause (which made them deny him, though they knew the Resurrection, and to sin against their own Consciences, and the Holy Ghost) they rejected, and put him to death. That Saying amongst the Talmudists, and ascribed to the house of Elias (whom some will have to be John Baptist) is commonly known, viz. that the World should continue six thousand years, whereof two thousand belong to Tobo or Inane (that is the void space of time betwixt the Creation and the Law) two thousand to the Law, and two thousand to the Messiah; that then it should be destroyed. Now as the first division lighteth well, if the Tobo be taken as ending at the birth of Abraham, the Father of the Faithful (or those in Covenant with God) so the second endeth much about the Birth of our Saviour (reckoning as to both those accounts the years of the Patriarchs, according to the Hebrew Text) and pointeth out the time of the Messiah. Suidas mentioned out of Theodotus a noble Jew, that before Christ did rebuke the Scribes, they marveling at his wise answers and questions made him one of the Priests, and entred his name, Ἰησοῦς ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ Μωϋσῆ, Jesus the Son of God and of Mary, otherwise he being of the Tribe of Judah could not have been suffered to Preach at Nazareth and Capernaum as he did.

25. But (that we may improve those things as to Josephus) it doth appear, that not only before Christ gave them offence, and that before he died, some had honourable thoughts of him, but also after his death they accounted him the very Messiah, though they would not part with their old way of worship. Their *Tal* Babylonian, like to Assees his Stable, is full of filth, amongst which but a few Graines of Corn do appear. It was not finished in less time than a hundred years, being written with this design, to contain all the Sayings of their Elders which were not expressed in Scripture, and was completed (such a Fardel as it is) about five hundred years after Christ. Yet speaking of that place of Zechariah (Chap. 12. ver. 10.) And they shall look upon me whom they have pierced, after it hath reprehended a certain exposition of it, addeth, Peace be to him who hath said that these things are to be understood of Messiah the son of Joseph, who is slain. There is nothing in the whole Talmud more worthy of observation. For so we have him whom both the Blessed Virgin herself, and Nathaniel calleth the Son of Joseph, and whom the Jews put to death, to be the true Messiah, and to have been born about the 4000 year of the World.

26. There are not wanting Testimonies concerning the truth of Christ and his Doctrine, from the Heathen. Rhodiginus and Volateran deliver it as a matter of credit, that there was an Altar in Egypt Dedicated unto a Virgin that should bring forth a Child: and Pothellus, that there was another intitled Primogenito Dei, to the first begotten of God. Upon the Star which appeared at his Birth (which some think the same mentioned by Pliny, and called Stella criminis crimine) many meditating turned to the truth, as Chæremon amongst the Stoicks, and Chalcidius amongst the Platonists, who thereupon went into Judea, and became Jews. It is also reported that the Romans called their Temple which they had built to Bacchus for Victory, Templum pacis aeternum, the everlasting Temple of Peace, because the Oracle at Delphi told them it should stand dum peperit virgo, till a Virgin brought forth a Child; but as soon as Christ was born it fell. The Oracles generally fell in the reign of Tiberius, when the time of Christ his Preaching was come, who was the eternal Word of his Father. Plutarch of this Subject wrote a Treatise, searching much, as a Philosopher, what the cause of this strange change should be. After his acute search after sundry causes, and accurate Philosophical disputes, he refers it partly to the absence of the Demoniackal spirits, which he thinks might die, or remove from place to place, either banished by others more potent, or upon some dislike; and partly unto the alteration of the soil wherein Oracles were seated, which yielded not exhalations of such Divine temper as in former times it had done; for, without a certain temperature of exhalations, or breathing of the earth, he thought that spirits could not give their Oracles, more than a Musician can play without an Instrument. Accordingly he expected, that Oracles should either come in Use again in Greece, or else burst out in some convenient soil. But where have they thus burst out? Christianity chased them away wherever it came, and put those spirits to silence, which were afraid of the Christians in the Primitive times, so, as those Holy Men could make them confess they were Devils, and chase them out of such Bodies as they had possessed; for the truth whereof Tertullian in his Apology appealeth to the Consciences of the Heathen themselves, and therefore he would not in fo publick a Defence produce an untruth, which must have been notoriously known. Therefore the silence of the Oracles was not from any of those causes (which to one that hath opportunity are in themselves easie to be confuted); the truth was, the time was come wherein the strong man's house was to be entred, his goods spoiled, and himself bound; Now the Prince of this world was to be cast out: Satan fell like lightning from Heaven upon the approach of that true light which lighteneth every man that cometh into the world.

27. That notable story which Plutarch bringeth for confirmation of his Opinion, concerning the Mortality of those Demoniackal spirits, maketh exceeding much for our purpose; if we consider the time thereof. Thamus the Egyptian Master, as he failed, was requested by an uncouth voice uttered three times from Land, to proclaim the news of Great Pan's death as he passed by Palodes. Thamus, whose name was unknown to his Passengers, till he answered to it at the third Call, was resolved to have let all pass as a fancy or idle message, if the wind and tide should grant him passage by the place appointed: but, the wind falling him on a sudden, at his coming thither, he thought it but a little loss of breath to cry out aloud unto the shoar, as he had been requested, Great Pan is dead. The words, as Plutarch relateth, were scarce out of his mouth, before they were answered with a huge noise, as it had been of a multitude, sighing, and groaning at this wonderment. Now, if these Spirits had been by nature Mortal, as the Philosopher thought they were, the death of their Chief Captain could not have seemed so strange: but that a far greater than the greatest of them, by whose power the first of them had his being, should die to redeem his Enemies from their thralldom, might well seem a matter of astonishment, and deep sorrow unto them. The circumstance of the time will not permit us to doubt, but that under the known name of Pan was intimated the great Shepherd of our Souls, who had then laid down his life for his flock; not the feigned Son of Mercury and Penelope, as the Wise-men foolishly resolved Tiberius, who having had the truth of the Story confirmed confirmed to him by ear-witnesses, called a Convocation of wife-men, to resolve him who this great Pan lately deceased should be. The Scriptures set forth unto us the true cause, why both the wild goatish Pan, and all the rest of that Hellish crew should at that time howl and mourn, seeing by our great Shepherd's Death they were become Dead in Law; no more to breathe in Oracles, but quite to be deprived of all such strange motions as they had seduced the ignorant World with before. All the Antick tricks of Fannus, the *Satyr*s, and such like Creatures were now put down; God had resolved to make a translation of his Church; and for this cause the Devils were forced to dissolve their old Chappels, and seek a new form of their Liturgy or Service. These passages are pregnant enough, though we allege not what Nicephorus reporteth, that the Oracle at Delphi (perhaps not just then extinct) said that this Pan was Itay, Εβραϊσμός, an Hebrew Child; and though we omit what Suidas writeth, that Augustus sending to Pythia to inquire who should succeed him, had answer, that an Hebrew Child, Lord of the Gods, had commanded him to be gone down again to Hell, and therefore he must no more enquire there. Whereupon Augustus erected an Altar in the Capitol Primogenito Dei, To the first born of God.

The Testimonies of the Sibylls.

28. But amongst other testimonies of the Heathen concerning Christ, that of the Sibyll's must not be omitted. These Women were indued with extraordinary gifts of Prophecy, as certain previous pledges, that the Gentiles should also drink of the true, heavenly, and eternal Fountain. Like to those was Balaam the Midianite, an Idolater, yet called a Prophet by the Scriptures, who amongst other things, foretold that a Star should rise out of Jacob, and a Scepter from Israel. There were many of these Sibyll's, as we have already shewn, and several of them Prophets of Christ. Their Sayings were made much use of by such ancient Christians as had to do with Pagans, and Heathen Philosophers. (a) Justin Martyr telleth such, that the old, and very ancient Sibylla, of which Plato, Aristophanes, (a) In Parasuta, p. 16. pro. ad 37. vult. and others have made mention, spoke of one God, and against Idolaters; as also of the Coming of our Saviour Jesus Christ, plainly, and manifestly, and of his works. (b) Clement also writeth of Hydaspes an ancient King of the Medes, who clearly foretold that the Son of God should come. Concerning the Verses of Sibylla Erythræa many have written, and many of them are produced by Eusebius in the Oration (c) of Constantine to the Clergy, the Acrosticks whereof make up these words. * Ιησους Χριστος Θεου &c. Jesus Christus Dei Filius, servator, crucis, and foretold the last Judgment and Authority of Christ. (c) Cap. 18. (d) Lactantius, which speak of Christ his coming into unjust hands, his being stricken on the head, and wearing a Crown of Thorns; the grieving of him Vinegar, the renting of the veil of the Temple, and his being dead three days. Now some were of opinion of old, that these were feigned by Christians, as appeareth by what Constantine (or Eusebius for him) subjoyneth. But there are many that give no credence, faith he, thereto, although they confess that Sibylla Erythræa was a Prophetess; yea, they suspect that some of our Religion was ignorant in Poetry, made these Verses; and that they are falsely inscribed, and reckoned among the Oracles of Sibylla: seeing they contain very profitable sentences, both to restrain the licentiousness of immoderate pleasure, and persuade to a modest continency of life. But the truth of this matter doth manifestly appear, for our men borne with great study so accurately compared the Poem, that none can suspect that this Poem was made, and came forth after Christ's coming, and therefore they are convinced of falsehood, who blaze abroad that these Verses were not made by this Sibylla. For it is manifest that Cicero, having read this Poem, did translate it into Latine, and joyned it to his works; who was afterwards put to death by the Triumvir Antonius, and Antonius was overcome by Augustus, who reigned six and fifty years: Tiberius succeeded Augustus, in whose reign our Saviour came into the World, and the mystery of Religion began to flourish, and the people were changed. Of which I suppose the chief of the Italian Poets hath thus sung.

Constantine's confessions such as accounted them forged.

29. He meant Virgil, whose Poem he reciteth concerning the Golden Days foretold by Sibylla Cumæa (by which name the Romans called all the Sibylls, because of the old Cumana or Cumæa, whose Verses were burnt in the Capitol, in the 671 year of the City, and were supplied by other fetcht from Erythræa, and elsewhere) as also concerning a Child that was to be born. He ascribeth to this Child such Divine things, as none can doubt, but that he must be above a man, whom Sibylla described by such expressions. Now that such Verses could be feigned by Christians none can affirm, but the grossly ignorant, who know not that Virgil died died several years (viz. 18.) before Christ was born. Neither can it be thought he feigned it on his own head, although we cannot say with Constantine or Eusebius, that he did thus mystically involve, and cover the truth, lest the Emperor should be offended with him for writing that which was contrary to their Laws, and Statutes established, concerning their gods; or that we do believe that he foresaw the happy and glorious mystery of our Saviour's Coming; but that he might avoid their cruelty, he spoke his audience in the accustomed manner. Some of late also have rejected the Poems ascribed to these women, as feigned by Christians, because they seem to speak more plainly of Christ, than the true Prophets do, and exhibit rather an History of Christ already come, than a Prophecy of his Coming. They think it contrary to the Word of God, to think that these profound mysteries should be more clearly propounded to the Gentiles than to the Jews. This also moveth them (for we will confess the utmost) that they perceive many of the Ancients in the most Primitive times, to have counted it the choicest work they could perform, to help the Heavenly truth by their fictions, whereby the new Doctrine might more easily be admitted by the Pagan wife men. And as they cannot but most grievously reprehend this thing, so not sufficiently can they admire the judgment of those Fathers, who with such facility received these writings, and as doubt not to produce testimonies from them, to underprop the heavenly truth.

Some of late have also questioned them.

30. But it is answered by way of utter denial, that there were many in the Primitive Times, who fought to establish the truth by fictions and lies, and by Challenge made, for them to produce any one lie or fiction made or used by the most ancient Fathers, though for a good end. Certainly they who in their Disputations with the Pagans, appeal to the testimony of the Sibylls, deserve great commendations for their Prudence. And hence may it be proved, that these testimonies were not forged, because they in all Conflicts more willingly had recourse to them than to any other. For, can we imagine them fools, with whom these Fathers had to do? They were as cunning and knowing as the best; they were Philosophers, Rhetors, Professors of Arts, States-men, and most commonly such as enjoyed the greatest honours. Where is it objected by any of these in the most Primitive times, that these testimonies were feigned by Christians? This Answer would have been easy and ready, and such as would instantly have stopped the mouths of Primitive Saints. But the wisest and bitterest of the Enemies of Christians, do not make any such Reply, in the most ancient times, knowing well enough these Oracles, to which the Romans had ever recourse, and which were known sufficiently to the whole World, through which it ran for current, that in the Books of the Sibylls was held forth, that one should reign who came out of the East. The clearness of these testimonies concerning Christ, can make nothing against them; for Esaia spoke not more evidently of Christ than Balaam, who said, that a Star should rise out of Jacob. Who dare prescribe to God a manner of prophesying; as if it were not free to him to speak plainly or obscurely to Jew or Gentile, or as if there were not in the Scripture most clear Predictions concerning Christ? But grant that the Sibylline Oracles are clearer: Ought not those things which are predicted to the Gentiles concerning Christ to be clearer, because they wanted Moses, and the rest of that learning, which should direct them unto him, that what here was wanting might be supplied by the perspicuity of these Oracles? Although we ought not to judge of these Oracles, by that light which at present appeareth. For what things are most evident to us after the accomplishment, were most obscure when they were predicted. If any one had feigned them, he would have made them indistinctly more obscure, that they might seem written before the things were done, and like to those Prophecies which are contained in the Scriptures. These Heathen Prophets spoke sometimes clearly, according to the intention of God who overruled them; but often abruptly. It's thought they prophesied as of old Balaam's Ass spoke, and not otherwise did Hydaspes and the Sibylls speak clearly of the Coming of Christ, the Holy Spirit moving them, and governing their tongues. It appeareth (a) from Justin Martyr, that it was forbidden upon pain of death to read Hydaspes, Sibylla, or the Prophets, lest the People should attain to the knowledge of good things. To these (b) Clement bringeth in St. Paul himself referring the Greeks: Take ye also (c) the Greek Books, acknowledge Sibylla that she manifested one God, and things to come. Take ye also Hydaspes, read him; and you shall find the Son of God more clearly and openly described.

31. To omit what might be (and by others hath been) produced out of *Heathen Writers concerning the blessed Trinity (for we may easily admit, that God, who was ever the God of the whole World, and designed to do the Gentiles good also in the knowledge of himself, might give to them such Hints of the truth, as afterwards might be improved for their welfare) we shall come to the last testimony concerning Christ, and that such an one, as will reduce us to the course of our design. After that Christ was risen from the dead, and had sent his Disciples about to preach and work miracles for the conversion of the World, Pilate who then governed in Judaea, reported his Passion and Resurrection to Tiberius and the Senate, with the miracles done by him, or by them in his name; and how the multitude of believers daily increasing, he was accounted a God. Tiberius hereupon reported the matter to the Senate, with his favourable suffrage, that Christ might be accounted a God. But the Senate, because they were displeased that they had not first moved it, refused to canonize him, and by an Edict commanded that Christians should be banished the City; especially by reason that Sejanus, the great Minister of State, most obstinately contradicted this Religion. But Tiberius by another Edict threatened death to the accusers of Christians. These things thus related by (a) Orosius, are also witnessed by (b) Eusebius, Tertullian, and Justin Martyr, whereof, the testimonies of the two later are incontestable; for in their Apologies they durst not mention such things, and cite such testimonies as they must needs know would be easily confuted.

32. (a) Tertullian writeth, that Tiberius referred it to the Senate, with the prerogative of his own suffrage, but they having not approved the thing, refused it. Cæsar notwithstanding remained firm in his resolution, and threatened such as should accuse the Christians. This he openly asserteth in his Apology to the Pagans, writing also in another (b) place of the same excellent Work, that Pilate, who in his heart believed in Christ, at the same time wrote all the History of him to the Emperor Tiberius, whereupon the Cæsars themselves had worshipped our Master, if their Government in so doing had been consistent with the men of this World, and Christians permitted to have been saluted Cæsars. He giveth another reason, why Christ was not at first worshipped as a God. There was an ancient Law that forbade Introducing new Ceremonies into Religion, as worshipping strange Deities, unless approved by the Senate; and this was an inviolable and unalterable Law, to which the Prince himself was subject. He instanceth, that Marcus Æmilius would have had divine honours rendered to his Idol, called the god Alburnus, but could not obtain it. As for Justin Martyr, he maketh it more evident, telling plainly the Pagans in his second Apology, that they may know these things thus to have been, in the Acts which were written under Pontius Pilate; and again, that they might know, that Christ wrought such miracles, from the Acts (or Acts) made under Pontius Pilate. Now the word Acta signifieth sometimes the Journal-Book of the Senate, then called Acta Senatus, and otherwhiles the Records of the People, or of the Publick, then named Acta Publica, Diurna, and Urbana. In the former sort was contained whatsoever was done or said by the Fathers. In the latter, things concerning the People, as Publick Judgments, Punishments, Assemblies, Buildings, Nativities, the Death of Eminent Persons, Marriages, and Divorces. These afforded matter for Historians to digest and adorn. Now Justin Martyr either meaneth those Acta Publica, wherein might be recorded what notable things hapned in the Provinces; and fell under the administration of the several Deputies or Governours; or rather those Acta which Pilate himself composed in his Province. For we cannot but imagine, that care would be taken for the Recording of things memorable, as well in other places, as in the City it self. The Provinces had their Subcensors and their Tables. And the Presidents and Deputies not only certified by Letters occasionally what happened, but, as we may easily apprehend, did refer in Acta all memorable things; which were sent to Rome, and there, it's probable, either transcribed into, or laid up with, the Acta Publica. But, thus much of the testimonies of Jews and Heathens concerning Christ.

33. The Lord Jesus having risen the third day from the dead, and after his Resurrection given Commission and Instructions to his Disciples, whom he ordained his Ambassadors to the whole World; forty days after, he arose, ascended into Heaven, and sent down the Holy Ghost upon his Disciples, according to his Promise, for the Furnishing of them to the Work, ten days after his ascension. May being converted to the Faith, the Church increased, and living in Love and Unity together, they had all things common, none calling any thing his own which he possessed.

Pilate made report unto Tiberius of the Passion and Works of Christ.

possessed. About the end of the year, as is rationally computed, the Greeks or Hellenists (Jews which living out of Judaea spake Greek in a peculiar dialect, which is called Hellenistic, and used the Scriptures in their Synagogues in that language) murmured against the Hebrews (or those who both read and spake Hebrew) for that their widows were neglected in the daily ministrations. Hereupon the Apostles committed it to the number of the faithful, to chuse seven men who should take care of what was gathered for the poor, and these Ecclesiastical Writers call Deacons. About this time James the Apostle the Son of Alphaeus (who is also called the brother of the Lord, and was surnamed Just) was created the first Bishop of Jerusalem. For thus Clemens wrote in the sixth Book of his Hypotyposicon, as he is cited by Eusebius. Peter, and James, and John, though they were preferred, after the ascension of the Lord, contended not amongst themselves for glory and honour, but with one consent appointed James the Just Bishop of Jerusalem. The same Clemens in his first Book, distinguished thus concerning the two which bore the name of James. There were two James, the one termed Just, who was thrown down headlong from the pinnacle, and brained with a Fuller's club, the other beheaded. Of him that was called Just, Paul made mention, saying, I saw none of the Apostles save James the brother of the Lord. In the year following Christ's resurrection, a great Persecution was raised by the Jews against the Church, wherein Stephan one of the seven Deacons and the Protomartyr was stoned to Death, by the procurement especially of Saul a Jew of Tarsus in Cilicia. But in this same year as this Saul was journeying to Damascus to make havock of the Church, he was converted, and called to the Apostleship, after which he went from Damascus into Arabia, as he himself testifieth in his Epistle to the Galatians. Eusebius in his Chronicon placeth the conversion of Saul (afterwards called Paul) in the nineteenth year of Tiberius.

86. About this time it happened, that a certain man who fought by all means the favour of the multitude, drew the Samaritans to Mount Gerizim (which they accounted holy above all other Mountains) promising to shew them there the holy Vessels buried in a certain place by Moses. Many had gathered themselves to the foot of the Hill, where staying for more company that they might ascend all together, Pilate prevented them, and killing some, took many, dispersed the rest, and put to death the chief of those he had taken. Hereof the Senate of Samaria complained to Vitellius Prefident of Syria, who sent Marcellus his friend to take charge of Judaea, and commanded Pilate to go to Rome, there to answer before Cæsar what should be laid to his charge. Hereupon he departed, after he had governed Judaea ten years, but ere he reached Rome, Tiberius was dead. About the same time that these things hapned in Samaria, the Jews were banished Rome by the Emperor upon this occasion: A certain Jew flying his Native Country for breaking of the Laws, came to the City, where he professed himself an expounder of them, and drew to him two or three no less reprobate than himself. They made a Proscelyte Fulvia the wife of Saturninus an Honorable Person, and persuading her to send some Purple and Gold to the Temple of Jerusalem, converted it to their own Use. Saturninus complaining of this to Tiberius, he thereupon commanded all Jews to depart Rome. Of these the Confessors chose out and lifted four thousand men, whom they sent into Sardinia, and punished many that refused to bear Arms, upon no other account, than because they would not transgress the Ordinances of their Country.

87. About two years after the death of Christ, died Philip the Tetrarch, Son to Herod the Great, a man of a modest and quiet disposition, whose Principality was for that he died without issue, Tiberius laid unto the Province of Syria. By this time Artabanus King of Parthia prospering against his neighbours, was much puffed up, and despising the old age of Tiberius, when his Son Artamas was dead made his other Son Arsaces King of Armenia in his stead. He also reviled Tiberius by his Letters, objecting parricide, murders, laziness, and luxury to him, and wished him by a voluntary death to satisfy the most just hatred of his subjects, as soon as possible. But many Noble men of Parthia, to escape his cruelty came to Rome, and desired a King from Tiberius, who thereupon gladly named Phraates the Son of Phraates, that had been of a long time Hostage at Rome, and he dying in Syria, he commended to them Tiridates. Mithridates Brother to Phraates King of the Iberi was also ordered to get Armenia, who breaking into it joyned the Albanians to him, and procured the death of Arsaces; for the Parthians were easily overthrown, being discouraged by a false rumour of the death of Orodes their Captain;

Captain, another of Artabanus his Sons. Artabanus having before this attempted Cappadocia, sent also to demand the Treasure which Vonones had left in Syria and Cilicia, and that had been seized by Tiberius, * who with great perfidiousness killed the owner at Antioch; and he further demanded the ancient Borders of the Perfians and Macedonians, bragging that he would invade whatsoever had been possessed by Cyrus and Alexander. But Vitellius the President of Syria having drawn many of his subjects from their Trust, his mind so changed, that he fled away cowardly with a few to the confines of Scythia. Vitellius taking the opportunity carried Tiridates into the Kingdom, but he by delaying to seize on the chiefest places, and halting his Coronation, gave occasion to some of the great ones again to fly unto Artabanus, who coming on, the other fled as fast back into Syria; so that he recovered his Kingdom, with Armenia, and resolved to set up on Syria.

88. Tiberius hereupon wrote to Vitellius to make a peace with him. Vitellius about this time was come to Jerusalem after the expulsion of Pilate, where he celebrated the Passover, remitted to the Citizens the Impost upon such fruits as were sold, and deposed Jeseph, surnamed Caiphas, from the High-Priesthood, to which he promoted Jonathan the Son of Annas. He met with Artabanus upon a Bridge built over the River Euphrates, where they concluded a Peace, and afterwards they were feasted by Herod the Tetrarch. Darius the Son of Artabanus was sent an Hostage to Rome with many presents. But Tiberius died before, (March 16) having since the death of Sejanus cruelly raged against many, and lived disquietly from his retirement to the Island Capree, whence he never returned to the City, though he was twice on his way. The people ran up and down overcome with joy upon the report of his death. Some would have had his body cast into Tiber, and others prayed that no other place might be assigned him now dead than amongst the wicked. He reigned twenty two years, seven months and odd days, and died in the seventy eighth year of his age, and the 790 of the City, Cn. Acerronius Proculus, and C. Pontius Nigrinus being Consuls.

CHAP. III.

From the Death of Tiberius to that of Nero, the last Emperour of Cæsar's Family, containing the space of Twenty years.

1. TIBERIUS left behind him a Grand-son of his own name by his Son Drusus, yet he preferred before him Caius the Son of Germanicus, either for some reason fetched (a) from Astrology to which he was much given, (b) Jesephus for some reason fetched (a) from Astrology to which he was much given, (b) Jesephus through the means (b) of Macro his Freed-man, and greatest favourite, who being a loose and vile person, Caius insinuated himself into his favour by the procurement of his Wife. With her Caius was wantonly familiar, and promised her Marriage by an Oath, and under his hand, if he could compass the Empire, where with Macro was well pleased, if so be he could but therewith purchase greater Preference. 'Tis reported that he helped his Master forward by stifling him in the bed-cloths. Others have thought (c) that a slow-working poison was given him by Caius; some that meat was denied him, and others that when he demanded his Ring which they had pulled off from his finger, they choked him with the Pillow. However it came to pass, Caius succeeded him, and some (d) judged him willing that so it should be, because he would prove a very bad man, and hoped that there by the faults of his own reign might be something covered. He was received with great applause by all men. By the Army, for that he had been brought up continually amongst them. Some say he was born in the Camp; 'tis certain that the surname of Caligula he had for that reason, because he was wont (f) to wear that habit of the ordinary Soldiers. By the people he was gladly entertained out of their affection to Germanicus, and commiseration of his family so grossly abused by Tiberius, whose cruelty he escaped merely by his great dissimulation, and taking in good part every thing; so as it was said truly of him, That never was there a better Servant, nor a worse Master than Caligula.

2. Caius, within a few days after the sumptuous Funeral of Tiberius, made Agrippa King of that Country whereof Philip had been Tetrarch. This Agrippa was the Grand son of Herod the Great by his Son Archibolus, whom he put to death, being begotten of Berenice the Daughter of Salome. Having run through many straits for want of Money by reason of his great profuseness, he became at length very dear to Caius, who restored him to liberty (being imprisoned by Tiberius for wishing his death, that Caligula might succeed him) and then let the Diadem on his head. He had a Sister named Herodias, married to Philip Herodes (not Philip the Tetrarch) his and her Uncle, and Brother to Philip Antipas on the Father's side, his Mother being Daughter to Simon the High-Priest. This Woman Herod Antipas was so taken with, that though he had already to Wife the Daughter of Aretas King of Arabia Petraea, yet he Divorced this, and Married her, upon which account Aretas made War upon him, and defeated his Forces, which * was taken by the People as a Judgment of God upon him for putting to Death John Baptist. Now Herodias envying exceedingly the promotion of her Brother Agrippa, importuned her Husband to go to Rome and beg, or buy the title of King. Agrippa smelling out their Design before-hand, wrote to Caius, and accused him of having heretofore been of Sejanus his Conspiracy, and of favouring at present the Party of Artabanus King of Parthia, whereof he said his Magazines could testify, being furnished with Provisions for seventy thousand men of War. This he could not deny, and therefore Caius Banished him to Lugdunum (now Lyons) in Gall (whither Herodias would needs accompany him) and gave his Principality and Estate unto Agrippa. Thus were these two Punished for the Death of John Baptist; and so was Pilate for that of Christ. For, being also Banished by Caius to Vienna, two years after, he killed himself (whereof the Græcians are witnesses, saith Eusebius, who commit to memory in their Histories the Olympiads of times) and so became the revenger of his wickedness upon himself, as he who betrayed Christ into his hands had been before.

3. Though the disposition of Caligula was from his Childhood tending to intemperance and cruelty, yet at his first coming to the Government he used much Moderation and Equity, as well towards publick as private Persons. He would not hear any Accusations, though said to be for his own safety, permitted free and antient Jurisdiction to Magistrates, attempted to bring in again the Comitia, and restore the Privilege of Suffrages to the People, payed the Legacies given by Tiberius, though his Will was null, and those given by Livia also, though her Son would never discharge them: he remitted part of the Taxes to Italy, relieved the necessities of such as received losses by fire, and to such Kings as he restored, he gave the Tributes collected in their absence. At first he appeared a great Patron of virtue, but degenerated into a Monster, so that as far as a man could go in luxury and cruelty, he seemed to proceed, which made Seneca * say, that nature seemed to have brought him forth to shew what the greatest viciousness backed with the greatest power could be able to do. We may be more favourable to this opinion, if we consider that the greatness of his Estate made him so far surpass the limits of all modesty, as, challenging to himself the title of Divinity, he governed all things in contempt of God.

4. He thought at first to have taken a Diadem, and changed his Principality into a Kingdom, till by his Flatterers he was told, that he was above all such titles. At length he began to take to himself Divine honour. For he caused the images of their Gods to be brought to Rome, whereof the heads being taken off, that of his own was placed upon each in their stead. He would offer himself to be adored amongst his brother gods as he called them, and ordained Temples and Priests with Sacrifice of no commoner things than Peacocks, Turkeys, and Pheasants, which were to be offered every day; and he invited the Moon to his Embraces. He could not endure to be accounted the off-spring of Agrippa, because of his ignobility; but gave out that his Mother was conceived of the incest of Augustus with his Daughter Julia. He himself committed incest with all his Sisters, and spared not the chastity of either Sex. So impious he was, that he would make Persons of greatest Rank run by his Chariot, and stand gilt with Towels when he was at meat. So cruel, that he killed his Grand-mother Anonia by unkindness, he murdered his Brother Tiberius, though he had adopted him, with all his Kindred except his Uncle Claudius, whom he preferred for a laughing stock; and he forced Macro and Ennia to kill themselves. As for others, he made havock of them, causing some to be knocked in the head with Clubs, if he were but disturbed in the shows. He would cast old men, or infirm, to wild Beasts, and shutting up the Barns and Store-houses proclaim a Famine. Many of Quality being first Stigmatized, he condemned to the Mines, or to repairing of High-ways, thut them up like Beasts in a Den, or fawed them afunder; and that for no greater Matters than if they had not high thoughts of his gifts and flows, or had not sworn by his Genius.

5. He forced Parents to be present at the Death of their Children. To one that excused himself by Sicknels, he sent a Litter to carry him. A certain Knight whom he cast to wild Beasts, crying out that he was innocent, he caused to be taken out, and his Tongue to be cut out of his Head, after this to be cast in again. Demanding of one whom he had recalled out of Banishment what he did all that time: upon answer that he prayed for the death of Tiberius, and that He might succeed him, supposing that all whom he had Banished prayed also for his Death, he gave command that they should all be killed. He would suffer none to be put to Death but by degrees, that so as he said they might feel themselves die. He forely afflicted the order of Knights, and being incensed against the multitude for favouring a Party against him, he wished that the People of Rome had but one neck. He was wont openly to complain of the condition of his time, because not signalized by any publick Calamity, and how by the Serenity thereof he should be buried in oblivion (his being herein contrary to the disposition of Phalaris) in so much as he would wish for some overthrow of the Armies, some Famine, Pestilence, Fire, or Earth-quake. He purposed utterly to destroy the works of Virgil and Livy, and take away the Law. He took away honour from Families, and when he met with any beautiful person, made them as deformed as he could. He was so Prodigal that he would drink most precious Pearls dissolved in Vinegar, and invent all sorts of delicacies, by which course he spent infinite Sums in the space of three years, which Tiberius had hoarded up; and to recruit his Coffers raised unheard-of Tributes. Amongst other means for increasing his Revenue he set up Stews in his Palace, and some were sent about to invite all sorts of men to them, such as came being commended for increasing Caesar's Revenues. He purposed to depart to Antium and thence to Alexandria, but first to kill all the chief both of the Senatorian and Equestrian rank; and answerably heretofore were there found after his death two Books, whereof the title of one was Gladius, or Sword; and the other Pugio, or Dagger, wherein were written the names of such as he intended to murder. A great chest also was found full of divers Poisons, which being by Claudius his appointment cast into the Sea, the water is reported to have been so infected, that the fish was therewith killed, and was cast up by the tide upon the shoar. These things are reported by Suetonius, concerning which Author yet it is observed by some, that he wrote the lives of the Emperours with as great liberty as they lived them.

6. Many desired to have an hand in removing him, yet durst not attempt any thing. But Cassius Cherea the Captain of his Guard being grievously affronted by him (for ever when Caius gave him the watch-word, it should be some effeminate or obscene name, and he continually charged him with Cowardice) fully resolved to kill him, and broke the business to others, whom he thought to have the same desire with himself. They killed him as he returned from the Games of the Palace to refresh himself, Chereas giving him the first wound. His guard of Germans (which loved him exceedingly, because of the profit they reaped from the execution of his cruel commands) in a great rage flew all they could meet in the Palace, and with much ado were kept from putting thousands to death, that were now assembled in the Theatre. Nay the common People allured by his shows and largesses, endeavoured to find out the Authors of his death, to whom Valerius Aflaticus (who had been Consul) coming forth whilst they were in an uproar, and every one inquired who had done the deed, O, said he, I wish I had done it. Being once advised to beware of Cassius, he suspected Cassius Longinus the Proconsul of Asia (of the same Family with Cassius one of the Murderers of Julius Caesar) and sending for him, put him to death, never thinking that Cherea had also that name. Having reigned three years, ten months and eight days, and lived twenty nine, he thus died, on the ninth before the Calends of February, in the 794 year of the City, and the 42 after the Birth of Christ, he himself the fourth time, and C. Sextius Saturninus being Consuls.

7. The

7. The Senate now, as Josephus telleth us, thought of refusing the ancient form of Government, though it was utterly impracticable, Saturninus the Consul especially sticking for it. But the Soldiers rightly judging, that such an Empire could not be ruled in a Popular way, and especially looking at their own advantage, resolved the contrary. Tiberius Claudius Drusus, Brother to Germanicus Caesar, and Son to Drusus (by Antonia the younger, the Daughter of Antony the Triumvir and of Octavia the Sister of Augustus) was yet living. Him they judging most fit to succeed his Nephew, pulled him out of an hole where he had hid himself to save his life, and straight-way declared him Emperor. He was at first discharged by the messages of the Senate, but again took heart, at the Counsel and directions of King Agrippa, so that the Senators despairing of Success, gave over their Enterprize, but not without (some of them) seeking the Sovereignty for themselves, which would have produced as great Slaughters and Desolations as ever, had any of them obtained liberty to prosecute their desires. The People were for Claudius his preferment, envying the Senate its ancient Power, and making account by the Sovereignty of one to be sheltered from its avarice. Herby also they thought to avoid such Civil Wars as fell out amongst the great ones in the time of Pompey. The wiser sort knew that it was impossible the Commonwealth should subsist but under Monarchy: some one they were sure would establish himself, and that through Desolations, Confusions, and Slaughters, they must come to it at last. Self-preservation therefore, and publick interest easily led them to the next heir, who by his Birth could challenge an interest. For hereditary Monarchies, by preserving due Reverence, excluding Emulations and Contentments amongst equals, by preventing numerous pretensions, and the extravagant grandeur of divers Families, can only secure the Peace and Prosperity of their Subjects.

8. Claudius promised the Soldiers a Donative upon their taking an Oath to defend his Person and Authority. Then put he to death Chereas and others that killed Caius, as a means to secure his own Person; but in reference to the Senate buried all things in oblivion, and behaved himself moderately and civilly. He confirmed Agrippa in his Kingdom, and enlarged his Dominions by an addition of Judea and Samaris, which heretofore belonged to his Grand-Father: And he further bestowed on him Abila, and the Principality of Libanus, which had belonged to Lysanias; moreover upon his desire he granted to his Brother Herod the Kingdom of Chalcis, and at the request of both, published favourable Edicts in behalf of the Jews, who groaned under the persecution of Caius. This Agrippa (called also Herod by St. Luke) labouring all manner of ways to gratify the Jews, killed James the Brother of John, and shut up Peter in Prison, intending to bring him forth to the People after the Passover, but he was miraculously delivered by an Angel. A just punishment from God overtook Agrippa not long after: For, having begun to build the Walls of Jerusalem, when upon complaint of Marcus Prefect of Syria, he was forbidden by Claudius, he descended to Cesarea, there to celebrate Games in honour of Caesar. Being clothed with a Robe of Silver, which glittered exceedingly by the reflection of the Sun-beams, he rejected not the flatteries of those who ascribed to him divine honours, and was presently seized by a pain in his Guts, and being eaten with Worms, gave up the Ghost within Five Days, after he had Reigned Seven Years in all, and Three over Judea. His Kingdom was not committed to his Son, by reason of his Youth, (for he was but Seventeen Years Old) and therefore Cassius Calpurnius Pulcher was sent to Govern it.

9. Claudius restored also Mithridates the Iberian to his Kingdom, whom Caius had imprisoned. On another Mithridates (descended from Mithridates the Great King of Pontus) he bestowed the Kingdom of Bosphorus (giving one part of Cilicis to Polemo in requital) and another part of this Country to Antiochus with Commagena; for he had also been deprived of this Kingdom by Caius. But the Lycians and Rhodiens he deprived of their liberty. The former, for that they had raised a Sedition, wherein some Romans had been slain, and the latter, because they had Crucified some of them. About this time the Britains were very tumultuous, for the reducing of whom to obedience, he sent A. Plautius in his Second Year, with an Army out of Gall.

10. Since the time of Julius Caesar, the Romans had attempted nothing upon Britain. Augustus seemeth of purpose to have neglected it, counting it policy to keep the Roman Empire within its bounds; to wit, the Ocean, the Rivers Elbe and and Euphrates, limits set by nature, to the end it might be a State Adamantine (for so he himself speaketh in Julian) or invincible, and not milicary through its too great bulk and burthen. Strabo is of opinion, that he despised it, seeing no cause to fear, nor hope of much profit from the Britains; and yet it seemed that no small danger would be presented from other Nations lying about the Island. But at length he departed from Rome with a purpose to transfer the War into Britain; but when he was come into Gall, the Britains pacified him by Ambassadors, and having obtained his amity, dedicated Presents and Oblations in the Capitol. They brought the Island now familiar to the Romans, and endured Taxes and Imposts, which saith Strabo, are now nothing grievous to them, being raised out of such Merchandise and Commodities as are Shipped to and fro out of Gall and Britain: those be Ivory Works, Bits and Bridles, Chains and Wreaths, Vessels of Electrum and Glasse, with other bafe and common Wares of like sort. And therefore there needs no Garrison for that Island. For it would require one Legion at least, and some Horsemen, if Tributes were to be Levied from thence, and the said Tributes would but countervail the Charges of maintaining a Garrison there, for of necessity, by imposing a Tribute, the Revenues coming by Tollage and Poundage, and such like Imposts, would be less: and if any violent course were used, some Peril or other must be expected. The Year following also, Augustus intended a second Expedition into Britain, because there was some variance about the Covenants: but by occasion of some insurrections made in Spain by the Cantabri and others, that Journey was stayed.

11. Tiberius nothing transported with an inordinate desire of enlarging the Empire, seemeth to have rested in that counsel of Augustus; For he produced a Book written with Augustus his own hand, wherein was contained the whole Wealth and Estate of the Commonwealth, what number as well of Roman Citizens as Allies were in Arms, how many Navies, Kingdoms, and Provinces, what Tributes and Imposts belonged to the State, with a resolution annexed thereto of containing the Empire within the same bounds. Which advice and resolution of Augustus contented him to well, that, as Tacitus reporteth, he would attempt nothing in Britain, nor maintain any Garrison or Deputies here. For, whereas Tacitus reckoneth up the number of Legions, and what Coasts and Countries they defended at that time, he maketh no mention at all of Britain. And yet it seemeth, that the Britains entertained amity with the Romans. For when as at the same time Germanicus sailed the Ocean, some of his Company being by force of Tempest driven to this Island, were by the Princes thereof sent back again. That Caius Caesar cast in his mind to enter this Island is certain: but by his little brain, sudden repentance, and wonderful Attempts against Germany it came to nothing. For to the end that he might terrifie Britain and Germany (over which he hovered) with the fame of some mighty piece of work, he made a Bridge between Baie and the Piles of Puteoli, three Miles and Six Hundred Paces in length. But having achieved no greater exploit, then received to grace Adrianus the Son of Cynobellinus King of the Britains (who being by his Father Banished, had fled over Sea with a small Power and Train about him) he sent magnificent and glorious Letters to Rome, as if the whole Isle had been yielded up into his hands, warning and willing the Posts to ride forward directly into the Forum and Curia, and in no wise to deliver the said missives unto the Consuls, but in the Temple of Adars, and that in a frequent Assembly of the Senate.

12. After this, to the Ocean he marched, as if he minded to translate the War over into Britain. There upon the shoar he embattled his Soldiers: he himself took Sea in a Gally, and having lanchted forth a little from the Land, returned again. Then mounting an high Scaffold, he sat him down, and gave his Soldiers the Sign for Battel, and commanding the Trumpets to sound, on a sudden charged them to gather Cockles, Muskles, and other small Shell-fishes: Having gotten these spoils he waxed proud, as if he had Conquered the Ocean: and having rewarded his Soldiers, he brought some of these Shell-fishes to Rome, to shew the booty he had gotten. In token and memorial of this great achievement, he caused to be built a brave high Turret, out of which as from a Watch-Tower, there might blaze all night long, Lights, and Fires, for the better direction of Sea-men. The ruins hereof are some times seen at a low-water on the shoar of Holland, by the People inhabiting thereabouts, called Britannias; that is, the British house, who also find oftentimes stones engraven with letters:

of which one had these Characters, C. C. P. F. which they expound thus, Caius Caligula Pharus Fecit, that is, Caius Caligula made this Pharus (or Watch-Tower) so called, I suppose, from that notable one, and one of the Worlds wonders, built by Ptolemy Philadelphus in the Island Pharus, from which some would have the ancient Kings of Agypt called Pharaohs. It is probable, that this Watch-tower afterward being repaired by Septimius Severus, became a Granary for reception of Corn, which was brought out of Britain, whence it might take its name of Britannia. For Zozimus writeth, saith Camban, that Corn was wont to be brought out of Britain by Ships to this place, and thence with Barges and Boats haled up the Rhene against the stream, to serve the Roman Garrisons: seeing that Julian the Emperor built Garrisons, as Marcellinus saith, wherein might be inned and kept the Corn, that the Britains usually transported thither.

13. But, afterwards the inland parts of Britain wafted, rather with Civil Wars and Factions than by the force of the Romans, came by little and little subjected to them. Some making choice of their protection swore allegiance to them, and practised by all means to subject their Native Countrey unto their Government. The principal of these Fugitives was one Vericus, who moved, and persuaded Claudius to give the Attempt upon Britain, which none assayed to do since the time of Julius Caesar, and which then was up in a broil and commotion, for that the said Fugitives were not rendered again unto them. Claudius therefore in his Second Year Ordered A. Plautius the Prætor to pass over out of Gall, who having by the means of Nariscus quieted the Soldiers that refused to make War without the compasse the World, overthrew several times the Sons of Cynobellinus. His Lieutenant was Flavius Vespasian, who behaved himself very gallantly in the Service. But Claudius in his Fourth Year being very ambitious of a Triumph (as not contenting himself with Triumphal Enigens decreed to him by the Senate) without a just cause pitched upon Britain as yet Seditious, because their Fugitives were not restored. Sailing from Osia, he was twice in danger of Shipwreck, once near Liguria, and again near the Islands Stachades (four or five in the French Sea near Languedoc and Provence) where from Mafilia (now Marsils in Provence) he went by Land as far as Gessoriacum (now Bologne) and thence passing into the Island subdued part of it, and amongst other Towns Camalodunum (now Maldon) the Regal Seat of Cynobellinus, with the Oreades: Dio writeth, that at his first Landing he defeated the Barbarians in Battel. But Suetonius saith, he performed these Acts without a Battel, and the loss of one drop of Blood. Having been divers times saluted Imperator (as Sutton at Brit. cap. 17.) and thing directly saith Dio against the Roman Custom; for lawful it is not in one War to assume that Title other than once) he disarmed the Britains, and committing as well the Government of these, as the War with the other (not yet subdued) to Plautius, he hastened to Rome in the sixth Month, finding before him Pompey and Silanus his Sons-in-Law with Tidings of the Victory.

14. So great a matter it was, and of such consequence to have Conquered even so small a parcel of Britain, that the Senate thereupon decreed in honour of Claudius, Yearly Games with Triumphal Arches, both at Rome, and also Gessoriacum in Gall, and a most honourable and stately Triumph. To the beholding hereof Governours of Provinces, and some banished Persons also were permitted to come to the City: a Naval Crown was fixed on the Looover of the Palace, as the Ensign of the British Sea subdued by him: the Provinces brought in Crowns of Gold, and Gallia Comata one above the rest weighing nine pounds: and the hither part of Spain, another of seven pound weight. He mounted up into the Capitol by the stairs on his knees, supported, and heaved up by his Sons-in-Law on either side. He entered in Triumphing wife the Adriatick Sea, embarked in a Vessel more like some exceeding great House than a Ship. Unto his Wife Messalina was allowed the highest place to sit in, as also to ride in a Carroch or hanging Coach. After this he set forth Triumphal Plays and Games, being made Consul for that purpose. The Solemnities were exhibited at once in two Theatres, and many times when he was gone aside from the fight, others had the charge hereof. Horle-races for the Prize he promised as many as those days would admit. Howbeit, above Ten there were not; for between every course of Horle Bears were killed, Champions performed their duties, and choice Boys sent for out of Afia, danced the Warlike dance in Armour. Conquest, he heaped Triumphal Ornaments. He suffered Licinus Crassus Frugi to follow after himself in his Triumph, mounted upon a trapped Courier with a rich Caparison, and arrayed in a Robe of Date-tree work. Upon Folvidius the Eunuch he bestowed a Spear-staff without a head: upon C. Gavins Chains, Bracelets, Horle-trappings, and a Coronet of Gold; as is to be seen in an ancient Marble at Taurinum.

15. In the mean time Aulus Plantius went on with the remainders of the War in Britain, and sped so well, that Claudius passed a Decree That he should enter Rome in Ovanti Triumph: and when he was entered into the City, he himself went to meet him, giving him the right hand all the way. Vespasian, partly under Claudius, and partly under Plantius, fought Thirty Battels with the Enemy, subdued also two most mighty Nations, and above twenty Towns, together with the Isle of Vetis or Wight. For those exploits he received triumphal Ornaments, and within a short space two Sacerdotal Dignities, with a Consulship which he bore the two last Months of the Year. Titus also served in quality of a Tribune under his Father with exceeding commendations for his industry and valour (for he valiantly delivered his Father when besieged) and no less Repute of his modest carriage say some, as appeareth by a number of his Imagines and Titles to them annexed, throughout the Provinces of Germany and Britain. About this time a new Island appeared in the Aegean Sea named This near to Hiera, which One Hundred and Ten Years before it first also sprung up: And both of them lay betwixt Thera and Therapsa, which in like manner One Hundred and Thirty Years before the Original of Hiera were first seen amongst the Cyclades.

16. Two or three Years after this, Claudius being certified that his Wife Messalina (the most unchast of all Women) had openly Married C. Silius, he animadverted upon her and her Minions. About the same time Herod the King of Chalcedia dying, he bestowed that Kingdom upon Herod's Nephew Agrippa the younger, for Judas his Fathers Kingdom was still governed by Deputies. Tiberius Alexander, who succeeded Fadus, gave place to Comanus, under whom the Jews, being affronted at the Passover by impudent and fawcy Soldiers, mutined, but now, as ever, came by the worst: and not long after their Country-men who dwell at Rome were expelled thence by Claudius, and under their name, as many think, the Christians also. In the Nineteenth Year of his Reign he Married Agrippina his own Niece by his Brother Germanicus through the persuasion of Pallas his Freeman, which Woman presently as soon as he perceived her strength procured his Daughter Octavia to be given in Marriage to Domitius Nero her Son by her former Husband Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus. The Maid was formerly contracted to L. Silanus, an eminent young man, but he acculed by Vitellius was put out of his Pratorship, and the match was broken betwixt him and the Princess, whereupon he shortly after killed himself. And a Year after was Claudius persuaded by Pallas to adopt Nero his Wife's Son, though he had a Son of his own, by name Britannicus, but two Years younger. Pallas was so high flown in favour, that he procured his Brother Felix to be lent Governour into Samaria, and afterwards got his power extended to Judea, Gallilee, and Perea, where he acted the part of a Tyrant, and having married several great Ladies, obtained also Drusilla Sister to Agrippa. The Parthians now again at variance amongst themselves, and wearied with the Tyranny of Gotarzes, asked a Prince from Rome. Claudius sent them Meherdates the Son of Vonones, and Grandson of Phraates, but he was presently betrayed into the hands of Gotarzes. At this time also the Britains rebelled.

17. Now was P. Ostorius Propretor here, upon whose first coming the Britains grew confident, as contemning him for his want of experience. The Winter being begun they made excursions into the Territories of the Alles of Rome. He knowing that the first event would either incourage or daunt them; set upon, and scattered them, then went about to disarm all such as he had reason to suspect; but the Iseni (inhabiting those parts now called Sussex, Norfolk, Cambridgeshire, and Huntingtonshire) a Frong Nation, refusing to submit, drew others in to them, and pitching upon a very convenient ground gave Battle to the Romans, who by reason that they despaired of Pardon, had much ado to overcome them. By this foil of the Iseni, others before unfettered were contained in obedience, and Ostorius led his Army against the Cangi (a People living towards the Irish Sea) and waisting their grounds had passed on well nigh to the Irish Sea, when he was recalled by the discord of the Brigantes (people inhabiting the North part of this now called England) the Ring-leaders of whom when he had taken off the Rebellion was extinguished. But the Silures (inhabiting Southern) would by no means be either allured or discouraged from waging War, trusting to the strength of Caratacus the greatest Prince amongst the Britains, who excelling as well in policy as the knowledge of the Countrey, transferred the War into the Territories of the Ordovices (now Northwales) as more convenient for him by reason of the Mountains and Rocks. Here he made a speech to his Officers, putting them in mind how their Ancestors had repulled Caesar the Dictator, and willing them to behave themselves at this time, as the beginning of their liberty or eternal slavery. Till they came to strokes the Romans had the worst of it; but afterwards breaking into the Rampsies they easily routed the Britains, and got a great Victory, wherein the Wife and Daughter of Caratacus being taken, his Brethren yielded themselves.

18. Caratacus committing himself into the hands of Carisgunda, Queen of Idem ibid. cap. 36. ibid. the Brigantes, was treacherously bound, and delivered up to the Conquerours in the Ninth Year of the War, wherein he had got himself an exceeding great name. Being carried to Rome, the people was called together as to some famous show, and the Pratorian bands were placed along for the reception of him. The Prayers of the rest were by reason of fear, bafe, and nothing favouring of Nobility: but Caratacus, neither hanging down his head, nor craving any mercy, when he stood before the Emperours Tribunal, spake to this purpose: If my moderation in prosperity had been as great as my Nobility and Fortune, I had come rather as a Friend into this City, than a Captive: neither would you have disdained to receive me with Covenants of Peace, being a Prince descended of Noble Progenitors, and a Commander over many Nations. My present state is, as to me Dismal, so to you Magnificent. Have had Horfes, Men, Armour, and Wealth: What marvel if again my will I have lost them all? For if you will rule over all men, it followeth that all men must abide Servitude. If presently I had yielded, and been delivered into your hands, neither had my Fortune nor your Glory been very remarkable: and oblivion would have followed my punishment. But if you save me alive, I shall be an example of your Clemency for ever.

19. Upon those words Caesar pardoned him, his Wife and Brethren. And they being all unbound did their reverence likewise unto Agrippina (who sat aloft not far off in an high seat to be seen) giving her the like praises, and in the same degrees of style as they did the Emperour himself. Surely a strange precedent without any example, saith the Historian, that a Woman should sit and command the Roman Ensigns. But she carried her self as a fellow and associate in th Empire gotten by her Progenitors. After this the Senate was called together, and the Fathers made long and glorious discourses, as touching the Captivity of Caratacus. Neither was this less honourable, as they affirmed, than when Pub. Scipio shewed Siphas, L. Paulus, Perseus, or whoever else exhibited Conquered Kings to the view of the People. As for Ostorius, it was Decreed that he should be honoured with triumphal Ornaments. But his Fortune soon changed, either for that he grew secure upon the Captivity of so considerable a man, or the Enemy was highly moved to revenge it. For a Party left to awe the Silures was incamped by the Britains, and if help had not presently come in from the adjoining Villages and Fortresses, had been utterly cut off, besides, that the Commander in Chief with Eight Centurions, and many others was slain. Not long after such as went to gather Forrage, and several Companies sent in to their aid, were also routed, and the Enemy was hardly restrained at length by the help of the Legions. After this hapned many Skirmishes, as they met by chance, or were desirous of Booty, and two Auxiliary Cohorts were intercepted, with the Spoils of which other Nations were drawn to revolt, and not long after Ostorius spent with care and peniveness died. To his place Claudius preferred A. Didius, who found things but in a bad condition, through the boldness of the Silures. But the Britains falling out amongst themselves were several times overthrown, and then kept under.

20. Claudius, the Twelfth Year of his Reign ending, bestowed on Agrippa the Tetrarchy of Philip, as also that of Lysania, taking Chalcis from him after he had Governed it Four Years. After this he restored the Rhodiens to their former liberty upon their repentance, and eased the Inhabitants of Ilium of all Charges and Tributes, as being the Authors of the Roman Race. Nero pleaded the causes of both Cities, whose Mother Agrippina now began to be discovered to her Husband. He chanced in his drink to say that it was Fatal to him first to endure, and then to punish the wickedness of his Wives, and he repented of his folly in preferring her Son before his own. She bethinking her self how to escape the danger, first gave him Poison in Mithrooms his beloved meat, but it passing through him, the used the skill of Xenophon the Physician, who as it were to A.D. 55. help him to Vomit, put something down his Throat dipped in a moist violent P.C. 807. Poison, and so he died, who within a small time upon a very small account had put to death Thirty Five Senators, and Three Hundred Equites. He was a man that before his coming to the Government was despised by his Relations as some imperfect thing, and afterwards was but counted blockish, and despicable by others, yet sometimes he would judge very wisely and circumspedly, and so far profited in liberal studies (which he very much plied) that he wrote divers things, and amongst the rest a learned defence of Cicero in answer to the Books of Asinius Pollio. He was fearful above measure, so that (amongst other demonstrations) when Camillus, who attempted a Rebellion, sent to him a reproachful, and menacing Letter, willing him to lay down the Government, he was in doubt, and seriously consulted whether he should not do it: and this made him put many to death upon idle and malicious accusations. He was the very Slave of his Freedmen (whereof Narcissus and Pallas were chief) who rather Reigned than he, for, they managed all things according to their Pleasure or Lust, bestowing favours upon whom they pleased, and killing any, though never so worthy, or nearly allied to him. He excused his anger and peevishness by a publick Declaration. He was so forgetful that he would several times ask for such as he had put to death. He would eat and drink at any time, or in any place: he was a great player at Dice, of which Art he set forth a Book. He died on the third before the Ides of October, in the 64 Year of his Age, when he had Reigned Thirteen Years, Eight Months, and Twenty Days, in the 807 Year of the City, the 55 after the birth of Christ, M. Asinius Marcellus and M. Acilius Aviola being Consuls.

21. Now that we may note briefly such Ecclesiastical matters, as fell out in the Reign of Claudius. In his First Year James the Brother of John was, as we said, put to death by Agrippa, and Peter being cast by him into Prison was delivered by an Angel. In his Second, Paul returned out of Arabia, to Damascus, whence he came to Jerusalem to see Peter. Hence he went to Tarsus, and not long after to Antioch, being called by Barnabas, who had been sent thither by the Apostles. In his Third, Paul Preached for a whole Year at Antioch, together with Barnabas. In his Fourth, Paul carried the Almshouse of the faithful from Antioch to Jerusalem, because of the Famine foretold by Agabus. Thence returning to Antioch, he was sent with Barnabas to Preach the Gospel in Asia. In this Fourth then, and the Fifth Year of Claudius he Preached Christ in Cyprus, Pamphylia, Pisidia, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe, and returned to Antioch. In the Sixth he was sent from Antioch to Jerusalem to the Council with Barnabas, whence returning to Antioch he reprehended Peter, who came thither a little after him, for his dissembling, and not long after went with Silas into Asia, to confirm the Churches he had Founded. In the Seventh of Claudius he Preached Christ in Crete, and through Pisidia, Pamphylia, and Phrygia, visited the Churches, and converted the Galatians to the Faith. In the Eighth he came to Troas, and thence into Macedonia, where at Philippi, as also at Thessalonica, at Beraa, and then at Athens he Preached the Gospel. About the end of the Ninth Year he came to Corinth, where he found Aquila and Priscilla, with whom he stayed half a Year Preaching the Gospel, and thence wrote both his Epistles to the Thessalonians. In the Eleventh Year he came from Corinth to Ephesus with Aquila and Priscilla, whom there leaving, he went to Jerusalem to the Feast. Thence he returned to Antioch and Ephesus through Phrygia, Galatia, and the higher parts of Asia. Being at Ephesus in the Twelfth Year, there he continued Two Years, till the Tumult raised by Demetrius. Hence he wrote his Epistle to the Galatians; the former also to the Corinthians, and to Titus, but about the end of the following Year; as also the first to Timothy. About the end also of the Thirteenth Year, or the beginning of the following, he came into Macedonia and Achaia, to receive the Collections to be carried to Jerusalem. And hence (from Corinth) being to pass into Asia, he wrote his Epistle to the Romans about the end of the following Year. About the end also of the Fourteenth Year he was imprisoned at Jerusalem. And being carried to Caesarea was there kept Prisoner by Felix for two Years. Concerning the Chronology logy of these accounts, Ludovicus Cappellus is by Students to be consulted, in his Historia Apostolica Illustrata.

Of St. Peter his being at Rome.

Nero succeeded Claudius.

All Princes came thence to his first Five Years.

22. St. Peter the Apostle is reported in the second Year of Claudius to have come to Rome, having been formerly Bishop of Antioch, in which See he was succeeded by Evodius one of the Seventy Disciples, of whom also Paul maketh mention: some say that he continued Bishop at Rome Twenty five Years, viz. Twelve under Claudius, and Thirteen under Nero. Perhaps he might come to Rome at this time, but that he stayed there Twenty five Years is but to be taken for a Fable. For we read that Claudius Banished all Jews from Rome, and he being a Jew, must needs give place, or abide the danger. We do not find he had any trouble, and this was by reason of his absence. It is probable that he went away when Aquila and Priscilla departed Rome, and met St. Paul at Corinth. Enchirion indeed often mentioneth his being at Rome, and writeth, that he suffered Martyrdom together with Paul under Nero. This might be at his second return unto Rome, so that we may count Twenty five Years from his first Coming under Claudius unto the end of his Martyrdom under Nero; it being, to say truth, better thus to reconcile Writers, than flatly to deny all, or to say, he never was at Rome. Here he met with Simon Magus again, and confounded him, as it is reported. This man being a Samaritan, of the Village Gittan, was Baptized by Philip the Deacon in Samarita. He would have bought of Peter the gift of the Holy Ghost; and thence of him arose the word Simony. He came to Rome in the time of Claudius, where calling himself a God, he was honoured with an Image, having this inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto. He had to his yoke-mate one Helene, by Irenaeus called Selen, a Witch and a common Harlot, whom he called the Principal understanding. He said unto the Samaritans that he was the Father, unto the Jews, that he was the Son descended from Heaven, and unto the Gentiles, that he was the Holy Ghost. Peter foiled him in Samarita, whence for shame he fled; and leaving Samarita and Judea, he sailed from East to West, and came to Rome, under Claudius, where Peter met him. Peter it is said had much to do with him in the presence of Nero. Some write that he had three Conflicts with him; and in the end Simon seeing himself foiled, and his Witchcraft not at all to prevail, told them he would leave their City, and flee up into the Heavens whence he came. Whereupon at a certain day appointed, he climbed up into the high Capitol, whence he took his flight by the means of Witchcraft, and the Spirits that bore him up in the Air. The People at the sight hereof was amazed. But Peter fell down and prayed God that his Witchcraft might be revealed to the World. He had no sooner spoke, but down came Simon Magus, and was broken to pieces, so that he there miserably died. Now again to the course of our History.

23. The death of Claudius was kept private by Agrippina, till such time as the Empire could be secured to Nero her Son, who then, at noon time of the day, the doors of the Palace being opened suddenly, accompanied with Burrhus Captain of the Guard, went to the Watch, by which at the instance of the Captain, he was received with lucky Acclamations. Being put into a Litter, he was thence carried to the Camp, where speaking at the time required, and promising a Donative to the Soldiers, after the example of his Predecessors, he was saluted Emperour, and presently owned by the Senate, and in the Provinces. Claudius his Testament he never published, left the People should be moved by the injury offered to Britannicus, to whom his Father was so Superlatively unnatural, as to prefer his Wives Son before him. Indeed some of the Soldiers at first paused, and looking back, asked for Britannicus; but finding no body to stir in his behalf, joined themselves to the multitude. Nero came to the Government, being Seventeen Years Old, Six Years after he had been adopted by Claudius.

24. Nero at first carried it exceedingly well towards People and Magistrates, Governing according to the Pattern of Augustus, whose prescript he professed he would observe. He omitted no occasion of shewing liberality, clemency, and mildness, inasmuch that Trajan himself admiring his first Five Years, averred, that All Princes came thence to his first Five Years. He bestowed money to the People, gave Annual Stipends to impoverished Senators, and to the Prætorian bands Corn every Month freely. Being desired to subscribe to the execution of a condemned Person, Otho said he, I wish I knew not lessers. But this good beginning is rather to be attributed to Burrhus.

Burrhus and Seneca (the latter of whom, after his Adoption, was his School-master) who being in power, mutually helped each other. Agrippina thought by virtue of his name to rule indeed, and at the beginning Poisoned Silanus Proconsul of Asia, and made away Narcissus; without his knowledge the former, and the latter without his consent, and had gone further, but that Burrhus and Seneca interposed. Not long after, jealousies arose betwixt them, for he falling in love with Acte a Freed-woman, and distasting such as the leaned upon, removed Pallas her Minion from publick inspection, which so far exasperated her, that she upbraided him with Britannicus, as most fit to enjoy his Father's Seat. This Seat she told her Son he now enjoyed by her means, and not sparing to lay open all the evils, as the said, of their unhappy Family, her own Marriage and Sorcery; she took it as happy for the gods and her, that Britannicus was living, and protested she would go with him to the Camp.

25. This, together with Britannicus his frowardness (who being Fourteen Years old, began to be sensible of his condition, and to move compassion towards himself) made Nero resolve to dipatch him out of the way, and for that he could not do it openly to his Brother, he procured Poison to be given him, which working downwards first without any great incommodity, he caused to be boiled to that height, that it instantly killed him the second time, whilst he himself sat at a Supper with him, as knowing nothing. He made him be buried the same, though a very rainy Night, his mean Funeral being provided beforehand. Agrippina very much troubled that her refuge was gone, was shortly after accused to her Son, as intending by a Marriage with Rubellius Plautus (who was as near to Augustus as Nero himself) to invade the Sovereignty. Being something gone in drink when he heard of it, he would have had her killed out of hand, but being hindered by Burrhus, the next day she stoutly denied any such Design, and the wound of jealousy for the time was skinned over. After two Years, Nero began to discover what his Nature prompted him to. Difficulting himself in a servile habit, he ran about the City by Night to Taverns and Stews, accompanied with such as himself, where taking away things by force, as also cutting and slashing such as they met, he himself came into danger of life.

26. A little before those things, he sent Porcius Festus into Judea to succeed Felix, who being out of his Office, was accused at Rome by such Jews as dwelt at Cæsarea. Nero pardoned him through the intercession of his Brother Pallas, who was as yet in favour. About the same time happened a great diffention betwixt the Jews of Cæsarea and the Syrians, which there inhabited with them, about the Right and privilege of the City. They pretended that Herod the founder of it was a Jew, and those answered, that ere he named it Cæsarea, it was called the Tower of Straton, at what time none of the Jews inhabited it: and the Syrians by a great Sum of Money procured Beryllus (who had been Nero's School-Master) to get them the Emperours Letters, whereby was abrogated that Privilege which the Jews had formerly enjoyed with the Syrians. Herewith the Jews incensed, were still seditious till the beginning of the War. Great motions at this time fell out in the East. The Parthians had set upon Armenia, having driven away Rhadamsus Nephew to Mithridates, whom Claudian had set over that Kingdom, and who was killed by the other, that he might succeed him. Nero sent to preserve that Countrey Domitius Corbulo, who for two or three Years had little to do, because the Parthians deferred the War. But now Tiridates Brother to Pologesius the Parthian being resolved to fight for the Diadem, the Armenians also inclining to him, Corbulo took several Forts, and besieged Araxata the Metropolis, which, though the Inhabitants opened the Gates, and for this were spared, yet because it could not be held for the greatness of it, was burnt and razed. Nero for these things was called Imperator, very great Honours were Decreed to him, and a far greater stir was made by the flattering Fathers than was convenient.

27. The same Year that these things were done by Corbulo, being the Fifth of his Reiga, Nero fell in love with Poppæa Sabina, the Daughter of P. Otho, though she named her self after her Grand-Father by the Mother's side, became more eminent. He came first acquainted with her by the commendations of Otho her Husband, who also had been too familiar with her in the days of her first Husband Rufus Crispinus: She incensed him more against his Mother, because she feared, that as long as she lived, he would not diminish Othavia and marry her self. Sometimes she laid at him by divers Criminations, and otherwhiles jeered him as a Pupil, who not only wanted Command and Authority, but also Liberty. Some have suspected, that Agrippina sought to commit incest with her Son. How true forever this was, he now began to be absolutely weary of her, restless her company, and within a while resolved to make her away, though solicitous how to do it. At length Anicetus his Freed-man and General of the Fleet at Mysenum, acquainted him that a Ship might be so framed, as to break into peices and let her fall into the Sea. This Ship was thus made, and she brought into it by her Son, under colour of doing her honour, but the upper part of the Ship falling, chanced to mislead her, though it killed one of her attendants. One of her Maids knowing nothing of the design, cried out, that she was Agrippina, hoping thereby to save her self, and was thereupon killed by the Oars; but she herself being silent, escaped them, and swam to Land. Her Elcaper struck Nero with great consternation, who called up Burrhus and Seneca to give their advice. Whether they knew of the thing before or no is uncertain. Some say, Seneca asking Burrhus whether the Soldiers should not be commanded to kill her, he answered, they would do no such thing to the Daughter of Germanicus, and that Anicetus rather should perform his Promise of dipatching her. This he readily undertaking, accompanied her Head with a Club, another drawing his Sword, the stretched out her Belly and bad him strike that, and so died of many wounds. Some report, that her Son viewed her dead Body exactly, and passed his Judgment upon every part. She had been a very leud and ambitious Woman, and now reaped the fruit thereof, according to her own desire. For consulting on a time about the Fortune of this her Son, the Chaldeans told her, that he should Reign, but kill his Mother, to which she answered, Occidat modo imperator: Let him kill me, so be his Reign. After this wicked Fact he was continually tormented in his Conscience, confessing often, that he was haunted by the Furies, which did beat him with Fire-brands.

28. He excused himself to the Senate, laying great loads of heavy accusations upon her. But the Fathers not only excused but commended the deed, nay to such lordliness of Spirit was both Senate and People degenerated, that returning to the City, they met him with as great Pomp, as if he had come from some notable Victory; for the several Tribes, and the Senate received him: their Wives and Children being placed according to their Sex and Age. Hereupon he grew excessive Proud, as Lord over so many Slaves, and presently unmasking himself, without any care of his actions, fell into such disorders, as he appeared rather a Devil incarnate than a man. He became a Stage-player, learning that Art, and exercising himself therein publick continually. He ordained Games to be solemnized at Rome every Fifth Year, in imitation of the Greeks, and called them Neronia; persons of all sorts, and degrees, being constrained to be Actors: These being continued Night and Day, most horrid things were committed, Prince, Senate, and People, either through affection or fear, not only giving way, but compelling to such filkiness. Corbulo at this time prospering in Armenia had Tigranoverra yielded to him, and then placed in that Kingdom Tigranes, Grand-son to Avchelaus King of Cappadocia, with whom having left a Guard, and settled matters, he departed into Syria to succeed Vitellius the Governour. The Year following, being the 814 of the City, wherein Cæsius Petrus and Petronius Turpilianus were Consuls, the Romans received a sad Defeat in Britain.

29. Of late the Lieutenants of this Province had made but small progress in their Conquests; A. Didius Avidus the Successor of Plautius contenting himself with what was done before, and Varenianus, who followed him, making only some excursions upon the Silures; for he was prevented by death from any further service. But now Paulinus Suetonius the Emulator of Corbulo for Military glory, had the chief Command, and fought to equal the Acts of the other in Armenia, by chastizing and taming the Britains. He set upon the Mon (now called Anglesey) Peopled with strong Inhabitants, and the receptacle of all Fugitives, where he was received with multitudes of men on the shore, and with Women running about like Furies with Fire-brands in their hands, having their hair spread about their shoulders; the Druides also, the ancient Seat of whom that Island was; pouring out plenty of Curses. diers something terrified at first, being exhorted by their General, easily broke through, and dissipated this furious Company: then placed he a Garrison in the Island, and cut down the Groves where they were wont to offer man's blood, and consult their Gods by the entral of some Captive. But whilst these things were doing, news came to Suetonius of the Revolt of his Province. For, Prasagus King of the Aceni, that his Kingdom and Family might be freed from molestation, left Cesar his Heir, together with his two Daughters. But it happened for otherwise, his Kingdom being wasted by Centurions, and his House by Slaves: his Wife Boadicia (otherwise called Boadicea, Boudica, Vondica, and Boudanica) was whipped, his Daughters deflowered, his chiefest Subjects spoiled of their Goods and Lands, and his Kindred counted no better than Bond-men. Provoked by these things, and Fear of worse, when they should be reduced into the form of a Province, the Aceni took Arms, stirring up the Trinobantes to Rebellion. Others also with joined them, having heretofore combined to recover their liberty out of hatred to the old superannuated Soldiers, who being planted as a Colony at Camulodunum, committed grievous outrages against them, and these were rather cherished by the Army than otherwise, in hope of the like liberty for the time to come. But this Colony not being fenced by any Fortifications, for the Founders rather looked at the pleasantness of the situation than commodiousness of the ground; the Britains accounted it no great matter to destroy it.

30. The Camulodunians being terrified by several Prodigies, desired Aid of Cassius the Governour in Suetonius his absence. He sent them but 200 men, and those but meanly Armed, and they neglected still to raise any Fortifications, their Councils being confounded by such as were engaged in the Plot. Being then beset round by the Natives, all things were burnt and destroyed, and Pastius Cerealis coming to their relief with the Ninth Legion was utterly defeated, all the Foot being cut in pieces, and the Horse with himself glad to run away to the Camp; whereupon Cassius passed over into Gall, having by his aversion been the great cause of this defection. The same Defeat was given to Venerianum (out of the ruins of which arose St. Albans) a Town free of the City of Rome; for the Britains passing by Castles and places of defence, set upon such as were most obnoxious to their fury. At both places were massacred 70000 persons, none being taken or sold after the custom of War, but either put to the Sword, Hanged, Burnt, or Crucified as Malefactors. Suetonius passed through the midst of his Enemies to Londonium (now London) a Town not then notable in respect of a Colony, but for multitude of Merchants, and plenty of Traffick very famous. Perceiving it but badly provided of Soldiers, although he once thought to make it the Seat of the War, he left it, being not prevailed with to stay either by the Prayers or Tears of the Inhabitants. For, resolving with the loss of one Town to preserve the rest, he took all along with him that could go; and all others, whom either Sex or Age, or the pleasantness of the place detained, were destroyed by the Enemy. Having got together an Army of 10000 men, he resolved to venture a Battle with all expedition; and for that purpose made his choice of convenient ground. Boadicia carrying her two Daughters in the Chariot with her about to the Companies, told them it had been usual before for the Britains to fight under the conduct of Women, but she was now in another capacity than her Ancestress, being not to fight for a Kingdom, but as one of the ordinary sort to revenge her lost liberty, her own stripes, and the violence offered to her Daughters. As for her self she said she was resolved to win the Field, or die; as for men, they might live if they pleased, and be Slaves. Suetonius on the other side considering the weight of the Enterprize, was not silent.

31. The Romans, though far inferior in number, yet in Military knowledge and Discipline far exceeding the Britains, put them to the worst, and made of their great slaughter by reason of the difficulty of flight; for those having brought their Wives to behold the Battle, and be Eye-witnesses of their Valour, they had placed them in Waggon's about the Army. Some reported that scarcely fewer than 80000 of the Conquered were slain, and of the Conquerors about 400, and Boadicia ended her life by Poison. Afterwards, the Army being increased by a great Supply sent over by Cesar, wasted the Country with Fire and Sword, which was sorely oppressed by Famine; for being intent upon the War, the Britains had neglected the Sowing of Corn, hoping also to enjoy the Provisions of the Enemy. For all this they were not forward to ask Peace, being encouraged by Julius Cassianus, who being sent to succeed Cassius, disagreed so far with Suetonius, and so ill to those at Rome, that he wrote they must not expect an end of the War till some one was sent to succeed him, attributing all mishaps to his unfitness, and all success to the good Fortune of the Commonwealth. To view then the condition of Britain, was Polyeetus the Freedman of Nero sent over, who coming in with a great Train seemed terrible to the Roman Soldiers, but ridiculous to the Britains, who burning with affection to liberty, and as yet ignorant of the power of such, wondered that the General and Army (which had put an end to such a War) would obey Slaves. Suetonius was commanded to deliver up his Army to Turpillianus, who was even now out of the Consulship, and neither provoking nor being provoked coveted slothful idleness, as Tacitus telleth us, with the specious, and comely name of Peace.

32. The Year after was Albinus sent into Judea to succeed Festus, who died in his Government. About the same time Agrippa (who had power after his Uncle of Chalcis to bestow the High-Priesthood on whomsoever he pleased) gave it to Ananus Son of that Ananus or Ananias, who beyond example having himself enjoyed the Office, had five Sons, who every one of them executed the same. This young Ananus being a Sadducee, as also very bold and cruel, conceiving he had got a convenient opportunity (Jefus being dead, and Albinus not yet arrived) called a Council, and condemned James the Brother of Jesus Christ, as Josephus writeth, with some others, as guilty of impiety, to be stoned. These studious of the Law, who desired of Agrippa that he would command Ananus to forbear the like for the time to come: some going also to meet Albinus, told him that the High-Priest had no authority to call a Council, whereupon he wrote to him very angrily, and threatened him, upon which account Agrippa the King removed him from his Office after the Third Month. At this time died Burrhus at Rome, not without suspicion of Poison, and Seneca's power was weakened by the loss of that conjunction, whereby they had mutually strengthened the hands of each other. Seneca was now backbited, and by Nero slighted, of whom he desired leave to withdraw himself, having been with him Fourteen Years, and he offered to give up his great Estate into his hands (for that had brought him so far into envy,) but Nero having learnt, and practised Disimulation, under colour of respect denied his Petition. Now did Nero marry Poppaea, whom all this while he had kept as his Concubine, and dismissed Octavia loaded with Accusations of Barrenness and greater Crimes; and when the people troubled at it grew seditious, he caused her to be put to death in that fatal Island Pandateria. The same Year also as 'tis believed he poisoned the Chief of the Liberti or Freed-men, Periphorus, because he was against his marrying Poppaea, and Pallas, for that living very long, he had scraped together a vast Sum of Money.

33. At this time were the Stirrs renewed in Armenia. For Vologeses seeing his Brother beaten off, and Tigranes set up in his stead, had invaded the Country to revenge the injury offered to the line of the Arscidae. Corbulo, though very warily, yet resisted and repelled him, when Cesennius Petus was sent to defend that Country, who by his ignorance in Military matters, and rashness, undid all. Being beleagued, he was glad to Covenant for his preservation to quit Armenia, and remove the Garrisons thence, which done, Nero was to be sent to. Yet so ridiculous and degenerate were they at Rome, as to erect Trophies over the Parthians, though they knew nothing of the success, either one way or other. The Parthian Ambassadors came to Rome to desire that (as they hinted) which had been gotten by force, but without effect, for War was decreed against them to be managed by Corbulo; yet were they dismissed with gifts, so as there might be hope, that, if Triades himself would intercede for the Diadem, it should not be in vain. Corbulo again invaded Armenia; at which the Parthians affrighted came to a Treaty, wherein it was agreed that Triades laying down his Diadem at the feet of Nero's Statue should not receive it without his leave. Nero now growing worse and worse, broke out into most horrid imities, much nigh beyond all belief.

Craſſus being Conſul, adding the common Stage-player, and giving up himſelf to all Luxury, and unheard-of Pollutions, amongſt the reſt he married himſelf as a Woman to one of his filthy crew, called Pyrrhonoras, all things being provided and celebrated as at a Marriage. He made himſelf alſo the Husband of Sporus, from whom he took as much of the Male as poſſible, and ordered him to be brought to him in a Veil as a Bride. Being offended at the deformity of the old Buildings, and the narrowneſs of the Streets, or elſe to feed his cruel Eye with ſo ſad a ſpectacle as he had read to have happened at the Siege of Troy, he cauſed the City to be ſet on Fire, which burning Six Days and Seven Nights, of the Fourteen Diviſions Four only remained whole, the other being waſted, or deſtroyed, with the fury of the Flame. He beheld the Fire from the Tower of Mametz, and very merry at the beauty of it, as he termed it, in a Player's habit ſung the deſtruction of Ilium. This calamity being generally attributed to him as the cauſe, he accuſed the Chriſtians thereof, and raiſed the Fiſt Perſecution, torturing them with moſt exquisite kinds of puniſhment. About this time he ſent Gaiſſus Florus into Juſada to ſucceed Albinus, who deſiring to gratifie them of Jeruſalem, for all the miſchief he had done, ere his departure, brought out all the Priſoners, whereof thoſe that were Committed for any Capital Offence he put to death, but the reſt he Fined only and diſmiſſed; whereby all the Gaols being thus emptied, the Countrey was filled with Thieves more than before. The Year following a Conſpiracy was diſcovered againſt Nero, which gave him occaſion further to indulge his cruel humour.

35. Who was the Author of it is uncertain, as also upon what particular grounds it was hatched, though all the Persons bore him malice, as they thought they had reason. But Lucan the Poet (who wrote the Civil Wars betwixt Cæsar and Pompey, and was Nephew to Seneca by his Brother Annæus Mela) was aggrieved that Nero envied him the glory he had got by his Verses; and several others joined with them out of love to Cn. Piso the head of the party. It was discovered by Milichus the Freed-man of Sejanus, who had commanded him to fowr his Dagger, and provide necessaries for wounds; whereupon some would have had Piso to have gone to the Roftra, and laid open the Tyrant to the People, to obtain their help, but he refused. The next after him that was put to death was Annæus Seneca the Philosopher, and Nero's School-master, not being convicted of any Treason, though accused by one Natallis, as it's thought, to please Cæsar. (such an earnest desire his Scholar had to dispatch him).

36. Pompeia Paullina the Wife of Seneca (Dio calleth her a most noble Woman, perhaps the Daughter of Pompeius Paulinus; to whom Tacitus giveth the Title of Consularis, and who was set over the publick customs or imposts) cut also her veins, that she might die with him, but Nero bearing her no malice as it happened, sent some to stop the bleeding, and recover her. Seneca had another her brother befores the father of Lucan, who was also put to death. This was Annaeus Novatus, otherwise called Junius Gallio from his adoptive Father, being also mentioned in the Atts of the Apothecian, and then Governour of Achaia. Their Father was M. Annaeus Seneca a Rhetorician of Coraba in Spain, whose Safories and Controversies are yet extant, joynd to his sons Works. Nero professed in his madnes and cruelties. Acting the Stage-player full he was reviled at his Return home by Poppaea his wife, for which he killed her great with child, and thereupon the miscarried. Then raged he against many of greatest note, amongst whom was Mela the father of Lucan (who had formerly perished for the conspiracy) and this allayed the grief which was conceived for the death of many others. by the Pestilence that now raged, because they seemed thereby well delivered from the fury and rage of the Prince, who now neither used choice nor measure in his slaughters. Being puffed up with the success of his cruelty, he said, that None of his Predecessors knew their power, hinting also, that he meant to defory the remnant of the Senators. It was believed he had a great desire to deliver up quick men to be devoured of an Egyptian, a monstrous eater of raw flesh, or any other thing that was given him.

37. Neither was there wanting to him luxury and effeminateness, fuitable to his cruelty, nor any other vice, whereby the truth of that saying of Domitius his father might appear, who hearing of his birth, said, That From himself and A- grippina could proceed nothing but accursed, detestable, and to the damage of the Commonwealth. For in him felled to meet and be conjoynd not only al-all the vices of his own family (which of late had been too pregnant of them) but all the corruption of his Country, from the beginning to his very time. He lengthened his feasts from Noon to Midnight, accounting no life of riches but in the Abuse of them. Such he thought to be fordid and bafe, as took account of their expences, and he extolled and admired his Uncle Caius, for spending in to shorr a time to vast sums, as had been hoarded up by Tiberius. To Tiridates that came to Rome to take a Diadem from his hands, he allowed an incredible sum for his daily expences, and as profusely gratified him at his departure. He put on garment twice, paid for vast sums at dice, filled with a golden net, when he journeyed any whither, he never had less than a thousand Caroches in his train, and he caused his Mules to be shod with Silver. But his house exceeded all belief, he having built it out of the ruines of the City. For length, for pleant nes of groves and fish-ponds it was admirable, garnished also with Gold and precious stones. To the madnes of this expence he was incouraged by one that made him fair promises of discovering a vast treasure in Africk, which Dido the Queen flying out of Tyre should thence bring with her. But being deceived, assayed likely, to foolishly a project, he took such courages as became Nero to recruit his Coffers.

38. When Tridates was departed into Armenia, he went into Greece, there to act Tragedies, to fing, and run races in the Chariot. Running in the Olympick Games, although he fell from his Chariot, yet he was rewarded with a Crown as Victor. He took from Apollo the Cyrrhean Territory, and defaced the place where they were wont to receive Oracles, killing men at the hole whence the blast came. He attempted to cut through the Isthmus of Peloponnesus, digging first himself, and carrying out the first basket of Earth upon his shoul ders : but with the same success as others had before him. When he was in Achaia news came from Celsus Gallus President of Syria, concerning the Rebellion of the Jews. Being long vexed with the injuries of the Deputies and Governors, they could no longer contain themselves. Chriſt's blood lying heavy upon them, and crying for vengeance, they themselves executed part of it. For such robberies in the Country, such and so many murders in the City were committed, and such delusions by false Prophets prevailed amongst them, as after a wonderful manner turned their estate upside down, drew upon them the malice of their enemies, and demonstrated the high displeasure of Almighty God. The particular occasion of their rebellion was taken from Florus their Governor, who through the insinuations of his wife into Poppaea having procured that Office, carried himself as worthy of such a Master. He flew to that height of impudence and wickedness, as by a publick Crier to give free leave to rob and steal through the whole Country, on condition that he might have part of the booty. It was his design to provoke them to rebel, that his impieties might thereby be covered. After he and the Townsmen of Calarea had grievously abused such Jews as there lived, he came to Jerusalem with an Army, rifled the Forum, plundered the houses, killed the Inhabitants, whipped and hung up several, who, though Jews born, were made Equites of Rome, and all under pretence that some had reviled him for cruelty. Not content herewith, he periwaded the People of Jerusalem to go out to meet, in a courteous manner, certain Soldiers that were coming thither, to whom he sent, that they should not return their civility, that if they might be offended, and give out words, which advantage he commanded them to take, and fall upon them. This was performed, and many perished, whom the Chief-Priests and others with lamentable intreaties had periwaded to go forth, hoping thereby to please the Tyrant, and prevent mischief. From this violence sprang the War, in the Twelfth Year of Nero's Reign, the Seventeenth of Agrippa, the Second of Florus his Government, the 819 of the City, and 67 after the birth of Christ, C. Suetonius Paulinus and L. Pontius Telesinus being Consuls.

39. Some of those that were most eager after Rebellion, assaulted a Castle called Masada, killed the Romans, and placed therein a Garrison of their own. And in the Temple Eleazar the Son of Ananias the High-Priest Captain of the Guard and a forward young man, periwaded the People no more to offer the Sacrifices which were wont to be offered for the good of the Romans. The Chief-Priest and Nobility diswaded them all they could from Rebellion, but proving nothing, belought Agrippa and Florus to come and suppress the Seditious betimes. Florus glad to hear such news, gave no answer. Agrippa sent 3000 Horse, which being received into the upper part of the City, the Rebels took the lower part with the Temple, and after some ado brake also into the upper Quarters, burnt divers Palaces and publick Houses, and then besieged the Tower of Antony, which having taken within two days, they put the Garrison to the Sword. After this they laid siege to the Kings Palace, whither Agrippa's Soldiers being retired, upon their desire they were dismissed. But the Romans yielding upon the Faith of Eleazar, were all cut in pieces contrary to his word, except Mithilus their Captain, who begging hard for his life, promised to be Circumcized and turn Jew: and this was done on the Sabbath-day, in September. On the same day were all the Jews of Casarea Massacred by the Infantry, to the number of above 200000, not one being left alive; for those that escaped were taken by Florus, and brought out bound to the People. Throughout all Syria the slaughters of the Jews were renewed. At Alexandria also a sedition being raised, 50000 Jews were slain in one day by two Roman Legions.

40. Cestius Gallus as soon as he heard of these motions, came with an Army into Judea, wherein taking some Towns he fate down before Jerusalem, at the Feast of Tabernacles. But though he might easily with a little patience have taken the City, yet raised he his Siege, having neglected many opportunities. He departed to Antipatris, losing many of his men by the way, that were cut off by the Jews who followed him close in the rear. With this success the Jews being elevated, created two Commanders to govern the City, viz. Joseph the Son of Gorion, and Ananus the High-Priest: and they sent several Captains and Governors into the Country, amongst whom was Joseph, who wrote the History of this War. He fortified the several Towns of Galilee, and indured as great a conflict as to his own Person, with divers, both there and at Jerusalem, (who envying him the honour of his Command, would have had him turned out) as he did afterwards with the Romans. But Cestius sent to Nero then in Achaia, as we said, to let him understand the state of affairs, laying all the blame of the Rebellion upon Florus.

41. Nero deliberating what Captain he should send into Judea, wanted Corbulo whom he had killed. At length he pitched on Vespasian, who having been trained up in Martial matters all his Youth, he thought him only capable of such a Charge, though a little before he was grievously offended at him, for that he little regarded his singing (either departing from off the stage, or sleeping if there) so that he forbade him not only his presence, but also publickly to salute him. Hereupon he withdrew himself, and lurked out of the way in fear of his life, but Nero having now need of him, and not fearing him, because of the meanness of his birth and name, gave him this employment. Vespasian dispatched away his Son Titus to Alexandria, thence to bring Forces into Judea, and he himself passing the Hellepoint into Syria gathered together the Roman Soldiers with supplies from the Princes, and came to Ptolemais, where Titus reached him sooner than was expected for the Winter-season. Nero returning towards Rome in Triumphant manner, manner, after he had been two Years in Greece, C. Julius Vindex a Gall by birth, but of Senatorial degree amongst the Romans, incensed his Country-men against him, for that they groaned under his intolerable exactions, yet striving not for the Principality himself, he offered it to Ser. Sulpicius Galba an old Soldier, and now Governour of the Tarraconian Province in Spain, who, as well for his own safety, as to gratify ambition, accepted it. Nero being come to Naples heard of the conspiracy on that day he had killed his Mother, and was then little moved at it; but seemed rather to rejoice for the occasion that was thence offered to spoil the rich Provinces of Gall. For though the Mathematicians had told him that he should be forsaken, yet he interpreted it of the losses sustained in Britain and Armenia; and some also promised him, though in this condition, the Empire of the East, and some by name the Kingdom of Jerusalem; but most affirmed that things would go well at this time. He took nothing ill in all the opprobrious speeches of Vindex, as to be called an unskilful Musician; and, after the name of his Family, Embarbus; yet at length terrified by many messages he returned to Rome. Now had he most horrid projects in his head, as of killing the Captains and Governors of Provinces, with all the Exiles, and all of Gallish Original at Rome; of poisoning the whole Senate in Feasting, burning the City, and letting loose wild Beasts upon the People, thereby to hinder the quenching of the Flames. From these things he was thought to be terrified more by despair of accomplishing them, than out of any repentance concerning his purpose. In preparing for this expedition his special care was for the choice of carriages, wherein to convey his Concubines and instruments for the stage.

42. When he heard of the revolt of the rest of the Armies, in a great rage taking some poison with him in a Golden Box, he left his House, and sending certain of his trustiest Servants to Olbia to make ready some Ships, moved the Tribunes and Centurions of his Guard about flying with him; but some flaggering at it and hanging backwards, others flatly refused it. Then he considered whether he should not fly to the Parthians, or in an humble manner to Galba; or whether going to the Rosbra in a mourning habit, he should not there ask pardon in as doleful manner as he could for what was past? but he was fearful to be pulled in pieces ere he could reach the publick meeting-place, and put off those thoughts till the next day. At night finding his Guards withdrawn, he started out of his Bed, and sending his Friends about to their Lodgings, went also himself; but none would answer, so that he returned to his Chamber, whence his Attendants also were now fled, having taken away the furniture, and removed out of the way the Box of Poison. Then desired he that some one would kill him, but none attempting it, Then, saith he, I have neither Friend nor Enemy, and ran down as to throw himself into Tiber. But stopping ere he came there, he desired some lurking hole wherein he might recover his Spirits, and Phaon his Freedman offering him his assistance, he went with him to a Village four Miles distant in a disguise, hearing as he passed the Prayers of the People for his destruction. Here being called on to rid himself out of the way, and prevent the abuses which else would fall upon him, he ordered things to be prepared for his dead Body, weeping, and adding, Quis Artifex perco? How excellent an Artist do I die? Understanding at length that he was decared an Enemy by the Senate, and how he was sought for to be punished more majorum, or after the custom of their Ancestors; and upon his enquiry hearing that this kind of death was, to be Stripped, and having his neck made fast in a Pillory to be whipped to death, he called for two Daggers, the points of which he only felt, and put them up again, pretending that his fatal hour was not yet come: He had Porus lament and weep, and wished that some would help him by their own example to kill himself, chiding also himself for his backwardness. Certain Horse-men now drawing near to fetch him alive, he at length effected it, by the help of Epaphroditus his Freed-man, on the fourth of the Ides of June, having Reigned 13 Years, 7 Months, and 28 Days, in the 32 of his Age, and the 821 of the City, Anno Dom. 68. C. Silius Italicus, and M. Valerius Trachalus being Consuls. Vespasian asked Apollonius what mai Nero's overthrow? He answered, Nero could touch and tune the Harp well (noting his excessive delight in that Instrument) But in Government sometimes he used to wind the Pins too high, sometimes to let them down too low. The unequal, and untimely Entrenchance of power Pressed too far, and Relaxed too much, destroyeth Authority above all things.

43. About the latter end of Nero's Second Year St. Paul was sent bound to Rome by Festus, where he continued in durance two Years. In his Third living at Rome in free custody, he wrote to the Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, and Philemon. About the end of the Fourth he seemeth to have been let at Caesarea in Liberty, and thence to have returned into Greece and Asia, where for five or six Years he Established the Churches he had Founded. In the Eleventh Year of Nero Ecclij. Illustrate. he is said to have suffered Martyrdom at Rome. For, Nero having for the City on fire, accused the Christians, as Tacitus writeth; and exposed them to ignominious deaths. Some he caused to be covered with the skins of wild Beasts, Ecclij. Illustrate. that they might be devoured of Dogs, others to be Crucified, and others burnt alive, and that in the night, that they might give light to passengers. He offered his own Gardens for this show, and celebrated the Circenfian Games amongst the common sort in the habit of a Chariot driver, who could not have raged against Christianity as Tertullian observeth, but that some excellency was in it. In this First Persecution, besides Paul, who was beheaded, and many others, Peter also was Crowned with Martyrdom; being Crucified as tis reported with his head downward, which kind of death he himself desired, because he would die in a more dishonourable sort than his Lord and Master. But some will have St. Paul and Peter to have suffered Martyrdom in the last Year of Nero's Reign, and that on June the Twenty-ninth, inasmuch that Chrysostome saith, that the day of Paul's death was more known than that of Alexander's.

44. After the Martyrdom of James surnamed Just the First Bishop of Jerusalem (whom Eusebius (a) from Clement's reporteth to have been thrown down from a Pinnacle of the Temple, and brained with a Fuller's Club) who governed that See Thirty Years, Simon (b) Cleopas the Lord's Cousin German, one of the 70 Disciples, and who saw Christ with his eyes, was chosen into his place by the Apostles, and Disciples themselves, being gathered together for this purpose. After the Martyrdom of Peter, (c) Linus one of the 70 Disciples, of whom Paul makes mention, succeeded him in the See of Rome, where he continued Bishop Twelve Years, though some place his Martyrdom also in the last Year of Nero, and the Ninth before the Calends of October. Eusebius one of the 70 Disciples, whom St. Paul remembered in his Epistles, was Bishop of Antioch, being by Eusebius said to be the first known to govern that Church. Him succeeded Ignatius (d) the Disciple of John, who wrote as they say to Mary the Mother of Christ, and Mary unto him again. He wrote unto John the Evangelist, and to Polycarpus his Disciple. Besides, he wrote sundry other notable Epistles, yet extant, and in the Eleventh Year of Trajan was brought to Rome, and torn in pieces of wild Beasts, as will be hewn. Eusebius writeth that he was the Second Bishop by Succession after Peter in the Church of Antioch. When Nero had Reigned the space of Eight Years, saith the Historian, first after Mark the Evangelist, Anianus took the Government of the Church of Alexandria, a man both virtuous, and renowned in all respects.

CHAP. IV.

From the Death of Nero to that of Domitian, the last of the Family of Vespasian, the space of 27 Years.

ALBA after the Death of Nero obtained the Principality, yet not long; for being Emperor, he maintained not the opinion which had been conceived of him whilst a private man; for he gave way to a cruel and covetous humour, acting all things according to the Will and Lust of three men whom the People thence called his School-masters. But his severity towards the Soldiers, especially that speech Legi à se militem non emi, procured his ruin, who upon the revolt of the Armies in upper Germany betrayed him to M. Salvius Otho, notwithstanding he had adopted Piso. He was murdered by them in the Forum

Forum near the place where Curtius rode into the hole, and his head being cut off, for some time was carried up and down on a Spear, till his Enemies had with the fight fatished their flouting appetite, and then it was buried with the Body. He died on the 17th. of the Calends of February, in the 73. Year of his Age, having Reigned Seven Months.

2. Otho seized on the Empire by the help of his Soldiers, having resolved it after he saw Piso preferred before him. He was Nero's great companion, and now refused not to be called by his very name, suffered his Images and Statues to be renewed, as also his Officers and Freed-men to their former places, and the first thing he subscribed to was for Money to finish his golden House. But A. Vitellius was shortly after saluted Emperor in Germany by the Army there, being Son to L. Vitellius, who Governed Syria. Being sent into Germany by Galba, he denied nothing to the Soldiers, but granted them their wills, with impunity in all things, and for that was rewarded with this Election. Hereupon Otho desired the Senate that they would lend him, to acquaint him with his Election, and to persuade him to be quiet; but he himself by Letters offered to be only Partner with him in the Sovereignty, and to be his Son-in-law. The Enemy drawing near, the Praetorian bands stood very faithfully to him, even so far, that with much ado, and with the slaughter of some of their Officers, were they kept from destroying the Senate, which they suspected to be false to him. His interest was to draw out the War in length, having the Enemy at advantage, who was straitened both for necessities, and by reason of the narrowness of the passage: but he rashly and imprudently resolved on a Battle, either for that Vitellius was not yet come, or urged by the earnestness of the Soldiers. They had four Engagements; whereof in the first three he had the better, but in the last at Bedriacum (a Village in Italy betwixt Cremona and Verona, now called Labermein) was worsted; yet so as he might without difficulty have recovered himself, though taken at unawares, and deceived by pretence of a parley. But being ashamed to seek his own establishment with the hazard of so many mens lives, rather than out of any deperation, he killed himself. He was much extolled for his generous death (as it was accounted) which rendered him so much more desirable than his life had done, that many thought him to have killed Galba, not so much out of the desire to rule as to restore liberty (so called) to the Common-wealth. He died on the 12th. before the Calends of May, in the 8th. Year of his Age, and the 95th. day of his Empire.

3. Otho being dead, though Vitellius was detested by those at Rome, yet when they heard how things went they began to flatter, and gave him the Title of Emperor. The Army of upper Germany which first mutined against Galba, turning to him, he gladly received the surname of Germanicus, but deferred till the Title of Augustus, and utterly refused that of Cesar. When yet in Gall he heard of the event of the Battle at Bedriacum, he presently cashiered the Praetorian bands, as giving a bad example of revolt, and 120 which had demanded a reward of Otho for killing Galba, he commanded to be fought, and put to death. Hereby he much commended himself to the People, and gave hopes of an excellent Prince; but carrying on all things afterwards according to his natural inclination and former course of life, he deserved to be ranked amongst the worst of Governours.

4. He returned to Rome in a triumphant manner, and gave up himself to Luxury and Excess, wherein he also tolerated his Family and Soldiers, as in all manner of wickedness. Coming through the Fields where the Armies fought, when many loathed the noisomeness of the Carkeises, he stuck not to say, Optime olere occisum hostem, & melius vivere: that a slain Enemy smells well, but sweeter a Citizen. He drunk much Wine in the place before them all, to prevent any hurt that might proceed from the stench, and caused this Liquour to be distributed to the Soldiers, with the like vanity and insolence. Entering the City as into a Field with Trumpets sounding to the charge, with Colours flying, and in his Coat-armour, he fell more and more into the neglect of all Laws, divine and humane. He made himself Perpetual Consul, and that it might be seen after whole Pattern he meant to Govern, in the Campus Martius attended by a number of Priests he Sacrificed for the Soul of Nero; and at a solemn Feast commanding a Musician to sing something of Domitian's, he leaped up and applauded the beginning of Nero's Songs. He Governed State-matters at the will and discretion of the vilest Player and Chariot-driver, especially of Asinius his Freedman.

man. He gave himself over to such Luxury as he had been accustomed to in the days of Cain and Nero; especially to Gluttony, the abominable excess whereof turned him into a very Monster. For, he would eat four or five Meals a day, which that he might be able to bear, he used frequent vomiting, and inviting himself to the Houles of his friends, he would, as Nero did, put them to incredible expences. At his coming to Rome his Brother made him a Feast, wherein were served up 2000 several Dishes of Fish, the daintiest that could be found, and 7000 sorts of Fowl. But he far exceeded this preparation at the Dedication of the Great Platter, which he called Minerva's Target, in which were mixed together the Livers of Quilt-heads, Brains of Pheasants and Peacocks, with the Tongues of Phenicopters, and the small Guts of Sea-Lampries fetched as far as the Carpathian Sea and the Straights of Gibraltar. He would also eat meat taken from the Hearth in time of Sacrifice, and fetched from Victualling Houses, either smoking, made ready the day before, or half eaten.

5. He was prone to the killing of any person, and for any cause whatsoever: Noble-men, his School-fellows and contemporaries, he deceitfully made away by degrees. To one in a Fever, desiring a draught of cold Water, he gave Poison in it with his own hands. He scarcely ever spared any of his Creditors or others that asked him the Money he ought. One of them saluting him, he sent away to be put to death, and presently again calling him back (for which the by-standers commended his clemency) he caused him to be killed before his eyes, saying, that he would satiate his eyes with the slaughter of him; and another that interceded for him, he put to death with his two Sons. A certain Knight whom he commanded to be slain, to save his life, told him he had made him his Heir, whereupon he commanded his Will to be produced, in which finding that the man's Freedman was made coheir with him, he caused them both to be put to death. He was cruel to Mathematicians, because they foretold his Reign should be but short. And to complete all, he was suspected to have killed his Mother. These Vices only seemed to put him in mind of his condition, for else to great a stupidity had seized on him, that if others had not known him to be the Prince, he himself would quickly have forgot it. He accounted all sharp that was wholesome, liking of nothing but what was pleasant; and fortifying himself only with mirth and sottishness against all dangers, he forgot all things past, and regarded nothing present or to come: not a word of War proceeded from him, the rumour and talk of which was forbidden in the City. But he was within a short time roused by the coming of the Forces of Vespasian, who was by others put upon seeking the Empire, being then in Judea.

Vespasian put upon seeking the Empire. His acts in Judea.

6. Vespasian (that we may now prosecute the History of his actions in that Country) after Titus had brought the Army to Ptolemais out of Egypt, with his Forces united set upon Galilee, and at the first outlet took Gedara, which was burnt and destroyed. Thence removing to Jotapata, on the 21 day of May he took it by storm after 40 days, though stoutly defended by Joseph the Historian. Joseph was taken and kept to be sent Prisoner to Nero; but desiring to speak with Vespasian, foretold him that he should dismiss him out of Captivity, but as Emperour. After this, bestowing his Army at Cesarea and Scythopolis, to refresh the Legions, he himself went to Cesarea Philippi, where he was entertained by Agrippa the King for twenty days. Then went he about to subdue Tiberias and Varichaea, whereof the former yielded, and was spared at the request of the King, but the latter was taken by force and destroyed. After this were Ca-Idem l. 4. c. 1. malis, Gisfala, and the Hill Itaburim taken; and all Galilee being reduced, Vespasian, Titus, and Titus returned to Cesarea.

The Jews fall out amongst themselves.

7. The Jews were now imbroiled in civil dissensions, whilst some desired Peace, and others would not hear a word of it. Parties were made and fought in every City, and rash young men prevailed every where against grave and older sort, who foresaw the calamity. At first they robbed one another singly; but at length turned Thieves in whole Troops, committing such Cruelties, as equalled the misfortune received from the Romans. At last the Thieves loaded with plunder brake into Jerusalem, where they not only consumed the provisions of the People, but filled the City with Slaughters, Rapines, and Dissentions. They cast the principal Citizens into Prison, and then put them to death unheard, pretending they intended to betray the City to the Romans; yet for all this wickedness they boasted of Zeal for the Law of God, and Customs of their their Country, and thereupon were called Zealots. The People being about to rise against them, they betook themselves to the Temple, where they made one Phanias an ignorant fellow Higb-Priest, though he was not of the Order of Priests; but they were opposed by Ananus, who procured the People to rise against them, and beat them into the inner part. Hereupon they sent to the Sadduceans, accusing Ananus of an intention to betray their Country, and forasmuch as they fought for the liberty thereof, and now were besieged, they implored their assistance. Twenty Thousand came, and being let into the City, together with the Zealots, committed horrid outrages against the Inhabitants. They slew 8000 the first Night, and afterwards about 1200 of the chiefest, (amongst whom was Ananus) besides an infinite number of the common sort: then at length the Sadduceans perceiving the wickedness of the Zealots, and that they had falsely accused the Nobility, set at liberty 2000 which they had imprisoned, and returned home. After their departure the Zealots renewed their slaughters, and raged more cruelly than ever, especially against such as they had found attempting to flee to the Romans.

8. But they presently after fell out amongst themselves by reason of one John, who with a seditious party holding Gisfala, pretended to receive the conditions given him by Titus, and stole away to Jerusalem. There becoming the great incendiary, he now affected sovereign power; but he was withstood by such as before this had been equal to him. Though they thus disagreed, yet herein they consented, to spoil the People, and Jerusalem being thus filled with Tumults, those that were without the City had liberty to rob and spoil, and those whose Towns were hereby destroyed, assembled together in the Wilderness, and uniting, brake into other Places and Towns, so that there was no place in Judea, which did not languish in an unheard-of manner together with the Mother City. Vespasian excited by the seditious, and irritated by the Fugitives to save their Country, prepared for the Siege of Jerusalem, and that he might not leave an Enemy at his back, took in Gadara (where 13000 were put to the Sword) and all other places beyond the River, except the Castle of Macheron. He built Castles at Fericho and Adida, and made all things ready for the Siege, but hearing of Nero's death, and the succession of Galba, he deferred the Expedition, and sent Titus to know Galba's pleasure. But as Titus failed by Achaia he heard of his end, and Orto's advancement, whereupon he returned to his Father. Uncertain what would ensue, and who should be Emperour, they neglected the War against the Jews, for they feared their own Country, and therefore thought it an unfit time to assault strangers. Yet he drew out his Army from Cesarea, and subdued all the Forts of Judea save three Castles, Heronium, Massada, and Macheron, which were kept by the Thieves. Besides these Jerusalem only remained to be Conquered.

9. Vespasian hearing of Orto's death, and having compassion on the State, thought of freeing the Commonwealth from the Tyranny of Vitellius; but for that it was now Winter, and he was at a great distance from Rome, he strove to conceal that indignation which he had conceived. But Mucianus President of Syria perceived him to be very earnestly: certain Soldiers also who were removed out of Syria into Messa, giving him large commendations, the three Legions which proceeded as far as Aquileia to help Orto, resolved to proceed, notwithstanding his death, and put Vespasian's name into their Colours. First of all others, Tiberius Alexander Governour of Egypt, on the first of July swore the Legions to him, and two days after the Army in Judea, compelling him with Threats to take the Government upon him, took the Oath. The Armies then in several Provinces declaring for him, he sent Mucianus with Forces into Italy, and went himself to Aquileia, to make sure of Egypt. The Messian Legions hearing of Mucianus's coming, chose Antonius Primus an excellent Soldier (who had been banished by Nero, and restored by Galba) for their Captain, and hated for Italy, that they might have the plunder of the Country. Cassius (otherwise called Allienus) the General of Vitellius, made haste and got to Cremona before them; but considering the effeminateness of his Army, he hearkened to the friendly advice sent him by Antonius, and persuaded his Soldiers, by laying before them the weakness of Vitellius, and the force of his adversary, to revolt. They accordingly swore fealty to Vespasian, but presently repenting, cast bonds upon their General as a Traytor, and exhorted Antonius to embrace the quarrel of Vitellius, then coming to blows, though they wanted a Leader, maintained a most sharp fight, both parties being possessed with such fury, that Night it self could not sever them. They knew and talked to one another, may intermitting the fight for some time, gave Victuals one to another, and yet after their repasts fell to it again. But in a morning the Soldiers of the Third Legion saluting according to the fashion, the rising Sun, Petellus his men thought Mucianus was arrived, and thereupon betook themselves to Cremona, where loosing Cecina, they procured him to make their Peace, and the Masian Army entering the Town made great disorder.

The Armies in the East declare for Vespasian.

Tacitus Hist. lib. 2. c. 4. & 5. Sueton in Vitellius, c. 11. Josephus de bello Judaeo l. 5. c. 10, 11, 12.

10. Petellus hearing of this was amazed, and not knowing what to do, became ridiculous unto all men; for his affairs went down the wind in all places. He covenanted then with Flavius Sabinus the Brother of Vespasian for his own safety, and presently after, at the Raids of the Palace, before many Soldiers, professed he would give up the Empire, which he had unwillingly taken upon him. But the Soldiers crying out against it, he deferred the thing, and in the morning went to the Rosfra in a mourning habit, where with many tears out of a paper he uttered the same words he had before spoken to the Soldiers, who again interrupting him, the People had him te of good cheer, and promised him their assistance. Taking courage hereat, he forced Sabinus (who was Governour of the City) with others into the Capitol, which letting out fire he suppressed them; Sabinus being put to death, whole Nephew Domitian (afterwards Emperor) was hid by the Priest of Jupiter's Temple and escaped. Then would he have had the Senate lend Ambassadors to the Enemy with the Vespal Nuns to beg Peace, or at least to much time as to consider what was to be done. But Vespasian's Soldiers enraged at the report of the besieging of the Capitol, made haste. Petellus Cerealis being sent before with a Thousand Horse set upon the City, but was forced to retreat.

Antonius Primus coming on with the rest of the Army, many skirmishes happened, till such time as the Guards being beaten from off the Bridge Vespasian's men entered the City with great fury, wherein they committed grievous outrages. Petellus was pulled out of an hole in the Palace where he lurked, at first unknown; but being discovered, he desired he might be kept in Prison, for that he had something to reveal, which concerned the safety of Vespasian. But his hands being tied behind him, and an Halter cast about his neck, he was dragged half naked into the Forum, and being abused in the way, both by many words and deeds, was killed with many blows, and cast after the fashion of Traitors into Tiber. This happened in the 57th. Year of his Age, after he had held the Government Eight Months, and Five Days. The day following Mucianus entered the City, and the Soldiers being hindered from any further slaughters, the Empire was by the Senate decreed to Vespasian, who hearing these things at Alexandria, receiving congratulatory Embassies from all quarters, and having settled affairs in Aegypt ere he set forward for Rome, ordered his Son Titus to fall upon Jerusalem, and finish the War in Judea.

11. Whilst Vespasian and Petellus were yet disputing the controversy, great commotions happened in Germany, the Barbarians (now Inhabitants of Hollana)th in the Low Countries) rebelling first at the instigation of Claudius Crotilis, the most eminent amongst them, who having been sent Prisoner in Chains unto Nero, and dismissed by Galba, came into danger again under Vitellius, the Army requiring that he should be put to death. He drew into the Conspiracy, besides the Caninafates (a more considerable people inhabiting the same Island) by secret messages the Auxiliaries of Britain, and the Basavian Cohorts, which then quartered at Mogoniacum, now Mentz. They cast out, or destroyed the Roman Garrisons, overthrew Aquilus Captain of the Vanguard, and after him Munius Lupercus the Lieutenant. Herennius Gallus also, endeavouring to hinder the march of the Basavian Cohorts, was worked by them. Crotilis after the coming of the Cohorts, to colour the matter, swore his Soldiers to Vespasian, and besieged such as refused in the old Camp. After this the Roman mutinying against Flordonius, the command was given to Vocula, and Herennius Gallus was made his Lieutenant. Vocula in his first engagement with Crotilis had the worst, but at length by good hap overthrew him, the Vizard of his friendship to Vespasian being drawn off.

12. The report of Petellus his death through Germany and Gall doubled the War. For now Crotilis, without any pretence of friendship to Vespasian, carried himself as an Enemy to the Romans, and Petellus his Soldiers rather wished for external external servitude than his Government: the Galles also took heart, interpreting the burning of the Capitol to preface the destruction of the Empire. The Treviri therefore (now Inhabitants of Triers) and the Lingones (now of Langres) revolted, when all Gall was in a tottering condition, and what was worse, and unheard of, the Legions proved unfaithful, and were corrupted. For Vocula being slain, they took an Oath for the Empire of Gall, and to them other Legions in several places joined themselves, some being besieged upon necessity, and afterwards cut in pieces by Crotilis as they had deserved. In the mean time Julius Sabinus one of the revolvers taking on him the name of Cesar, led a great and disorderly Company against the Segunani (inhabiting the Country now called La Franche Comté) who not refusing Brattle routed the multitude, and put him to flight. These things being reported at Rome rather with improvement, all things seemed there to be lost, whereupon Domitian the Son of Vespasian, and Mucianus, addressed themselves to the War, and four Legions were presently dispatched away towards Germany.

13. By this time the Galles, by the means especially of Julius Vindex, began to consider of the power of the Romans, and at length approved rather of a servile Peace than a dangerous War; Petellus Cerealis also gave the Treviri a great Overthrow, and most of the revolvers returned to obedience. After this he accepted of Battel from Crotilis and Classius his companion, in the beginning whereof he had the worst, for the Legions began to be broken, the Horse was put to flight, and the Bridge over the River Moselle gained by the Enemy; but though he had now lost even all for want of heed, yet he reformed all by his diligence, so as, on the same day he took and destroyed the Enemy's Camp. Domitian and Mucianus heard of the success ere they came to the Alpes, and Mucianus perswaded Domitian against marching further, knowing his ambitious and haughty humour, which he had already betrayed whilst at Rome; but his advice succeeding not, he went with him out of complacence to Lyons, whence, as 'tis said, Domitian wrote privately to Cerealis to deliver up the Army to him, that he might therewith seize on the Empire. But perceiving he was despised for his Youth, he betook himself to such courses whereby he thought that his designs might best be covered. During these Stirs Vespasian was yet at Alexandria. Afterwards both Crotilis recruited his Forces through Germany, and Cerealis also doubled his strength, whereupon followed several fights, the effect of which was a Peace. For the Barbarians were so chastized, as glad they were to accept of it, as Crotilis of pardon, both of which were offered by the Roman General.

The invasion of the Sarmates.

14. With the aforelaid revolt of the Germanians, at the same time, faith * Josephus, agreed the boldness of the Scythians. For those that are called Sarmates, in great multitudes having privily passed over Ister, being violent, and most cruel, through the suddenness of their invasion killed many of the Romans whom they found in Garrisons, with Fonteus Agrilla the Lieutenant (who valiantly resisted them) and wasted all the adjacent Countreys with Fire and Sword. Vespasian hearing of this, and the wasting of Mesia, sent Rubrius Gallus to chastize them, by whom many being slain, such as escaped returned home in great fear. The War being thus ended, the General taking more care for the future, fortified the places with strong Garrisons, that the passage might be utterly impassable to the Barbarians. These first eruptions of the Barbarous Northern Nations are therefore more to be noted, because at length they over-ran and destroyed the Roman Empire. Now return we to the affairs of the Jews, and the War managed by Titus.

The Zealots fall out amongst themselves.

15. During the former transactions in the West, a faction was raised against the Zealots by one Simon the Son of Thora, who getting together a company of Thieves and Murderers that were assembled on the Hilly Countrey, fell upon many Villages and Cities, brought all Judea into his power, wasted Judea, pitched his Camp against Jerusalem it self, and became a great terror to the poor Inhabitants, who were most cruelly oppressed by the Zealots within. In the mean time such Judeans as had of late fled into the City, and were become of John's party (whom the Zealots had now chosen their Captain) fell at odds with him, detesting his cruelty, and killing many of his men, forced the Tyrant out of his Palace into the Temple; but Citizens fearing that by night he might fall out upon the City, let in Simon, and then set upon the Temple, but in vain. After this Eleazar, who once had been Chief amongst the Zealots, envying John his power withdrew some Soldiers from him, and kept the inward part of the Temple;

Temple;

Temple, whereby John was forced to fight, both against Simon and him. Hereby all things about the Temple were burnt up, and Provisions destroyed, which might have served them a long time, and for want whereof they were oppressed with Famine in the Siege.

Titus besieged the City.

15. But Titus in prosecution of his Fathers Orders came from Alexandria to idem id. Cesarea, where gathering together some Forces with Aids from the Neighbouring Kings, he appointed the rest to follow him, and marched towards Jerusalem, accompanied with Tiberius Alexander, (who now began to be in principal favour) and Joseph the Jew, he being for the truth of his prediction now released out of bonds. He sat down within six or seven furlongs of the City, a little before the Fest of the Passover, and therein shut up an infinite multitude, which according to the custom flocked to that solemnity; and hereby all Provisions were consumed in a short time. The three Factions upon sight of his great Army agreed to oppose it, and issuing out, made great disorder, forcing the Romans to forsake their Camp, and flee to the Mountains, but they were repelled by the great care and industry of Titus. But on the day of Unleavened bread (April the 14.) Elezazar, who kept the inward part of the Temple, opening the Gates to the people, which was desirous to Sacrifice, John sent many of his party in amongst the rest with Swords hid under their Cloaths, who killing Elezazar, and many of his faction, seized also on that part of the Temple, and thereby the number of the factions was reduced to that of two. That under John consisted of 8400, and the other under Simon of 10000 fighting men, besides 5000 Idamians. Notwithstanding the Enemy was at the Walls, and to oppose him, they a little joined together: yet did they break out the one upon the other, and the poor people miserably suffered under both.

16. The City being fortified with three Walls on every side, but where it was fenced with deep Vallies, Titus having with much opposition placed his Engines, battered the uttermost of them, and breaking, on the third of May, and the City, possessed all the North part as far as the Tower of Antonia, into the Valley of Cedron. Five days after, he brake within the second Wall, though the besieged made divers Sallies. They beat him out again, but the fourth day after he recovered the place, and prepared for the Battery of the third Wall. Yet he sent Joseph the Historian to them, who exhorting them with many words to yield, was entertained only with Scoffs and Reproaches. The people thinking to escape out of the City, John and Simon stopped up all passages, yet the Famine increasing many came out, whom being taken Titus caused to be Crucified to such a vast number, that room was wanting for Crosses, and Crosses for Persons. On the 12th of May he began four Mounts whereon to place his Battering Rams: two near to the Castle Antonia, where he hoped he might take the Temple, and other two near the Monument of John the High-Priest, where he thought he should with most ease break into the upper part of the City. But John, whose part it was to oppose the Romans in the former place, cast down, and burnt two of them, and two days after Simon did as much by the other, though seventeen days had been spent in making them all. He destroyed also many Rams and Engines, and brake into the very Camp of the Romans; but was repelled by Titus from Antonia, who in a Council of Officers resolved now to compass the whole City with a Trench, which with incredible diligence and celerity was finished in three days, with thirteen Forts to hinder the flight of the besieged, and hinder the conveyance of relief into the City.

17. The seditious were nothing herewith moved, though the Famine not only raged amongst the common sort, but themselves also were pressed by it. A certain Noble-woman fed her Child to eat it, and such a mortality ensued, that from the fourteenth of April to the first of July were carried out to be buried at the publick charge One Hundred and Fifteen Thousand and Eighty Carkeises of the poorer sort, as Titus was told by one Mannaus, who was appointed to pay the Money. Divers Noble-men that fled to him, certified him also that Six Hundred Thousand of the ordinary sort were cast dead out of the Gates, and others that were dead besides, were innumerable; for because they could not carry all out, they laid them up in Houses. A Bushel of Corn was sold for a Talent, finks and holes were raked to find old dung of Oxen to eat, which moved the Romans to compassion, but the seditious were hereby nothing changed. For Simon not abstaining from Murders and Rapines, notwithstanding this lamentable condition, killed Matthias the High-Priest, by whom he had been let into the City.

City, with his three Sons, and sixteen others, pretending that they purposed to flee to the Enemy. Judas one of his own Officers hereupon weary of his cruelty, attempted to betray a certain Tower, whereof he had the charge, to the Romans; but being discovered, was put to death with ten others of his complices. John also being driven by necessity, converted the Golden Vessels of the Temple with the Sacred Money to prophane uses, and was constrained to divide the Wine and Oil, ordained for Sacrifices, to his Soldiers.

18. Titus cut down all the Groves within a great distance of the City, and causing more Mounts or Scaffolds to be Erected within Twenty-one Days, on the first of July began to batter the Wall of Antonia, John that opposed him being beaten back, and on the fifth day broke into the Cattle. At this time many false Prophets suborned by the Seditious, told the multitude they must expect assistance from God, and therefore though Titus often exhorted them to yield, they flatly refused, boasting that they would rather endure all miseries. The contest was earnest about the Temple. The Wall of the inward part thereof was too strong for the battering Rams, and the Defendants valiantly resisted at the top: the foundation of the Gates could not be undermined, and therefore Titus was constrained to set them on fire. Yet was it his intention to save the Temple, but on the Tenth of August, a certain Soldier without any command, (nay against the command of his General) moved as by an instinct from above, cast fire into the buildings on the North side, which catching the flame imparted it to the Temple itself, notwithstanding all that Titus could do to quench it, on the same day of the same Month that it was formerly set on fire by the command of Nebuchadnezzar. The Temple thus burning, Titus was saluted Imperator by his Soldiers, and the Tyrants with their Companions fled into the City. They now desired a parly with the General himself, who checked them much for their obstinacy, but promised them life if they would yield. But refusing to commit themselves to his fidelity, they required to depart the City with their Wives and Children, wherewith being greatly vexed, he commanded it to be proclaimed by a Crier, That they should not look any longer for Mercy.

19. He permitted his Soldiers to plunder and burn the City, but the seditious wretches got to the King's House, where many had deposited their wealth, and thence repelled the Romans. They also killed of their own Country People to the number of Six Thousand and Four Hundred, and rifling the money got them into the upper and strongest part of the City, called Sion, where for all this danger they still most cruelly Tyrannized. Titus having considered the strength of the place, provided Engines to batter the Walls, and began so to do it on the Seventh day of September. Part of the Wall being broken down, the Tyrants were seized with great fear and amazement, not knowing what to do. Some said the East part of it was broken down, others that the Romans were entred, and that they saw them out of the Towers; so that the power of God appeared in the overthrow of these wretches; for they forsook the Towers which were their only strength, and in vain seeking to escape, hid themselves in Caves and Privies. The Romans entering, put all to the Sword, and burnt the Houses with all that fled to them for safeguard. Titus commanded both the Temple and City to be utterly razed by a plow brought over them, according to the custom; only the West part of the Wall with three Towers for their strength and beauty he preserved, to bear testimony of the flateliness of the City to posterity. They would have crowned him as a Conqueror for this work, but he refused the honour, denying that he was the Author of it; for that he only served God herein, who by it demonstrated his wrath against the Jews. To such an end came this famous City, on the Eighth day of September, in the Second Year of Vespasian, he and Titus his Son being Consuls. Thirty Eight Years after the death of Christ, the Blood of whom now fell heavy upon them. It had been taken in all six times; by Asochus or Shishack King of Egypt, Nebuchadnezzar, Antiochus Epiphanes, Pompey, Herod and Solus, and now by Titus; but twice only was it destroyed, viz. by Nebuchadnezzar and Titus. It was first built, saith Josephus, by Melchisedek King of Sallem, and afterwards enlarged by David. It was burnt by the Babylonians. One Thousand Four Hundred Sixty Eight Years and Six Months after the Founding of it, and Four Hundred Seventy Seven Years and Six Months after it had been taken by David from the Canaanites. By Titus Vespasian it was destroyed One Thousand One Hundred Seventy Nine Years after David took it, but from its first Founding to its last Destruction intervened Two Thousand One Hundred Seventy Seven Years.

20. John and Simon having hid themselves were taken, and the former being condemned to perpetual Prison, the other was reserved for a Triumph. The rest of the Thieves and Seditious were discovered, one telling of another, and were all slain. Of those which during the whole War were taken Captives the number amounted to 97000, and of those that Perished in the Siege to 110000. So heavy was the guilt which lay on them for the death of Christ, and such were the horrid Enormities committed by them, that we have reason to agree with Josephus, who thought, that if the Romans had delayed to come against Lib. 6. c. 16. them, the City would either have been swallowed up of the Earth, or have perished by some Deluge, or else by Thunderbolts and Lightning have undergone the punishments of Sodom, whose Inhabitants they exceeded in wickedness. A Year after was Lucilius Bassus sent Lieutenant into Judaea, who having the Army of Cerealis Vitellianus, took the Castle of Herodian and of Macherus beyond Jordan. Not long after Vespasian wrote to Liberius Maximus the Governour, Idem l. 7. c. 25, to tell all the Land of the Jews, upon whom wheresoever they lived he imposed a Yearly Tribute to be paid into the Capitol, it being that they were wont to pay into the Temple at Jerusalem. About a Year after Publius Sylva succeeded Bassus then dead, and finished the War, taking the strong Castle of Massada from Eleazar, who held it with 960 Hacktles, such as upon his motion set fire to the Castle and all their Goods, and then killed themselves. Many like them flying out of the Country came to Alexandria in Egypt, where they solicited the Jews to revolt, but were by them delivered up to the Romans, and those of them that then escaped were afterwards taken. Vespasian hearing of their attempt, gave order to Lupus Governour of Alexandria, to demolish the Temple of the Jews, (built in Egypt in times past by Onias Brother to the High Priest) which he neglected to do, only spoiled it of some consecrated things, and shut it up. But Paulinus his Successor utterly bereaved it of all, and so shut it up, that he made it inaccessible, and without any shew of Religion, 343 Years after it was first built by Onias.

21. But the Jews of Cyrene were also infected with a distemper of madness. There one Jonathan a Weaver led many of the simple sort into the Wilderness, promising to shew them signs and wonders; but by the chiefest of the Jews the matter being discovered to Catullus Governour of those parts, he sent Soldiers who slew most of them, and not long after Jonathan himself was taken. Catullus a covetous man procured him and others to accuse many unjustly, whom having slain and seized on their Estates, he carried him to Rome, where following the same Trade, Joseph the Historian was also accused; but Vespasian having found out the deceit, caused Jonathan first to be whipped, and then burnt alive. Catullus at present escaped through the mildness of the Emperor, but not long after fell into grievous anguish of mind, imagining he saw the Ghosts of those he had slain, and his bowels rotted away from him, that he died miserably. Thus far hath Josephus communicated to us the affairs of the Jews, vide Esch. c. 25. 16. who being kindly entertained by Vespasian, was honoured with a Statue, and his Books were thought worthy of the publick Library. For the truth of his History concerning the Wars, he had the testimony of the Emperours, King Agrippa, and others. Titus would have the certain knowledge of these Wars delivered unto Josephus contra Apianum lib. 1. c. 2. Antiqu. l. 1. c. 16. c. 25. 16. the World by his Books only, commanding them to be published with the privilege of his own hand. And King Agrippa wrote 62 Epistles, wherein he testified of the true History delivered by him. But his Jewish Antiquities he finished not till the Thirtieth of Domitian, when he himself was 56 Years old, as he testifieth at the end of that Work.

22. To Vespasian was renewed the Lex Regia, and the same power that Augustus, Tiberius, and the rest enjoyed, was confirmed to him as Hæreditary. A fragment of this Law (which evinceth that absolute power we formerly proved to have been in the Emperours) is yet extant after this manner. Let it be lawful for him to make a League with whom he pleaseth, as it was lawful to Divus Augustus, Tiberius Julius Cæsar Augustus, and Tiberius Claudius Cæsar Augustus Germanicus, &c. As also to hold the Senate, make report, dismissis, and make Senatus Consulta by reporting and separation, as it was lawful to Divus Augustus, Tib. Julius Cæsar Augustus, Tib. Claudius Cæsar Augustus Germanicus. Moreover, when as by his Will, Authority, Command, or Mandate, or being present, the Senate shall be assembled, it shall be effectual to all ends and purposes, as if the Senate had been assembled or held by Law. Moreover, whatsoever he he shall command to the Roman Senate and People that stand for any Magistracy, power, command, or charge, or to whomsoever he shall give or promise his Suffrage, let it be considered beyond the usual form in the Comitia. As also it may be lawful for him to enlarge the Pomarium if he think it convenient for the Commonwealth, so it was lawful for Tib. Claudius Cæsar Germanicus. Moreover, whatsoever he shall think useful for the Commonwealth, or agreeable to the Majesty of all things divine or humane, publick or private, let him have right and authority to act and do, so as it was lawful for Divus Augustus, and Tiberius Julius Cæsar Augustus, and Tiberius Claudius Cæsar Augustus Germanicus. Moreover, from what Laws and Plebiscita it was ordained, that Divus Augustus, Tiberius Julius Cæsar Augustus, and Tiberius Claudius Cæsar Augustus Germanicus should be loosed, from those Laws and Plebiscita, let the Emperor Cæsar Vespasian be loosed. And what things soever, by what Law or asking soever Divus Augustus, Tib. Julius Cæsar Augustus, and Tiberius Claudius Cæsar Augustus Germanicus ought to do, let it be lawful for the Emperor Cæsar Vespasian Augustus to do them all. Moreover, what things soever before the asking of this Law were acted, done, decreed, or commanded by the Emperor Cæsar Vespasian Augustus, or by any other, by virtue of his Command or Mandate, let them be held as just and valid, as if they had been done by command of the People.

The Sanction.

If any one by virtue of this Law hath done or shall do any thing against the Laws, asking of Laws (rogationes) Plebiscita or Senatusconsulta, or shall not do what he ought to have done according to any Law, asking, Plebiscitum or Senatusconsultum, and that by virtue of this Law, let no damage thence light upon him; neither let him owe any thing to the People for this matter, neither, let any have an action against him, neither let any one judge him, nor permit the matter to be debated before him.

23. In the fourth year of Vespasian, Cæsennius Petrus President of Syria, accused Antiochus King of Comagena and Epiphanes his Son, as holding correspondence with the Parthian, whereupon order was given him to prevent what might ensue. Petrus then invaded Comagena, which Antiochus quitted, being loth to fight, and fled into Cilicia. His Sons also, after they had made some opposition, went to Vologesus into Parthia. But Petrus procured Antiochus to be taken and sent to him bound towards Rome, yet Vespasian caused him to be loosed, and stay at Lacedæmon, where he allowed him a revenue to live like himself, and he afterwards sent for both him and his Sons to the City, where they were magnificently entertained. About this time the Alani, who being Scythians inhabited about Tanais and the Lake Maeotis, consulted with the King of the Hyrcanians who was Master of the Straights to invade Media, which they entered and sacked at their pleasure. Pacorus the King being forced up into a strong Hold, and glad to redeem his Wife and Concubines with an Hundred Talents. From Media they passed into Armenia, and wasted the Country. Tiridates the King opposed them, but was near being taken alive in battle, for with his Sword he cut in pieces the Rope that was cast about his neck, as they were therewith drawing him amongst his Enemies, and escaped. But they enraged at his opposition wasted the Kingdom, and carrying great booty out of both Countreys returned home.

24. Vespasian took away liberty from Achaia, Lycia, Rhodes, Byzantium, and Samus, reducing them into Provinces, as also Thracia, Cilicia, and Comagena, the King whereof he sent for to Rome, as we laid before. Cappadocia now began to be over-run with barbarous Nations, to restrain whom he added Legions, and placed one of Consular dignity over it in room of an Egues. At length all Wars and Tumults being suppressed both at home and abroad, he shut the Temple of Janus the sixth time from the foundation of the City. It was his principal care first to settle and establish the afflicted and tottering condition of the Empire, and then to adorn it. Whereas the City was very deloried by reason of the burning of it, he permitted any to build upon old PLOTS, if the owners would relinquish them: He also re-edified the Capitol. As to his personal quality, he was of much temper and clemency, easily passing by and forgetting injuries. The means of his former condition he sought not to hide, but sometimes would profess it openly: He took not the Tribunal power, not title tle of Father of his Country for some time. If any innocent person were punished, it was forcibly against his will, and for want of knowledge. He passed by the Treason of many that had plotted his Destruction, saying, They were fools, and knew not what a weight and trouble the Empire was: he wept and groined at the punishment of an offender. To Vologeses King of Parthia who wrote to him thus: Artaxerxes King of Kings to Fl. Vespasian, without any reproach he directed his answer thus, Fl. Vespasian to Artaxerxes King of Kings. The only vice reprehended in him was covetousness, and yet to that seeking earnestly for Money, he was constrained through the necessities of the State. <sup>Tis certain he used it well however gotten, being very liberal in feasting, relieving impoverished Senators, and others of desert. He encouraged Learning, and gave the first stipends out of the Exchequer to the Professors thereof. He was</sup> Conful eight times (besides once before he was Emperour) and in his last Confulship died of a flux, in the Sixty ninth year of his Age, the Tenth of his reign being completed; in the 832 of the City, A. D. 79, he himself the ninth time, and Titus Caesar the seventh being Confuls. He was the first Emperour whose Successor was his own Son. In his time flourished Pliny the Elder and Writer of the Natural History. Who also the same year that he died, whilst he went to see what might be the cause of the burning of the Hill Vesuvius, was sufficed with the smোক thereof, and died, as Pliny Junior his Nephew writes in his Epistle * to Trajan. Now also Quintilian and other Learned Men * Lhb. 6. p. 16.

His death,

2nd that of Pliny.

2nd succeeded ceth him.

25. Titus his eldest Son succeeded him (by whom Jerusalem had been taken, and destroyed) on the eighth of the Calends of June. He was born that year wherein Catus was slain, and brought up with Britannicus the Son of Claudius. <sup>Sutton in Tit. Emper. l. 7. p. 82.</sup> being instructed in the same things by the same Masters: he was thought also to have drunk some of the poison which Nero gave to that Prince, and that this was the cause of his want of health some conjectured. He performed the Office of Tribune both in the Wars of Germany and Britain with great Commendations, and after that, being Questor, came to have the command of a Legion in Judaea. <sup>A. D. 79. P. C. 832.</sup> After his Father came to the Government he was suspected by some, when he was yet in Egypt, as intending to establish himself, whereupon he halted to Rome to cut off all jealousies. Taking then part with his Father in the Publick Cares, he triumphed with him over Judaea, executed with him the Censorship, Tribunship, and seven Consulships; nay, taking as it were all upon him, he dictated Letters in his Father's Name, published Edicts, spake in the Senate, and that in the room of the Questor, and took on him the Government of the Palace, which never had formerly been discharged but by some Roman Knight; and this Office he executed with such rigor, that he contracted much envy, and was accounted cruel. He was suspected of Luxury, for feasting with voluptuous persons till midnight; of Incontinency also, being (amongst other Arguments) too familiar with Berenice the Sister of King Agrippa, to which Lady he is also said to have promised Marriage, but performed it not, because of the distaste of the People. Moreover rapacity was laid to his charge. He was both accounted and openly talked of as another Nero, and scarcely did any ever come with more fear or less favour to the Government.

His admirable Virtues.

Several calamities in his time.

26. But so contrarily to expectation did he behave himself, that his former carriage did but set him off with the greater lustre; and so free was he from all Vice, and adorned with so many Virtues, that he became the Love and Delight of Mankind, and by an happy exchange was so called. His temperance he showed in the moderation of his Diet, the choice of his Companions, and putting away Berenice: His moderation by abstaining utterly from mean mens Goods, and refusing often ordinary Benevolences, although no man ever exceeded him in Munificence. He was the Mirror of Courtesie, being wont to say, That no man should go sorrowful from the presence of the Prince; and on a day having done no courtesy for any man, he said, Amici diem perdidit, My friends I have lost a day. Several sad Accidents happened in his little time; so great a Pestilence as seldom had been known. So great a fire there was in Rome, and kindled from Heaven, that it burnt three days together. Vesuvius also the Hill in Campania burst forth with great flames, and destroyed all round about it; all which miseries he lessened as much as he could, neither sparing cost nor pains to relieve the distressed. At the same time another War arose in

Britain,

Britain, wherein Cn. Julius Agricola harassed all the Country of the Enemies, and first of all the Romans, that we know of, faith Dio *, knew that Britain was compassed about by the Sea. For certain Soldiers in a Sedition having killed their Centurions and Tribunes fled to their Ships, and launching out, failed about that part of Britain which lieth toward the West, being carried by waves and wind: when they had done this, and by chance light upon the other Camp of the Romans on the other side, Agricola sent out others to hold the same course, from whom he also knew that it was an Island. These things being done in Britain, Titus was saluted Imperator the fifteenth time. Agricola passed the rest of his life in Ignominy and Poverty, because he had done greater things than were suitable to a Praetor; and for that cause he was afterwards put to death by Domitian, though by the permission of Titus he had triumphed. But concerning these things Tacitus is rather to be consulted in the life of Agricola.

27. Titus put down Informers, usually tolerated before. His mercy was too great; for he vowed he had rather perish than destroy another, as according to the judgment of some it came to pass. Amongst others that plotted his destruction, he not only spared his Brother Domitian, but had him in the same respect as from the beginning, and owned him as his Partner and Successor; only betwixt them two he bestowed him with tears at length to relent to Love and Unity. He was a man of excellent parts, both outward and inward accomplishments; but to the great loss of Man-kind, was presently taken away, whether by the treachery of his Brother or no, is uncertain. In the beginning of his Sickness he is said to have look'd up to Heaven, as taking it ill he should dye so soon, being not conscious to himself of any Sin, save one, which as he did not express, so it is altogether unknown. He was with good reason sadly lamented throughout the Provinces. He died in the same Village his Father had ended his days, near the Country of the Sabiner, in the forty second year of his Age, when he had reigned two years, as many months, and twenty days; in the 834 year of the City, A. D. 81. M. Plautius Silvanus, and M. Annius Vetus being Confuls.

He dieth.

Domitian his Brother succeeded him.

At his beginning different his Vices.

Which yet he overcometh.

28. Domitian (so called from Domitilla their Mother) succeeded Titus, being more like to Nero, Caligula, or Tiberius, than either Father or Brother. His youth he passed disgracefully enough. Doubting upon the death of his Father, whether he should not give a double donative to the Soldiers to obtain their good-will, he never feared to boast that he was left Partner in the Empire by his Father, but that his testament was corrupted. He never ceased to plot against his Brother secretly or openly, and ere he was quite dead, commanded him to be carried out as such. In the beginning of his reign he restrained himself; for his cruelty was then employed upon flies, which privately in a room he was wont to catch and prick with a Bodkin, so that one asking whether any body was within with Cesar? it was not unfailly answered by Vibius Crispus, No not so much as a fly. But though at present he strove to allay the fury of his vices by some forced virtue, yet within a while he let fall also this vizard, and became in appearance what inwardly his indisposition inclined him to be.

29. He undertook several Expeditions, as against the Catti and Sarmatians (People inhabiting the Northern parts of Europe) who had cut off a whole Legion. <sup>Sutton in Tit. Emper. l. 7. p. 82.</sup> The Dacians also put him to much trouble, and grievously afflicted the Roman State, under conduct of Diurpaneus their King; for they overthrew first Oppidius Gracian lib. 7. p. 16. Sabinus a man of Consular dignity, and next Cornelius Fuscus Captain of the Guards, in several fore and bloody Battels, in such that the Historians of those times, have thought fittest to pass over in silence the number of the slain; Yet at length he triumphed over them all. He was also struck at by a Civil War raised by L. Antonius President of upper Germany, whom he had incensed by the odiousness of his vices, and especially by uncivil language. This he finished though absent with admirable felicity; for, that very hour the Fight was to be, the Rhine swelled so high, that it hindered the Auxiliaries which were sent to Antonius, from joining with him. In the second year of his reign Agricola defeated the Ordovices in Britain, and took the life Mona about Autumn, and that upon his first coming into the Island. So that the years of the Expeditions which Tacitus afterwards relateth, are rather to be reckoned from the Kalends of January of the former year, as Jacobus Cappelus hinteth. Though Dion Cassius, as appeareth from Xiphilinus, referred the discovery of Britain being an Island to the reign of Titus: Yet others unto the time of Domitian, who at length envying Agricola that great glory he had got in reducing Britain, recalled him, under under

under pretence of sending him into Asia; and he died two years after, on the tenth of the Calends of September, in the fifty sixth year of his age. Pompeius Collega and Cornelius Priscus being Consuls. Whether he died of poison or not, though there wanted not suspicions, Tacitus his Son-in-law dareth not affirm.

His cruelty.

30. Domitian having suppressed the Rebellion of Antonius, grew extraordinarily cruel, putting men to death upon small and trivial accounts. Those of any note that were of his party he tortured to death by ways unheard of, and confounded the cause of the innocent with that of the guilty, raging against the Christians with a second persecution. He arrived at that horrid arrogance, that he ticked not to say in the Senate, That he gave the Empire to his Father and Brother, who did but restore it to him; and (what was worse than this) he would be called our Lord and God. Being hereby rendered terrible and hateful unto all, he wrought his own destruction, which fearing, and being foretold it by the Chaldeans, he grew timorous out of measure, and was moved with the least suspicion. Hence did he cause the place where he was wont to abide, to be beset with the stone Phengires, that he might fee if any one came behind him; and though he was sufficiently ambitious, yet did he refuse an extraordinary honour offered him by the Senate, viz. that when he bore the Consulship, Equites should go before him with spears amongst the Sergeants. Hence also he put Euphratidus his Secretary to death, because it was believed that he had helped Nero in dispatching himself; and he killed Flavius his Uncle, though he had openly owned his two Sons as his Successors, whereof the one he called Vespasian, and the other Domitian; which hastened his destruction. Eight months after he was slain by his own servants, of whom Parthenius the chief of his Chamber was principal. Domitia his Wife being drawn in to the Conspiracy, for that she feared to be poisoned for her kindness to Paris. Longinus Proculus then in Germany is said to have foretold the very day of his death, and Apollonius Tyaneus a famous Magician (who being converted before him vanished out of his sight) spoke of it that very hour, exhorting Stephanus as it were to strike him home. The people took his death indifferently, the Soldiers however, which they shortly after revenged upon the Murderers; but the Senate as it were triumphed, and ordered the memory of him to be abolished. The best thing we find concerning him is, that though he was no Scholar himself, he took care for repairing of Libraries. He was murdered on the fourteenth before the Calends of October, in the forty fifth year of his age, and the fifteenth of his reign, in the 849 year of the City: A.D. 96. T. Fulvius Valens, and C. Antistius Petus being Consuls. In his time flourished Statius Papinius, who beginneth the fourth book of his Sylve with the celebration of his seventeenth Consulship, which fell in with the fourteenth of his reign. Juvenal and Martial also flourished at this time; whereof the latter was of Equestrian Rank, though ever poor, as * he himself witnesseth.

31. Now must we give a short account of Ecclesiastical affairs, according to the course of time and matter. (a) Dionysius the Areopagite being by St. Paul, (c) Ephes. 6. (who converted him to the faith) made Bishop of Athens, governed that Church till the time of Nero and afterwards. There are extant several works under his name, but suspected; and sundry Epistles, whereof one to John the Evangelist then in the Isle Patmos, and another unto Polycarpus. Linus the Bishop of Rome, being Crowned with Martyrdom on the ninth of the Calends of October, in the last year of Nero, according to Damasius, Cletus or Anacletus succeeded him in that See. Some next unto Linus do place Clemens, then Cletus, and then Anacletus. But Irenaeus, Eusebius, and Epiphanius rank the thus: Peter, Linus, Cletus, or Anacletus, Clemens, for he whom Irenaeus and Eusebius call Anacletus, is by Epiphanius and Damasius called Cletus. This Cletus according to Damasius died in the second year of Domitian, on the sixth before the Calends of May and was succeeded by Anacletus. But (b) Eusebius maketh Anacletus to have been Bishop twelve years, and in the twelfth of Domitian to have been succeeded by Clemens, whom St. Paul in his Epistle to the Philippians, calleth his fellow-labourer. In the fourth year of the reign of Domitian (c) Antianus the first Bishop of Alexandria (having continued there thirty two years) died, to whom succeeded Abilius. As for the Bishops of Byzantium afterwards called Constantinople, we have them in this order from (d) Nicephorus the Patriarch. The first was Andrew the Apostle, who having preached the Word at Byzantium, and built an Oratory in Argyropolis ordained Stachys to be Bishop, of whom (e) St. Paul maketh mention.

Stachys governed Sixteen years, after him succeeded in the year of our Lord 55 Oncimus, who governed fourteen; then Polycarpus ruled Seventeen, and Eusebius Seven, who came to the Chair A. D. 85. in the second of Domitian.

32. Domitian having raised the second Persecution against the Christian faith, St. John the Apostle, who having continued at Ephesus Twenty seven years, was in the ninth of his Reign Banished unto the Island (a) Patmos, one of the Cyclades, where he wrote his Revelation. In this work he sheweth both Christ's and his own hatred of the Doctrine of the Nicolaitans; for several Heresies had by this time sprung up, as St. Paul had forewarned. (b) Eusebius maketh Simon Magus (c) Lib. 3. c. 13. the first Author of Heresies, concerning whom we have already spoken; but, as to his Heresies particularly: 1. He affirmed that he himself was Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and that he was worshipped of all people by divers names. 2. That Christ did suffer no hurt from the Jews; for he was Christ. 3. That any man might lye with any woman, for this was no sin. 4. That the World was made by Angels, and that an Angel redeemed Mankind. 5. He denied the Resurrection. 6. He thought that the gifts of the Holy Ghost might be bought with Money, and therefore that Sin of him is called Simony. (c) Nicholas the Patron (c) Clemens of the Nicolaitans was one of the seven first Deacons. He having a fair wife, and being accused of Jealousie, permitted any to Marry her, at which Fact others taking occasion, thought it lawful for any man to have the company of any woman whom they themselves could like. (d) Epiphanius writeth, that they taught Venery to be so necessary, that those men who used it not every week on Friday, could not be saved. Besides these Heretics, about the year 69 sprung up the Heresie of the Cerinthians. (e) Cerinthus was a Jew by Birth. He taught that the World was made by Angels. 2. That Jesus our Saviour had for his Parents indeed Joseph and Mary, and that at his Baptism Christ descended on him, who (f) Lib. 2. c. 14. (fifth he) is called the Holy Ghost, by whom he did all his Miracles; when Jesus Phalagias was to be crucified of the Jews, then Christ left him, and returned into Heaven. 3. That Christ's Kingdom after the Resurrection should be an earthly Kingdom, and men then should live in all fleshly lusts and pleasures together for a Thousand years. 4. He denied the Divine Nature of Christ, and said, that he had only an Humane Nature; and that he was not yet risen from the dead, but should rise hereafter. 5. He affirmed that the old Law, and all the old Commandments and Precepts belonging to it were to be kept, together with the new Law or Gospel, and that therefore Circumcision was necessary for every one that would be saved. Epiphanius writeth, that certain Heretics called Alogi, affirmed Cerinthus to have been the Author of the Revelation.

33. About the beginning of Domitian arose also the Heresie of Menander a Samaritan, and the Scholar of Simon Magus. He taught first, that the World was maritan, and that these Angels could be overcome by no means but by Art Magic. 2. He denied Christ to be true man. 3. He affirmed himself the Saviour of the World, and that he came from Heaven to save Mankind, and that all who would be saved must be baptized in his name. Out of his Doctrine (that we may speak of these Heretics briefly) budded that of Saturninus of Antioch, who not long after in like manner taught. 1. That the World was made by seven Angels, without the knowledge of God the Father. 2. That Christ was but the shadow of a man, for he had neither the true Body nor soul of a man, and thus he fulfilled the mystery of our Redemption. 3. He said moreover, that Marriage and Procreation was of the Devil. Basilides, of whom were named the Basilidians, agreed in several points with Simon, Menander, and Saturninus. He taught, that Christ did not suffer, but Simon of Cyrene; that Christ taking the form of Simon laughed them to scorn. 2. He turned men away from Martyrdom, affirming that it was no Sin to deny Christ in time of Persecution. 3. That the Angels made Three hundred sixty five Heavens, and that these Heavens made the World. He wrote Twenty four Books upon the Gospel, and feigned to himself Prophets, whom he called Barabas and Barceph. He commanded silence to his Scholars for the space of five years, after the manner of Pythagoras.

34. Irenaeus writeth, that in the time of these two Carpocrates lived, the Father of the Heresie held by the Gnosticks, who thought good not to make known the Sorcery of Simon privily, but openly, glorying of charmed love-drinks, of Devilish, and drunken dreams, of assitant and associate spirits, with other like illusions. They taught further, that who so would attain to the perfection of their mysteries, must work such facts though never so filthy, otherwise could they not overcome (as they termed them) the secular Potentates, unless every one played his part after the same secret operation. These were the most vile Heretics in filthiness of all others. They held 1. That the Soul was made of the substance of God, and that brute beasts have reason as man hath. 2. That there are two Gods, a good and an evil one, and that this evil God was the Creator of all things. Carpocrates also taught 1. That Christ was a meer man born of Joseph, and not of the blessed Virgin, that he was a good man, and therefore after he was Crucified, his Soul went up into Heaven, but his body is still in the Grave. 2. That the World was made by Angels. 3. That there is no resurrection. 4. He rejected the Old Testament as not Canonical. Besides these, at this time arose the Heresie of the Ebionites, so called from Ebion. He taught, that Christ was but a meer man. 2. That when Jesus was 30 years old there descended on him, and dwelt in him another person called Christ, and thus Jesus and Christ dwelt, and were united together. 3. He agreed with Cerinthus in the rest of the Heresies, touching Circumcision, and keeping all the Law of Moses. He denied the Epistles of Paul, accusing him that he fell from the Law. The Jewish Sabbath, and other Ceremonies he observed together with the Jews, only the Sunday he celebrated as we do in remembrance of the Resurrection. 'Tis reported that St. John hearing Ebion was in the Bath refrained his company, and having seen and allowed the three Gospels published by the other Evangelists, wrote his own to confute the Heresies of him, Cerinthus and Menander.

CHAP. V.

From the Death of Domitian to that of Pertinax, and the exposing of the Empire to public sale by the Soldiers, the space of 97 years.

1. IT is reported of Domitian, that not long before his death he dreamed, that Satan in a golden neck and head was grown up on his shoulders, and that he was fully assured, that after him were thereby portended golden days to the Commonwealth. This truly came to pass through the abstinence, moderation, and excellent government of the six succeeding Princes, during the Reign of whom the Roman Empire (for temporal respects) enjoyed more happiness, than ever before or after, Strangers affording that, which the Natives of Italy would not contribute to their own Country. Cocceius Nerva, an old man, and born in Crete (say some, though others make him a Native of Narnia in Italy) after the death of Domitian had the Empire put upon him, by the Legions which then quartered amongst the Sequani in Gall. After his assuming the Government, a strong rumour went abroad, that Domitian was yet living, which somewhat perplexed him, till by Parthenius, and Petronius, Captains of the Guards, he was put out of doubt; and afterwards his election was confirmed by the Senate.

2. Most of the Golden and Silver Statues of Domitian, who was hated by all men, he caused to be taken down, of which was raised a great Sum of Money. The Triumphal Arches, of which many had been erected to him, were also demolished. He absolved them who were held guilty of Impiety, and restored the Exiles. Slaves and Freedmen, who had been treacherous to their Lords, he commanded to be put to Death, taking care that they accused their Masters of no Crime; neither did he suffer any to be accused of Impiety, or the Jewish rites; for many had by Calumnies been condemned, and amongst the rest Seras the Philosopher, which caused a great Tumult; (for all accused all) So that Fronto the Consul was reported to say, That it was a very bad thing to have an Emperor, under whom it was not lawful to do any thing; but much worse when every one might do what he pleased. Nerva was old, and had a weak Stomach, which caused him to Vomit what he took. Statues both of Gold and Silver he forbade to be erected to him, and he restored the Goods as were found in the Palace, to such Owners as Domitian had unjustly deprived of them. To Roman Citizens that were poor, he gave Lands, to be divided by certain Persons of Senatorial Rank. Wanting Money himself, he set to Sale abundance of rich Clothes and Furniture, both of his own, and what belonged to the Publick. in exacting the Price, but herein shewed himself liberal towards many Persons. He took away many Sacrifices, Circencian Games, and other Shows, to diminish Expences. He swore in the Senate, that by his Order no Senator should be put to Death; and his Oath he kept, although a Conspiracy was hatched against him. Doing nothing without the Assistance of the Principal Senators, he enacted many Laws, of which was remarkable one, which forbade the making of Eunuchs, and another which Prohibited the Marriage of a Niece.

3. He stuck not at taking Virginius Rufus to be his Colleague in the Consulship, though he had often the Title of Emperor given him; on whose Sepulchre was Inscribed, That having overthrown Vindex, he ensured the Empire not for himself, but his Country. Nerva indeed was so good a Prince, that he dared to say, That he had done nothing, but that quitting the Government, he might safely live a private life. When Calpurnius Crassus, descended from that Noble Family, and others had conspired against him, he placed them at the Speitacula near himself, before they knew that they were discovered, and delivered them Swords into their Hands, to try as he said, whether they were sharp; but his design was to let them see that he cared not though he were presently killed in the place. Calpurnius Elianus, whom, following the Example of Domitian, he had set over the Prætorian Guards, stirred up the Soldiers against him to require certain Persons to be punished; and he so opposed himself against what was intended, that he offered his Neck naked to them, but profited nothing; they being killed whom Elianus had demanded to be slain. Perceiving that he was despised for his Age, he went up into the Capitol, and there with a loud voice praying that it might prove happy for himself, the Senate and the People of Rome, he adopted M. Oclpius Trajanus Crinitus, who now governed Germany, and afterward he designed him Cæsar in the Senate. This he did, though he wanted not Kindred of his own; for he would not prefer his own Relations before the Publick Good, neither did it affright him that Trajan was a Spaniard, and not an Italian, and that before him none of another Nation had held the Roman Empire, judging that the Virtue, and not the Country of a Man was to be esteemed. This Account we have from Dio, who writing of the Persecution raised against such as followed the Jewish Rites, we have cause to believe that Christianity was chiefly meted thereby; for our Ecclesiastical Writers say, Nerva recalled such as were Confessors upon that account, and that St. John the Apostle by virtue of that Indulgence returned out of Patmos to Ephesus. We are told from other Hands, that Nerva only banished Crassus the Conspirator to Tarentum. That he eased the Commonwealth of grievous Impositions, and conjoyed two things in the times of some of his Predecessors infociable, viz. Sovereignty and Liberty. He lived with Trajan but three Months; For falling out with one Regulus a Senator, he was in so great a Passion, that it drove his Natural heat into a Fever, whereof he died on the sixth before the Calends of February, having, as Dio tells us, lived sixty five Years, ten Months, and ten Days, and Reigned one year, four Months, and nine days, in the DCCCXI year of the City. A. D. XCVIII, he himself the fourth, and Trajanus Cæsar the second time, being Consuls.

4. Trajan was a Spaniard by Birth, of the City Italica, of an Ancient rather than an Eminent Family, and took the Ensigns of the Empire at Agrippina in Gall. As soon as he was Emperor he wrote much to the Senate, and amongst other things, that he would never put to Death any good Man, nor mark such with Infamy; and this he not only at present confirmed by Oath, but also afterward. He sent for Elianus and the Prætorian Soldiers, who had moved Sedition against Nerva, as though to make Use of them, and caused them to be slain. He presently reduced all Germany into its former condition, as well as brought under several Nations beyond the Danube. When he came to Rome, he did many things there for correcting the State of the Commonwealth, and in favour of good Men, of whom he took care. To the Cities of Italy he gave much, toward the Education of Children. When his Wife Plotina first of all entered the Palace, she turned her self upon the steps to the Multitude, and told them, That the entered such a sort of Woman as she desired she might come out again; and indeed, she carried her self so in her greatness, that nothing could be said against her. When he had staid sometime in the City, he was provoked to undertake a War against the Daci, the King of whom, Decebalus (or Decabals, Diaparnes, or Diarpans, for he hath several Names) had forced Domitian to pay Tribute. Trajan found himself burthened with the Payment of the Money, besides the Disgrace, and he was netled with the Reputation that people had got, with their confidence thereupon, and the daily increase of their Forces. Decabalus when he heard of his Design, was troubled at it, knowing that formerly he had not overcome the People of Rome, but Domitian; but now he should have a War with the People of Rome, and Trajan the Emperor too; that Trajan, who for Justice, Fortitude and Goodness was excellent, and vigorous in Body as well as Mind, being in the Two and fortieth year of his Age. These good qualities Dion Cassius makes out in many Particulars, though to the Virtues lately mentioned, he adds not Temperance. But he writes that though he was given to the love of Boys and of Wine, yet did he nothing that might be reprehended; for though he drank largely, yet he was Sober, and as for what concerned Boys, he was troublesome to no body. For those his good qualities and his Skill in War, Decabalus feared him. Trajan gave him Battel, and therein made great slaughter of the Enemy, but had many of his own Men wounded, so many, that Linnen failed to bind up their wounds, the want of which to supply, he spared not his own Robe.

5. After this Success, he removed into the higher part of the Country, where seizing on divers Hills, he came, not without danger, to the Royal Seat of the Daci. Their King sent several times, and at length obtained Peace, which he was to purchase by delivering up his Arms, his Engines, and them that made them; by giving up Fugitives, dismantling his Forts, and having the same Friends and Enemies with the People of Rome, he laid aside his Arms, and having lain at the Feet of Trajan, and done his Reverence, he sent to the Senate to have the Peace confirmed by the Fathers. These things performed, and these Agreements made Trajan left a Garrison in Zermizegethia, and fortifying the rest of the Country returned into Italy. At Rome the Ambassadors of Decabalus were admitted into the Senate, where they spake a few things, having laid aside their Arms, and holding their hands joynt together like Slaves or Captives. The Peace being confirmed, they had their Arms restored, and Trajan triumphing over the Daci, obtained the Surname of Dacicus. He presented a Show of Gladiators, with which Sport he was delighted, and of Dancers in the Theatre. Yet in such a noise of Arms, he calt not away the care of other matters, but in the Forum of Augustus, the Porticus of Livia, and other places administered Justice from the Tribunal. But within a little while word was brought that Decabalus acted all things quite contrary to the League, receiving Fugitives, fortifying places, and soliciting the Neighbouring Nations to the War, whereupon he was by the Senate judged an Enemy, and Trajan again undertook the War in Perfon. When he was come into Myfia Decabalus sent some to watch their time, and kill him, but this being discovered, he perswaded Longinus one of his Officers to come to him about an Agreement, and then kept him, hoping to make his terms by him, till he killed himself.

6. In the mean time Trajan caused a Stone Bridge to be laid over the River Danubius, such a Bridge as Dio, or Xiphilin, could not sufficiently admire. Though there were other works of his, very Magnificent, yet in his Opinion this excelled them all. It stood upon twenty Piles of four-square Stone, an hundred and fifty foot high from the Foundation, distant from each other an hundred and seventy feet, and conjoined with Arches. It was built in a River full of whirlpits, having a muddy Channel, and in which the Stream could not be turned another way, rapid in its motion, and uncertain as to its breadth and depth. The Piles only remained in the time of Dio, serving for to shew that there is nothing but the wit of man can accomplish it. Trajan built it with this Design, That if War was made upon the Romans that lived beyond the River in Winter when it was frozen, Succours might by it be sent over to them. But Adrian on the contrary, fearing that the Barbarians should kill the Guard, and break into Myfia, commanded the upper parts of it to be broken down. Trajan having finished the Bridge, passed over, and waged War with the Daci, rather more securely than speedily; and hereby at length subdued them. Many things he performed both like an Expert Captain, and a Valiant Soldier, and his Men gave notable Testimonies of their Valour. At length Decabalus understanding that his Seat, and all the Country about it was taken, left he should run the same rike, killed himself. His head was sent to Rome; Dacia became a Province of the Roman People, and into it Trajan led a Colony. Bicilia the Companion of Decabalus discovered that he had caused the Current of the River Sargetia to be turned another way, and in the Channel thereof had buried his Treasure, and then suffered the Stream to return to its former course; after which, he killed such Slaves as he had employed in the work. This Treasure, and such good things as he had hid in Caves, was secured as excellent booty.

7. At the same time Palma the Praefect of Syria, subdued that Part of Arabia which joyned to Petra, and thereby increased the Dominion of the People of Rome. To Trajan when he was returned to Rome, Ambassadors from several Nations made their Addresses, and particularly from India. He Exhibited Shows for an hundred and twenty three Days together, in which sometimes were killed a thousand Beasts tame and wild, and sometimes ten thousand; and a thousand Gladiators fought. He conversed with his Friends with all freedom, and especially with one Licinius Sura, of whom he was bidden to beware. This man was so rich, that he built at his own expence a Gymnasium for the City, and on a time invited Trajan to Supper. The Emperor went, and dismissing his Guard, first, called Sura's Physitian, and bad him shave his Eyelids, then his Barber whom he permitted to do the same office upon his Chin; for this was the ancient Custom both of the Roman Citizens and Princes, Hadrian being the first of the Emperors that let grow his Beard. Afterward being walshed he went to Supper; and the day after told his Friends, who were wont to calumniate Sura, That if he would have murdered him, he had sufficient opportunity to have done it. But he was so far void of fear, that when he delivered the Sword to one whom he had advanced to Command the Prætorian Cohorts, with which he was to be girt, he gave it him naked, and bad him draw it in his defence, if he governed as he ought to do; but if contrary, then to use it to his destruction: yet was he so prudent as to Animadvert upon some who had plotted his Death, in the number of whom was Craffus, their Cause being first heard by the Senate. He built Libraries, and erected a vast Column in his own Forum, partly for a Sepulchre, and partly for a Monument to Posterity, having digged away the hilly ground, and by that means levelled the Forum.

He makes War against the Parthian King.

A Dreadful Earthquake.

8. After this he made War against the Armenians and Parthians; finding himself concerned, as he said, That the King of Armenia had not received a Diadem from himself, but the Parthian King; but his great Inducement was desire of Glory. When he came to Athens, he was courted by Ambassadors sent from Chosroes, who promised all fair things, but he would not be diverted from the Expedition. After he was come into the Enemy's Country, he was met by the Satrapa, and the neighbouring Kings, who presented him richly; he took all Armenia, punished Paramasties the King thereof, and rewarded the King of the Hemiochi. Having placed Garrisons as was convenient, he came to Edessa, where he received the submission of Augarus, who ruled Ostroena. When he arrived in Mesopotamia, Chosroes offered to quit that Country and Armenia, but he proceeded against his Captains Manus and Manisarus into Adiabene. When these things were heard at Rome, many Decrees passed to honour him, and amongst other marks, the Surname of Optimus was conferred on him. He in his Expeditions travelled on foot; as he marched, Exercised his Soldiers, and tried their Courage and Fidelity by spreading abroad false Reports. Nisibis and Barnæ being taken, he was Surnamed Parthicus; but he gloried most in that of Optimus, whereby his Nature and Disposition was expressed, and not his Wars. Returning to Antioch, he there made some Stay, and was frighted with a most terrible Earthquake, which afflicted other Cities, but especially this, in an unheard of manner. With the fall of Houses and Rubbish, and by other means a vast number of People perished, so that the Town being full of Strangers, who came either for Law-Suits, upon Messages or other Business, the Court being there all the Winter, there was no Nation that received not loss from so great a Calamity. Trajan himself escaped out of a Window, being, it's said, drawn out by one of more than humane proportion, and though the Earthquake ceased, he continued many days in the open Air. The Hill Corasus was so shaken, that its higher parts fell down, and it looked as if it would tumble upon the City. Other Mountains were levelled, waters broke out where formerly none appeared, and Fountains which formerly poured out water were stopped up.

9. When Spring came on he led his Army into the Enemies Country, resolving to pass the River Tigris, and knowing that thereabout was no Timber for building of Ships; the Vessels he had made of Trees felled in the Woods about Nisibis, he caused to be conveyed thither in Carriages, being so framed as to be taken in pieces and set together again upon occasion. With them he made a Bridge at the foot of the Mountain Cardynus, in despite of the Enemy, who was discouraged by his multitudes of Men, and the sight of Ships in that place, where they thought they had no reason to expect them. Then crossing the River, he took in all Adiabene, being that part of Affyria belonging to Ninus, with Arbela and Gazgamel, where Alexander overthrew Darius; it was called Attyria, the letters S.S. being by the Barbarians changed into T.T. To Babylon he marched without controul, there being none left in his passage to oppose him; for the Parthians were weakened by Civil War, and this sort of Discord was not yet taken up amongst them. There he had opportunity to behold a Lake of Bitumen, of which the Walls of that City were built, being of that Nature, that mixed with Brick or small Stones, it was more strong and durable than any Stone or Iron. He beheld the mouth thereof, when so great a vapour proceeded out of it that no fort of Terrestrial Animal, nor Fowl was able to bear it, but died with the smell thereof; and had it proceeded far, the place had not been habitable; but it contained it self in a narrow compals, to the bounds of which when it came, it returned back. The like to this Dio tells us he himself had found at Hierapolis, a Town of Asia, the vapour of which, as he heard and saw, was pernicious to all living Creatures, Eunuchs or gelded Men excepted, the reason of which he could not understand; no more do we.

10. Trajan had a design to join Euphrates with Tigris by a Ditch, thereby to convey his Boats for making of a Bridge; but finding it was higher than Tigris, he changed his purpose, let it should make Euphrates rapid and not Navigable. He conveyed then his Vessels by Land over the narrow place betwixt them; for, Euphrates falling into a Fen, joynted it self with Tigris. Having passed Tigris, he took Ctesiphon, and thereupon had the Title of Imperator, and that of Parthicus confirmed; and it being known, the Senate decreed many things in his honour, particularly, that he should Triumph and keep as many Festivals as he pleased. Now had he a great desire to Sail down into the Red Sea, being a Sinus of the Ocean, and called Erythraean from Erythrus, who there reigned. In his passage he was in danger, by reason of the rapid Stream of Tigris, the Winter Season, and the Tide; but coming to the Sea, and taking notice of the passage into India, he affirmed, that had he been a young man he would have sailed thither. He made curious Inquiries concerning that Nation, and would say, Alexander was an happy man, yet sometimes affirm, That he had gone farther than he, and so he wrote to the Senate; although he could not defend what he had got. But he wrote so often of so many Nations subdued by him, that the Fathers not able to reckon them, voted him as many Triumphs as he pleased to accept of, ordered a Triumphal Arch to be erected in his Forum, and the Citizens would have gone far to meet him, had he ever returned. His latter end however did not answer his beginning; for while he spent his time in sailing to the Ocean, all he had taken left off again in the greatest Tumult, each Nation either killing or casting out the Garrisons he had left to bridle them, while his Journey answered not his expectation, for he saw and heard nothing besides heaps, falls and ruins; only he made a parentation to Alexander in the House wherein he died.

11. The News of the general defection being brought to him while still on Shipboard, he sent Lucius and Maximus against the Rebels, of whom Maximus was overthrown in Battel, but Lucius behaving himself very gallantly, recovered Nisibis, took Edessa, and after he had plundered it, set it on fire. Besides this, Seluca was taken and burnt by Erycius, Clarus, and Julius Alexander. But fearing that the Parthians would also revolt, he resolved to give them a King, and when he was come to Ctesiphon, calling them and the Romans together in the Field, after he had from an high Tribunal boasted of his Performances, he set a Diadem on the Head of Parthamasperes. This done, he undertook an Expedition against the Agareni in Arabia, who had also revolted, possessing a City neither great nor rich. For, the adjoining Region, for the most part, was Desert, having no Water, or that unwholloom, and being destitute of Wood and Forage, so that no great multitude of Men could there long continue, and it was protected by the most violent Heats to which it was exposed. Therefore neither Trajan now, nor afterwards Severus took it, though they cast down part of the Wall. Trajan sent his Horse against them and afterwards he followed in Person; but the Horse received much loss, and he himself narrowly escaped, one that rode near to him being shot dead; for though he disguised himself, yet by the gravity of his Person they guessed him to be the Emperor. Now did the Heavens shake with Thunder, Rainbows were seen, Lightning, Tempest, Whirlwinds, Hail and Thunderbolts Thunderbolts fell upon the Romans, as often as they attacked them, and when they went to Supper, they were exceedingly plagued with Flies, both in their Meat and Drink. Therefore did Trajan dislodge and get him gone, and not long after fell into his Mortal Disemper.

A furious Rebellion of the Jews.

12. In the mean time, while he was thus employed, the Jews supposing him intangled in an inextricable War, perfwading themselves also, that by the Earthquake was portended the ruine of the Roman Empire; moreover imagining that from the first year of Cyrus, to this present, had passed but Four hundred and eighty three years, and consequently that but one of Daniel's Weeks was unfinished, entered into a Conspiracy, and made incredible Slaughter of the Romans, using in several Countreys, some say several Captains, whereof yet Barcochab was Chief. The fury of this Rebellion fell upon Aegypt, Cyrene, and Cyprus; and Dio tells us, That about Cyrene one Andreas was their Captain. The manner of their Outrages they committed, both upon Greeks and Romans, was as horrid as the Facts themselves, though these horrid beyond all belief, if they had not been related by most credible and impartial Writers. From the head they sawed them downwards, they cast them to wild Beasts, caused them to fight and kill one another; they eat their flesh, beameared themselves with their blood, and wore their skins. In and about Cyrene perished by this means Two hundred and twenty thousand men, and in Aegypt and Cyprus Two hundred and forty thousand; upon which account, in the time of Dio, it was not lawful for a Jew to come in Cyprus, if he entered there, he was presently slain. Trajan resolved to prosecute them throughout his Dominions, not as Enemies or Rebels, but as Creatures noxious to Humane Society, and that with revenge suitable to their Crimes; and for this purpose sent Marcus Tubero, with a great Power, both by Sea and Land, who neither in a short time, nor without cruel hostility finished the War; but he slew many Myriads of the Jews. Their carriage in the West made the Emperor suspect their Brethren in Mesopotamia, whereupon he commanded L. Quintius to Banish them that Country, and he joining Battel with them, slew also a great Number.

13. Dio writes, That Trajan thought of making in person another Expedition into Mesopotamia; but his Disease growing upon him, he took his Journey to Italy, leaving P. Aelius Hadrianus in Syria with an Army. Therefore though Armenia was taken, and a great part of Mesopotamia, and besides, the Parthians were overcome; yet the Romans thought they had in vain been at such pains, and undergone so many Dangers, for that the Parthians detesting Parthamasperes were resolved to be governed according to their own Customs. As for Trajan, he suspected that his Disease came by Poison; some thought it proceeded of Blood, which being wont to issue from his Interior Parts every year, had of late stopped; and indeed he was seized with an Apoplexy, so as he lost his Sense in some part of his Body; but he manfully laboured of a Dropsie. Being brought to Selinus a City of Cilicia, called Trajanople in Dio's time, he soon died, after he had Reigned Nineteen years, six months, and fifteen days. He extended the Empire farther than any of his Predecessors, so that now it reached from the Irish Ocean further than the River Tigris; from the Atlantic Sea to the Persian Gulf; from Mount Atlas to the Caledonian Forest; as also as far as the River Albis, and beyond Danubius. His Moderation was exceeding great, he so using his Subjects as he himself, he said, would desire his Prince should use him, were he a private Person. Though he was not learned, he much favoured Humane and Secular Learning, conversing very often and familiarly with the Professors thereof, whom he also preferred to Publick Offices. But Humane and Secular Learning he only favoured; for he raised the third Persecution against the Heavenly Doctrine and Church of Christ, which drew down its thought, the heavy Judgments we have mentioned, upon the Empire during his Government.

14. Being puffed up with the Victory he had obtained over the Daci and Thracians (after the ending of the second Dacian War, in the ninth year of his Reign, Decabalus having killed himself) as he was marching against Osroes or Chobabros the Parthian King, and the Armenians, having commanded all that would not worship his false gods to be put to death, Ignatius the Scholar of St. John the Apostle, and Bishop now of Antioch, was brought before him, whilst he lay (in his passage) in this City.

City. Ignatius standing in his presence, he said, who art thou Devil (Cacodemon) who makest haste to transgress our Commands, and persuadest others to destroy themselves? Ignatius answered, No body calleth Theophorus a Cacodemon, for Devils sit from the Servants of God. But I know thou so callest me because I molest them. For I confess I have Christ the heavenly King; and dissolve their councils. Trajan demanded, who is Theophorus? Ignatius replied, He who hath Christ in his breast. Trajan said, Dost thou think we have the Gods in our breast which assist us against our Enemies? Ignatius answered, In that thou esteemest the Devils of the Gentiles to be gods, thou erreth. For there is one God, who made Heaven, and Earth, and Sea, with all that are in them; and he hath one only begotten Son Jesus Christ, whose friendship I have obtained. Trajan then said, Thou speakest of him that was crucified by Pontius Pilate. Ignatius replied, Of him who crucified sin and the inventor of it; and who approveth not of him that serveth Idols, but who in his heart wisely understandeth this. Trajan added, Dost thou then carry Christ in thy self? Ignatius said, Yea, for it is written, I will dwell in himself the Crucified. concluded thus, I award that Ignatius, who saith, he heareth in himself the Crucified, be conveyed in bonds by Soldiers to the great City Rome, there to be devoured of beasts for a show to the People. This was accordingly executed upon the most holy Martyr, on the Twentieth of December, as it is recorded in his Acta, or the Memorials of him, collected by Philo, Gaius, and Agathopus, who followed him from Syria to Rome; concerning which, as also the Epistles which go under his name, the Disquisitions of the most Reverend and Learned Arch-Bishop of Armagh are to be consulted.

15. Ignatius being vexed by a tedious journey, that his constancy might be shaken, when he came to Troas (or new Troy, built not far from the place where that of Priamus stood) understood that Peace was restored to his Church of Antioch. This came to pass whilst Trajan still continued there, consulting about the Parthian War, as appeareth from Malela the Historian of that City. For Tiberianus the President of the chief Nation of Palestine, moved the Emperor to moderation by this Letter: I am wearied with punishing and putting to death the Galileans (who come before us under the name of Christians) according to your Commands; yet they cease not to reveal themselves for the slaughter. And although I have laboured both by exhortation and threatenings, that they might not dare to make known themselves to me as professors of that doctrine; yet being persecuted, they do not cease. I desire therefore that what your pleasure is in this kind, your Majesty would please to certify me. * Suidas mentioning also this message of Tiberianus unto Trajan, * in our addeth, that the Emperor forbade all his Subjects to punish the Christians. Yet Trajan added, that this indulgence was not so universal, but that it most especially concerned Palestine, Syria, and other parts of the East, where the Emperor then resided, appeareth from Ignatius his deprecation, that the Persecution might cease, when he was even to be brought into the Ampitheatre; as the Acta or Memorials concerning him relate. But besides this Letter of Tiberianus, there is extant another of Pliny the younger, who was moved to write to the Emperor upon the same occasion, and for the same end.

16. For being Proprator of Bithynia, the variety of cases in those that were accused, viz. Epist. 10. troubled him; although to comply with the iniquity of the times, he declared that such as stood out his threatenings thrice, he commanded to be led to punishment. He signifieth, that out of such as had formerly been Christians, but now worshipped the Images of the Emperor, and the gods, and blasphemed Christ, he could not get any confession of any other fault or error, than that they were wont on a day appointed, before it was light to meet together, and sing an hymn to Christ; and bound themselves by a Sacramentum or religious Oath, not for any wickedness, but that they should not commit robbery, theft, or adultery, that they should not break promise, nor cheat. Which being done, they were wont to depart and meet again to eat, promisingly but innocently. To get out the truth he tortured two women servants, but could not find any thing justly chargeable, though through his Ethnic pravity and desire to please the Emperor, he termeth the faith Superstitio prava & immodica, or a naughty and immoderate superstition. He addeth, that it seemed to him a thing worthy of serious consideration; especially for the number of those that were in danger: for many, faith he, of every age and order, and of both Sexes, are brought, and will be brought into danger. For not only hath the contagion of this superstition gone through Cities; but also Villages, and Fields, which, as it seemeth, might be stopped and corrected. To be sure, it's clear enough, that the Temples which were almost desolate, begin to be frequented, and the sacrifices of long time intermitted

St. John the

intermitted to be restored, heats for that use now going off, which till now scarcely any would buy. Whereby it is easy to guess, what a multitude of men might be reclaimed, if there were but place for repentance. Thus Pliny, to whom Trajan answered, that we may only repeat the Summe, that Christians are not to be sought for, but if accused and convicted, except they recant, to be punished; concerning the absurdity and injustice of which Sentence, Tertullian excellently argueth in his Apology, most worthy to be read of all Christians.

17. In the Reign of Trajan died St. John the Apostle, the time and manner of his death being uncertain, though all agree as to the place, which was Ephebus. (a) Jerome referreth his death to the fixty eighth year after the Passion of Christ, which fell in with the third of Trajan, and the twenty seventh of December, on the first Feast. (b) Others place it in the seventy first after Christ's Passion, and the sixth of Trajan. Dorotheus Bishop of Tyre (in his Tract written concerning the lives, ends, and Martyrdoms of the Prophets, Apostles, and seventy Disciples) writeth, that being a hundred and twenty years old, yet living (the Lord would so have it) he buried himself. (c) Jerome alleged out of Tertullian, that in the time of Nero (though others lay in the Reign of Domitian) he was thrown at Rome into a tun of hot boiling oil, yet thereby took no harm, but came out after this trial purer than he went in. (d) Augustine calleth him a Martyr by will: Polycrates Bishop of Ephebus (as (e) Eusebius allegeth) sticketh not to call him a Priest, a Martyr, and a Doctor. But that which (f) Augustine writeth of his end, is strange of all (and let the credit thereof rest in the choice of the Reader,) how John caused at Ephebus his grave to be made, and in presence of divers went in alive, and being no sooner in, and to their seeming dead, they covered him. Which kind of rest, faith he, is rather to be termed a sleep than death, for that the earth of the grave bubbleth or boyleth up after the manner of a Well, by reason of John's resting in it, and breathing: a sign of his slumbering therein. Though he died at Ephebus, yet was not the succeeding Bishop, much less any other, Heir of that Authority, which for so many years he had obtained in the Church, as having many outlived the rest of the Apostles. For to the Apostles succeeded not Apostles nor universal Messengers of Christ, of which sort John was for many years, and he alone; but Bishops, every one circumscribed within his own Limits. In the days of Trajan, and this third Persecution was Crucified (g) Simeon Cleophas Bishop of Jerusalem, being an hundred and twenty years old. Justus a Jew succeeded him, after whom some place Zacharias, Tobias, Benjamin, and John in the nineteenth and last of Trajan. In the eleventh of his Reign was Eusebius Bishop of Rome Crowned with Martyrdom, on the sixth of the Calends of November, and Alexander succeeded him, who also being Martyred in the nineteenth year, on the fifth before the Nones of May, (h) Xystus had his seat according to Damasus. And we must not forget that Heros succeeded Ignatius in the Sea of Antioch.

18. Trajan, that we may conclude his Story, was esteemed a Prince of unful City and Fortitude, and Aurelius Victor tells us some reason, because the Estate of the Roman Empire had been so afflicted and wasted by many and cruel Tyrants, that he was believed sent by heaven, by designment to amend and repair it. He pleased the more because he took order for supply of Rome with Provisions, instituting a Company of Bakers; and it was thought a great Advantage to the State, that for speedy Intelligence, he more vigorously managed the Cursus Publicus. Pliny Junior, who flourished in his time, upon his being promoted to be Consul, made a large Panegyrick in the Senate still extant, wherein as he extols him for many things, so in an especial manner for removing grievances, and heavy Impositions, particularly that of the Vicesima, or twentieth part of Estates, first required by Augustus, which his Successor again rigorously exacted. That Inclination he had to Wine, of which also Nerva is said to have been guilty, it's said he moderated by Prudence, giving order, that after a full meal, no more should be brought in, though called for. All the respect and love he had from the People, was cemented by his familiar converse. For he would make visits to his Friends, see them when Sick, eat at their Houses, and often ride in their Chariots. He was liberal, and studied to enrich those with whom he had but small acquaintance. In his time was but one Senator Condemned, and he by the Senate without his knowledge. Hereby he procured such fame even after his death, that in the Acclamations of the Senate, the Fathers would wish that the succeeding Princes might be happier than Augustus, and better than Trajan.

Entropius writes,

The Death of Trajan.

writes, that he died of a Flux at Seleucia, a City of Iauria in his return from Perfia, in the sixty second year of his Age. He alone, he adds, was buried in the City. His Ashes in a golden Urn were put in his own Forum, under his Column, which was an Hundred and forty four foot high. In his time flourished, besides Pliny Junior, Plutarch, Lucian, Suetonius, L. Florus, Cornelius Tacitus, and others. His Death fell in the fifth of the Two hundred twenty fourth Olympiad, the Eight hundred and seventieth of the City A. D. CXVII. Quintus Niger, and T. Vespasianus Apronianus, being Consuls.

19. It was commonly believed, that the Design of Trajan was to leave Neratus Priscus his Successor; and his Friends were so much inclining to it; that one time he told him, He commended the Provinces to him, in case that any thing fatal should happen; many said, that he thought good to imitate the Example of Alexander the Macedonian, and dye without a certain Successor; and that he intended to send an Oration to the Senate, wherein he would desire, that if any thing happened to him otherwise than well; they would give a Prince to the Commonwealth, yet so, as he therewith added several Names, out of which they should make choice. But the Succession fell upon Hadrian his Kinsman, who was born at Rome, in the year that Vespasian the Seventh, and Titus the Fifth time were Consuls, but had his Original also from Italia. It was given out that Trajan adopted him before his Death, and some name the day whereon he should receive Letters which certified him of such Adoption. But most agree that for it he was obliged to Plotina the Empress, and Estropius writes, That Trajan refused to adopt him, though the Son of her that was his Cousin German by the Mothers side, whereas others say, That his Father Ælius Adrianus, surnamed Afer, was his Cousin German, and so related. Dio writes, That he was joyned to Trajan in Affinity, as well as Conanguinity, having Married his Brother's (some say his Sister's) Daughter, and lived with him continually. He advanced him to several Offices in the State, and several Military Commands in the Wars, which he himself managed in person. Being sent his Prætorian Legate into the lower Pannonia, he reformed the Sarmatae, supported Military Discipline, bridled the Extravagancy of Procurators, and for this obtained the Dignity of Consul. He was supported by Sura the Emperor's Favourite, and Plotina the Empress, who procured him, after Sura's Death, his second Consulship, and to be designed Legatus in the Parthian Expedition.

20. When her Husband was dead, with the assistance of Attianus his Countryman, she procured him to be Emperor, being in love with him, and encouraged, by reason he was not far off, and had great Forces. Dio tells us, He had it from Apronianus his Father, who governed Cilicia, who told him all the particulars, and that especially how Trajan's Death was concealed for some days, that the Adoption might proceed, which was discovered by her. Subscribing the Letters sent in his Name to the Senate, which had never been practised before. Spartianus writes, That some reported how by Plotina's means he was adopted after the Death of Trajan, one being suborned to counterfeit his weak voice. After his having obtained the Empire at Antioch, he set himself to govern it in a peaceable manner. Therefore the Barbarians rebelling, whom Trajan had subdued, and thus happening in several other Provinces, he resolved to quit all beyond Euphrates and Tigris, following therein the Example of Cato, as he said, who declared the Macedonians to be free, because they could not be held in subjection. At first he studied to shew himself addicted to Clemency. He begged pardon of the Senate, that he had not made them Judges concerning his Succession, and excused it by the suddenness of his being saluted by the Senators, because the Commonwealth could not be without an Emperor. The Senate having decreed a Triumph to him, which was due to Trajan, he refused it, and caused Trajan's Image to be drawn in a Triumphal Chariot. The Title of Pater Patriæ being given him, both at first and afterwards he refused, saying, That it was late before Augustus deserved it. The Aurum Coronarium he remitted to Italy, and lessened it in the Provinces, yet setting forth the difficulties at large under which the Treasury laboured. A Conspiracy was hatched against him by Negritus whom he had designed for his Successor, but being discovered he was put to Death, and so were his Complices, Palma, Celsus, and Lucius, by command of the Senate, but against his will, as he wrote in his own life. But he was ill spoken of for putting to Death these four Persons of Consular Dignity; and to cause it to be forgotten, he came to Rome, where he gave a double Comgraty to the People, and in the Senate he swore, having excused what was done, that he would never punish a Senator but by the Sentence of the Fathers themselves.

21. That the Magistrates might not be charged with the Cursus Publicus, he laid the burthen upon the Treasury, as soon as he came to the Government. To obtain a good name, he remitted to private Debtors dwelling in Rome and Italy, an infinite Sum of Money, and vast Arrears to others in the Provinces, causing the Bonds whereby they stood engaged, to be burned in the Forum of Trajan. The Estates of condemned Persons he forbade to be brought into his private Fiscus, but to be accounted for in the publick Ærarium. He increased the liberality of Trajan, to Boys and Girls that wanted maintenance. To Senators who were decayed, not by their own faults, according to their charge of Children, and their quality he gave allowances for life. Most of the Senators he admitted to familiarity. The Circensian Games decreed to him, he refused, but only on his Birth-day, and said often both in the Assembly of the People, and in the Senate, that he would so govern as the Interest in the State being that of the People, and not his. When he had entered his third Consulship, he made many Consuls the third time; but a vast number he honoured with the second; and his third Consulship he held only four months, during which time he often sat in Judgment; when the Senate was legally assembled, either in the City or without, he was always present, and promoted the honour of it all he could, especially taking care, that the Dignity should not be cheap, for he difficultly admitted any into it. Yet would he venture to make himself rather cheap in visiting sick Persons twice or thrice a day, though but Equites, or even Libertini; he would comfort, relieve, and advise men of such quality, and take them to his Table, doing all things like a private man. Travelling into Gall, he was as liberal to all that had need of his liberality.

22. Thence he passed into Germany, and there, though he was more desirous of Peace than War, so exercised his Soldiers, as if some War and Expedition had been at hand. He taught them to bear and endure hardship, and that by his own Example; for living himself like a Soldier amongst the Manipulares, he publicly fed upon Military Fare which was Lard, Cheese, and that they called Folca, or Water & Vinegar as did Scipio Æmilianus, Metellus, & Trajan. On home he bestowed Rewards, on others Honours, to make them more willingly undergo what he severely imposed. Indeed Spartianus tells us, He reitord the Discipline of the Camp, which had decayed by the carelessness of other Princes, ordaining Offices and Allowances. That this is true, in part we have some reason to believe from what other Historians also write of Trajan; Vegetius mentions Hadrian's Constitutions about Military Affairs; Dion Cassius tells us, That his Rules and Orders were to his time observed for Laws; and Cassiodorus mentions a Coin, on the Reverse of which Discipline was engraven. He was also so extraordinarily Skilled in the Art Military, that he wrote a Book of Tacticks, which lying long obscure, at length saw the light in the days of Augustus, by means of Zoticus, who to his Observations, and the Experiences of the ancient Captains, added others of his own time, as Salmasius has observed. But what Spartianus writes of his restoring, we must not believe; as if he alone restored the Discipline which had been decaying from the time of Augustus; for, Galba was careful this way, though he had small time to make reformation, it being a common word amongst the Soldiers, That They must mind their Duty, for it was Galba, not Getulicus. Vespasian also was a good Soldier, and no doubt careful this way. To be sure so was Trajan, who also, as appears from Vegetius, published many Constitutions upon this Subject.

23. But Spartianus, the better to make good his Assertion, proceedeth and telleth us, That he never suffered any Soldier, without warrantable Cause, to be absent from his Colours; when this happened, usually the Tribunes were in fault, by giving leave upon frivolous pretences; but, Tribunes in his days were commended for their worth, and not by the favour of the Soldiers, or their commendation to the General, as had been practised toward the end of the Commonwealth, when they were not chosen by the People in the Comitia. To excite them to Travel, he himself would march on foot, armed as he was, twenty miles; for it was the usual and ordinary Custom, for the Soldiers to Travel five hours every day, in which space they got twenty or four and twenty miles; twenty miles in the Law being esteemed a Journey, and called Militaria gradus; as twenty four, gradus plenus. He caused to be pulled down all arched Rooms, Galleries, and such Coverings as the Soldiers made o're their Tents, for keeping off the heat of the Sun: The Army in Summer was Exercised in the Field; in Winter, if it rained or snow, under Coverings, and then only; and for this purpose they made Porticus's or Galleries, but these were more for Necessity; such as Hadrian pulled down were rather the green Porticus's made against Heat, and for pleasure, by them when Idle and Extravagant. Frequently he went meanly clad, which is to be understood when he was in the Camp; for that he used Gold in his Ornaments, and first of all Princes in that sort called Mantilia, some Authors wrote, The Belt he wore was without Gold; whereas it was the custom for the Roman Captains to have them sparkling both with Gold and Gems. The Hilt of his Sword was scarcely of Ivory, though this was despised in those days. Soldiers that were Sick, he visited at their Lodgings. He himself would chuse the ground where the Camp should be, though this was the Duty of the Metatores. He chose no Centurions but those that were Robust, and of good Repute; neither made he a Tribune that had not a Beard, or was not of such an Age as his Prudence and years might be equal to the Charge. Nothing did he permit the Tribune to receive from the Soldier, though there was an ill Custom, for the Officers to sell leave to the Soldiers of being absent from their Colours, and to convert their Pay and Allowances to their own Use. All delicacies he removed, and reformed what was amiss in their Arms and Furniture.

24. He made inquiry into the Age of the Ordinary Soldiers, suffering none to serve who was of less than Valour required, nor of greater than Humanity would suffer, or the Ancient Custom; and he made it his business to know them both as to their Persons and their Number. He was also diligent to understand what Military Provisions for Horse and Man were laid up in the limitaneous Cities; he curiously inquired into the Revenues of the Provinces, that if any thing was wanting, he might supply it. No man ever took such care not to buy or feed any idle thing. His Soldiers being thus brought to imitate their Emperor, he came into Britain, and here correcting many things out of order, he first of all others raised a Wall eighty miles long, to divide the Barbarians from the Romans. Septimius Clarus the Præfatus Prætorio, and Suetonius Tranquillus his Epistolærum Magister, he removed from their Places, for being more familiar with his Wife Sabina, than he commanded, or the reverence due to his Court required; and he said, That had he been a private man he would have put away his Wife, as morose and forward. And he was not only curious as to matters of his own House, but in such as related to his Friends; so as by the Frumentarii he discovered all things; neither did they understand that the Emperor knew how they governed themselves before he let them know how they did it. Having settled his Affairs in Britain, he returned into Gall, being troubled to hear of the Sedition at Alexandria, which was raised by occasion of their God Aps, who having been dead after many years, the People fell into a Tumult about the placing of him: At Nemausus he raised a Basilica of admirable work, in honour of Plotina. After this he went into Spain, and wintered at Tarraco (now Arragon) where at his own Expence he re-edified the Temple of Augustus; for the Inhabitants of that place raised Temples to him amongst the rest. He called a meeting of the Spaniards at this place, at which they of Italian Extraction endeavouring in jesting wife to draw their Necks from Burthens, and the rest in good earnest, he ordered his matters very prudently.

25. In those days in many places where the Barbarians were divided from the Romans, not by Rivers, but Limits made by Art, he raised a fort of Rampart with pieces of Timber in the manner of an Hedge or Wall. Over the *German*s he set a King; he appeased the motions of the Mauri, and had Supplications decreed him by the Senate; Afterward he composed the War of the Parthians by a Conference. He travelled out of Spain into Africk and so into Egypt and Syria, with the rest of Asia. Coming into Acbaia, he was at Athens initiated in their Mysteries called Eleusinia; after the Example of Hercules and Philip; many favours he bestowed upon the Inhabitants, and having been formerly their Archon he presided at their Solemnities, as Agonotheta; and in Acbaia it was observed, that it being at their Sacred Solemnities, the Custom for those that were present to have Knives about them for fear of Treachery, none that were so armed entred with Hadrian. After this he went into Sicily, and there up to the Hill Ætna, to see the Sun rise in form of a Bow. Thence he came to Rome, and from Rome passed again into Africk, where he conferred many benefits on the Provinces, as the Coins still bear witness, in some of which he is stiled the Reformer of Africk. Spartian adds to these his Narrations, that scarcely any other Prince travelled with such speed through so many Countries. As to this, Cassaubon observes, that he was accounted another Hercules, for his travelling so assiduously through the Roman world, and doing good in his passage. For Victor tells us, That he had his Troops of Smiths, Architects, and other Artificers, not unlike the Military Legions distinguished into Cohorts, for making or beautifying of Walls. Cassaubon saw a Coin in the possession of Thuanus, whereon he was both called Roman Hercules, and accounted like to that Hero. In others he found him stiled Soter, or Saviour, because going about the Provinces, he severely punished Governors thereof, whom he found faulty, who were often more cruel than any Monarchs. But whereas Spartian adds scarcely, this I learned man thinks he doth it, because of Julius Cæsar, who like Lightning ran through the Provinces, and illustrated most of them by his Victories. Next to him was Augustus, who yet as Suetonius confesseth, came not in Africk nor Sardinia, though in all the other Provinces. All the other Princes, Trajan excepted, were in a manner Homelings. But as for Hadrian, Dion Cassius in this respect prefers him before all the other Emperors without exception.

26. Having returned from Africk to Rome, he went again into the East, and took Athens in his way, where he perfected the works he had formerly begun, and dedicated the Temple of Jupiter Olympius, and an Altar to himself; and in the same manner passing through Asia, he consecrated Temples of his own Name. Then did he receive from the Cappadocians Slaves for the Service of the Camp. Of old when the Roman Discipline was vigorous, the Soldiers were not permitted to have any Slaves to follow them, and when the Custom was come up, yet such Captains as were severe, would cause them to be dismissed. But afterward it grew to that height, that every ordinary or Common Soldier would have his Slave. These Slaves the Ancients called Calones, and the later Romans Galearii from carrying their Helmets, who were wont to dig also, to make Trenches, and labour at such works as the Soldier himself formerly wrought. Now out of Cappadocia did Hadrian furnish himself, for out of that Country the greatest part of Slaves proceeded, that People being noted by the Greeks to be of a servile Disposition, and so much also by the Romans, that Cappadox and Mancipium with them, signified the same. But to pursue our Story, Tetrarchs and Kings he invited into Friendship, and particularly, Cydræus the Parthian, to whom he restored his Daughter taken by Trajan, and promised the golden Chair, which had also been taken; but performed not his word. Some Kings came to his presence, whom he treated in such sort, that it repented the rest that they did not come: In his Progress through the Provinces, he so severely punished the offending Officers and Governors, that he himself was believed to procure their Accusers. The Antiochians he so much hated (for their lightness and prating it's most probable) that he determined to separate Syria from Phœnicia, that Antioch might not be called the Metropolis of so many Cities. At this time the Jews raised a War, because they were forbidden to Circumcise themselves. He ascended the Mountain Cafius, where it is reported, the Sun might be seen to rise at the fourth watch of the Night, to behold this sight: Now there were two Mountains of this Name; one at Pelufium, at the entrance into Egypt, and the other hanging over the City of Antioch, where we may perceive Hadrian was about this time. But next to this, Spartian subjoyns, that having passed Arabia, he came to Pelufium, and built more Magnificently the Monument of Pompey, which Monument was in the other Mountain Cafius adjoining to Pelufium. As he failed through the Nile, he lost Antinous, a beautiful Youth he had. Some believed that he devoted himself for Hadrian, it being a Custom of old to kill one's Self; to prolong the life of a Friend, as they believed they thereby did, one live thing being given for another. Others thought he was killed by him, that by his Entrails he might discover future things, as there was also a Custom amongst the Pagans. However here he died, as Spartian saith, devoted to him, the one way or the other; and he loved him extremely; in such a way it's thought by some, as is not to be named, for he was very beautiful, as his Image expressed in a Medal doth shew, which Cassaubon saw amongst the Reliques of Thuanus, the President. And the Greeks, to flatter Hadrian, consecrated him for a god. Having the Town named after him, where he was Buried, he had there, and in many places of Greece Temples and Priests, and they said he gave out Oracles, as such as flattered Alexander, said of Clæpe- tion, whom he made a god in the same manner. Spartian adds, That Hadrian himself was reported to compose the Oracles of Antinous.

27. For he was most studious of Poetry, and indeed of all sorts of Learning; most Skillful in Arithmetic, Geometry, and Painting; to which some add, the Art of Medicine. He pretended also to have Skill in Singing, being too much given to his Pleasure in this kind, for concerning such as he loved, he Composed many amorous Verses. As of Arms, and the Art Military he was most knowing, he could manage the Weapons of the Gladiators. He was severe and merry, fair-spoken and grave, wanton and yet flow; close-handed; and counterfeiting liberality; cruel and yet merciful, and in all things ever various. He enriched his Friends, and even such as asked nothing, denying nothing to those that did; yet would he hear readily whatsoever was whispered against them, and there was scarcely any either of those to whom he bore the greatest Friendship, or favoured with the greatest Honours, whom he did not afterwards treat as Enemies. Amongst others, he compelled Severianus, his Sister's Husband, and one of Ninety years of Age, to die, that he might not over-live him. His Freed-men and some Soldiers he prosecuted. Being very ready in Composing both Prose and Verse, and most Skillful in all Sciences, yet, as more Learned, he derided all Professors of Arts, contemned and oppressed them. With these Professors and Philosophers, he often would contend by Writing Books or Verses. Favorinus a famous Learned Man of this Age, having made Use of a word which Hadrian reprehended, would not contend but yielded, and being reprehended by his Friends for so doing, the word being used by good Authors, he made them laugh, by telling them, that They did not well in that they would not suffer him to believe him learner than all others, who had at his Command thirty Legions. He was so desirous of fame, that he delivered Books of his own Life written by himself to those of his Freed-men that were Scholars, commanding them to Publish them in their own Names. For the Books of Phlegon were said to be of Hadrian's making. He wrote most obscure Books in imitation of Antimachus. He loved the ancient way of speaking. He declaimed Controversies. He preferred Cato before Cicero, Ennius before Virgil, Cælius before Sallust; and in the same boasting manner he judged concerning Homæ and Plato.

28. He seemed so much to be Skilled in Astrology, (by our Historian called Mathesis) that on the first of January at Night, he would write down what would happen to him the whole year; and that year he died, he wrote what he should do to the hour of his Death. But to shew more of the strange contrariety of his humour, our Author telleth us, That he was inclined much to reprehend Musicians, Tragedians, Comedians, Grammarians, Rhetoricians and Orators; yet he both honoured and enriched all Professors, though he ever vexed them with Questions. And notwithstanding he himself was the cause that many went Melancholic from him, yet he would say, he could not endure to see any one sad. He was very familiar with Epictetus and Heliodorus the Philosophers, besides other learned Men of all Professions, but was reported most to prize Favorinus, concerning whom we read so much in A. Gellius. Such Teachers as seemed unable for their Professions, he dismissed both with Wealth and Honour. Them with whom he had been at Enmity whilst a private Man, being Emperor he so far neglected, that to a Capital Enemy when made Augustus, he said, Thou hast escaped. Such as he himself called to the War, he furnished with Horses, Mules, Clothes, Money, and all Conveniences. He often washed publicly, and with all, being a most boasting Lover of the common People. He was so great a Lover of Travel, that he had a desire to see all he had read of the several Places in the World. Cold and Tempestuous weather he so patiently endured, that he never covered his Head. To many Kings he was very kind, of most he bought Peace, and by some was despised: to many he gave great Gifts, but greater to none than him of the Hiberi, to whom he gave an Elephant, and a Cohort of Five hundred men, after many other things. He also having received from Pharasmenes great Presents, and amongst them Chlamydes or Soldiers Coats made with gold, he caused Three hundred Malefactors to be put to fight in the Theatre filled with such Coats, on purpose to deride his Presents.

29. When he came in Judgment, he had in his Council not only his Friends and Companions (Comites) but Lawyers also, and especially Julius Cælius, Salvius Julianus, Neratius Præficus, and others, but such as all the Senate approved. Amongst other things, he ordained that in no City should any Houses be demollished for conveying their Materials to another City. By this passage of Spartian, it should seem that he made some Edict about this matter, but in our Books of Law, no such Constitution of his we meet with, and therefore several Learned men are of opinion, That these words of the Historian relate to a Senatusconsultum, made in the fifth year of his Reign, and the Consumplish of Aviola and Panfa. By this the Fathers ordained, that it should not be lawful to remove such things as joyed to Buildings, in way of Trade; to buy, sell, or leave them in Legacy, nor to sell or bequeath an House to be demolished; which thing was also forbidden in the days of Vespasian. Now this Spartian may mean, though his words do not express the intent or purport of the Senatusconsultum, a thing usual in those Writers of the Historia Augusta, when they talk of Law Matters. He tells us farther, that to the Children of Condemned Persons, he granted the twelfth part of their Estates. Of the ancient Cornelian Law concerning Proscription one branch took away all Access to Honours from the Children of proscribed Persons; by virtue of the other the Goods of the Father were to be sold. The first branch was taken away by Julius Cæsar, and succeeding Princes, and the latter was mitigated by this Law of Hadrian, who yet was not so merciful herein as Marcus, who reigned after him. Crimes of Treason he admitted not. He refused to be Heir to unknown Persons, neither received he the Inheritances of such as were known to him, if they had Sons. Concerning Treasure, he ordained that if one found it in his own Ground he should enjoy it, if in that of another man, he should give half to the owner; and if in publick Ground he should divide it with the publick Treasury. He forbid that Slaves should be killed by their Lords, and Commanded that they should be Condemned by the Judges, if they deserved it. To a Brothel House-keeper, and a Master of Defence, he forbid an Heir or She Slave to be sold without a Judge, and the pleasure of the Owner.

30. Such as had wasted their Estates, if they were Men, and at Age when they did it, he Commanded to be disgraced in the Amphitheatre, and diminished. But what disgrace this was is difficult to be understood, the word that Spartian useth, being variously interpreted. Cassianus will have it signify, that such were led through the Theatre, there to be scoffed at; and derided as Criminal Persons usually were, both word and Custom being taken from the Greeks. But Salmastus contends that the word imports a beating betwixt the Neck and Shoulders; a Punishment usual for Malefactors. And a great Malefactor doubtless is he, who by wasting his Estate, Robs his Wife and Children of what was left to him, as well as him, by their Ancestors. But this punishment was to give Example to others, and prevent the like Crime in lookers on, of which there must have been Multitudes in the Amphitheatre. More mild and effectual was the other course the Roman Law took against the Extravagancy of a Spendthrift, by virtue of which the Pætor forbade him the Use and Government of his own Estate, and assigned him a Guardian no otherwise than as to a Mad-man. But Spartian in reference to the Laws made by Hadrian, farther tells us, That he took away the Ergastula of Slaves and Liberti, or those that once had been such. So now we read it; but in stead of Freed-men, Salmastus will have Freemen to be read. Ergastula were places where Slaves or other Persons were kept in Bonds, and set to hard labour for some Offence committed. Of these some were publick, as the Mines, and some belonged to private men, unto which, in the Days of Augustus, some free men and ingenious Persons were by violence and stealth cast; and in the time of Tiberius, others to him being called to Arms, put themselves; and therefore both in Greece, Rome, and other places, as Plutarch complaineth. Cassianus thinks the Custom began when Agrippa first of all others, opened publick Baths at Rome. Now Hadrian endeavoured to take it away, but his Endeavour succeeded not, or but for a little time. For Marcus after him, made a new Law for this purpose, which prevailed, till taken away by Heliogabalus; but Alexander Severus restored it by another Constitution. Yet Alexander's care had but small effect;

the ancient Christians giving way to the Custom, though Prohibited by the Constitutions of Clemens. The Fathers in their Synods also forbade it, but their Authority was long neglected after the Decree of the Laodicean Council. But at length the Canons got ground, as should appear from a Novel of Justinian, by which amongst others, this was made a lawful cause of Divorce. If a Woman without leave obtained from her Husband shall cohabit with Men. Farther, Hadrian ordained, That if a Person was killed in his House, the question should not be put to all his Slaves, but only such as by their nearness might know of it. By Question is meant Examination by Torture, as will largely appear in the second Part of this Work.

31. So Popular was Hadrian, that, though Emperor, he would take Inferior Titles, as of Prætor in Hetruria, in the Latine Towns of Udinator, Edilis and Duumvir. At Naples he was Demarchus, in his own Country Quinquennalis, as also at Adria, which was esteemed as his other Native place, and Archon at Athens. Almost in all Cities he built and celebrated Games. At Rome after other vast Divertilements in honour of his Mother-in-law, amongst other Species which were wont to be given to the People, he gave Spices. In honour of Trajan, he commanded water made of Balm and Saffron to be sprinkled on the People, through the Degrees of the Theatre. Though every where he erected infinite Structures, yet he put his Name to none but the Temple of his Father Trajan. At Rome he repaired the Pantheon, the Septa, the Basilica of Neptune, many Temples, the Forum of Augustus, the Bath of Agrippa, and consecrated them all to their own and ancient Names. All these, or most of them, had perished by Fire in the Reign of Titus, and had been begun to be repaired by Trajan, but were left imperfect. He made a Bridge of his own Name (called Pons Ælius, as appears from Dio) and a Sepulchre by the River Tiber. So writes Spartian, though others will have Hadrian's Sepulchre, which Procopius terms a Tower and a Castle, to have been built after his Death by his Successor Pius. Marius Maximus said he was Cruel by Nature, and therefore did many things piously, that what was the lot of Domitian might not also happen to him. Though he rejected Titles, and would not have his Name set upon Buildings; He named, Spartian saith, many Cities after himself Adrianople, Carthage it self, and part of Athens; besides an infinite number of Aqueducts, he distinguished by the same Name. Yet Salmastius tells us, That using his utmost diligence, he could find but Nine Cities of his Name, whereof two were most known, and by no other; to the rest remained their other Names, though their Inhabitants boasted themselves for Hadrianopolis, and so would be called. One of these was in Cyrenaica; and the other in Thrace, Twenty four miles distant from Plorinopolis. Further, Hadrian first ordained the Officer called Advocatus Fisci, whereas, as Casaubon notes, the Affairs of the Treasury were managed formerly by the Procurators of the Cæsars.

32. He had a vast Memory, and a great readiness of Speech; for, he dictated himself his Orations, and answered to all things when he was saluted by the Common sort on certain Days, he would return their Names to many without a Nomenclator, though he had heard them but once, and spoken all together; so as he would correct the Nomenclators often when mistaken. He could tell the Names of the Veterane Soldiers whom he had dismissed from Service. Books which he had never seen before, and hastily read, he would repeat by heart. At one and the same time he wrote, dictated, heard, and discoursed with his Friends. Of all the publick Accounts he was so much Master, as scarcely was a Diligent Father of a Family of those of his own House. Concerning the Judges or Governors of Provinces, he fought what he could by Inquiry, and so long till he found out the Truth. His Freedmen he would neither have known in publick, nor be thought to have any power with him, being wont to impute to the preceding Princes the faults of all this sort of men that served them, and condemning all of his own that made their boasts of him. Such Cities, and Persons as were afflicted with Famine, Pestilence, and Earthquakes, he relieved. He gave the Privilege of Latium to many Cities; whereby we may understand, that it was not he that made all the Subjects of the Empire free Citizens of Rome. Under him were no troublesome Expeditions, and Wars were in a manner passed over in silence; yet was he beloved by the Soldiers for his extraordinary care of the Army, and for being most liberal to them. The Parthians he always had his Friends, because he took away their King whom Trajan had imposed on them. He permitted the Armenians to have a King, whereas under Trajan they had but a Legatus, or Lieutenant. From the Mesopotamians he exacted not the Tribute imposed on them by by Trajan; but why should he meddle with Armenia or Mesopotamia, when these Provinces and Affria, at the beginning of his Reign he had quitted and resigned up to the Parthians, perceiving them not capable to be held by him. The Albani and Hiberi were his mighty Friends; because he had been liberal to their Kings, though they would not come at him. The Kings of the Badrians in an humble manner sent Ambassadors to desire his Friendship.

33. He himself often assigned Tutors. Enacting Civil as well as Military Discipline, he commanded Senators and Equites ever to wear their Gowns in Publick, except they returned from Supper; and he himself always wore the Gown in Italy. It seems he re-enforced Augustus his Law, which took in the common People also, though by Hadrian they were left to their liberty. Before this Restraint of his, both Senators and Equites would use the Pennula and Lacerna in Publick. But Marcus was so great a lover of the Gown, that he always used it himself in Italy, and commanded his Soldiers also to be Gowned, wherein his Son Commodus also was so much concerned, that some he caused to be killed who met him in a Barbarian's Habit. But Hadrian required it not when they returned from Supper, because then they wore their Garments proper to eating; so they had Clothes proper for the time of Bathing, and from the Baths they might return in such. He received the Senators when they came to Feast with him, standing; and always when he lay down to Meat, was either clothed with the Pallium, or Gown put from his right Arm toward the left Shoulder; which he did, by his Example, to Correct the Extravagancy of the Romans, who in those days when they went to meat, were wont to change their Shoes for Sandals, and their Gowns for Senatorial Weeds, which were so large, that in nothing they more shewed their Luxury. But he either wore the Pallium, which left the Arms at liberty, or else had his Gown removed from his right Arm; which he must necessarily have loose and free. And he not only regulated the manner of Eating, but the Expense thereof, by direction from the Governors of Provinces, and reduced it to the ancient Custom, by recalling the Sumptuary Laws; not the Lex Fannia, or Licinia, (so Salmastius thinks;) which were too ancient and unsuitable to those times, but the Julia; by which it was ordained, that not above Two hundred Sestertii should be laid out upon a Supper; on the Kalends, Ides and Nones Three hundred and on other Festivals, and a Thousand at Weddings, and the like.

34. Carriages with great Burthens, he suffered not to enter Rome, neither Horses to be ridden in Cities; which Law Casaubon tells us, was changed for a milder, which permitted one to Ride in Cities on Horseback, but not in a Chariot, as our Neighbours of Amsterdam, lately Prohibited the Use of Coaches in theirs. Before the eighth hour of the Day, he suffered none except Sick Persons to walk in Publick. The ninth hour at Rome was the usual time for Supping; and then were opened the Taverns, Baths, and Brothel Houses; but it seems Hadrian would allow the Baths to be set open at the eighth. He first used the Ministry of the Roman Equites, for dispatching Epistles and Petitions. He himself frequently heard Causes both at Rome, and in the Provinces, taking in to his Assistance, the Consuls, Prætors, and the best of the Senators. He constituted four Consulares, Judges through all Italy. When he went into Affric it rained, which it had not done for five years before; according to our Historian; and for this the Africans loved him. But it seems, his ordering of his Head in Rain was such, that he loved not himself. For having travelled through all Parts uncovered, in the Showers and Colds, he fell into a Lingring and Consumptive Disease. Then being solicitous concerning a Successor, he thought of Severianus, and others, but looking upon them as Emperors, he detested them, though he repressed the force of his natural cruelty, till by a flux of Blood he was almost brought to his end. Then did he command Severianus to die, as affecting the Empire; in that he sent some Victims from Supper to the Emperor's Slaves, had set him down in a Royal Seat, placed by the Bed, as the Custom was, and though an old Man of Ninety years of Age, had gone bolt upright to the Stations of the Soldiers; many other being put to Death, either openly, or by cunning and secret means. Amongst these, his Wife Sabina was also said to have been taken away by Poison. Vellor, the Historian speaks of her Death as caused by him; yet voluntary, writing that Being affronted by almost servile Injuries, he was compelled to a voluntary Death; and that the openly boasted how insufferable an humour he had endured, and had laboured, that she might not be with Child by him, to the Destruction of Mankind.

He adopts Verus.

35. He adopted Ceionius Commodus Verus, the Son-in-law of Nigrinus, who conspired against him, whom formerly he had respected for his handfomness, and called him Elus Verus Caesar. In respect to this Adoption, he gave the Circensian Games, and a Donative both to the People and Soldiers; he honoured him with the Prætorship, the Government of Pannonia, and two Consulships. But he was very fickle, inasmuch that he could not give him thanks in the Senate for his Adoption, which made him often say, that he had leaned to a rotten Wall, and had lost a Thousand Sestertia. Having taken too strong a Purge, or some other sort of Physick, he died in the Night, through a great Issue of Blood which happened to him while he slept; Hadrian being wont to foretell his short continuance. He died on the first of January, or the Calends, and therefore he forbade he should be mourned for. Though on the third day after the Calends was the greatest Solemnity for naming Vows for the health of the Emperor; yet the first day itself was very Solemn, and such Ceremonies they were generally unwilling should be interrupted, or the Festivity lessened by Mourning. Elus Verus Caesar being Dead, he adopted Arrius Antoninus, afterward surnamed Pius, but on condition that he should adopt other two, which were Arrius Verus, and Marcus Antoninus. Many were vexed at the Adoption of Antoninus, particularly Catilius Severus, Præfect of the City, who aimed at the Sovereignty; which being discovered, he was put out of his place, and deprived of his Dignity. Hadrian weary of his life, commanded his Slave to run him through with his Sword; which being known, Antoninus and the Præfect came in, and desired him to bear patiently the violence of his Disease; at which he was angry, and commanded him that had made it known to be killed, but Antoninus preserved him, who affirmed, that being adopted, he ought not to suffer Hadrian to be slain; otherwise he should be a Parricide. He made his Testament, and this done, endeavoured again to kill himself, but the Dagger was stolen away from him, after which he grew more cruel; and he demanded Poison, of a Physician, who that he might not give it him, flew himself. At length he went to Baia, leaving Antoninus at Rome, to govern; where all endeavours for recovery being frustrate, having sent for Antoninus, he died in his sight on the sixth day before the Ides of July; and being hated by all Men, was Buried in Cicero's Village at Puteoli.

36. This is the Account we have from Spartianus, concerning the Reign and Character of Hadrian; and the largest we have from any Author now extant, being to our great loss deprived of so great a part of Dion Cassius his works. And we could have wished Spartianus himself had been more copious; for the Reader must take notice, that though we have such slender Intelligence of the manner of it; yet we are told, That Hadrian made a great alteration in the form of Government, so great that he obliterated most of that which was introduced by Augustus; nay, that the Model, as it stood in Constantine's time, was most of it of his contrivance. Yet when we come to particulars, we find little in Spartian; but that He made four Consulares Judges, throughout all Italy. Only Sex Aurelius Victor tells us much in little, that The Publick and Palatine Offices, as also of the Militia, Hadrian put into that form, which a few things being changed, remained in his days. But we cannot be of this opinion, that they were but a few things; For from this time down to Constantine, an Alteration crept in by degrees, as all Sublunary things are subject to change. But it will not be amiss to hear what a very great Man, Omnobrius Pavinus saith, concerning this Subject. He writes, that there were four Authors of a new form of the Commonwealth in the whole Roman Empire. These were, Romulus, Augustus, Hadrian and Constantine. That Hadrian made this alteration first after Augustus; and he founds his Assertion on this Affirmation of Victor. Before he comes to demonstrate it, he premitteth a Description of the whole Empire, taken out of Apollonius Proem to his Books of the Civil Wars. Then he renews his Assertion, that this Description of the Empire falling chiefly into the Reign of Hadrian, he made a new division of all Nations and Provinces therein mentioned, and ordered the Empire in a far differing manner from that wherein it was constituted by Augustus. Which division of Provinces, and new Constitution of the Empire, he saith he will suggest chiefly out of Sextus Rufus, and begin with Italy, the head of all. Italy, and her three Islands were distinguished into seventeen Dioecesi, or Administrations; The Governors of which were some Consulares, some Correllores, and some Præsides. There were eight Consulares, two Correllores, and seven Præsides. In Galls, Aquitains and Brittain; were eighteen Provinces; in Ilyricum seventeen; in Thrace six, and in Africa as many. As for the division of Asia, it's wanting.

37. But for Italy, eight Provinces, or Dioecesi as he calls them, had Consulares, two had Correllores, and seven had Præsidents. For those of Spain, Gall and Britain, he saith not which had which, so bold are some in following Victor; they knew not why, as to particulars. Generally Learned men have concluded that the Consulares, who by that Name and Authority governed Provinces, were instituted partly by Hadrian, and partly by Constantine. But Salmasius contends; that the Division of Provinces into Consulares, and Pro-Consulares, was not only before Constantine, but also before Hadrian, he being Consularis of a Province, who governed it by Consular Authority. That Hadrian brought not first up the Administration of the Consulares, but that Italy before his time not being governed by Consulares, he appointed such Judges to administer Justice to all the Provinces of that Country. He fetcheth them from the Institution of Augustus, who sent such Officers to govern some of his Provinces when the Partition was made betwixt him and the People. Cassaubon observes, that Marcus afterward to these Consulares, substituted Lawyers, and so was Italy governed till the Reign of Macrinus, under whom these Juridici failed, as he gathers from the fragments of Dio. Afterwards we shall see in Constantine's Model, that Consulares were a sort of Governors, and of the ordinary Governors of Provinces. Hadrian it seems did not first institute them; but he might introduce some things circumstantial as to their Office. No more did he institute that of Prætor, which was very ancient; but in his time a great Accident happened in reference to the discharge of the Prætor's Office, and that possibly by his Direction and Command.

38. For under him we are told by Entropius, that the Edit called Editum Perpetuum, was Compiled by Salvius Julianus. And the Emperor Justinian in his Preface before the Digests to the Great Senate, attributes this to Hadrian himself, saying, That what things were every year published by the Prætors in their Edicts, he comprized in one little Book, taking in excellent Julian to that Enterprise. During the Commonwealth, the Prætors had Power to Correct the Rigor of the Law, and the Ediles Curules had in certain Cases authority to make Laws also. But as their Offices, or their Edicts were but Annual before the Corneilian Law. Now Salvius Julianus, whom Spartian writes to have been one of Hadrian's Councillors, reduced them by his Command into order, and framed out of them a perpetual Edit, to be as a certain Body of standing Law, and to prevent the great Confusion occasioned by the New Edicts which each made at the Entrance into his Office. This Edit which was henceforth to be their guide and rule in Administration of Justice, consisted of One hundred and ninety Books or Chapters, and being confirmed both by Prince and Senate, was afterward illustrated by the Commentaries of two most Noble Lawyers, Paulus, and Ulpian, of whom the former Composed Eighty Books, and the later Eighty three. And well might they bestow their pains upon it; for this was the Archetype of the Pandectis, the most noble Body of the Roman Law, and the Sum of what is left unto us, most of the Books now remaining, referring unto it as a Fountain, and the greatest part of the Digests being transcribed out of the Volumes written up on this Subject.

39. From this time forward it came to pass, that whereas since the Monarchy introduced by Augustus, the Prætors had still made their Laws or Edicts; the Lawyers also reigned in the Forum, with remarkable Authority, and moderate Princes very often consulted the Senate upon any new Law to be made (where upon their Orations in Senate are recited in Books, and have the Name also of Senatusconsulta) after the Publication of this Volume of Edicts, the Prætors no more proposed any of their own; but like other Magistrates, began upon occasion to consult the Prince, who ever had at his Hand the best Lawyers to advise with, as we see Hadrian had. And indeed by all of that Noble Profession, the Reign of this Emperor deserves much to be taken notice of, both in respect that the Perpetual Edit was made in his time, and not without good reason, Justinian in Composing his Code, begins with the Constitutions made by him, omitting those of the former Emperors; as also that now the Power of making Laws remained in the Princes alone; in the Privy and Select Council of whom, all things necessary for the Government of the Commonwealth, the State of the Empire, and the Discussion of Causes and Controversies were handled and debated. But this Salvius Julianus, that eminent Lawyer of Milan, the Scholar of Jabolenus, is thought Author also of that called Interdittum Salvianum; as also of the New Edit concerning the joining of other Children with an Emancipated Son. For he was Prætor; he was also twice Consul, and Præfect of the City, besides several Governments of Provinces; and which made him more Noble, saith Spartian (in the life of Didius Julianus the Emperor his great Grandson) a Lawyer. He it was that composed the perpetual Edict, and not Didius Julianus the Emperor, as Grætius strangely mistook, being deceived as Menagius believes, by a most corrupt place of Aurelius Victor.

40. By all that has been said, we may easily perceive that Hadrian was really a great Person, as to his Parts and Accomplishments. But that his humour was compounded, and that he was various, appears from Spartian, who is most in his Commendation, and as is abundantly evident from other Writers. They agree that he endeavoured to conceal his Cruelty, and other Vices; but it would now and anon shew it self, as it did even at the first, though he cared the People all he could, to make it have a good Opinion of him; and swore to the Senate that he would never punish a Senator, but by the Sentence of that Court. But he broke his word toward his later end, when he put to Death many of that Order, which some may charitably attribute to his not being himself. He is charged with Envy, and that toward his very Benefactor Trajan. For to this both Eutropius and Sext. Rufus do attribute his quitting Assyria, Mesopotamia, and Armenia to the Parthians, and his resolution to have Euphrates to be betwixt them and the Romans; yet this he might do being of the same Opinion as Augustus, that the former bounds of the Empire were large enough, and that Trajan did but endanger it by making it greater. This, together with desire of Ease both of himself and People, might be the principal Cause of his quitting those Countries; for though he understood the Art of War, as we have seen, very well, yet he had devices to keep it off; and would not fail upon occasion to do it by underhand Gifts and Presents he made to Neighbour Princes, and he would boast that he did more (this way) for the safety of the Empire, than others had done by their Arms. But whereas Spartian talks that there were no heavy Expeditions under him, and that Wars were in a manner transacted in silence, he wrote it without good Intelligence, or due Consideration. For besides that he is said by some to have overthrown the Sarmatæ (or Sarmatæ, inhabiting the Countries now called Russia, and Tartary) he had a bitter contest with the rebellious Jews.

41. The principal cause of their rebellion was, for that he built a new City, and therein a Temple to Jupiter Capitolinus, where Jerusalem stood, and called the place after himself Ælia Capitolina, and he forbade them to be Circumcised. They were confirmed in their Sedition by one who pretended he came down to them as a light from Heaven to save them from slavery and bondage, saying, he was the Star foretold by Balaam, whence being called Barcochab, he was first worshipped as the Messiah, and anon after Bitter, a City in Africa, but afterwards proving to be an Impostor, they called him Barcochab, or the son of a lye. Dio wrote, that the whole World was in a manner shaken with this Commotion of the Jews. Hadrian sent the best Captains he had against them, whereof the chief was Julius Severus, who had at this time governed Britain. Albeit in the end he had the victory, yet would he not have wished for many Triumphs at the same rate. For very many of the Romans fell; inasmuch that Hadrian writing to the Senate, used not that beginning which other Emperors were wont: Sto vos liberique vestri valeis, Bene est; Ego quidem & exercitus valeamus. But the extraordinary strength which now appeared in the Jews was given them for their destruction. The greater danger their mutiny had occasioned to the Empire, the greater was the Emperors severity in punishing their rebellion past, the greater his care to prevent the like in time to come. In Battels and Skirmishes were slain of them 580000, besides an infinite number consumed with Famine and Diseases, during the time of this lingering War, protracted of purpose by the Romans, not willing to try it out in open field with such a forlorn desperate multitude. Dio, who lived not long after this time, emphatically notes, that they were left few in number, their Land laid waste, fifty of their strongest Munitions utterly razed, and Nine hundred eighty five of their Chief, and most populous Towns sackt, and consumed by Fire. Hadrian after this strange desolation, by Publick Decree ratified by the Senates consent, prohibited any Jew to come within the view of Judea. Before this overthrow they had manifest signs foreshowing their destruction. Solomon's Sepulchre, which they held in greatest honour, laid Dio, a little before this War fell asunder of its own accord; Wolves and Hyænas howled throughout their streets, and devoured them in the fields. Such Jews as Hadrian took Captive, he banished into Spain his own Country (this was their Tenth Captivity, saith *John * Vasæus*) where they had their Synagogues, till the time of Ferdinand and Isabel, and Emanuel King of Portugal.

42. The State of the Jews from this time until the expiration of the Roman Empire cannot easily be gathered from any Roman Writers, who seldom vouchsafe the Jews or Christians any mention, unless enforced thereto by some famous War or Mutiny, or by some other event redounding to the Roman glory. Judea after this time was not famous for any tumult till the ruin of Rome; greatness; the Jews wanted strength, and the Christians willing minds to procure the Emperor's glory by Seditions. Hereupon whatsoever calamity either of them suffered by the Romans, was passed over by Roman Writers, as private wrongs not worthy registering in their Annals. Upon this account 'tis no wonder they took no notice of our Saviour, or his Acts, all tending to Peace and Loyalty. For as Tacitus notes, Judea was most quiet in Tiberius his time, which was the best news the Romans cared to hear thence. Yet the general estate of the Jews between Hadrian's and Honorius's time, as *one observes, may be gathered out of the reverend Fathers of the Primitive Church; who usually stopped the mouths of Heathens, or blasphemous Atheists, by propounding their condition, then known unto all the World, for such as our Saviour had foretold it. Thus much of the Jews until the series of time and affairs reduce us to them.

Hadrian's Character.

43. Hadrian, if we look at his natural disposition, was as it were compounded of vice and virtue, yet so as he seemed to have the command of them, and may be reckoned amongst good Princes. He was much addicted to studies, and well seen in most of the liberal Arts; here was his fault, that he desired to comprehend all, and did not reserve himself for the most worthy, being one of the most curious men that ever lived. And in him that Saying was sufficiently demonstrated, Non est curiosus quin idem sit malevolus. For he was so curious that he mortally hated all better Scholars than himself, and consequently the greatest Professors in all Sciences; but such as were unable for their Profession he would dismiss with great rewards, as was said. He killed Apollodorus the Architect for shewing him something freely the Errors in his Buildings. One of his Præfects was Similis, who as Dio writeth, getting leave to retire, and live quietly in the Country there his last seven years, commanded this Inscription to be set on his Tomb: Hære bieth Similis, whose life consisted of many (or sixty seven) years, yet he lived but seven. His cruelty toward his latter end we may in charity impute to his peevishness contracted by the Dropsie, with which he was fore vexed in every part. In his time the Church was under some Persecution; for Xistus Bishop of Rome was Crowned with Martyrdom in the tenth year of his Reign, on the eighth of the Ides of April, to whom succeeded Telephorus, according to Damasus; but this was rather from the malice of others, and the wicked custom then on foot, than out of his inclination. Being somewhat satisfied with the Apologies of Quadratus and Arifides, two learned Men, he wrote a Letter to Minutius Fundanus Proconsul of Asia, which Justin Martyr hath exemplified in his second Apology, and from him as it seemeth, Eusebius in his History, after this manner:

This Letter in behalf of the Christians.

44. The Emperor Cæsar Ælius Adrianus to Minutius Fundanus. I received a Letter from Serenius Gratianus, that right worthy man thy Prædecessor, the occasion whereof I cannot with silence pass by, lest thereby men be troubled, and a gap left open to the malice of Sycophants. Wherefore if your Provincials can prove ought against the Christians whereof they charge them, and justice it at the Bar, let them proceed, and not impeach them only for the name with making outcries against them. For it is very expedient that if any be disposed to accuse, the accusation be thoroughly known of you and sifted. Therefore if any accuse the Christians that they transgress the Laws, see that you judge, and punish according to the quality of the offence; But in plain terms, if any upon Spite or malice in way of cavillation complain against them, see that by all means you chastise and punish him according to his malice. Hadrian at length by vomiting blood in great quantity, contracted a Dropsie (if Dio writeth Physician like) which he tormented him, that he desired death, but could not have it (according to the Prayer of Severianus, whom, though he judged him worthy of the Empire, of late he had put to death) but at length by an ill kind of diet accelerated it, yet saying, Multi Medici Regem sustulerunt, and enquiring * of his Soul whither it meant to go. He died on the fourth of the Ides of July, having lived Sixty two years, and reigned twenty-one, with eleven Months, in the 89th year of the City, A. 45. Antoninus succeeded his Adoptive Father Hadrian, and was Surnamed Pius. Concerning the reason of this Surname, some fetch it from his Piety to his Father-in-Law, whom Hadrian seeing him to lead when old and weak, into the Senate, and to sustain him with his Arm, was so taken with him, that thence he was moved to adopt him, as the Senate was to give him this Surname. But others derive it from his pious and grateful Memory of his Adoptive Father, to whom he not only built a Monument resembling a Castle, at least a Tower, as Procopius describes it; but presently after his Death, when the Senate was much incensed against him by reason of his cruelty shewed to several Members thereof, and refused to canonize him for a Divus, or give him, as they worded it, divine Honours, he with much pains obtained it of them: Besides this, he made him a Sepulchre at Puteoli, ordained Games every fifth year, with Flamines and Sodales, and many other things in honour of him as a Demy-God. Some thought him so called, because he saved such as Hadrian in his Extremity commanded to be killed; others, because he would not suffer him to kill himself, and others derive the Surname from his own innate Goodness and Clemency of his Nature. He is called by Capitolinus, who wrote his Life, T. Aurelius Fulvius Boionius Antoninus Pius, deriving his Pedigree by the Father's side, from Gallia Transalpina, and the City Nemausus, or Nimes. His Grandfather was Titus Aurelius Fulvius, who through various Honours, arrived at the second Consulship, and the Prefecture of the City: his Father Aurelius Fulvius who also was Consul, a temperate and honest Man. His Mothers Mother was Boionia Procilla, his Mother Arria Fadilla, and her Father Arrius Antoninus, who was twice Consul, a Person by the Historian termed Sanctus, who told Nerva in the Senate, That he pitied him for being Emperor. This his Grandson was born in September, when Domitian the twelfth time was Consul, together with Cornelius Dolabella.

46. While he was a private man, he most commonly lived in the Country, but was Eminent where ever he came. He was made by Hadrian one of his four Consulares over that Part of Italy, where he had most Estate. To the Italians he restored all that Gold called Aurum Coronarium given him upon the account of his Adoption, and half to the other Provincials. He was so constant, that good Governors of Provinces he kept in their Places seven, and nine years. He waged many Wars by his Legates. For he overcame the Britains by Lothius Urbicus, raising another Wall made of Turf, after the removing of the Barbarians: he compelled the Moors to desire Peace: by his Legat and Presidents he also reduced the Germans, Daci, Jews, and other Nations which rebelled. Moreover he repressed Rebellions in Achaia and Egypt, and restrained the Alani, who often attempted to stir. He commanded his Procurators modestly to exact the Tributes, heard willingly such as objected any thing against them; such as exceeded, he commanded to give account of their Actions, neither ever rejoiced he in any gain, by which a Provincial was oppressed. The Imperial Height and Dignity he brought to the greatest Civility. Being Emperor, he bore so much respect to the Senate, as when he was a private Man, he desired should be given to him by the Prince. He ordained nothing concerning the Provinces or other Matters, without the advice of his Friends, and according to their Opinions composed his forms. Whereas other Princes were never seen but in their Gowns, he would appear to his Friends at home in his ordinary Clothes (as the Tunica and Peplus) and about some of his Domestick Business. He governed, yet, the Empire with such diligence, that he took care of all Persons, and all things, as of his own, and all the Provinces flourished under him.

47. Confication of Estates in his time was more rare than ever, for though several were found guilty of Treason, yet one Person was only prohibited for affecting the Sovereignty, Attilius Tullianus, and that by Decree of the Senate, and yet he would not have him forced to reveal his Complices, and he was ever ready to help his Son in all things. Priscianus also perished who was guilty of the same Crime, but he killed himself, and he forbade the Conspiracy to be inquired into. His manner of living was such, as there was opulency without reprehension, parsimony without forbidness, and his Table was furnished by his own Servants, Fowlers, Fishers, and Hunters. The Bath he had he let the People make Use of without Rent; neither did he change any thing from the quality of a private private life. But he took away Pensions from many whom he saw idle; affirming, That Nothing was more joyful, nay cruel, than for those to gnaw upon the Commonwealth, who by their pains contributed nothing to it.

The Accounts of the Provinces, and the Revenue he understood very well. His private Patrimony he gave to his Daughter, but the Profits of it (but for some time surely) to the Commonwealth. He sold things belonging to the Emperor which were superfluous, and often lived on his own Lands, neither made he any Expeditions, but only travelled to his own Estate, and into Campania, saying, That The Train and Attendance of a Prince, although too sparing, was burdensome to the Provincials; and yet was he of great Authority amongst all Nations; for he resided in the City, that, as in the middle, he might with more speed receive Messages from all quarters. He gave a Congiary to the People, and a Donative to the Soldiers. Besides many works of his own, and the repairing of others, he assailed many Cities with Money, either to raise new Fabricks, or restore the old; nay, he would help the Magistrates and the Senators of Rome in the discharge of their Functions.

48. He refused to be left Heir by such as had Sons. To a good Judge he gave no Successor so long as he lived, except to Orpilius Prefect of the City, at his own desire. For Gnaevius Maximus, the Praefectus Praetorio arrived at his Twentieth year under him; a most severe Man, to whom Tatius Maximus succeeded, in whose Place, when dead, he substituted two Puellets, Fabius Repentinus, and Cornelius Vidorinus, of whom Repentinus was libelled, as if he came to the place by means of the Prince his Concubine. The scarcity of Wine, Oyl, and Wheat he supplied out of his own Treasury, by buying them up, and giving them gratis to the People. For, in his time there was a Famine, the Cirque fell down, and Earthquakes happened, which over-turnd some Towns of Achaia and Rhodes; all which he wonderfully restored: There was also a Fire at Rome, which consumed Three hundred and forty Islands, or Houses, as our Historian explains himself, for the Houses were insular, made at distance one from another. King Pharagmenes came to him to Rome, and paid him more respect than to Hadrian. He made Patricius King of the Lazi. He drew back the Parthian King from invading the Armenians only by his Letters. He took up Controversies betwixt Kings. The King of Parthia, who desired to have back the Royal Chair taken by Trajan, he denied. He restored Rimithalces to the Kingdom of Bosphorus, having heard the Controverfie betwixt him and the Curator. He sent aid into Pontus to the Olbipolites against the Tauriscythes, whom he compelled to give them Hostages. Now Cassianus tells us, that the Olbipolites were Greeks, at least mixt with Greeks; the Tauriscythes were Barbarians, either Scythians or Goths, called also Getae. The Senate decreed, that the Months of September and October should be called the one Antoninus after him, and the other Faustina; after his dearly beloved Wife Faustina; (who died in the third year of his Reign and was made a Dea by the Senate, with a Temple, and other things suitable to that Heathenish Honour) but he refused it. But the Marriage of his Daughter Faustina to M. Antoninus, he so highly solemnized, as to give a Donative to the Soldiers.

How he treated his Ministers.

How Learned Men.

49. His Prefects he both enriched and honoured with Consular Ornaments. If he condemned any of Extortion, he restored their Estates to their Children, but on condition, that they gave the Provincials back what their Fathers had taken from them. To Pardon he was most prone. He conversed with his Friends as a private man, living with them in the time of Vintage. He used his Freedmen very severely. To Rhetoricians and Philosophers throughout the Provinces he gave both Honours and Salaries, though other Writers ascribe this, to Hadrian who went before, and Marcus who followed after him. He enacted many things, and made use of these Lawyers, Papianus Verus, Salvius Julianus, Volusianus Metianus, Ulpianus Marcellus, and Jabolenus. All Seditions he repressed, not by Cruelty, but by Modesty and Gravity. He forbade the Dead to be Buried within Cities. He stated the Charges of the Shows of Gladiators. The Cursus Publicus, or Cursus Vehicularius with great diligence he made less burdensome. Of all things he did, he gave an account in the Senate, and by Edicts. He deceased in the Seventieth year of his Age, and yet he was milled as if he had been a young Man. He contracted his Disease by eating Cheese at Supper, which Vomiting in the Night, the next day he was seized by a Fever. The next day after finding himself very ill, he recommended the Commonwealth and his Daughter to M. Antoninus, his Prefects, or Officers being present, and commanded the Golden Fortune which was wont to be set in the Bed Chamber of the Emperor to be the World. In the Reign of Antoninus Pius, Marcion also the Heretick began to teach, living in the time of Justin Martyr, who wrote against him. He was Native of Pontus, first a Stoick, then a Christian; he followed Basilides, Cerdon, and Valentinus, in their Heresies. Meeting Polycarpus, he said, Knowest thou me? Polycarp answered, I know thee for the first born of Satan. Epiphanius writeth, that being a Bishop's Son, when he had deflowered a Virgin, he was by his own Father excommunicated, and afterwards flying to Rome, because they there admitted him not into the Church, he began to Preach detestable Doctrine. He taught, that there were three beginnings, Good, Just, and Evil: that the New Testament was contrary to the Old. He denied the Resurrection. He baptized such as died without Baptism, saying, that Paul had him do so. He taught that Marriage was unlawful, and that it was a great Sin to Marry. That Cain, the Sodomites, and all wicked men were saved, because they met Christ when he descended into Hell, but the Patriarchs and Prophets are still in Hell, for not meeting Christ; for they thought (said he) that Christ came to tempt them. Under Anicetus also came to Rome Marcellina, a woman which infected many with the Heresie of Carpocrates, who called himself kyriakos. She is said to have kept and offered incense to the Statues and Pictures of Christ (which the Gnosticks said, had been made by command of Pilate) as also to others of St. Paul.

54. About the nineteenth year of Antoninus Pius, the beginning also of Montanus his Heresie is placed by Epiphanius; but from Eusebius, Cappellus would gather, that the original of it was fifteen years before, because the Historian writeth, that Apollinaris wrote against Miltiades and Montanus the Hereticks, under the Proconsulship of Gratus, who seemeth the same with him, whose Consulship is by Cassiodorus cast into the fourth of Pius. He thinks therefore, that in the nineteenth year some new thing might be attempted by Montanus; as he might this year institute his Prophetesses. These were his two Country-women, Priscilla and Maximilla, born at Pepusa a City of Phrygia, upon which account he called Hierusalem by that name. Cappellus further observeth, that of such things as are attributed to Montanus, some were truly his, some after his death were added by the Montanists, and some falsely ascribed to them. Montanus really held, that the Promise of sending the Holy Ghost was deferred till his time, and in himself fulfilled, because the Church heretofore could not bear the yoke of more severe and holy Discipline, which he endeavoured to bring in, by appointing the eating of dried meats, fasting, and Monogamy, or single Marriage. The Montanists, after their number was increased, did those things which Jerome mentioneth, viz. they appointed themselves Patriarchs, two Cenae, which word semeth of Phrygian Original, and three Bishops. That is falsely imputed to them, which Jerome saith others did attribute, but he would not believe, viz. that they pricked an Infant, and with his blood made up the Eucharist. If this opinion may be attributed to any Heresie, or if this prejudice did not arise from the imputation of this kind of cruelty by the Heathen to Christianity it self, the Carpocratians rather than the Montanists were guilty of it. But because both sorts were called Gnosticks (as swelling with an opinion of knowledge) what was acted but by one, might easily be attributed to the other. So because Montanus, as full of the Holy Ghost, called upon men in the name of the Father, he was believed to confound the Persons of the Trinity into one, which was the invention of the Sabellians a hundred years after. 'Tis further said of him, that he baptized the dead, and not allowing of second Marriages, permitted Married Persons to be separated when they themselves would. That he took away repentance, affirming, that Sinners could never have their Sins pardoned by repentance. And that the Apostles and Prophets understood not any thing they had written, but were Arrepti. Now to return to civil matters.

55. Marcus Antoninus, the Successor of Antoninus Pius, a Man who lived as a Philosopher all his life, and who in Sanctity excelled all Princes in the Opinion of Capitolinus, was the Son of Aminius Verus, who died in his Pretorship, and Grandson of Aminius Verus, who was both Consul and Praefect of the City, and brought in amongst the Patricians by Vespasian and Titus, the Censors. He was born at Rome in the Gardens on Mount Calvus, the Six and twentieth of April, his Grandfather being the second time Consul with Augustus, and was thought to derive his Pedigree from Numa. At first he had the Name of Catilius Severus, his Great Grandfather by the Mother's side. After the Death of his Father, he was called by Hadrian Aminius Verissimus, to express the veracity of his Nature, and was Adopted and Educated by his Grandfather on the Father's side, being called Aminius Verus, after he had taken the Gown of a Man. He was grave from his first Infancy. And as soon as he was taken from Nurseries, was delivered to great Masters to be taught Philosophy, whom he much respected. He had those that taught him Musick, Geometry, Grammar, and Rhetorick, both Greek and Latine; amongst whom, he chiefly respected Fronto a Latine Orator, to whom he deferred in the Senate a Statue to be erected; and Proculus, who instructed him in Latin Grammar, was so dear to him, that he promoted him to the Proconsulship, taking the Burthens thereof upon himself. Even while yet a Boy, he vehemently studied Philosophy. When twelve years old he took the Habit of a Philosopher, and with it the Patient enduring of all things, inasmuch that he studied in the Fullness, and lay on the ground, his Mother hardly prevailing to have him make Use of a Couch spread with Skins. When he was made Partaker of the Imperial Dignity, yet would he go to hear Apollonius the Chalcedonian a Stoick Philosopher. He heard Sextus of Charonea the Nephew of Plutarch, and others, Stoicks; and of Peripateticks Claudius Severus; but especially Junius Rusticus, a Stoick; he revered and chiefly followed, being very able for Civil Affairs and Matters of War, as well as most Skillful in the Stoick Discipline. With him he communicated all his Publick and Private Councils, whom he would kiss even in the presence of the Praefect Pratorio, whom he honoured with a second Consulship, and after his Death required of the Senate that he should have Statues. So great Honour he gave to those that taught him, that he kept their Images of Gold in his Lararium or Household Chappel, and always graced their Sepulchres with Porches, Sacrifices and Flowers. Besides what is mentioned, he studied the Law, and in such labours took such pains, that he disordered thereby his Body; and in this alowes his Childhood to be reprehended. He frequented the Publick Schools of Declaimers, and his School fellows he so loved, that whom he could not prefer to Places in the State, he enriched other ways.

56. For studying the Law, the Historian tells us, That he had L. Volusius Marcianus for his Master. This is that Marcianus whom he formerly named as Councillor to Antoninus Pius, who in the Treatise written by this Marcus concerning himself, and often in the Pandects, is falsely called Marcianus. Being a most Learned man, he composed many Books, as Sixteen De Fideicommissis, Fourteen De Publicis Judiciis, a Book in Greek upon the Rhodian Law, and which must especially be mentioned, another De Affectu, or Distribution of an Inheritance, which Cujacius formerly caused to be bound up with the Code of Theodosius, and not long since Fredericus Gronovius published at the end of his Learned Commentary De Seffer. um in Amentibus Jovis Civilis, 6. 9. Cujacius, and after him Jacobus Gothofredus commends this Book of Marcianus, to all such as intend to study the Law, to be read before Justinian's Institutions; for, in vain do such apply themselves to that labour, who do not understand the Distribution now mentioned.

57. Marcus took his toga Virilis in the Fifteenth year of his Age, and then was the Daughter of L. Cetonius Commodus; by the order of Hadrian contracted to him. Not long after he was made Praefect for the Latine Verie, and in that place carried himself very discreetly. He granted all his Fathers Patrimony to his Sister, saying, when his Mother called him to a Division, That he was content with his Grandfather's Estate, and that she, if she pleased, might give his Sister hers too, that the might not be inferior to her Husband. Notwithstanding his gravity, contracted by the study of Philosophy, he was so good natured, that he would be drawn to see the huntings of the Theatre, and behold the Spectacula, and naturally he loved such Exercises. Though the study of Philosophy diverted him from all, yet not so as to take away his Civility; for he was temperate without Contumacy, bashful without laziness, and without sadness grave. Being adopted by Antoninus, who had Married his Aunt, he was rather afraid than merry; and when his Domesticks wondered at it, and asked him the reason, he argued with them concerning the Inconveniences which attended the Sovereign Command. Then for Antius, he began to be called Aurelius, because of his passing into the Aurelian Family of the Antonini. Hadrian being dead, Antoninus resolved to have him for his Son in-Law, the Contract being dissolved betwixt his Daughter and Verus, who was not ripe enough for her, and he designed him Quaestor and Consul with himself. He conferred on him the Title of Cesar, with other Honours, and the Consulship the second time, when he himself bore it the fourth. After this, Marrying Faustina, Pius his Daughter, and having a Daughter by her, he was adorned with the Tribunitia Power, as also with the Proconsular, (which Augustus and his Successors took to themselves, though Antoninus Pius seems to be the first who used the Title of Proconsul) and the Privilege of making the fifth Report, being in such credit with Pius, that he would promote no man without him, neither would give ear to any whippers against him. For twenty and three years he so demeaned himself in this his Father's House, that the Old Man's love to him increased, neither in all that time did he lye from him above two Nights, at several times.

He joins with himself Lucius in the Imperial Sovereignty.

58. After the Death of Pius, being constrained by the Senate to take the Publick Government upon him, he made his Brother L. Commodus Partner with him in the Empire, calling him Lucius Aurelius Verus Commodus; he gave him the Titles of Cæsar and Augustus, and thenceforth they began to govern the Commonwealth with equal Right, and the Roman Empire to have two Emperors, upon which account they are in Law-Books known by the Names of Drui Fratres. He himself presently took the Name of Antoninus, and as the Father of L. Commodus called him Verus, and adding that also of Antoninus, betrothed to him his Daughter Lucilla, and upon this occasion, whereas Trajan had given Maintenance to certain Boys and Girls, whose liberality had been increased by Hadrian; and Pius, in Honor of Faustina, had given Alms to Girls, which from her had the Name of Faustiana; now there were other both Boys and Girls taken in, and allowed Maintenance. Having dispatched what was to be done in the Senate, and in the Camp with the Soldiers, to whom they promised Twenty thousand Nummi a piece, and to the rest proportionably (that is, as Cæsar and Præfets of Ale) they buried their Father magnificently in the Tomb of Hadrian, and both of them commended him by Funeral Orations, conferring on him the usual Ceremonies of a Divus. After their possession of the Empire, they both carried themselves so civilly, that no man mist the lenity of Pius. Still did Marcus follow the study of his dear Philosophy, but received some disturbance therein by the rising of Tiber, which overflowed to such extremity, that it spoiled many Buildings, and other Things, drowned many Animals, and procured a most grievous Famine; all which mischiefs they moderated by their presence and care. The Parthian War also now broke out, which Vologesius had designed in the Reign of Pius, but now he declared by driving away Avidius Cassianus, who governed Syria. A War was also ready to break out here in Britain, and the Catti made Irruptions into Germany near the Rhine, and into Rhetia. Against the Britains was sent Calpurnius Agricola, and Avidius Vitorinus against the Catti. But against the Parthian by consent of the Senate was Verus himself sent, whom Marcus his Brother accompanied as far as Capua, and gave him a Train besitting his Person.

Sires in the Provinces.

59. Verus being come into Syria, lived deliciously at Antioch, and Daphne, and exercised himself with the Arms of Gladiators and Hunting, carrying on the War against the Parthians by his Lieutenants; whereas Marcus was no hour free from business, and partly unwilling, partly content, bore with the voluptuous humour of his Brother. Statius Præfex prospered well in Armenia, taking the City Artaxata, whereupon the Surname of Armeniacus was given to both the Emperors, and Marcus refused it at first, though he took it afterward, as also that of Parthicus upon the ending of that War; and that of Pater Patriæ, he put off till the Return of his Brother. He ordained that all Citizens should within Thirty days enter their Children that were born at Rome, in the Registers of the Governors of the Ærarium of Saturn; and throughout the Provinces he brought up the Use of the Publick Tabularii (Slaves at present, though afterwards Freeman) who should do the same there, as the Governors of the Ærarium did at Rome, keeping the Publick Records; so that if any one in the Province happened to be questioned concerning his Liberty (as whether he was not a Slave) thence he might bring proof, as also might any one concerning his Age. About the State of the Dead, whether they were free Persons, he forbade inquiry to be made after five years. No Prince ever shewed more respect to the Senate; when he could he was always present, though he had nothing to report, if he was at Rome; and if he had any thing to Communicate, he came out of Campania when he was there. And in other Affiliations, he would stay till Night, neither did he ever go out of the Senate-House (or Curia) till the Consul said, We shall trouble you no farther Consular Fathers. He made the Senate to Judge of Appeals from the Consuls. He used singular Diligence in Judicial Proceedings, and added Days of Judicature to the former, so as in all he appointed Two hundred and thirty every year for doing Business, and debating Causes. He first made the Priest Tutorum, or him who had the care of Tutors, that they might more easily be obtained; whereas formerly Tutors were wont to be demanded of the Consuls.

60. The Guardians which governed the Persons and Estates of Children under Puberty, the Romans called Tutores; and such as governed the Estates and Persons of those that were Puberes, but under Five and twenty years of Age, they called Curatores. Now as for Curatores, whereas formerly they were not assigned for wantonness or madness, but by the Law called Lex Læstoria decreed that all that were once Adult should receive Curatores without rendering any cause why. This Lex Læstoria being also called Quinquagennaria, because the Legitimate Age of Twenty five by Law was determined, contained, as Jacobus Gothofredus hath observed, certain Heads, whereof this was the first, to provide Curatores for Minors, that were wanton or Spendthrifts, and for those that were Distracted: The second ordained that Minors or those under that Age, should not stipulate, or oblige themselves by making Bargains; whereupon it followed, that a Creditor who trusted one under that Age, should lose his Money, or that wherewith he trusted him. Further, Marcus had a care to lessen the Publick Charges. He set himself against Calumnies, imposing a mark upon false Accusers. As for such Accusations as increased the Revenue, he despised them. For Publick Allowances, he invented many things. He assigned Curatores out of the Senate to many Cities, that thereby he might extend the Senatorial Dignities; For not only Cities, but Regions and High-ways had their Curatores, who took care of them. He provided for the Italian Cities in time of Famine, by Corn given them from Rome; being very careful that Grain should not be wanting. He qualified every way the Shows of the Gladiators, as also the Charges of the Stage-Plays, commanding that the Players should receive but five Aurei, and that no Scribe of them forth should exceed ten. Now for the Shows of the Gladiators, Cæsar observes, that he qualified them three ways, especially, First, by diminishing the Expenses of them. Then by commanding that they should be without Blood, at least when He was there, and without killing, their Swords being blunted, or so ordered that they could not deadly wound, as the Athletæ were wont to fight. And in the third place he took the Gladiators to serve in the Wars, making Soldiers of them; contrary to the old Custom, whom he called Obsequentes, as Capitolinus also observes, which raised a Discourse amongst the People.

Marcus sets himself against Accusations.

Italy had several sorts of Governors.

61. He took special care of the Ways both of the City, and of the Provinces. He provided for Italy by giving it Juridici, according as Hadrian had commanded those of the Degree of Consulares, to administer Justice. Appian writes, That the Consulares continued not long after Hadrian's Death; and indeed the Jurisdiction in the Provinces of Italy was in various Hands, sometimes administered by Consulares, sometimes by Juridici, sometimes by Correctors, and in the time of Constantine and afterwards, by Consulares again, who yet seem not to have been of the same Dignity with those in the time of Hadrian, to whom Capitolinus gives the Appellation of Consulares viri. The Historian farther writes, That Spain being exhausted, he supplied it out of Italy, against the Command of Trajan; but he did it modestly. As to this, we must know that Italy being much unpeopled by the Civil Wars, Augustus replenished it with frequent Colonies, and from him the succeeding Princes took it for a Maxim of State, to be sparing in raising Men out of Italy; which was so constantly observed, that the Italians withdrew their minds from War, and applied them to Arts of Peace and Agriculture, as we shall see more in the second Volume of this Work. The Legions therefore being ever supplied with Soldiers out of the Provinces; and especially out of Spain, later Princes were wont to fill up the Towns that were so exhausted with Italian Colonies, which it seems Trajan forbade; but Marcus thought fit for all that to do it, but with much Modesty and Reverence to his Memory. We are told further by Capitolinus, That Marcus added other Laws concerning the Twentieth part of Inheritances, already, and hereafter to be spoken of; concerning the Tutelage of Liberis; of the Estates of Mothers; of the Successions of Sons for the Mothers part, and that Foreign Senators should possess a fourth part in Italy. As for the Mothers Estate, Marcus introduced new Law, That Children should succeed their Mothers which died Intestate; and this he did by that which sometimes is called the Oratio of D. Marcus, and sometimes the Senatus Consultum Orphitium, because it was made when Orphitus and Rufus were Consuls; as Laws made by Marcus.

Justinian

Julian tells us, in his Institutions, This year, of their Consulship, was the Twentieth from that of the Consulship of Pl. Terentius, in which, was made the Senatusconsultum Tertullianum, whereby the Mother was enabled, to inherit the Estates of her Children, whereas by the Laws of the Twelve Tables, neither of these could be. Now this concerning the Succession of Children, is attributed to Marcus, because the Emperors were wont to send their Epistles or Orations, as they are termed, to the Senate, concerning such or such a matter, which being ready, the Senatusconsultum passed, and thereby it came to pass, that the same things were ascribed both to the Orations and Senatusconsultum. At length the Emperors Valentinian, Theodosius, and Arcadius called the Grandchildren also, to succeed their Grandmothers; yet so as they should receive one third part less, than their Fathers or Mothers should have received, but Julian made them equal in Right who succeeded to one dying Intestate. As for Senators having a fourth part of their Estates in Italy, there was something of it before, as appears from Pliny Junior, who speaks of a third part; that They which stood for Honours might take Rome and Italy for their Country, and not like Strangers to an Inn or Stable.

62. To the Curators of Regions and Ways he gave Power, either to punish, or to send to the Præfett of the City to be punished, such as exacted any thing from any man besides the Peltigalia. He rather restored Old Law, than introduced New. He had his Præfetti with him by the Authority and Precepts of whom he dictated always his Laws. Especially he made Use of Scævola the Lawyer. This was Cervidius Scævola who flourished at this time, and in all his Answers used extraordinary Caution to accommodate Law to the condition and quality of the Fact, and therefore was wont to use this Clause, According as Matters are proposed. Modestinus reckons him amongst the Lawyers of the highest Form. But to return to our Historian, he adds, That Marcus treated the People no otherwise than it was wont to be used in the Commonwealth. He was in all things most Moderate, in deterring men from what was ill, in alluring them to goodness, in rewarding and indulging; and he made good of bad; and of good, exceeding good; and bore with Moderation the Reproaches of some Persons. He was of a compassionate a Nature, that upon occasion of the Fall of a Dancer on the Ropes, he commanded Mattresses to be laid under them when they Danced; whence it came to pass, that in the time of Capitolinus, Nets were wont to be hung under the Ropes, to keep them from falling to the Ground. While the Parthian War was carrying on, another arose with the Marcomanni, which the Officers upon the Borders for some time kept off, till the former could be made an end of. This War of the Marcomanni struck them at Rome with so great terror, that he sent for Priests from every place (by reason of Sacrifices, Cassaubon thinks) of which he procured to great a Number, that he was jerey by the People upon that account; as in case he returned Victor, Oxen would fail and be all destroyed. He filled up strange Rites, he lustrated or purged Rome all manner of (Superstitious) ways; and being kept back from going to the War, he celebrated the Lettisterna, according to the Roman Rite, for seven days. So great a Pestilence happened, that dead Bodies were carried out in common Carriages. Then were the most severe Laws of the Antonini made, of Burying and Sepulchres; for they ordained, That every one that would should not build a Sepulchre, as faith the Historian, is observed at this very day; possibly not with much Cost and Labour. He was so kind, that such as died poor, he commanded to be Buried at the Public Charge.

63. The Marcomanni and Vitorali making great disturbance, both Emperors went out in their Coat-Armour; and time it was; for such Barbarians as were driven out by others, except they were received, made also War. And this their Expedition did not a little Good; for being come as far as Aquileia where they purposed to Winter, most of the Kings retired with their People, and killed the Authors of the Insurrection. And the Quadi having lost their King, said they would not confirm him that was chosen in his room, without the consent of the Emperors. But Lucius went unwillingly in this Expedition, most of the Mutineers sending and begging Pardon for their Defection; and when Furius Virdrinus and Part of the Army was lost, he was of opinion that they should return home. On the other side, Marcus imagining that the Barbarians did but Counterfeit, pretending to fly, that they might decline so great a War as they saw was coming upon them, was for going forward and pushing on the Affair. There fore passing over the Alps they proceeded further, and settled all Matters that tended to the Defence of Italy and Ilyricum. Lucius however urged, that having sent Letters before to the Senate, he might return to Rome, and in the way as he was fitting with his Brother in the Chariot, he died of an Apoplexy. Capitolinus ascribes their Return to the desire Lucius had to be at Rome, it seems to enjoy the Pleasures of the City; but he urged it more after the loss of the Præfettus Prætorio, and part of the Army. But Galen who was sent for to Aquileia, gives another account of their Return, That it was by reason of the Plague mentioned by Capitolinus, which raged exceedingly both in Country and Army. It is written of Lucius, That he had always Learned and Eloquent Men about him, and that he loved his Matters, and was beloved of them. He demeaned himself toward Marcus his Benefactor with indifferent respect till his Expedition into Asia, but living there in a Luxurious manner, after his return he carried himself with no great agreeableness, and gave himself up to all manner of Debaucheries, spending his time in continual feasting, and other sorts of voluptuousness, and ordering himself according to the Government of his debauched and infamous Freedmen. Some suspected he died by Poison; but he lay Speechless three days, and being carried to Altinum died there. Marcus having made him Emperor with equal Power, gave him the Name of Verus, transferring upon him his own; whereas before, he was called Commodus. But Valesius observeth against Joseph Scaliger, that of 14 Annot. Ann. 1-344 these two Brothers who first of all governed the Roman Empire with equal Right, him whom the Latine Writers name Marcus, the Greeks call Verus; and him whom the former call Verus, they ordinarily signify by the Name of Lucius.

64. But of such Sanctity was Marcus the Survivor, that he concealed what he could, and if he could not, excused the Vices of Verus, though they exceedingly displeased him; and being dead, he conferred on him the title of Divus, with the Honours usually given to such, and both honoured and provided for his Relations. Now Capitolinus tells us, That there is no Prince, but is struck at by evil Tongues, inasmuch that it was reported, That Marcus took Verus away either by Poisoning one side of his Knife, and giving him a piece of Meat which touched that side, keeping to himself the other, or by the help of Polydippus his Physician, who let him bleed unseasonably. But Dion Cassius relates, that Verus laid in wait to take away the life of Marcus, and was himself taken off to prevent it: and not only Dion, but Philostratus also hints as much, as is observed by Salmastus, writing that Herodes was also suspected by Marcus, as being of the Conspiracy, and that Marcus made choice of some of his Athenians to bring Complaints to him of his Tyrannical carriage; and therefore Herodes complained that this he had got by having Lucius for his Guest. However, Marcus after the death of Verus, being delivered from the trouble of so unease a Partner, with more freedom and vigour applied himself to the course of Virtue and Philosophy, being of the Stoick Profession, which he so much was Master of, that he never changed his Countenance either for Joy or Sorrow; with great Moderation and Benignity he governed the Provinces. He warred prosperously against the Germans. In particular he himself dispatched the War against the Marcomanni in such a manner as had not been known, both in respect of Valour and Felicity, and at such a time when the Pestilence destroyed many Thousands both of the Provincials and the Soldiers. By this means he delivered the Pannonia from the Marcomanni, Sarmatae, Wandalls and Quadi, and returned to Rome, with his Son Commodus, whom he had made Cæsar, and triumphed with him. Now in reference to this War with the Marcomanni, though Capitolinus relates several things betwixt the Death of Lucius, and it; as if Marcus had dispatched it some large time intervening, Salmastus blameth him for so doing; especially for mentioning that Commodus did partake with his Father in his Triumph, before he speaks of the finishing of this War. For from Galen he observes that Lucius dying, Marcus returned to Rome with his Reliques, which being Buried, and he made a Divus, he presently undertook again the Expedition against the Marcomanni which had been interrupted by his Death. This War was of extraordinary consequence, both in respect of the loss of the Romans, and the great things performed by Marcus; which if they of this time were to be believed, in an Inscription in a Stone erected to his Memory after his victorious return, advanced his glory above all the Performances of the greatest Emperors. But what these Performances were we know not. Ammianus Marcellinus toucheth at them; but the place of his Book is so corrupted, that though Cassaubon and Salmastus both have indicavoured to amend it; yet Valerius complains of their ill Success, and plainly tells us, That as Hippocrates forbids Remedies to be applied to those that are desperately Sick, so he is of opinion, that one ought to abstain from the desperate places of Authors.

65. But this we know from Capitolinus, That having exhausted his Treasury in this War against the Marcomanni, and not being inclined to lay any extraordinary Impositions upon the People, he set to Sale in the Forum of Trajan, abundance of rich Furniture, Clothes, and Vessels of Gold, Silver and other precious Materials which belonged to the Imperial Houses. The Sale continued for two Months, and so much Gold he raised as to dispatch the remainders of the War according to his desire, and afterwards he gave leave to the Buyers, to bring in what they had bought, and to receive their Money again if they pleased; neither did he trouble any that brought the things again, or refused to do it. But as we said, so great a shock he found coming upon him and the Empire, as put him upon very extraordinary Courses, especially a great Pestilence raging at the same time. This made him call Slaves to take Arms as had been practiced in the Punic War, whom he named Voluntarii, after the example of Volones. He armed also the Gladiators, whom as we said, he called Obsequentes. Nay, he made Soldiers of the Robbers of Dalmatia and Dardania. He armed also the Diocmitæ, or those that pursued Robbers, the Romans having such disposed in all quarters where the case required. He purchased the Assistance of Germans against Germans, besides the Legions, which he furnished out with all Diligence. For all Nations from the limit of Illyricum as far as Gall, had conspired, of whom Capitolinus reckons up Fifteen hard Names, besides the Marcomanni, whom Marcus overthrew in the Passage of the Danube, and restored the Plunder they had taken from the Provincia. But so with his great labour he overcame most fierce Nations, the Soldiers imitating him, the Legati and Præfetti Prætorio leading the Army; and the Marcomanni yielded themselves to him, of whom he translated many into Italy. He always was wont with the Senators and Great Men to Consult, not only concerning Military but Civil Affairs, saying, That it was more fit that he should follow the advice of so many and such Friends, than that so many and such should follow his Will and Pleasure. Many Noble Persons were lost in the War, to all whom he Erected Statues in the Forum of Trajan. His Friends often persuaded him to desist from Wars, and return to Rome, but he refused to comply with them, and staid till he had finished all. So that to those that carped at him as by reason of his Philosophy, and being a Scholar, not pliable enough to the labours of War and Government, he might easily answer by letters, or word of mouth, when as by his very Actions they were confuted.

66. Of the Provinces, some he changed from Proconsular to Consular, others if Consular, he made Proconsular or Prætorian according to the Necessity of War. This had been, and continued to be, the Custom of all Princes after Augustus, who taking to himself at the Division, the unquiet Provinces, made some Consular by his Consular Legates sent into them, and gave the quiet to the People, some of which were called Proconsular, because Consuls after the going out of their Offices during the Commonwealth, took the Provinces by lot, and then governed them as Proconsuls. Therefore the Emperors having the Power over the Armies, if Provinces happened to be unquiet, they took them from the People, and from being Proconsular, made them Consular, and in room of them gave them others, which then from Consular were changed to be Proconsular. And though at first, as Salmastus observes, in the Division of the Provinces, there were but two amongst those which fell to the share of the People that were Proconsular, and ten that were Prætorian, into which Prætors were sent, yet afterwards those Prætores and Prætorii were called Proconsuls, and governed them with Proconsular Authority; whereupon it happened, that so frequent mention is made of Proconsuls, who never had been Consuls indeed. Now as the People had for their Governors Proconsuls and Prætors, so the Prince had for his Consulares and Prætors, which were all properly called his Legati, but the Provinces were still styled Consular and Prætorian, and so Capitolinus is to be understood in this place. But Marcus had need to make some Consular and Prætorian, and thereby to take care of them by what the Historian further tells us, that the Moors wasted almost all Spain, though by his Legati he restrained them; and that in Aegypt the Soldiers he calls Milites Bœulici did great mischief, till they were vanquished by Avidius Cassius. There was also disturbance amongst the Segani in Gall, which by seasonable severity and his Authority he repressed. To his Son Commodus, having lent for him to the Limit of Germany, he presented the Toga Virilis, thereupon gave a Conjary to the People, and designed him Consul before the time. If any one was proscribed by the Præfetti of the City, he did not willingly receive him. He was most sparing in giving away publick Money, (to his praise rather than reprehension) but yet he was bountiful to good Men, and to decaying Towns, and even remitted Tributes and Customs, though the Commonwealth stood in need of them.

67. When he was absent from the City, he took especial care that the publick Shows and Diversions should not be prevented but by the richest sort of Men. When he took away the Gladiators to the Wars, there was a Talk went amongst the People, as if he would take away their Recreations, and compell them to apply themselves to Philosophy; for on the Market-Days, he had commanded that Pantomimus should not act till it was late, lest Trade should be hindered. And a report there was, That as in all times there are many who for Gain and Interest apply themselves to such courses as they find Princes to be inclined to, so now there were many that under pretence of being Philosophers, were burthensome to the State, and were troublefome to private Men; possibly by Intruding themselves into their Houses, and requiring Meat and Drink, and other Conveniences, which if they could not obtain, they loaded them with Reproaches, carrying themselves big because of the Pallium they wore, and it might be without the Tunica, as they of the Cynical Seat were wont to go. But Capitolinus saith, That Marcus removed this Inconvenience, which possibly, as to the Commonwealth, might have extended it self to freedom from being Tutors and Guardians, and other Burthens in the State, to which true Philosophers might plead some Title. It was his custom to punish all sorts of Crimes, more mildly than the Laws ordained, though sometimes against Persons notoriously guilty, and of grievous Crimes he was inexorable. The Capital Causes of Men of Reputation he heard himself, and that with all fairness imaginable; inasmuch that he reprehended a Prætor who quickly dispatched Trials, and bad him hear them over again, saying, That the Dignity of the Persons was concerned that they should be heard by him who judged for the People: The Prætors were wont to delegate their Jurisdiction to Decemviri or others, to take Cognizance of the Causes of Men of Note, which Marcus here reforms; truly affirming. That it concerned their Dignity that they should be judged by them who judged for the People. And not by such Delegates. But shewed himself mild and civil towards such Enemies as were taken; and of the subdued Nations, he planted an infinite number in the Roman Soil. To this Capitolinus subjoyns, that he extorted Thunder from Heaven by his Prayers against the Device of his Enemies, obtaining Rain for his Men when they were oppressed with thirst. But we are told by Christian Writers, that this was procured by the Soldiers of the Legion called Melitina, being Christians, who fell upon their knees in presence of their fellow-Soldiers, and in the Name of Christ; so far prevailed with Almighty God, that presently abundance of Rain fell, and the Enemy was defeated by Thunder and Lightning. This Legion was thence called Fulminatrix, or Thundering, and obtained by this an honourable Edit in behalf of the Christian Religion, although the Letters which go under Name of this Emperor in reference to this thing, be either counterfeit or interpolated. But what Capitolinus ascribes to the Prayers of the Emperor, that do Dio and Claudius to the Magi.

68. Marcus intended to have made Marcomannia and Sarmatia both Provinces; but that he was hindered by the Rebellion of Avidius Cassius, who took upon him the Imperial title in the East; for he said at the suggestion of Faustina the Empress, who despaired of her Husband's life, as others believed, because he thought he would perish, or had already, in the Marcomannian War. But Marcus was not much moved with the News of his Revolt; neither did he rage against his Relations; but he was declared an Enemy by the Senate, and his Estate was seized by the Publick Ærarium. Leaving then the pursuit of the War with the Marcomanni, he went against Cassius, and at Rome there were Tumults, out of fear that the Rebels would come thither in his Absence. But Cassius was presently Slain, and his Head brought to the Emperor, who commanded it to be Buried, not rejoicing at his Death. And Marcianus the Son of Cassius, to whose care Alexandria had been committed, was killed by the Army.

But Marcus forbade the Senate to proceed againſt any in Extremity, that were conſiſtent to the Deſection; and he deſired, That in his Reign no Senator might be put to Death, left thereby it ſhould be polluted: Thoſe that were Condemned to Iſlands, or Deportation he commanded alſo to be recalled, only a very few Centurions being put to Death. He pardoned the Cities that had ſided with Caffius; nay, he forgave the Antiochians, who prated much againſt him in Caffius his behalf, from whom he had taken the ſpectacula, publick Meetings, and all ſorts of publick Orations, and againſt whom he had lent a moſt heavy Edit. Though he had refuſed to ſee Antioch when he went into Syria, as he did Cyrrus, the place where Caffius was born; yet having been at Alexandria, he went thither. He tranſacted many things with Kings, and eſtabliſhed Peace, all the Kings and the Ambaſſadors of the Perſian meeting him. He was moſt dear to all the Eaſtern Provinces, with many of which he left footſteps of his Philoſophy, amongſt the Egyptians in particular, he carried himſelf like a Citizen and a Philoſopher in all their Temples and publick Places, and whereaſ they of Alexandria had wiſhed well in ſeveral reſpects to Caffius, yet he pardoned them all, and to ſew that he was reconciled, left one of his Daughters with them. As for his carrying himſelf like a Philoſopher, others write, that when he was there, he propoſed his Queſtions to the Philoſophers, and answered theirs, as it was the cuſtom for Learned Men to meet in publick Places to confer concerning learned Points, and diſcuſs Queſtions. But well might he pardon them for ſiding with Caffius, when he bore a mind full of Clemency even to him and his Relations. He ſuffered him to be killed, that is, did not revenge his Death, but commanded it not. Heliodorus his Son was Banished into an Iſland, and others went away into ſore Banishment with part of their Estates. Other Sons of Caffius received more than one half of their Father's Patrimony, and were aſſiſted with Gold and Silver; moreover, were the Women with Ornaments. Nay, he grieved that Caffius was ſlain, ſaying, That he would have had his Reign paſſed over without the blood of a Senator.

The Clemency of Marcus.

He ſeeth his Wife Fauſtina.

69. In his Winter-Quarters, at the foot of the Mountain Taurus, and a Village called Halala, he left Fauſtina his Wife, who there died ſuddenly; he had her with him in Summer too, and had given her the Title of Mater Caſtro-rum. From Dio it appears, alſo from Coines, that after his Victory over the Quadi, he was himſelf ſaluted the ſeventh time Imperator, and ſhe by this Title of Mater Caſtro-rum; for Livia having that given her of Patris Patrie, afterward this flattery was drawn into Example. And it ſeems Marcus approved it; for Capitolinus tells us further, That having praiſed her, he deſired of the Senate that they would decree her Honours and a Temple, and took it kindly that they made her a Diva; and that he inſtituted a New Company of Girls, called Fauſtiniana, in honour of her. He made the Village where ſhe died, a Colony (called thence Fauſtinopolis) and built her a Temple; and this he did, though he had the fame of an unchaſt Woman, of which he was either ignorant, or diſembled it. Indeed he was accounted unchaſt, and Commodus was thought begotten by ſome other Man than Marcus, to whom Julian his Ape in his Tale of the Ceſar's objects both his reckoning his Wife amongſt the Heroines, and preferring ſo bad a Son; but he makes him excuſe the ſirſt by Cuſtom, and the ſecond both by Cuſtom, and the Natural Affection which Fathers (ſuch it ſeems he thought him, however he did of himſelf) bear to their Sons. He makes him alledge, That he was not the firſt that honoured his Wife. To have begun ſuch a thing would have been unreaſonable, but to deprive ones neareſt Relations of what is uſual, would come neareſt to Injuſtice. But to return to our Story, having ſettled the Affairs of the East, he came to Athens, and there was initiated in the Temple of Ceres, to prove himſelf Innocent, and above entered the Sacrarium. For it was the Cuſtom for the Pagan Priests when they celebrated their Myſteries, to command all that found not themſelves Innocent, even as far as Purpoſes and Intentions, to get them gone. And they were wont it ſeems, as Cæſarion obſerves from Lucian, to drive away three ſorts of Perſons, <sup>to Judgment.</sup> Atheiſts, Chriſtians, and Epicureans.

70. Returning into Italy, he came by Sea to Brundisum in a grievous Tempeſt. There he took the Gown, and commanded his Soldiers to do the ſame; neither ever under him were they ſeen to be without them (or Legati) in Italy. Having Triumphed at Rome, he made his Son Commodus his Colleague in the Tributinal Power, gave a Congiary to the People, and preſented them with Extraordinary

Extraordinary Shows. Many things then in the State he corrected. He moderated the Expence of the Shows or the Gladiators. That Saying of Plato was always in his mouth, That States would flouriſh if either Philoſophers Reigned, or Princes would be Philoſophers. He Married his Son to the Daughter of Brutius Praeſens, Solemnized the Wedding no otherwiſe than as private Perſons were wont to do, but gave a Congiary to the People. Having formerly ſpent three years in the Wars againſt the Marcomanni, he undertook now another Expedition againſt theſe Northern Nations, and in it died at Strimion. At the beginning of his Sickenſs, deſpairing it ſeems of Recovery, he adviſed his Son to ſlay and diſpatch the remainders of the War, which he was unwilling to do, pretending fear of the raging Peſtilence. He obtained from Meat and Drink, deſiring to die, and increaſed his Diſeaſe. On the ſixth day he called his Friends to him, and laughing at the things of this life, and contemning Death, he asked them why they wept for him, and did not rather think of the Peſtilence and Common Death; and when they would be gone, he ſigh'd and ſaid, If you leave me, I bid you farewell, as going before you. The Army hearing he was Sick, grieved exceedingly, for they dearly loved him. On the ſeventh day he grew worſe, and only admitted his Son; whom again he preſently diſmiſſed left he ſhould catch the Diſeaſe. And yet were told that in his Sickenſs he grieved that he ſhould leave ſuch a Son behind him, as ſhould be pernicious to the Empire, and that he wiſhed him dead. It ſeems his Natural Affection prevailed, as Julian makes him ſpeak for himſelf. His Son being gone, he covered his head as going to ſleep, but that Night he died; of the Plague it ſhould appear, by what Capitolinus writes, of ſending away his Son, left he ſhould be infected; yet Dion ſaith, that he died not of that Epidemical Sickenſs. Being asked by his Friends, to whom he would commend his Son, He answered, to them, if he ſhould deſerve it, and to the Immortal Gods.

71. As for his Faults, it was objected againſt him, That he promoted thoſe that abuſed his Bed; namely, Tertullus, Orillius, Orphidius, and Moderatus, to various Honours; and aſor Tertullus, he found him dining with his Wife, which the ſevere gravity of the Court would not permit, and for this Indulgence he was jeered upon the Stage by a Mimick, and various talks being raiſed, the People blamed him for his Eaſineſs. But he dreaded nothing more than to be accounted Covetous, which cauſed him by many Epistles to purge himſelf of this Vice. And yet he needed not have done it, if ſaith and conſiderous Perſons, who think all men as bad as themſelves, or would have them ſo; had conſidered that he did not enrich himſelf by the Eſtates of proſcribed Perſons, as bad Princes were wont to do; yet they took occaſion to rail againſt him, poſſibly from a Law he firſt made, that the Lex Julia Majestatis ſhould extend alſo to dead Perſons. And he was very ſparing in Largeſſes, and giving away the publick Money, which opened the mouths of thoſe that were Indigent. But let what Dio writes be conſidered in his behalf, to ſtop the mouths of debauched Perſons, who think none are virtuous, as impure Men and Women believe none are Chaſt. He tells us (as Xiphilinus hath Epitomized him) that when he was at Athens, he there hired with Annual ſtipends, Profeſſors of all ſorts to read for the benefit of all Nations. Being returned to Rome when he ſpoke to the People, he uſed this Expreſſion, That he had been abſent many years, at which the People cried out Eight, and lift up their Hands to atteſt it, their meaning being that they were to receive ſo many Aurei to Feaſt with. At this he ſmiled, and ſaid alſo Eight, and afterwards gave ſo many to every man, ſo great a Sum as they never had before received. This done, he forgave to all what was due to the Piſcus or Publick Ærarium within Forty and ſix years, the Sixteen of Hadrian excepted, and all Bills and Obligations relating to them, he commanded to be Burnt in the Forum. To many Cities he gave Money, and in particular to Smyrna, which had been diſtreſſed with a great Earthquake, and committed it to the Care of a Perſon of Senatorial Quality, who had been Praetor, to ſee it repaired. Wherefore, ſaith he, I wonder at thoſe who reprehend Marcus, and deny that he was of a generous Mind. For though he was very frugal, yet he was never wanting to lay out Money when it was requiſite, and in Exacting Money, he was never troubleſome to any, and was at vaſt Expence in other things, though not in what related to his own Family.

trary affirms, That he did nothing by design, but from the Prefcript of Virtue, as appeared, in that though he lived Fifty and eight years, ten Months, and two and twenty Days; and was long a Prince with Antoninus his Father, and reigned himself Nineteen Years and eleven Days; yet in all his life he was of an equal and constant tenor; neither ever in any thing was he changed. He was truly a good Man therefore, there being nothing feigned or counterfeit in him. To what Dio writes, we can more easily assent, because in the Book he wrote concerning himself, containing his Philofophical Exercises and Meditations, he presses still this virtue of Truth, Candor, and Sincerity. But there was another thing still laid to his Charge, and that was, That he confirmed the Arrogancy of the Court, by removing his Friends from his common Society, and from his Feasts. Indeed he writes in that Book now mentioned, that amongst other things, he observed in, and learnt from his Father, a Moderate condescending to other mens occasions, as an Lib. 1. c. 13. ordinary man (so Cassian the Son translates that word into English, which Cassian the Father, saith is proper to Marcus) neither absolutely requiring of his Friends that they should wait upon him at ordinary Meals, nor that they should of necessity accompany him in his Journeys. And this is thought by worthy Men to have been only his fault: He did not require Attendance at his private Repasts, both giving ease thereby to himself, and those who were to Eat with him. For Salmafus observes, that besides at Publick Feasts, there were those who were compelled to be present at this Prince his private Meats, because he could not well be without Company. And this Attendance Marcus remitted, as Galen writes of him, that he remitted him his Attendance, and following of him to the German War, which he attributes to his kindness and love to Mankind, agreeable to the other word which the Emperor uses in expressing his Fathers Humanity. As he loved to be true himself, so Capitolinus tells us, That he would not easily believe such as moved him in business, but always was long in searching out the truth. Accordingly he himself tells us, That this also he observed in his Father, an Accurate Examination of things in Consultations, and patient hearing of others: that he would not hastily give over the search of the matter, as one easy to be satisfied with sudden Notions, and Apprehensions. He subjoins his care to preserve his Friends; how neither at any time he would carry himself towards them with disdainful Neglect; and grow weary of them; nor yet at any time be much fond of them.

73. So good an Husband Marcus was, what wife soever Faustina proved; that he being dead, Fabia (the Sister of Verus) endeavour'd to succeed her in his Bed; but Capitolinus tells us at parting, that he took for his Concubine the Daughter of his Wives Procurator, lest he should bring a Mother-in-law upon so many Children. Thus was it usual we see for the Emperors to have Concubines, not only mention being made of this of Marcus, but also of the Concubine of Antoninus Pius. However his Wife Faustina deserved it, yet when he wrote that Golden Book of his Meditations still extant, it appears that he had a good opinion of her, for amongst other things which he ascribes to the Gods, as having received them from them, this is one, That he had such a Wife, so Obedient, so Loving, so ingenuous. These other things were, That he had good Grandfathers and Parents, a good Sister, good Masters, good Domesticks; loving Kinsmen almost all he had, and that he never through haught and rashness transgressed against any of them. That he was not long brought up by the Concubine of his Father, and that he preserved the flower of his Youth. That he took not upon him to be a man before his time, but rather put it off longer than he needed. That he lived under the Government of his Lord and Father, who would take away from him all Pride and Vain-glory, and reduce him to that conceit and opinion, that it was not impossible for a Prince to live in the Court without a Troop of Guards and Followers, extraordinary Apparel; such and such Torches and Statues, and other like particulars of State and Magnificence; but that one might reduce and contract himself almost to the state of a private Man, and yet not become the more base and remiss in publick Matters and Affairs, wherein Power and Authority are requisite. But he had such a Brother, who, by his own Example, might stir him up to think of himself, and by his respect and love, delight and please him. That he had ingenuous Children, not born distorted, nor with any other Natural or Bodily Infirmity. That he was no great Proficient in the Study of Rhetorick and Poetry, nor of other Faculties; which perchance he might have dwelt upon, if he had found himself to proceed in them with Success.

74. More-

74. Moreover, He accounts it a gift of the Gods, that he should have the Gratitude to prefer by times those by whom he was brought up, to such Places and Dignities as they seem'd to him most to desire; and that he did not put them off with Hope and Expectation. That he ever knew Apollonius Rusticus, and Maximus. That he had occasion often and effectually to consider and meditate with himself concerning that life which is according to Nature; what the Nature and manner of it is. That his Body in such a life had been able to hold out so long. That he never had to do with Benedicta and Theodorus, and afterwards when he fell into some fits of Love, was soon cured. That having been often displeased with Rusticus, he never did any thing to him for which afterwards he had reason to repent. That it being so, that his Mother was to die young, yet he lived with him all her later years. That as often as he had occasion to relieve any that were poor or fallen into some present necessity, he never was answered by his Officers, that there was not ready Money enough to do it, and that he himself never had occasion to require the like succour from any others. That he had choice of fit and able Men, to whom he might commit the bringing up of his Children. That by Dreams he had received help, as for other things so in particular, how he might stay his Casting of Blood, and Cure his Dizzines. That when he first applied himself to Philofophy, he did not fall into the hands of some Sophists, nor spent his time either in reading the manifold Volumes of ordinary Philofophers, nor practising himself in the Solution of Arguments and Fallacies, nor dwelt upon the Studies of the Metecors, and other Natural Curiosities. All these things, he saith, without the Assistance of the Gods and Fortune, could not have been. As for the three Persons he mentions here, he tells us also, for what he was beholding to them, all of them having Contributed to the forming of that excellent Virtuoso life, whereby he was so Exemplary; but amongst all the Persons he mentions to have assisted him, he seems chiefly obliged to Rusticus, by whose endeavours amongst other things; He first, he saith, entered into the apprehension that his life wanted some redress of Cure. This was a good step to the Cure, that he was convinced of his Want of it, and necessary to amendment it was, That he should know himself to be out of order.

He was chiefly obliged to Rusticus.

75. As a Direction to arrive at this amendment and recovery, he propounded to himself not to do any even of the least things without Relation unto the end; and the end of reasonable Creatures he affirms to be this, to follow and obey him, who is the Reason, as it were, and the Law of this great City the World: Or as he saith in another place, the Providence of Almighty God is the Law, who over-rules all things in the World, and of his infinite Wisdom disperseth all particular Events, to the general Good; and preservation of the Universe. That he might have no Lets or Rubbs in his way to this Recovery, he had a true Sense and Estimation of Sublunary things, and of Humane Affairs, though not to deride them, as Capitolinus writes. He was convinced of the Vanity of earthly Enjoyments, and thence came to know that the Happiness of a Man must be in something higher than in gratifying the sensual appetite. For he writes, That the time of Man's life is a point: the substance of it ever flowing, the sense obscure, and the whole Composition of the Body tending to Corruption. His Soul is restless, Fortune uncertain, and Fame doubtful; so be brief, as a Current, (or Stream) so are all things belonging to the Body; as a dream or smoke, so are all that (here) belong to the Soul. Our life is a Warfare, and a meer Pilgrimage. Fame after life is no better than Oblivion. What is it then that will adhere and follow? One only thing, Philofophy. And pity it was that he was not acquainted with the true and only Philofophy indeed, or the Christian, which would have afforded him both better directions and Helps for to attain doing of God, and shunning of Evil, and that without Vain-glory, the usual attendant or Shadow of Pagan virtue; as to which, however Marcus, by the goodness of his Temper or his Endeavours, might be affected, one who succeeded him both in the Empire, and in pretence to Philofophy, was guilty of it to a Prodigy.

The fourth Perfection.

76. But, to Lucius, rather than unto him, is to be imputed the fourth Perfection of Christian Religion, which in their time, raged throughout the Provinces. Herein suffered Polyeap, that famous Bishop of Smyrna, as is testified in the Epistle written by his Church to the Brethren in Pontus. He was ordained Bishop by St. John, and other Apostles with whom he conversed, and his Scholar he was St. Tertullian, Irenaeus; and several of the Ancients do testify, and had served Christ eighty six years; for he was elder by much than thus, as the most Reverend Reverend Uiber * hath Evinc'd. He caus'd Meat to be set before those that apprehended him, and with wonderful Alacrity and Resolution underwent his Martyrdom by Fire; on the Seventh of the Calends of April, the Ninth year of this M. Aurelius Antoninus, and the CLXIX. of the ordinary Era of Christ, the same wherein Lucius died, as some Inscriptions of Gruterus do testify. Now suffered also Justin Martyr, after he had published his second Apology for Christians, through the Malice of Crescent the Cynick (whom railing against Christianity, he had taxed for his filthy kind of life) as he even foretelleth in his Apology. The Churches of Lugdunum and Vienna in Gall, were especially exercised in this fiery Trial, as it is to be seen in the History of Eusebius. Marcus doth insinuate nothing more in that Book of his new mentioned, than being sociable and useful in this World, which he calls a great City, and in contriving how to contribute to the Good of the Whole, which he makes the duty and end of every particular Member. Now the Whole consists of Parts, an Universal of Individuals; and as to suppose an Universal without Individuals is a conceit, and an act of the Imagination, so to contrive the Good of the Whole, without that of its several Parts is meer fancy; a less considerable part indeed is often in Policy cut off to preserve the Whole; but the Body of Christians was not in those days inconsiderable, which filled the Court, the City, and all the Provinces, so that a Resolution would have been made to root it out (if it had been possible) and the greatest Persecutors finding still more and more to prevent themselves to Tortures, were constrained to give over, without hope of Success.

77. But however, as we said, Marcus insinuates in his Book upon nothing more than that the World is one Society, Commonwealth, and City, and that it's the Duty of every man to regard the Good of the Whole and to be sociable. Now Aurelius Victor writes, That in his time the Freedom of Rome was promiscuously given to all, or that all the Subjects of the Empire were made free Roman Citizens. Others write, That this was done by an Ordinance of Pius, and some ascribe it to Hadrian; but though I put no stress upon it as an Argument, yet it something moves me to be of Opinion, That He might be the Author of this Indulgence, in that these sociable Thoughts so much possessed him; for it's known sufficiently that he squared his Life, and even his Actions relating to Government, by Rules and Principles of Philosophy; affirming, That then States or Cities (Civitates the Historian hath it, as he termed the World, and esteemed the Empire) would flourish, if Philosophers reigned, or Emperors turned Philosophers. Now for better understanding what this freedom of this City anciently was, we are to know, That it was wont to be given either with privilege of Suffrage or without. The first that had it without Suffrage, were the Cærites. We understand, saith Gellius, that the Cærites were first made Municipes without the Right of Suffrage: and that it was granted to them, that they should receive the honour of the Roman City, but be freed from business, and burthens, for that they received, and kept the Sacra (or Idols) in the Gallick war. Paterculus also telleth us, that in the Consulship of Sp. Posthumius and Veturius Calvinus, Campanis data est civitas partique Samnitum sine suffragio, and in the same place, M. Curi & Rufus Cornelio Cōs. Sabinis sine suffragio data civitas. What Municipium was, and who Municipes, is worthy of consideration. In the time of Gellius it appears from him that those words were much in Use, but nothing understood. For such as were of Colonies would call both themselves and their Countreymen Municipes, which, saith he, is far distant from reason and truth. Even so what Municipia are, and how much they differ from a Colony, we are ignorant, and we think that Colonies are in a better condition than they.

78. Of this opinion so full of error Hadrian the Emperor learnedly discomfited in his Oration, which he made in the Senate concerning the Italicens, or Inhabitants of Italic in Spain, (as they were called) from whom he himself descended. He wondered that the Italicens and other ancient Municipia (amongst whom he named them of Utica) when they might live according to their own Customs and Laws, were tickled with a desire to be changed into the condition of Colonies. He said that the Præcines earnestly desired of Tiberius to be altered from the state of a Colony to that of a Municipium, and that the Emperor granted it, in consideration that under the Walls of their Town he had recovered from a deadly Disease. Municipes therefore (so Gellius concludeth) are Roman Citizens of the Municipia, using their own freedom and Laws, only partakers of honourable employment (Muneris honorarii) with the Roman people, from undertaking which employment employment (a quo munere capessendo) they seem to be named, being bound by no other necessities, nor by any Law of the Roman People, for as much as their Land never belonged to it. Then proceedeth he to distinguish in the matter of the Cærites, betwixt such Municipes as had Right of suffrage, and not, for if there had been no such distinction he would never have said, The first Municipes we understand to have been made without Right of suffrage were Cærites. For a more clear discovery of the relations of other places unto Rome, we shall observe this four-fold distinction of privileges. There was 1 Jus Civitatis, 2 Jus Municipii, 3 Jus Colonie, 4 Jus Latii. Jus Civitatis was freedom of the City, and we find in Paterculus that it was eum suffragio & sine suffragio. Jus Municipii we find in Gellius to have also been freedom of the City for Municipes were also called Civitates Romanæ, and were named Municipes, a muneribus capiendis, or capessendis; there was also, as appeareth from Gellius, Jus Municipii cum & sine suffragio; Jus Civitatis therefore & Jus Municipii seem to have differed little; the former was larger, respecting single persons sometimes absolutely considered without relation to any place that was related to Rome as a Municipium. For single persons (Ambassadors or others) have had the freedom of the City bestowed on them primarily without respect to any place at all, who perhaps could not be called Municipes, because such seem to have been proper, and only Freeman of Municipia, and not otherwise than mediately to have been free of Rome. The power or Right of suffrage will not suffer us to imagine that, because Gellius calleth the employment of the Municipes, munus honorarium, therefore it was but titular. For by the Right of suffrage they had power to assemble in the Comitia, and Vote in their Tribes, Centuries, and Curia, as the occasion required: and hence doubtless were capable of honourable Offices. And the word it self, though sometimes it may be expounded Titular, as the Consuls, & Complutenses time (or rather Consulares, as they are called in Caesiodorus, and their Office Consularitas) are termed Consules Honorarii, being but Titular Consuls; yet it also respecteth authority and power as well as meer Title, in that the Law of the Prætor (whereof we have formerly spoken) is called Jus Honorarium.

79. As for the Jus Colonie, it is so termed by Tacitus also in those words: Atin Italia veteris oppidum Puteoli Jus Colonie & Cognomentum a Nerone adipiscuntur. Gellius distinguisheth it from the Jus Municipii, after this manner. But of Colonies there is another relation or alliance (necessitudo.) For they do come extrinsically into the City, neither do they stand on their own roots; but are as it were begotten by the State, and have Laws and Institutions, not of their own, but those of the Roman people. Yet this condition, although it be more obnoxious and less free, is accounted better and more excellent, for the amplitude and Majesty of the Roman people; whereof these Colonies seem to be certain Images and resemblances: and also because the Rights of the Municipia are obscure and oblituated, which by reason of ignorance the owners cannot use. From this it appears, That Colonies were free of the City, in which respect Paterculus, giving us account of the several Colonies that were planted till the time of Marius, mixeth with them such places as to which freedom was given, making it as it were the same thing. If it had been otherwise, there would not have been any comparison as to privilege betwixt Municipia and Colonies; and it would have saved Gellius the labour of proving, against the common belief, that the Jus Municipii was greater. Now as for the Jus Latii, Suetonius distinguisheth it from Jus Civitatis, for speaking what Augustus did to several Cities, he hath this expression amongst the rest: Latinitate vel civitate donavit. Spartianus in the life of Hadrian saith, Latium multis civitatibus dedit. And Tacitus (coming up to our Term) saith of Nero: Eodem anno Cæsar nationes Alpium marimarum in Jus Latii transtulit. Latines were ever counted of the kindred of Rome, the Romans having defended from them; and upon this account there was a stricter League and Alliance with them, than any other people, which enjoyed not the freedom of the City.

80. The Latines envying the rising fortune of Rome their Colony; laboured to suppress it, but still were worsted; and ever forced to submit. Servius Tullius the sixth King of Rome breathing after glory in future times, in imitation of the Council of the Amphytriones in Greece, and other publick conventions (as we have formerly said) periwaded both Nations to build at Rome a Temple or Astylum out of the common expence, where the Cities meeting yearly, should sacrifice, hold a fair at certain times, and if any contention hapned amongst them, might might be composed in a religious manner by their fellow Cities. Gathering Money he built the Temple of Diana in the Aventine Mount (the most eminent in the City) and wrote down the conditions of the League, with the manner of observing the Feast and Mart. And that they might not be abolished by the injury of Time, he engraved the Decrees of the Council in a Pillar of Brass; and the Cities which were partakers of this Society, which Pillar continueth till our Age, saith Dionysius, dedicated in the Temple of Diana, inscribed with such Characters as Greece anciently used, which is no light Argument that Rome was not built by Barbarians. Tarquinius the last King, and Successor of Servius, renewed this League, and taking in the Hernici and Volsci, appointed another place in the midst of all those Nations, viz. a Mount near to the Albanians, called also Mons Albanus, where yearly Ferie (or a Festival) were to be celebrated; and for that time, in respect of the Religion of the place, and the Law made for that purpose, they were all to abstain from all manner of violence, and, in common, sacrifice to Jupiter Latialis, and Feast together; it being appointed how much each people should contribute and receive. Of these Ferie, and this Sacrifice were partakers forty seven people; and in our age, saith the Historian, the Romans observe these Ferie (called Ferie Latinae) and some contribute Lambs, some Cheefe, some a certain quantity of Milk, and others Cakes or Wafers made up with Milk. The Sacrifice is one Bull for all, of whose inward a certain portion is given to every people. They sacrifice for all in general, and the Romans preside at the Sacrifice. Those Ferie at first consisted but of one day, which Tarquinius appointed. After his Banishment the people added another. And about six years after, when Peace was composed betwixt Patricians and Plebeians, after the Creation of the tribuni Plebis, and Ediles, a third was added; at what time the League was renewed with the Latines, because that after the Peace made with them at the end of the War with Tarquinius (whose part they took) they had continued peaceable and faithful to the Romans during their confusions and seditions.

The Contents of the League.

81. * Dionysius mentioning the Renewing of this League, giveth us the substance of it, by which description our design is accomplished as to the Jus Latii. These things were contained in the League; Let there be mutual Peace betwixt the Romans and Latines, as long as the Heavens and Earth keep the same Station: and let neither make War upon the other, nor procure others to do it, nor give free passage to such as would, but to the utmost help each other infested by War, and equally divide the Prey and Spoils. Concerning private Contracts, let the controversy be judiciously decided in the Forum of that People where the Contract was made. Let nothing be added to the conditions of the League, nor taken away, without the consent of the Romans, and all the Latine People. To this purpose a League was established betwixt the parties, and sworn to by all sacred things. This near confederacy is to be taken as explanatory of the Jus Latii, including such a strong Alliance as was not made with any, but afterwards according to this Prescript. In process of time the Latines came to have the freedom of the City. When this freedom was given to them, is something obscure. Dionysius so relateth the Story of Cassius (in whose second Consulship, according to him, this League was renewed) as if at the same time was given to them the freedom of the City; for Cassius, to curry favour with the Hernici, gave them the same league, and when he would have in his third Consulship the Agrarian law to pass, he caused the Latines and Hernici to be present at the Comitia, to carry it by the greater Number of voices. But if any such thing were, it was done rather by his over-forwardness to gratify them, and without the consent of the State, as those Privileges were which he bestowed upon the Hernici. However, it appeareth that they had not the freedom till this time; for Cassius in his flattering speech to the multitude, concerning the excellent acts performed by them in his three Consulships, saith, That in his third the sedition being appeased, the Commons were reduced home: the Latines Kinmen of the Romans, but emulators for Glory and Empire, were received into friendship, and into the City, that afterwards they might esteem Rome as their Country, and not as an Adversary. Though formerly there was a League with them, yet it seemeth they were not received into the City till now, and that rather by Cassius his flattery, so that neither they nor the Hernici retained this privilege, and we do not find that they were admitted into any Tribe, or gave thenceforth their suffrages in the Comitia. This confirmeth what we say, That * Florus declareth the cause of their their Revolt afterwards, to have been an emulation for Empire and Magistrates, and that contemning the Romans after the burning of the City, they required Jus civitatis amongst other things.

82. This they did not now obtain, being subdued and reduced by War to obedience, and punished several ways. However the ancient League seemeth to have been renewed; at least with most of them; who were still called Socii Latini. Often the Jus Civitatis was promised them, but still deferred and put off by the Fathers, who alone knew the Secret of Empire, till at length they broke out into the Social War, and yet then were they subdued again, and brought under by force, and then was given to them conquered, what they could not obtain by strong hand. After this, the hedge being broken down from about the Roman State, and through the variety of the interests of Roman Citizens parties and factions arising, Freedom came to be given to other places, one after another, though when, to whom, and by whom, we now must not inquire. Augustus was very sparing in the grant thereof; but succeeding Princes spread this privilege far and wide, till at length Antoninus Philofophus communicated it to the whole body of the Empire, it being now nothing material, seeing that the multitude met not together in the Comitia, to give their suffrages, which had by variety of Interests, humours and inclinations confounded all things. But to return to our Matter. Marcus Aurelius Antoninus Philofophus died when he had reigned Nineteen years, on the Seventeenth of March, in the Fifty eighth year of his Age, the Nine hundred thirty third of the City. A. D. CLXXX, Arrius Prætorius the second time, and Zelus Gordianus being Consuls.

Commodus his Son (for whose sake Dio maketh the Physicians to have killed him) succeeded him, having two years before been made a Consul, through a Dispensation with the Lex Annalis, as Lampridius writeth; although it seemeth something strange, that this Law could take place upon those, to whom the title of Augustus was not denied. Being owned by the Army, for some time he governed according to the direction of his Father's friends; but being obnoxious to flatterers by reason of his youth, who sought to make their own ends out of him, he shortly after, contrary to the judgment of his best Counsellors, made a dishonourable Peace with the Enemy, and away he went to enjoy the pleasures of Rome, where he was joyfully received for his Father's sake; his Beauty also much commending him to the eye. For a time he here also harkened to his Father's friends, but making one Perennius an old Soldier Captain of his Guards, he being excessively covetous, allured him at first by pleasures to idleness and neglect of business, then governing all himself, he falsely accused them and others of the richer sort, that he might seize on their Estates. This his design was furthered by Lucilla the Emperor's Sister, who grudging that Crispina, Commodus his wife, should take place of her, entered into a Conspiracy against her Brother, and engaged one Quadratus a young Noble man therein, who perswaded Quintianus to kill Commodus. But he meeting him, had no power to do the deed, only shewing the Dagger, said, The Senate sends thee this, and so was apprehended and put to Death with his Complices. These words concerning the Senate thus foolishly spoken, never went out of the Emperor's mind, but made him suspect all the Fathers; which advantage Perennius took, and perswaded him to kill all the chiefest of them. This being performed, this man affected the Sovereignty, but was in good time discovered, both he and his Sons, whom he had sent into Ibrycum to draw the Legions to revolt, and received their reward.

His dissimulation.

84. Commodus, to prevent the too great power of one man, put two into his place, Cleander and Niger, for the time to come; and yet presently after had more Plots laid for his life. There was one Materanus, who practising the Trade of Robbery, got a great company of Highway-men together, and making himself Captain of a considerable Army, wasted Gall and Spain, and thence repelled, resolved to venture for the Sovereignty to itself. Having but little hope to obtain it by force, because of the People, and the Prætorian Bands, he betook him to his wits. At that time the Annual solemnity was kept in honour of the Mother of their gods, wherein it was lawful for Soldiers or any other to imitate Magistrates or their Officers. Taking this opportunity, he sent some of his Soldiers privily armed to get amongst the Sergeants and Officers of the Emperor, and so to kill him; but being betrayed by his own Party, he and his Plot both miscarried. After this succeeded a terrible Pestilence, accompanied with a Famine, which Cleander a Phrygian, one who from a Slave came into greatest Power,

made an occasion to advance himself. He bought up all the Corn, thinking by a largess thereof to purchase the Empire of the Soldiers and People, but these rising against him, as the cause of the Dearth and Plague too, after that with great difficulty, by reason of his Power, the Matter was revealed to Commodus, he also received his reward. These things caused the Emperor to be jealous of all men, to cast off all care of State-affairs, and giving ear to every back-biter, to kill any. Hence also no persons of worth being admitted into his presence, he was ruled by dissolute Companions, and fell more and more into disorder.

85. He turned Chariot-driver, and spent his time in killing Beasts with darts, and other unworthy exercises. He was the best marks-man that ever was known, scarcely ever missing any mark he aimed at. He publicly killed multitudes of wild beasts upon the Theatre, amongst the rest a Panther, which just being about to devour a man, he hit and slew in the nick of time, as she was about to seize on him. In stead of Commodus the Son of Marcus, he commanded himself to be called Hercules the Son of Jupiter. Casting off the usual Robe of Princes, in compliance with that name, he would lye on a Lions Skin, and have a Club in his hand; yet he would wear Purple Garments and Cloth of Gold. To his former title he added Amazonian, and Conqueror; Rome he styled Immortal and Fortunate, and the World His Colony. A great fire happened in the City, which burned that excellent Library gathered by his Predecessors, with the Temple of Peace, and other Buildings, which accident as the People accounted an ill Omen, so they laid the guilt upon him, knowing well his Practices, which he never strove to conceal. Though his throwing of Darts upon the Theatre much derogated from the Imperial Majesty, they were indifferently pleased with it; but when he came Naked upon the Stage and acted the Common Fencer, it seemed intolerable. At length at the Feast of Janus resolving not to proceed from his Palace as Emperor, but as Fencer from the Fencing-School, attended with such like to the view of the People, this occasioned his end.

86. For, this his resolution being known to his Friends, Martia his beloved Concubine, Lætus his General, and Eleutius his Chamberlain, laboured with all intricacies to divert him from so shameful a thing. He herewith extremely displeased, betook himself to his Chamber, where in a roll he wrote down the Names of such as he would have killed, and amongst them those three in that order we mention them had the first place; then followed a great number of Senators, the Goods of whom he intended to distribute amongst the Fencers and Soldiers, to purchase mirth and jollity from them, and defence from these. This writing he laid upon his Bed, where he did not suspect that any would come at it. But a little Boy with whom he was wont to play, coming thither, took it up, and went out with it in his hand, whom Martia meeting, and taking up in her arms, fearing it might be something of consequence, read it, and thereby discovered the matter, which the presently imparted to the other two. They all concluding that haste was to be made, Martia gave him Poison, and when that succeeded not, they hired one Narcissus to strangle him. So Commodus died, who by his Lieutenants overthrew the Moors and Dacians, and bridled Pannonia, Germany, and Britain, which would have thrown off the yoke. He died on the last day of the Julian year; the Thirty second of his Age, when he had Reigned almost Thirteen years. A. V. C. 945. A. D. 192, he himself the seventh, and Helvius Pertinax the third time being Consuls.

87. The Conspirators did not make known his death, till they had made means for a Successor; and then gave out that he died of an Apoplexy, which was easily believed, because of his voluptuous life. He upon whom they pitched was Helvius Pertinax, an old Soldier, who had done good Service in Britain, where he was near killing by his Soldiers, but severely corrected their insolence. He had been thrice Consul, yet being thus delivered from the danger he was in by Commodus, considering the meanness of his Birth, he would have declined the burthen, but it was put upon him by the Senate, and the Army acknowledged him. He gave great hopes of an excellent Prince, behaving himself modestly and suitably towards all men. He restrained Promoters, took away divers Tolls and Gabels lately imposed, and refrained the Rapines and Insolence of the Soldiers. This troubled the Guards exceedingly, who being so much the more sensible of the change brought upon them by strict discipline, as they remembered the liberty given them by Commodus, resolved to make trial of another, and an end of Pertinax.

Pertinax. In the strength of this resolution they set upon and killed him, though he had, like so excellent a Person, gravely and stoutly admonished them of their Duty. He died in the Eighty fifth day of his Reign; and the Sixty ninth year of his Age. Q. Sosius Falco, and C. Julius Erucius Clarus being Consuls.

Bishops.

88. Now, that we may briefly carry on the series of Ecclesiastical matters, where we left them. In the second year of M. Aurelius Philoſophus died Anicetus the Bishop of Rome, and Soter being the 13th of this See succeeded him, according to Damasus. In his 1st year Soter died, & was succeeded by Eleutherius. In the 6th of Commodus died Eleutherius, on the Seventh before the Calends of June, Maternus and Bradus being Consuls, in which year Commodus and Cleander to overturn the Power of the Consuls created Twenty five Consuls, for which Cleander was afterwards punished, being carried to Rome amongst the worst sort of Slaves. In the following year Eleutherius was succeeded by Victor an African, Commodus the fifth time, and Glabrio being Consuls. Touching the purity of the Church of Rome at this time Eusebius thus wrote. (a) When I came to Rome I stayed there till Anicetus was Bishop, whose Deacon was Eleutherius, whom Soter succeeded, and after him Eleutherius. In all their successions, and in every one of their Cities it's no otherwise than the Law and the Prophets, and the Lord himself preached. Irenæus also wrote: Now (b) Eleutherius was the Twelfth Bishop from the Apostles, after the same order, the same Doctrine and Tradition of the Apostles truly taught in the Church, at this day continued in our time. From Marcus the first Bishop of Jerusalem from amongst the Gentiles, some reckon Thirteen Bishops unto Narcissus, of whom are many things reported. He (c) was accused of an heinous crime, and although (d) he was innocent, yet left he his Church, and fled into the Wilderness, where he continued a long time. In the mean while his Accusers were wonderfully plagued from above, to the example of all perjured persons. After his departure Dios was Bishop unto the Reign of Severus, as is gathered from Epiphanius. After Cornelius was (d) Theophilus Bishop of Antioch, he wrote of Elemental Infitutions, and dedicated them to Autolytus. Also against the Heresie of Hermogenes and Marcion. After him followed Maximinus, and then (e) Serapion. After Celadion in the Church of Alexandria, (f) Agrippas was Bishop about the Eighth year of Marcus, and governed Twelve years. Him succeeded (g) Julianus in the first of Commodus, and governed Ten years. Then followed (h) Demetrius; who continued Forty three years.

Councils.

89. During the Reign of Commodus were several Synodes or Councils held against the Heresie of Montanus, and about the Celebration of Easter. Because before this time Councils were but few, we would not give any account of them in a scattered manner; but now shall briefly recite from the first of all such as happened until the end of Commodus. The (a) Apostles immediately after the Ascension of our Saviour returned from Mount Oliver to Jerusalem, and there assembled together for the election of one to succeed in the room of Judas the Traitor, where they chose Matthias. This is the first Council. The (b) second was summoned of the Apostles and Disciples at Jerusalem, about removing the Tumult risen twixt the Græcians and Hebrews about their Widows, wherein they chose seven Deacons, as they are called by Ecclesiastical Writers. The (c) third was held by the Apostles, Elders, and Brethren at Jerusalem, concerning Circumcision and Observation of the Law, where it was resolved, That the faithful should abstain from blood, from that which is strangled, and from fornication, the which they published by their Letters unto the Churches of Antioch, Syria, and Cilicia. The fourth was held by James Bishop of Jerusalem, Paul, and the Elders at that City also, where for removing of Suspition, and winning of the Brethren, it was decreed, that Paul should clear and purify himself according to the Law, yielding for some time to the Ceremonies of it. After the death of James, the Apostles from every quarter (d) gathered themselves together at Jerusalem for the Election of a Bishop, and chose Simon Cleopas. In an assembly of the Apostles, certain Canons were agreed on, and published by Clement, as 'tis said. But (f) those that now go for them, are corrupt, the corruption of the Apostolical constitutions, and of Ignatius his Epistles having proceeded from the same hand, as Reverend Usher sheweth in his Dissertation concerning the said Epistles, who as to this matter is therein most worthy to be consulted. About the time of Nervus the Emperor were two (g) Synods summoned in Africa, for Reformation of the Churches, and Consecration of Bishops, where St. John the Apostle, being sent for, was present. About the beginning of Marcus Antoninus, was a Synod at (h) Ancyra in Galatia, where the figments of Montanus were confuted by Apollinarius. And there were held in Asia sundry Synods in which Montanus was excommunicated, and his Heresie condemned. The brethren in (i) France also assembled together, and censured the opinions of Montanus, writing to Eleutherius Bishop of Rome, that he would maintain the Peace of the Church there against such Hereticks (i) Serapion also Bishop of Antioch held a Synod there about the middle of Commodus his Reign, where together with many other Bishops he condemned the Montanists, or their Heresie called the Phrygian Heresie, because Montanus was of that Countrey. Not long after was held a Council at (i) Rome by Victor the Bishop, about the Celebration of Easter (i) Item L. 5. in Palestine also, in Pontus and Gall were Synods called about the same matter.

90. This controversie about Easter, is mentioned by Eusebius not till the last year of the 243 Olympiad, which fell in with the fourth of Severus; but Cappellus thinketh it first arose in the first of the 242 Olympiad, and the tenth of Commodus, wherein this Feast was Celebrated by the Jews, and the Churches of Asia Minor, at a wrong time, as Theophilus Bishop of Caesarea thought, viz. by the Jews on the fifteenth of Nisan, March 20. but by the Christians of Asia on the fourteenth of Nisan, March 19. on the fourth Feria, three days before the Vernal Equinox. Theophilus supposing that the Equinox happened on March the 25. and that so it ever did; and for this cause that the Sun was on that day created, and that Christ arose again the same day, as also that the Lord's Supper was instituted on the 22. of March, contended that it was utterly against reason to prevent the Epoehe of the Equinox so many days, and the day whereon the Lord's Supper was instituted. Wherefore he procured the Fathers of Palestine assembled in a Synod, to make these Canons: 1. That never, except after March 21. 2. That never but after the fourteenth Moon. 3. That never after April 24. 4. That never except on the Lord's Day, Easter should be celebrated; on that day which next followed the fourteenth Moon hapning next after March 21. Hereby he hoped it would come to pass, that Easter would ever be observed within the Month of Aries. In the Synode of Palestine where these Canons were made, the forefaid Theophilus Bishop of Caesarea, and Narcissus of Jerusalem presided. Of that at Rome, Victor the Bishop was President. In that of Pontus, Palmas, as the most ancient, did govern. In that of the Bishops of Gall, Irenaeus presided. There was another of the Bishops throughout Ofrœna, and the Cities therein contained; and especially held by Baucillus Bishop of Corinth, with many others; all which, saith Eusebius, with one and the same Sentence and Judgment ordained the same Decree. With those also consented Cassius Bishop of Tyre, and Clarus Bishop of Ptolemais. They affirmed that it was the Apostolick tradition and custom as yet retained, that the fasting days should be broken up on no other day than that wherein our Saviour arose from the dead. And the Church of Alexandria celebrated Easter on the self-same day with them.

91. But all the Churches throughout Asia, as of an ancient Tradition thought good to observe the high-feast of Easter in the fourteenth Moon, on which day the Jews were commanded to offer their Paschal Lamb. As much as to say, That upon what day soever in the week that Moon fell, the fasting days were finished and ended. Polycrates of Ephesus, chief of these Bishops, in his Epistle to the Church of Rome, sheweth the custom of Asia observed unto his time, in these words: We observe the unviolated day of Easter, neither adding any thing thereto, neither taking any thing from it. For notable pillars of Christian Religion have rested in Asia, which shall arise at the last day when the Lord shall come home from Heaven with glory, and restore all the Saints to joy. Philip, one of the twelve Apostles now lying at Hierapolis, and his two daughters, who kept themselves Virgins all the days of their lives, the third also after the end of her holy conversation rested at Ephesus. John also, who lay on the Lord's breast, and wore the Priestly Attire, both a Martyr and a Doctor slept at Ephesus. Moreover, Polycarpus Bishop of Smyrna, and a Martyr. Thrafeas an Eumenian, both a Bishop and a Martyr slept at Smyrna. What shall I speak of Sagaris, both a Bishop and a Martyr lying at Laodicea? Also of blessed Papius and Melito an Eunuch, who was led and guided in all things he did by the holy Ghost, and now resteth at Sardis, waiting the message from Heaven when he shall arise from the dead. All these celebrated the Feast of Easter, according to the Gospel, in the fourteenth Moon, swearing no where, but observing the rule of faith. To be short, and I Polycrates the meanest of you all do retain the tradition of my forefathers, of which also I have imitated some. For there were seven Bishops before me, and I am the Eighth which always have celebrated the Feast of Easter on that day day in which the people remove the leaven from amongst them. I therefore (my brethren) who now have lived sixty five years in the Lord, have conferred with the brethren throughout the World, and have read, and over-read the holy Scriptures, yet will not be moved at all with those things which are made to terrify us. For my Ancestors and Elders have said, That we ought rather to obey God than men. Afterwards he speaketh of the Bishops that consented, and subscribed to his Epistle, after this manner: I could repeat the Bishops that were present, whom you requested me to assemble, whom also I have assembled together, whose names if I should write would grow unto a great number; they have visited me a simple Soul, and a man of small account, and have consented to this Letter. They also know that I bear not these gray hairs in vain, but always have had my conversation in Christ Jesus.

Victor Bishop of Rome sharply reprehended Id.

92. Immediately upon this, Victor Bishop of Rome went about to sever from the unity in the Communion all the Churches of Asia, together with the adjoining Congregations, as favoring not aright, and inveighed against them in his Epistles, and pronounced flatly all the Brethren there for excommunicated Persons. But this not pleasing all the Bishops, they exhorted him to seek after those things which concerned Peace, Unity, and Love between Brethren. Their words are at this day extant (saith Eusebius) that sharply reprehended Victor. Of which number Irenaeus in the name of all the Brethren in Gall that were under his charge, wrote, and allowed the same Sentence, viz. The Mystery of the resurrection of our Saviour to be celebrated on the Sunday only. Yet as it was very meet he put him in mind at large of his Duty, that he should not estrange, or cut off all the Churches of God, which retained the Tradition of old Custom. He told him, That there was not only a controverfie about the day, but also the kind or manner of fasting, that this variety began long before their time; yet for all this they were at Unity one with another, for this variety of fasting, saith he, commendeth the unity of Faith. He told him, That his Predecessors in the See of Rome, Anicetus, Dius, Hyginus, Telephorus, and Xistus, neither did so observe it themselves, neither left any such Commandment unto Posterity, and yet they were at unity with them which referred to them from other Churches, and did observe the same. Polycarpus being at Rome in the time of Anicetus, they varied between themselves about trifling matters, yet were they from reconciled, and not a word of this matter. Neither was Anicetus able to persuade Polycarpus that he should not retain that which he had always observed with John the Disciple of our Lord, and the rest of the Apostles with whom he had been conversant: neither did Polycarpus persuade Anicetus to observe it, but told him he ought to keep the Ancient Custom of the Elders whom he succeeded. These things being at this point, they communicated one with another. And in the Church Anicetus granted the Eucharist unto Polycarpus (or as Rufinus understandeth it, granted the Ministrant of the Communion to him) for the reverence he owed him, and in the end they parted in peace; and all such as retained contrary observations throughout the whole universal Church held fast the bond of Love and Unity. Thus Irenaeus, not degenerating from the Etymology of his name, and passing all others in the gift of reconciling the Brethren, practised for Ecclesiastical Peace. He wrote not only to Victor, but also to sundry Governors of divers other Churches, in several Epistles concerning the said Controversie.

93. Thus do we see the first controverfies about this Feast of Easter. Although the Hypotheses of Theophilus concerning the Aquinodial will not abide tryal, yet doubtless, those had more reason on their side, who intending to celebrate the Resurrection of Christ, refused to do it, but on that day he rose from the dead; the other practice seeming to have risen from a Custom of keeping the Passover at that time, by such as were originally of the Jewish Nation. Notwithstanding they differed about time and manner, yet before the Government of Victor, we see they agreed in Brotherly love. And it appeareth that the Custom of observing this Feast, was most ancient, even in the Apostles days, as appeareth from what is said by Polycrates, and by Irenaeus, in behalf of Polycarpus. Though they differed in the manner about keeping it, yet we do not find that any denied it was to be kept at all, although they were also for the true and spiritual observation of it, and against Abuses, as good Christians have reason to be. But (that we may conclude this Controversie) in process of Time, both they of Asia, and others, leaving their own Customs, admitted of the Paschal Canons; made by the Orientals, especially by those of Palestine and Alexandria. At length few Differen-ters remaining, a necessity of Obedience was imposed by Constantine, who herein followed the judgment of two Synods, viz. that of Arletum or Arlet, A.D. 314, and the other of Nice, A.D. 325. But (that we may note thus much by way of Anticipation) The ancient British Church, as it seemeth submitted, not to those Decrees, observing Easter from the fourteenth to the twentieth Moon, which computation, faith <sup>(a)</sup> Beda, is contained within the Circle of Eighty four years. And for this, when they would not comply with Augustine the Monk (who had been sent from Gregory the Great Bishop of Rome to convert the Saxons, and was made by him the first Arch-Bishop of Canterbury) who fought to draw them to Uniformity, twelve hundred Monks of Bangor were put to the Sword (whether through procurement of Augustine or no, I shall not now determine) by King Ethelfrid, A.D. 603, the Scots also then inhabiting Ireland observed Easter at the same time as the Britans did, to whom therefore Laurentius the Successor of Augustine in the See of Canterbury wrote, to drive them from their singularities. But how much he hereby profited, the present times do yet declare, faith <sup>(b)</sup> Beda, who lived A.D. 700.

When Britain received the Christian Faith.

94. And being thus occasionally brought to Britain, we must observe in behalf of our Native Country, that the thick mists of Superstition being scattered, in the Reign of Commodus (not under M. Aurelius and L. Verus, as Beda writeth) when Eleutherus was Bishop of Rome, the heavenly light and brightness of Christianity, by the means of King Lucius, shone upon this Island. This Prince admiring the holy life of Christians, made Petition unto Eleutherus by mediation of Elvan and Meduan, Britans, that both himself and his Subjects might be instructed in the Christian Religion. He sent forthwith Fugatius and Donatianus, two holy Men, with Letters, whicheat this day, faith Cambden, be extant, and as very many be persuaded, not forged, but Authentical, as bearing date when L. Aurelius Commodus the second time, and Vesprontius were Consuls. This Vesprontius was Vesprontius Candidus, whom Onuphrius and Baronius make the Colleague of Commodus in the first year of his Father's Reign, though an Inscription of Gruterus mentions Aurelius Verus; so that, to the very first beginning of Commodus, the Preaching of these Men is to be ascribed. These holy Men instructed the King and others in the mysteries of Christian Religion. Hereupon Ninnius writeth: King Lucius is surnamed Lever Maur, that is, a Prince of great glory, for the Faith which in his time came. Now such as call the Being of this King into question, for that they think there was at this time no King in Britain, which was wholly and fully reduced into a Province before; Cambden willeth to remember, That the Romans had by ancient Custom in their Provinces, Kings, as the Instruments of their Bondage, that the Britans even then refused to obey Commodus, and that they themselves possessed and held freely those Parts of the Island, which were beyond the aforelaid wall, and had their Kings of their own, and that Antoninus Pius a few years before, having put an end to War, permitted Kingdoms to be ruled by their own Kings, and Provinces by their own Comites. He citeth Tertullian, who much about this time wrote, That those places amongst the Britans which yielded the Romans no access, are now subdued unto Christ. Britain is inclosed within the compass of the Ocean. The Nation of the Mauri, and the barbarous Getulians are beset by the Romans, for fear they might pass beyond the limits of their Countries. What should I speak of the Romans, who with Garisons of their Legions fortifie their Empire? neither are they able to extend the power of their Dominion beyond these very Nations. But the Kingdom and Name of Christ reacheth further still, it is believed in every place, and is worshipped of all those People above named, &c.

95. But our Ecclesiastical Writers (thus Cambden proceedeth) who have employed both time and diligence in the consideration of this point, endeavour and labour to prove, and that out of ancient Fathers of credit, that before this time, in the very dawning and Infancy of the Church, Britain had received Christian Religion: and namely, that Joseph of Arimathea, a Noble Senator, failed out of Gad into Britain, and that Claudia Rufina the Wife of Aulus Pudens (which woman, as is credibly thought, St. Paul nameth in his latter Epistle to Timothy) and whom the Poet Martial so highly commendeth, was a Britain born. They cite the testimony of Dorotheus, who commonly goeth under the name of the Bishop of Tyre, who in his Synopsys hath recorded, That Simon Zelotes having travelled through Mauritania, was at last slain and buried in Britain, as also that Arifobulus, whom St. Paul mentioneth in his Epistle to the Romans, was made Bishop of Britain

Britain (to which Nicephorus inclineth) notwithstanding he speaketh of Britania, and not of Britania. They report likewise upon the authority of Simeon, that great Metaphrast, and of the Menology of the Greeks, that St. Peter came hither and spread abroad the Light of God's Word: out of Sophronius also and Theodore, that St. Paul after his second Imprisonment in Rome, visited this our Country. Whereupon * Venantius Fortunatus wrote of him, (except he speaketh of his Doctrine) if he may be believed as a Poet. But to this purpose, faith our Author, maketh especially that which ere while I alleged out of Tertullian, as also that which Origen recordeth, how, The Britans with one consent embraced the Faith, and made way themselves to God by means of the Druids, who did always beat upon this Article of Belief, That there is but one God. And verily of great moment is that with me which Gildas wrote after he had mentioned the Rebellion of Boodicia and treated of the revenge thereof. In the mean while, faith he, Christ that true Sun shining with his most glittering brightness upon the universal World, not from the temporal skie and firmament, but even from the highest cope of Heaven, exceeding all times, vouchsafed first his beams, that is to say, his Precepts and Doctrine, in the time, as we know, of Tiberius Cæsar, unto this frozen Island full of ice, and lying out as it were in a long tract of earth remote from the visible Sun. Chrysostome likewise, to note so much by the way, writeth of the Christian Religion in this Island as followeth. The British Islands seated without this Sea, and within the very Ocean, have felt the power of the Word (for even there also be Churches founded, and Altars erected) of that Word I say, which is planted in the Souls, and now also in the Lips of all People. And the same Chrysostome in another place: How often have People in Britain fed of man's flesh; but now with fasting they refresh the Soul. Likewise St. Hierome: The Britain divided from our World, if he proceed in Religion, leaving the Western Parts, towards the Sun setting, will seek Jerusalem, a City known to him by form only, and relation of Scriptures.

Heretics.

96. As for Heretics which lived in the time with the forementioned Bishops, and the Reigns of Marcus and Commodus; There were the Secundians, called so from Secundus, who together with Epiphane and Ildorus taught the same with Valentinus. In life they were leadly, all Women among them were common: they denied the Resurrection of the Flesh. Ptolomæus of whom were named the Ptolomæi, taught the Heretical Opinions of the Gnosticks, and of Valentinus; adding thereunto of his own, certain Heathenish doctrines out of Homer. Marcus of whom the Marofiti, Colorabasi, and Heracleon of whom the Heretics were called Heracleonites, sacrificed with Witchcraft: to amaze their Auditory they pronounced Hebrew words. Many Women coming to Church, under colour of receiving the Power of Prophecy from them, confided they were abused by them. Marcus ran away with another man's Wife. They poured oyl and water upon the head of the deceased, hoping so to redeem them. They said, that the life and generation of man consisted in seven Stars: that Christ suffered not indeed, and that there was no resurrection of the flesh. Alciades refraining the Use of God's Creatures, was reformed by Attalus the Martyr. Archontici, Heretics in Palestine, referred all things unto man's Powers. They said, Christ Sabbath was the God of the Jews, and the Devil the Son of the Sabbath. Tatianus the Scholar of Justin Martyr gave original to the Encratites, so called from Continency. For they abhorred Marriages, forbade the Use of living Creatures, offered Water instead of Wine in the Sacrament, and denied that Adam was saved. Severus, of whom were named the Severians, added to the opinions of Tatianus, reviling Paul, rejecting his Epistles, and the Acts of the Apostles. He said, That a Woman was of the Devil, that Man from the middle upwards was of God, and beneath of the Devil. Apelles, Pontinus, and other Marcionites; about this time also disturbed the Peace of the Church.

97. There were also certain Heretics of Galatia and Cappadocia called Pepes, Epiphanius, as also Quintilian and Priscillian, because they said, that Christ in form of a Woman being the Bed fellow of Quintilla or Priscilla, revealed unto her Divine Mysteries. Women were Priests amongst them, and their sacrifices were alike to the Montanists, of which Sect they seem to have been, seeing also his Prophetesses were of the Town Peperca. Arystyritæ were Heretics which offered Bread and Cheese in the Sacrament. Alogi denied Christ to be the Word, condemned John's Gospel, and said, that Cerintus the Heretic wrote the Revelations. Theodotus a Montanist through Sorcery took his flight towards Heaven, but down he fell and died miserably. Adamiæ devised a Church after the fashion of an hot-house, to keep them from cold for the space of an hour, or Service time: they were all naked, Men and Women: Virgins preached unto the rest: their Church they called Paradise, and themselves Adam and Eve. (a) Florinus and Blasius tell from the Church, and taught at Rome, That God was the Author of Evil, whom Irenaeus confuted. (b) Theodotus a Tanner, denied the Divinity of Christ: He was the first Author of the Heresy of Artemon, for which cause Viator Bishop of Rome excommunicated him. Artemon his Disciple accounted Christ but a bare and naked man. He lived in the time of Victor and Zephyrinus. His Companions were Aclepiodorus and Natalius, who repented and fell at the feet of Zephyrinus Bishop of Rome, for Abolition. (c) Marcianus the Heretic maintained an Heterodox Opinion, out of the pretended Gospel of Peter, whom Serapion Bishop of Antioch confuted. (d) Noetus denied there were three Persons, saying, All three were one. He called himself Moses, and said, Aaron was his Brother. He said, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, suffered in the Flesh.

CHAP. VI.

From the Death of Pertinax, and the exposing of the Empire to sale;
the Death of Maximinus the first elected Emperor without Consent of the Senate; the space of 45 years.

1. THE Soldiers having murdered Pertinax, got them to their Camp, and set the Empire to Sale, Proclaiming, That they would prefer him that should offer most. Two there were found who bade Money for it: First Sulpicianus, a man of Consular Dignity, Governor of the City, and Father in Law to Pertinax, and Didius Julianus of the same Degree, a great Lawyer, and exceeding rich. The Soldiers being jealous left the former should have an intention to punish them for the Murder of Pertinax, accepted the offer of Julianus, who promised what they would ask, having, as he said, treasures of Silver and Gold. Being by a Ladder received up to the Wall, and so into the Camp, he promised to restore the Honours and Statues of Commodus, to grant them what Liberty they enjoyed under that Prince, and to give them more than they could ask or expect; he was carried into the Palace, the people by the way cursing and upbraiding him with his purchase. Having thus invaded the Empire, he gave himself up to all Luxury, but being unable to perform his promise to the Soldiers, lost their favour, and fell into the contempt of all men, the People desiring another Prince. At this time Pescennius Niger was Governor of Syria, who as well for the greatness of his Place (his Province containing all from Phoenicia unto Euphrates) as for his Popularity, was most eminent: him did the People extol, and they implored his assistance. He being glad of this opportunity, easily persuaded his Soldiers to accept of him for their Emperor, and entertained Ambassadors which now had recourse to him as the lawful Prince. But then giving himself up to idleness, he neglected to settle and confirm his Estate by going to Rome, and (what was more) by drawing the Army in Illyricum to his side, and to loſt all.

2. At this time governed both the Pannonias L. Septimius Severus, an African born, a man forward and crafty, who seeing the Roman Empire thus obnoxious to every man's Catch, resolved to venture for it amongst the rest, especially in regard that of those two who had seized on it, the one was negligent and secure, the other hated and despised. Being also encouraged by some dreams, he first of all inveighed against the Prætorian Bands which had killed Pertinax, whom knowing to be much beloved by his Soldiers, he highly extolled him, and easily persuaded them to revenge his Death, who once was Lieutenant of the Forces in Illyricum. Then presently (though he pretended he sought it not) was he saluted Emperor, and took upon him the name of Pertinax, which he knew was acceptable to all. After this he marched with great speed to Rome, the Italians (who ever since the days of Augustus had not been used to War) receiving him in all places, and Julianus his Soldiers very slowly providing for resistance, though he had now now distributed to them all the Money he could by any means compass. Severus conveyed his Soldiers in a disguised manner into the City, which was full of them, privily armed, ere Julianus or the People were aware; whereupon Julianus wrote to him, to signify he was willing to receive him, into participation of the Empire, and afterwards desired he might resign it. For the Senate seeing him so timorous, and the other now at hand, being called together according to the ancient Custom by the Consuls, decreed death to him, and the Empire to Severus. Julianus held the Dignity seven Months, having purchased death at an excessive rate.

3. Severus having thus obtained the Empire, that he might not at first crack his credit by falsifying his word, got those Soldiers into his Power that had slain Pertinax, and making them be stripped of their Military Cloaths, banished them a hundred Miles from the City. Then entering the Court, he promised great things to the Senate, professing his intention was to govern after the Precept of Marcus, and not only to take the name, but also disposition of Pertinax, although there were some who so well knew him, that they could not be deceived. After this he prepared for an Expedition against Niger, but fearing to leave an Emulator at his back, he endeavoured to prevent him: This was Clodius Albinus, who at this time governed Britain, was of Patrician rank, and had a strong Army at his Command. He flattered him with the title of Cæsar, beseeching him, as the fittest person, to take care of the Empire, for that he himself grew old, and his Children were Infants. Albinus overjoyed that he should obtain what he had desired, without any trouble, fooled himself in his vain confidence, especially for that Severus had written to the Senate in the same strain, had ordered Money to be stamped with his Image, erected him some Statues; and did him Honour otherwise, to deceive him.

4. Niger much troubled at his coming towards him, took care for securing the passages into Asia, gathered together all the Forces in those Parts, obtained aid from the Parthian and Armenian Kings, seized on Byzantium, and fortified the Straights of the Mountain Taurus. Severus therefore directed not his course towards Byzantium, but marched for Cyprus, where Æmilianus General to Niger met him, and either for that he was over-matched, or desirous to save his Children (whom Severus as also others of his Adversaries had got into his hands) betrayed his trust, and lost his Army. Then did Severus invade Bithynia, wherein they of Nicomedia revolted to him; but the Inhabitants of Nice stuck close to Niger: thence he proceeded into Galatia, and so into Cappadocia to pass over Taurus. The passage was so fortified and defended, that no hope there was of breaking through, till abundance of Rain-water falling down from the Mountains broke down the Wall, whereupon the Defendants fled. Then came Niger with an Army very numerous, but not to be compared with the Legions of Illyricum for Skill and Valour; and they met at Iffus, where Darius was overthrown by Alexander. Here Niger had the same fortune in a great and bloody Battle, after which going back to Antioch, and being pursued by a Party of Horse, his Head was cut off, having brought himself to this end by his delay and idleness. Severus having thus removed him, now cast his Thoughts towards his friend in Britain.

5. He now consulted how he might secure the Empire to his Family, which could not be done as long as Albinus continuing Cæsar had some title to it, and to whom in his absence the great ones had demonstrated their affections, as to a man of great Nobility, and far more worthy of the Sovereignty than he who at present possessed it. He therefore resolved to remove him out of the way. By open War he thought it not convenient to do it, and therefore at first attempted his Design by Treachery, sending some, who under colour of bringing Letters, should make him away. Albinus having warning to beware of him, this succeeded not, so that he betook himself to force, and with incredible expedition returned into the West. Albinus terrified at his hasty retreat, made all possible Provision for resistance, and passed over into Gaul, where after many skirmishes they joined in a pitched Battle near Lugdunum. Victory at the first lay inclined towards Albinus, that Severus cast off his Robe, and hid himself, but by the coming in of Læurnus, who designed to destroy them both, and set up for himself, the fight was so changed, that Albinus was routed, and flying to the City, there had his Head struck off. Then returned Severus to Rome with all his Army, which to reward, he not only bestowed Money upon them, but also such Privileges, which though to him they might procure respect and service; yet proved the bane of the Commonwealth.

For the Soldiers having formerly through the looseness and neglect of some Emperors, contracted sloth and covetousness, were thence more animated to violate the Sovereignty, to depose, and set up whom they pleased. Now he adding more fuel to this flame increased their allowance of Corn, gave them license to wear Rings of Gold as Knights, and to Marry and maintain Wives, which broke in pieces the Reliques of the ancient Discipline, and effected, that we shall hear more of them upon very sad occasions.

6. He made another expedition into the East, to be revenged upon such as had assisted Niger. Piercing into Arabia he besieged Ara, the Metropolis of the Arabi, but found such entertainment as glad he was to retreat without any thing performed, and only by chance, as some say, saved his Reputation. For in his return being driven by Tempests into Parthia, he was constrained to Land near Gressiphon, the chief City where Artabanus the King then resided. Artabanus struck with the suddenness of the thing, fled amazed, and Severus taking the City with ease, got great Treasures, with multitudes of Captives, and returned to Rome in a Triumphant manner, having more by good fortune than policy achieved this Enterprize. When he had done these great things abroad, and (considering the Princes by him defeated, and the wonderful Expedition he used at all times) had approached near unto the greatest Military glory of the most famous Captains; he lay idle at home, or, spending his time in judicial affairs; he let fall the vizard of goodness, which in the beginning he had put on. His extraordinary covetousness increased his innate cruelty, to that under pretence of taking off his Enemies, he put to death unheard forty three Persons of chiefest Rank. In despite of the Senate, he Canonized Commodus for a God, call Avicellus, who strangled him (as he had deserved) to the Lions, called himself his Brother, and to his Son Basianus, whom he made Partner with him in the Empire; he gave the Surname of Antoninus. His cruelty was also extended to the Church, against which he raised the fifth Persecution in the Tenth year of his Reign, when perished many.

His Vices.

The fifth Persecution.

Coming into Britain.

Here he died.

7. Severus after the overthrow of Albinus, sent first Heracianus to seize upon Britain, and to rule it: then Virius Lupus as Proprietor and Lieutenant (whom Ulpian the Lawyer calleth President of Britain) who being wearied with the Inroads and Insolences of the Maeata, sent for the Emperor himself over. He was glad of this occasion, not only for desire of glory, but also to draw away with him his two Sons from the City, where they gave up themselves to licentious rioting, and exercised irreconcilable enmity betwixt themselves. The Britains sent Ambassadors to him to beg Peace, but he detained them till he had made sufficient Provision for War, and then dismissed them without granting their requests. Leaving his Son Geta (whom at his arrival he also created Augustus) in the hithermost part of the Province (which continued in obedience) for the civil Jurisdiction and Administration of affairs there; he himself with Antoninus went into the further parts, where being busied in cutting down Woods, making Bridges, and drying up the Meers, he fought no Battle, but what with the Enemies Ambuscades, and with Sickles, lost Fifty thousand Men, according to Dio. Herodian writeth, That the Britons found him work enough, being able to retreat where the Romans could not follow by reason of the Fens, which the Natives easily passed, being naked, very nimble and skilful in the places, so that by Ambuscades laid in the Caledonian Forest, and through the unwholeness of the Meerish Grounds he lost many Thousands of his Men; but he forced them to Peace with delivery of a good part of their Country and their Arms. For these Victories he stamped certain pieces of Money with this Inscription, Victoria Britannica, assumed the Surname of Britannicus Maximus, and his Son Geta was also Surnamed Britannicus, as appeareth by his Coins, saith Camden. But shortly after they revolted, whereupon he brake out into such a rage, that he gave his Soldiers charge to make a general Massacre of them all, and returning, though much tormented with the Gout, against them raised a Wall a hundred and thirty miles in length cross the Island, so leparate betwixt the Barbarians and Romans, which Basianus afterwards increased. When he had in some sort repressed the Rebels, he sickned, not so much out of any bodily Distemper, as for grief, and sorrow of mind, by reason of the desperate and unreclaimable demeanour of his Son Antoninus, who once or twice gave the attempt to kill him with his own hand. These were his last words: A troubled State of the Commonwealth I found in every place, but I leave it in peace

peace and quietness even amongst the Britains. He died at Eboracum, now called York (having tried as he laid all sorts of lives, and condemned all of vanity) * Omissa sunt et on the day before the Nones of February, having Reigned Eighteen years, and almost lived Sixty fix. A.V.C. 964. A.D. 211. Q. Epitidius Rufus and Pomponius Bassus being Consuls.

8. Severus his Body was in a Military fort carried forth by his Soldiers to the funeral fire, and honoured with a solemn Jutting and Running at Tilt, performed by his Sons and Soldiers. He was also Canonized a god after the ordinary manner of the Apostheos of the Roman Emperors, which being not formerly touched, it's convenient in this place to describe, as we have it from Herodian. A custom like, ad iit: faith he, the Romans have to consecrate those Emperors that die, their Sons or Successors surviving. And whosoever are thus honoured, be canonized, and registered in the Roll of their Divi, or gods. During this Complement they hold a general mourning through the whole City, and the same mixed with a festive Solemnity. For the dead Body they bury with a Sumptuous Funeral, according to the manner of other men. But they frame an Image of wax, resembling in all points the Party deceased, and lay the same openly at the Entry of the Palace, upon a most ample and stately bed of Ivory erected on high, and covered with Cloth of Gold. And verily that Image is clothed with a Pale colour like unto a sick man. About the Bed there sits a good part of the day the whole Body of the Senate on the left hand, arrayed in their Blacks; and on the right hand certain Matrons honorable by the Dignity of their Husbands or Parents. And there is not one of them seen to wear any Gold about them, nor to be adorned with Jewels, but clad in white and slender Garments, they represent Mourners. This they do for seven days together: during which time the Physicians resort daily in bim to feel his pulse, and consider of his Disease, and thereupon as of their Patient judicially pronounce that he groweth worse and worse. Then when he seemeth to be dead, certain of the nobles, and most choice young men, as well of Senatorial as Equestrian Rank, take up the Bed, and carry it through the Via Sacra into the old Forum, where the Roman Magistrates were wont to lay down their Offices. Here on both sides are certain Steps raised in manner of Stairs; upon which on the one hand are placed a quire of Boys of noblest birth and Patritian dignity, and on the other a Company of Women of noble Parentage, Singing in commendation of the deceased Prince, Hymns and Sonnets turned to a solemn and mournful Note.

9. These things done, they take up the Bed or Herse again, and carry it out of the City into the Campus Martius, where in the broadest place thereof a frame or turret four square, with equal sides, is raised, and made in manner of a Tabernacle, of no other matter than great pieces of Timber. Now this within is all filled with dry fuel: but without, adorned with rich Hangings interwoven with Gold-wire, with divers Ivory Portraits of Imagery, and sundry curious Pictures. Over this frame stood another somewhat less; but in form and furniture like unto the former, with Windows and Doors standing open. And so a third, and fourth Turret, smaller every one than that next beneath it, and others like it still one after another, till you come to the last, which is the least of all the rest. The manner of this Building, you may compare to those Lanthorns, or light Towers standing by Haven-sides, and commonly called Phari, which give light by fire in the night time, and direct Ships at Sea in their course to safe Harbours. The Herse then being mounted up into the second Tabernacle, they get together Spices, and Odours of all sorts, as also all the sweet smelling Fruits, Herbs, Juices, and Liquors, that the whole World will afford, and thereon pour them by heaps. For there is no Nation, City, or State, nor any Person of Rank and Quality, but strive every one to bestow in honour of the Prince, these last Gifts and Presents. Now when there's a mighty heap of Spices raised, and the whole Room is therewith filled, then all of Knights degree first ride about the edifice, marching in a certain measure: and therewith in their courses and recourses observe a Warlike kind of motion round, in just measure and number. Chariots are also driven about by such, as sitting in them are clothed in Purple, and represent all the famous Roman Captains and Emperors. These things thus performed, be that succeedeth in the Empire takes a Torch, and sets it to the Tabernacle: then all the rest on every side put fire under, and every place being filled with the dry fuel and Odours, instantly are taken with a vehement fire. Then presently from the last and least Tabernacle, as from some high Turret, when the fire is put underneath, an Eagle is let fly, which is believed to carry the Princes Soul up into Heaven. And so from that time forward the Emperor is adored amongst the rest of the gods.

Cccccc

to Severus

10. Severus left his two Sons Antoninus Bassianus (called also Caracalla, from a Great Hercules barbarous habit he gave to the people, as Spartianus writeth) and Geta,<sup>4</sup> equal dieters in the Empire. They after his death left not off their former contentions, but increased them to that height, that they could neither live nor reign together, but thought of parting the Empire betwixt them; but their Mother Julia (Spartianus maketh her the Step-Mother of Antoninus, and to have loved him better than her own Son Geta, may filthily, inasmuch that the Married him afterwards) by her passionate interposition hindered it. They then betook themselves to secret Conspiracies, which succeeding not, Antoninus resolved, though it were by open force, to kill his Brother, whom he perceived to be far better beloved than himself, and either breaking into his Brother's Chamber, or getting in by his Mothers means, under pretence of Reconciliation to be made, killed him in her womb. This done, he secured the Empire to him by bribing the Soldiers, to whom he was so profuse, that in one day he bestowed on them, which his Father had been unjustly scraping together for Eighteen years. Then falling like a savage Beast into cruel courses, he cut off all Geta's Friends and Acquaintance, all the Senators of any considerable rank or wealth, the Lieutenants and Governors of Provinces, with the Vestal Nuns, and set the Soldiers to kill the People beholding the Circenian Games. After this, going into Germany, to please his Army he lived an hard and laborious life; and thence passing into Thrace, he there imitated Alexander the Great, whom he ever much affected to talk of, and pretended to emulate. He went thence to Illyum, where he counterfeited Achilles, and so to Alexandria, where he made the Inhabitants deeply repent of their rashness and folly.

11. Being naturally given to much Tatling, they had formerly raised against him for his being so forward in praising his Brother; and for that being a mark of so contemptible feature, he compared himself to their Alexander. Resolving then to be vengevood on them, he first entertained them very plausibly, but afterwards drawing forth all the youth by a wile, he compell'd them in with his Arms, and killed them all. After this, desirous to become famous by some great Exploit, he sent to the Parthian for his Daughter, and pretended that he himself would come and Marry her, whereby that King being persuaded to meet him with a great number of People, he fell upon them and made a great slaughter, for that they thought it needfuls to come armed to a Wedding; and as he thought much glory, he returned into Mesopotamia, where he received punishment from above, for his manifold cruelty. There was one Opilius Maximus an African born, and one of his Captains, whom he unworthily used. This Maximus receiving a Letter from Maternianus, directed to the Emperor (who had commanded him to call together the Magicians, and consult them about his end, and whether any lay in wait for the Empire) wherein Antoninus was addid to cut him off, as aiming at the Sovereignty, when he had ventured to open it, perceived that either he or his Master must die, and therefore procured one Martialus to kill him. This man being incragd against the Emperor, for that he had condemn'd his Brother without sufficient Hearing, flew him as he was making water, on the sixth of the Ides of April, after he had reigned fix years, and two months, in the first year of the 229 Olympiad, A. V. C. 970. A. D. 217. Brutus Praefens and Extricatus being Consuls. Amongst many others Caracallus put to death Papinianus the great Lawyer, as it's said, because he would not defend his Paricide.

12. Papinian! A Name as fragrant as Violets, as Roses, as the Sticilian and Africk Flowers; sweeter than Honey, or the most delicious Nectar; a Name so noble, so pleasant, so delicate, as the most beauteous words and Flourishes of Rhetoric cannot reach it. How have all Ages been enamoured with it? How have all others envied the Happiness of that which alone enjoyed him in his Person? A Lawyer who lived not fully seven and thirty years; but a Lawyer so learned and every way accomplished in his Profession, as before him the world never saw the like; neither ever hereafter is like to be. He alone was of such Authority, that in a difference of Opinions, his Judgment was most commonly preferred before that of any other Doctor. In the number of Sentences, his Voice, by order of Justinian, was to go for two; and in respect to his Eminency and the excellency of his Writings, as the Students in Arts wish us of the third year are called Sophists, those in Law of the third year bore the Name of Papinianus. And as the Syracufians of old, in gratitude to Marc'cellus, ordained a Feast to his memory; by this Emperor's Command, the Name and Memory of Papinian was preserved in the Schools, in the same manner every third year. Spiritus the Historian calls him the Sancituary and Treasury of Law, and faith, he was Præfatus Prætorio under the Emperor Severus, who used him with all respectantwerable to his Transcendent merit. But Sons more rarely imitate their Fathers in what is good. Antoninus Bassianus Cæsarac succeeding his Father, kills his Brother Geta in his Mothers Arms, and will have Papinian defend the Fact, who refusing utterly to do it (answering, it's said, That it was Easier to commit Parricide, than defend it) was by his Command, sent after him where he would not, contrary to Justice, accuse. Such were the Heroick virtues of those ancient Lawyers, who when they gave out their Answers spake as of the Tripos, and being preferred to Places of Trust in the Commonwealth, by virtue of a more than ordinary Impulse, and protected by the Murus æthereus of their own Integrity, stood all the Storms of Difficulties and Dangers with undaunted Courage, and by their Virtue and Constancy either terrified Tyrants, or conquered them by suffering for Truth and Justice.

14. Julius Paulus, the Afflictor of Papinian, and of Council to Alexander Severus the Emperor, wrote more Books concerning Law, than any other, of which five of Sentences or Aphorisms written to his Son, or rather the Epitome of them, are yet extant. As for Ulpian, the other Afflictor, Alexander Severus (that we may a little anticipate, to speak altogether) calls him in a certain Constitution both his Profectus Prætorio, and his Parent. For as Lampridius writes; he took him for his Tutor or Guardian solely against the will of his Mother, though afterwards he gave him Thanks for so doing, and the grateful Prince often defended him from the rage of the Soldiers, by covering him with his Purple Robe. He was born at Syria Phenice, a famous Colony of the Syrians, as he saith himself, and having mended some things which Heliogabalus had put out of order, was slain by the Prætorian Guards, which let upon him in the Night, although he fled for refuge to the Emperor and his Mother. There was another great Lawyer, Africanus, whom some think to have been a Scholar also of Papinian. But they were deceived by a corrupt Place of Lampridius the Historian, which reckons up many other Lawyers amongst the Councillors of Alexander, though they died before that Emperor was born, at least ere the Purple came upon his Shoulders. These were Pomponius Alphenus, Mæcianus, Triphonius, Celsus, Proculus, and others. Indeed there were two Lawyers who had the Name of Africanus, viz. Sextus Cælius Africanus; commonly called Sextus Cælius, and another simply to called, both who lived before the time of Alexander. As for Pomponius, he reached (when ever he lived) the Seventy eighth year of his Age, and spent all his time in the study of the Law, and other Parts of good Literature, being much pleased with that Saying, That although he had one foot in the Grave, yet did he desire still to Learn.

15. These and many more mentioned in the Pandects, were the great and Reverend Sages of the Law, out of the Writings of whom were Collected such Books as are come to our Hands, and have the force and efficacy of Law from Imperial Stamp and Authority. They were Persons induced with all manner of good literature, and what ever could render them accomplished. Their Writings were not only words, nor only matter, but words and matter both; being solid and judicious in respect of the one, and elegant, ingenious, rhetorical, and copious in reference to the other. They did not circumscribe the Law within the narrow bounds of Forms and Cautions; but as their business was to discern betwixt Just and Unjust, Equitable and not Equitable, Lawful and Unlawful, they took in all manner of knowledge whatsoever, conducing to that great and difficult Design, and thought it a point of Dishonesty as well as Ignorance, to be unlearn in any thing which tended to the Safety of Men, and the Profit of the Commonwealth. For the Elegancy of the Writings of those who were more ancient, we have Cicero a Competent Judge; who usually Joyns the Commendation of Eloquence, with that of the Knowledge of the Law. And as for these of later times, the Writings of whom Compose the Pandects, or Digests, Lawrentius Valla, one as able to pass his Censure in point of Elegancy and good Latine as any other, thus expresseth himself in their behalf. 'I lately read over and over Fifty Books of Digests, taken out of most of the Writings of Lawyers, and I did it both willingly, and with great Admiration. First, Because it's hard to say, whether they excel in Diligence or Gravity, Prudence or Equity, various Knowledge, or excellency of Language; In the next place, every one of these Perfections do so abound in all of them, that it's hard to say in whom they most prevail. And this increaseth the Wonder, that they lived some of them some Ages distant, although all of them after Cicero, and therefore in some ways they differ from him, as all do who wrote after Virgil and Livy. Of S. Sulpitius, and Mutius Sævola, nothing is extant, although of a later Stævola there be something. As for the most ancient Lawyers, therefore, how Eloquent they were, we cannot judge, having nothing left us to read of all they wrote. But to speak of those Writings which are come to our Hands, in mine Opinion, nothing can be added or taken from them, not only in respect of Eloquence, which yet that Subject doth not greatly bear, but also of the Purity and Elegancy of the Latin style, without which, all Learning is blind and illiberal, especially in the Civil Law. Thus much doth Valla write in behalf of their Language, as for their Matter, and the excellency of that reason contained in their Writings, the Practice of the Christian World bears witness to it, almost all Kingdoms and States receiving them for Law at this very day.

Bishop.

16. In the first year of Severus (that we may continue our method concerning Ecclesiastical matters) died Victor Bishop of Rome, on the fifth of the Calends of August, and Zephyrinus succeeded; the fifteenth Bishop of that See, according to Damasus. In the last of Antoninus Bassianus, Zephyrinus died, on the seventh before the Calends of September. The See was vacant five days. Then succeeded Callistus, who therefore was elected the day before the Calends of September, on the first  feria. After Dios Bishop of Jerusalem, whom the Bishops of the neighbouring Churches had ordained after the departure of Narcissus, Germanian succeeded, and after him Gordian, in whose time Narcissus shewed himself again, as if he had been risen from the dead, and was intreated by the Brethren to enjoy his Bishoprick, being much marvelled at for his departure; for his Philosophical course of life, and especially for the Vengeance and Plagues of God poured upon his accusers. And because for his great age he was not able to supply the place, Alexander Bishop of Cappadocia was joyned with him, and governed alone after his death. In the Church of Antioch, Astlepiades was Bishop after Serapion, about the first year of Caracalla, and was succeeded by Phileas about the last of that Prince's Reign.

17. Upon

Tertullian.

17. Upon Zephyrinus Bishop of Rome falleth very foul Tertullian a Presbyter or Priest of Carthage in Africa, for that he was more severe against such, as through fear had sacrificed to Idols, than against Whoremongers and Adulterers; wherein not without cause truly (saith Capellus) but yet without measure he blameth Zephyrinus, and the whole Roman Clergy, the manners of whom were even now very corrupt, if we may believe Tertullian. But really not so much out of hatred to their Vices, as out of prejudice to the truth he calleth the Roman Clergy Psychicks, as well in his Book of  Pudicitia, as in that of  monogamia, which he thus beginneth, Haereticis nuptiis auferunt, Psychici ingerunt. He pretendeth therein only to condemn second Marriages, but indeed most of his Arguments respect both first and second, although he himself had Married a Wife, and retained her in his Presbytery. But Marriage which he had learnt of the Orthodox to approve, he learnt of Montanus to despise, to whom he would have more revealed than to the Apostles, because they as yet (or for certain the Church) could not bear the yoke of fastings and celibate which Montanus brought in, and he as a Montanist would inculcate. This humour at length so possessed him, that neither content with the title of Christian, nor that of Presbyter, he put on the Philosophy, Pallium, as a token of a more austere life, wherein he would be eminent, not only amongst Christians, but also Montanists. The Africans either being amazed on laughing at this Novelty, he wrote an elegant but most obscure Book de pallio, which being being miserably lacerated, hath been of late days restored by the most learned Salmasius. He wrote his Book De prescriptionibus about the eighth year of Commodus, as Capellus gathereth, because in the end thereof making a Catalogue of Hereticks, he mentioneth Theodotus (who was censured by Victor Bishop of Rome, for holding Christ to have been a meer man) but not Artemon the Heretick who appeared shortly after.

18. His Book De corona Militis acquainteth us with the occasion of the Persecution of the Christians, in the Reign of Severus. The Emperor ere he marched into the East (in that Expedition wherein he overthrew the Partians) made his elder Son his Partner in the Triumphant Power, and by his liberality pleased the People formerly enraged by the many Punishments he inflicted. By occasion of this liberality as it seemeth a Christian Soldier holding a certain Garland or Crown in his hand, as if it were wickedness for him to let it on his head as the rest did, was asked why he did so, and answered, That he was a Christian. This was the occasion of the Emperor's rage. About the fifteenth of Severus, he wrote against the Marcionites, whom he so impugned, as yet underhand he inculcated his Monianism. For saith he: Amongst us spiritual reason derived from the Comforter, persuadeth in the Faith single Plurimorum. But we must not forget, that about the fourth of Severus, he wrote a most excellent Apology for the Christian Faith. At the same time with Tertullian flourished Clement, called Alexandrinus, because a Philosopher of Alexandria, the Scholar of Pantemus, and Master of Origen. Eusebius mentioneth him, and Pantemus in the second of Severus, at which time it's probable he wrote his Stromata; for not intending his Chronology beyond the time of Commodus, he seemeth not long after his death to have begun that Work. At this time also lived Mimetus Felix an eminent Lawyer, and the Author of that excellent Book, intitled Othavius, which, as Lactantius writeth, doth declare how fit an asserter of the truth he might have been, had he applied himself wholly to that Study. This Book being intended as an Apology for Christian Religion, acquainteth us what thoughts the Heathen at that time had thereof, as also do the Apologies of Justin Martyr, the Books of Origen against Celsus, and especially that of Tertullian. We have already shewn the rise and increase of Christian Religion, we have delivered the series of the most eminent Bishops and Fathers thereof, as also of the several Hereticks which from within disturbed the peace thereof. We have also given an account of the several fiery Trials the Faithful underwent. But what opinions the Infidels had of Christians and Christianity, of what crimes they accused them, whence their hatred proceeded, whereupon the Emperors grounded their bloody Edicts: what the Primitive Saints did in the mean time, how they behaved themselves under these pressures, how they carried it towards their Enemies, how they stood affected in duty towards their Princes; in sum, what their conversations both as Men and Christians were, is most worthy to be considered, and those things in short out of the Apologies stored, and other Authors, we shall endeavour to discover.

19. The

The reason of the prejudice of Heathens against them.

Malignant slanders concerning the manner of their worship.

19. The first thing that the Heathens cavilled at in Christianity (besides what occasion was given by Hereticks whom the Church abominated) was the Newness of it. (a) St. Paul seemed to them to be a fether forth of new gods. And there was an ancient Law at (b) Rome which forbade introducing new Ceremonies into Religion, as worshipping strange Deities, unless approved by the Senate; and this was an inviolable Law, which binding Emperors as well as others, Tiberius could not, as he desired, receive Jesus Christ amongst their gods; for the Senate would not approve of a God they did not know. This prejudice (which yet in Idolatry often effected nothing amongst the Romans) was increased by a misapprehension of our Lord and Saviour's Sufferings; his being Crucified, made them despite both him and his. Hence (c) Tacitus telling the original of the Christians, will let the World know, that Christ from whom they derived their name, was Tiberio imperitante per procuratorem Pontium Pilatum supplicio affectus. And hence Trajan (d) in his discourse with Ignatius; when he would mean Christ; called him Crucifixus, the Crucified, in way of contempt. This contempt was increased into disdain; by reason that Christ would have no other Gods (as they accounted them) tharers with him in worship, and this disdain was heightened to rage, when Christians preaching this saving Doctrine, declaiming against Idolatry, proving the Heathen gods to be devils, and striking at the root of Paganism, endeavoured to draw even the whole World from Superstition, and Idolatry to an ancient and universal: Tu say, we do not worship the Gods, saith (e) Tertullian. This was accounted a Crime of Sacrilege, and worthy of death; much more than to dispute others from doing it. Quid, homines (suscipitis enim me impetum suffragata orationis liberis exercentem) homines (inquam) deplorata, illicita ac desolata falsitatis grassari in Deos nonne ingemiscendum est: saith (f) Cicilius, as he is brought in by Minutius. Hereupon the Christians were accounted Atheists, and it was a Custom to cry out against them, where the Greek tongue was used (g) Alpe the Atheists; which words they would have had Polycarp utter as a sign of his Recantation. This by reason of the malice of the Devils (who were worshipped under the names of the several gods) did render them so highly impious in the opinion of the vulgar, and so enraged the multitude against them, that (h) if Tiber over-flooded, if Nile watered not the plains; if (i) Heaven stopped its course, and did not pour its rains here below, if there were Earthquake, Famine, or Plague; they would immediately cry out Christians ad Leones, Cast the Christians to the Lions, as the cause (in their opinion) of all the calamities that arrived in the World, and all the evils that people suffered.

20. Prejudice and hatred being risen thus high, invented false accusations, and caught hold of idle Surmises, nothing ill seeming incredible concerning those that are already odious. (a) Athenagoras saith, that three things they objected against Christians: Atheism, Theft, his seals, and the Capitation of Oedipus. The two latter (whereof as much as concerned Theft and Oedipus we have spoken above) in their due places) (b) Tertullian thus explained: 'The Crimes pretended against us (the horror of which makes us pass for wicked in the opinion of the people) are, that we meet together to Sacrifice a Child; that after we have taken away his life by a barbarous superstition, we devour his body, and when we have eaten the flesh of this innocent, we commit Incests. They add, that we have Dogs, which serve to overthrow the Candles, and doing the Office of those infamous Merchants of Modesty, make us lose all shame in taking the lights from us; and covering our actions under the veil of darkness, embolden us to seek the Use of ungodly, and sacrilegious pleasures. Calicius maketh beginners initiated by the Blood of an Infant, which they all licking up, and dividing his Members amongst themselves, by so horrid a Ceremony confirmed their league, and the Covenant of their mutual secrecy. These Sacra (saith he) are more abominable than all Sacrilege. And as for their feasting 'tis known sufficiently, all speak of it in all places; the Orations also of our Certain doth witness it: They meet together to eat on a set day with all their Children, Sisters, Mothers, Persons of every Sex, and every age. There, after much eating, when the feast is now grown hot, and the heat of incontinent lust is kindled by drunkenness, the Dog that is tied to the Candlestick is provoked, by casting a piece of meat beyond the length of the string by which he is bound, to a violent leap. Thus the conscious light being overthrowen and put out, &c. so he proceedeth to the same purpose, but in worse terms. And Justin Martyr in his Conference with (c) Tryphon the Jew, demandeth (d) of him after this manner: 'Do you also believe concerning us that we devour men, men, and after meat the lights being put out, use wicked and promiscuous Copulation? Lastly, Theophilus Patriarch of Antioch in his third book (d) to Antolycus (e) against Calumniators of Christian Religion, fumeth up what we have already said, in these words: 'They say that our Wives are common, and accuse us that we use promiscuous Copulation. Besides, they lay to our charge that we do not abstain from our own Sitters, but rashly dare to violate those with incontinent lust. But this is most cruel and brutish of the Crimes they object against us, when with an impious mouth they prate, that we eat man's flesh: neither do they cease to traduce our Religion or Doctrine as of yesterday, and destitute of all truth, which neither we ourselves, if a controverfie arise, are able to defend with clear demonstrations. Further, they lay that our Doctrine is nothing but folly, and meer toys.

21. That malice which invented these impious adjuncts of Christian Religion; found out a suitable object of worship; for the Romans had so far forgotten their own ancient Custom of serving their Gods without Images, or resemblances (for Numa, as Plutarch telleth us, and the ancient Romans for many years admitted no Images in their Temples, because the Deity cannot be made out by any external resemblance) that they thought it impossible for any Religion not to be guilty of Idolatry towards some visible thing. Hence came that Fable related by (a) Tacitus (an Author guilty of malice against both Jews and Christians) (b) that the Jews consecrated the Image of an Ass, because (forsooth) being pressed sorely with thirst in the Deserts of Arabia, certain wild Asses shewed them the Fountains where they were wont to drink; although this Author, who saith he lies not, writeth, that Pompey having taken Jerusalem, and entered into the Temple to see the mysteries of the Jewish Religion, saw there no Image at all. (c) Tertullian conceiveth, that from this tale sprung that conceit that the Christians (the Religion of whom was drawn from that of the Jews, and succeeded it) worshipped the Effigies of an Ass. 'I hear, (saith Cicilius) that they worship a Consecrated head of an Ass, the most filthy of all sorts of Cattel, I know not out of what foolish persuasion; a Religion worthy of, and descended from, such manners. But he goeth further, and relateth a Report, that the very object of their worship was also obscene. (d) Tertullian further writeth, that some were of opinion they worshipped the Crook, and Cecilius, from the ignominious Death of our Lord, and this instrument of it, argueth to the Infamy of Christian Religion in an abominable manner. Tertullian in the same place telleth us, 'That some with more apparent reason believed the Sun to be their God, and sent them to the Religion of the Persians, herein suspecting them for so doing, because when they prayed, they turned themselves toward the East. [And after an answer to this lie he addeth:] 'The Calumnies invented to cry down our Religion arose to such excess of impiety, that not long ago in this City, a Picture of our God was shewed by a certain infamous Person that got his living by exposing to the sight of the people, wild beasts: who by a strange faculty gotten by him to avoid their bitings, making Use of his craft, shewed also the aforesaid Picture to all Comers, with this Inscription thereon, This is Onocrotus the God of Christians. This supposed God of the Christians pretended by him, had the Ears of an Ass, an hoof on one of his feet; carried a Book, and was clothed with a Gown: we laugh at the barbarousness of this name, and the extravagancy of this figure. Such were the Blasphemies of Pagans against Christian worship, and as an Argument for them, they produced the secrecy of Christian meetings, which their own cruelty and rage had made necessary. 'They (d) talked of nothing more than the excess of the Tables of the Christians. And after all this they (e) objected; that they were not any way profitable in the commerce of the World.

22. As to their outward demeanour, they accused them of Sedition as well as Atheism. Let (a) Tertullian speak up on what frivolous grounds: 'You say we worship not the Gods; nor for the welfare of the Emperors, offer sacrifices to them. The one of these two Crimes whereof you accuse us, must necessarily follow upon the neck, or in consequence of the other: for, being resolved to render no manner of worship to your Deities, we must necessarily in like manner be resolved not to sacrifice at their Altars, whether for our selves, or for what person soever it be. Hereupon you conclude us guilty of Sacrilege and High Treason. Pliny was wont, as appeareth from his Epistle to Trajan, to try Christians by Supplications made to the Images of the Gods, and amongst these to the Emperor's Picture by Frankincense and Wine. This burning Incense was an ordinary trial in all ages. They were also counted singular and iachous, for that they would not swear by the Fortune or Genius of the Emperors." This the holy Martyr (b) Polycarp was (b) Epiph. Ecbidden to do by the Proconsul a little before his Suffering. Their prejudices and false opinions being heightened and irritated by the malice of Devils, who found Martyrs <sup>20, 21.</sup> themselves nearly concerned therein, procured wonderful enmity and malice in the hearts of Pagans against the Faith.

23. 'Is it not strange (saith (a) Tertullian) that the hatred wherewith this (a) Apol. c. 2.
name is pursued, in such manner blinds the minds of most men, that when they witness the probity of a Christian, they mix in their discourse as a reproach, that he hath embraced this Religion. One saith, truly, he of whom you speak is an honest man, if he were not a Christian, and his life would be free from blame.
Another, Do you know such a one, who had the reputation of a wife and dif-creet man? he is lately turned Christian. [Again] "Thief People by an extream blindness of hatred speak to the advantage of the name Christian, when they strive to render it odious. For, say they, How pleasant, and of what a good humour was that woman? How sociable and jovial was that man? 'Tis pity they should be Christians. So they impute the amendment of their lives to the Profession of Christianity. Some of them also purchase the aversion they carry against the name Christian, which we bear, with the price of what is most precious to them, rather desiring to lose the sweetness of life, tranquillity of mind, and all sorts of Commodities, than to see in their houses that which they hate. A man who heretofore had his mind full of jealousy, can no longer endure the company of his wife; what assurance soever he hath of her chastity, after once he perceives her to be turned Christian, and parts from her now when her actions full of modesty have extinguished all suspicions wherewith he was heretofore moved. A Father who of a long time endured the disobedience of his heathenish Son, resolves to take from him the hope of succeeding him in his inheritance for turning Christian, when at the same time executing his commands without murmuring. A Master that used his Slave gently when his carriage gave him some cause of distrust, now puts him far from him for being a Christian, when he hath most assurance of his fidelity. 'Tis committing of a Crime to correct the disorders of a man's life by the motions of an holy Conversion to the Christian faith, and the good which is produced by so happy a change works not so powerfully in the minds of men, as the hatred they have conceived against us. Indeed this hatred is strange; and when I consider that the name of Christian only makes it to be so, I would willingly know how a name can be Criminal, and how a simple word can be accursed? Thus much (and enough I suppose) to discover hatred it self."

The sad effects
thereof.

24. And the fruits of hatred abundantly manifested themselves. 1. In fasting Christians to Crosses and pieces of Wood. 2. Hanging them up as publick spectacles unto all men upon Gibbets. 3. Piercing their Bodies with Irons. 4. Cutting off their heads. 5. Exposing them to the rage of wild Beasts. 6. Throwing them into flames. 7. Condemning them to work in Mines; and 8. Confining them to Islands; "All which sorts are expressed in one (a) Chapter of Tertullian (a) cap. 12.
Apology. In another (b) place he thus writeth, "How often do those people believe our Enemies, of their own accord, without your Authority, assault us with stones, or burn us? They are verily so enraged against us, that during the furies of the Bacchanals, they spare not even Christians that are dead, but trouble the Rest of their Graves, they violate their Sepulchres which are as Sanctuaries of the dead, they draw forth their Bodies not to be known whose Bodies they are, after mangled by them, with extreme inhumanity they tear, and drag in the streets. (c) [Elsewhere,] "How many are there among you, O Ye People, that are this way greedy of the blood of Christians? and also among you, O ye Magistrates, after you appear such Justifiers by the severity you treat us with, whose Consciences I would fain with true reproaches of having procured the death of your own Children? Yet if you did but simply put them to death, it were something; but by a strange excess of cruelty you throw them into the water, you expose them to the rigour of cold and hunger, and the rage of Dogs;
you will not take their lives away with the sword, because too gentle a death, and which men of the age of discretion had rather suffer, than any other that hath violence in it."

25. But, when the time of Persecution drew towards an end, then especially did the Devil rage with variety of torments against the Primitive Saints. For besides those formerly mentioned, (d) Scorpius was thrown down, and had his neck

neck broken. Some having their flesh rent in pieces with the lash of the whip; some were broyled upon Gridirons; others having their skins razed, and scorched being tied by one leg were hanged on Trees with the head downwards. They pulled out the right eyes of others, fearing the empty place, and fawing off the left legs of others, feared their hams, and condemned them to the mines, which usage was accounted Clemency. Some they scourged to death, cut out their tongues, and strangled them. One Apphianus, being all disfigured with stripes, had his feet wrapped in flax coyled all over, which being set on fire, it ran over his flesh and consumed it, and pierced into the marrow within the bones, so that his whole body distilled like to melting wax. Three days he was suffered to remain in Prison after this torture, and when by reason of his wounds he was ready to yield up the ghost, then was he thrown into the Sea. Others were forced by buckling, josting, and buffeting, to kill one another. Others of mens estate were gelded and condemned to the quarries. Others were tormented grievously and chastised with imprisonment and fetters, of which number was Pamphilus, of all my familiars my dearest friend, a man who among all the Martyrs of our time, saith Eusebius, excelled in every kind of virtue. He had his sides mangled with sharp razors, and then was ordered to be kept in the noisom stench of the close Prison, where the rest of the Confessors remained, till at length he was put to death, being a Presbyter of the Church of Cæsarea, concerning whose life Euse- bius wrote three books, and for his familiarity with, and affection to him, had the surname of Pamphilus. This variety of the torments of Christians, appeareth from several passages in the seventh and eighth Books of his Ecclesiastical History, which so far exceedeth all inferior Punishments, or (that I may speak in the phrase of Lawyers) the diminutions capitis, that we need not mention how Christians were denied the title of (b) Roman Citizens. But one kind of punishment far more grievous than the rest there yet was, which more tormented Christians than all other tortures put together: and that was the loss of their chastity. This Engine battered the fort of Origen's constancy, who chose rather to sacrifice to Idols, than be abused by an Ethiopian, as Suidas writeth. (c) Tertullian giveth us another (c) Apol. c. 14.
instance, that we may enquire no further. "And indeed a few days since, (saith
'he) you condemned a Christian maid to be rather prostituted to an infamous corrupt: of her chastity, than to be exposed to the rage of a Lyon; you acknowledge there is no punishment nor kind of death, which is so intolerable to Christians, as the loss of their chastity."

26. Such was the entertainment Christians found in this World; now let us see how far they deserved it, as to their demeanour, and carriage; for there is no need to speak here to the two first objections. "The Heathens (a) believe a man 'could not make profession of Christianity; without being tainted with all sorts of Crimes, without being an Enemy to the gods, to Princes, to the Laws, to good Manners, and to Nature; and that a Christian could not be acquitted, unless he denied himself to be such an one. But their carriage was so quite contrary to all these surmises, except that concerning the worship of Heathenish vanities, or Devils, under the name of gods, that they only were the Servants of the true God, they only were free from all sorts of Crimes, were the best friends and Subjects of Princes, of the Laws, good Manners, and Nature, and truly affirming themselves Christians, might justly in this respect have been acquitted from these accusations. "They (b) assembled together by troops in their Prayers to God, as if thereby they would carry by force the grant of whatsoever Prayers were presented to him, this being a violence agreeable to him; they prayed to him for the Emperors, their Ministers the Magistrates that had the exercise of their Power, for the State, the tranquillity of the Empire; and the retarding of the general dissolution that must put an end to all things. They assembled together to read the Holy Scriptures, and they read them according to the condition of the times; what served either to admonish or confirm the faithful. 'In effect, the Scriptures nourished their faith, lifted up, and assured the confidence they had in God, nevertheless they ceased not to confirm their discipline by the strength of Precepts they continually repeated. In these Assemblies, (saith Ter- tullian, for the former are also his words) we make exhortations and threatenings; and exercise Divine censure, which banisheth Sinners, and excludes them from our Communion; we judge them with very much circumspection, because we know that God is in the midst of us, and sees what we do; and certainly this a great foretelling of the judgment that God will one day pronounce against

against the wicked, when the Church moved with the enormity of their Crimes, darts out upon wilful Sinners the Thunderbolts of Excommunication, and deprives them of the participation of it's Prayers, it's Society, and all sorts of holy Commerce with it.

27. 'In our Assemblies there are Bishops that preside, and have Authority over all the faithful committed to their charge; they are approved by the Suffrages of them whom they ought to Conduct, and it is not Bribes that acquire them this honour, but Testimonies of their good life. For in the Church of God nothing is done by the allurements of Gifts; if there be among us any kind of Treasure, the Money laid up makes our Religion not ashamed. And every one contributes a little Sum at the end of the Month, or when he will; but it is if he will and can; for none are constrained to give. If we get any Alms it is of good will; riches gathered in this manner, are as the pledges of Piety; we do not confound them in eating and drinking with excess; we make not Use of them for the foul and loathsome exercise of Gluttony: but we employ them in feeding the poor, burying them, in comforting poor Orphans, in helping old men who have spent their best days in the service of the Faithful, in helping the poor that have lost by Shipwreck what they had, and in assisting them that serve in the Mines, are Banished into Islands, or shut up in Prisons, because they profess the Religion of the true God, that during the time they suffer for the Confession of his Name, they may be nourished by the stock of the Church. But it's a strange thing, that this charity among us gives occasion to some to blame us. See, say they, how they love one another; this astonisheth them, because they hate one another. See say they, how they are ready to die one for another; but as for them they are ready to kill one another. [A little after:] As we live with the same intelligence, as if we had all but one Spirit and one Soul; we have nothing in particular but our Wives, of all things in the World there is nothing but Wives, whereof we reject Community; and on the contrary among them of their Wives only there is a Community with other men. [Again:] Now seeing we live together with so much Charity, that all our Goods are common, why should they wonder if we make good cheer: for it's one of the excesses you reproach us with: besides the infamous Crimes whereof you accuse our Repasts, you charge it with Prodigality.

28. In the same place: "But you need but consider the name given to our Repasts, to know the quality thereof. They express themselves with the same word that signifies Love with the Greeks; whatsoever the cost is that is made, it is profitable, for they gain always in this expence, because it hath Piety for its foundation. It's a sweetness wherewith we comfort the want of the poor, but we do not treat them as you these infamous Gluttons, who glory in selling you their liberty for the price of their good bits, wherewith they fill their Bellies in the midst of a thousand indignities. But we will have the least served with our goods, because they we know, amongst all men, are the most acceptable unto God. Then seeing our Feasts have for honest end, consider what our Discipline should be in the rest of our Actions, even those which more concern the Duties of Religion; it permits nothing that is dishonourable, nor far from Modesty. Before we go to Table we are fed with Heavenly Meat, which is the Prayer we make to God; we eat as much as is necessary to satisfy one's appetite, we drink as much as is permitted to persons that have a care of their Purity. They that sit there, take their reflection with so much Temperance, as they may remember they are obliged to worship God even at night. They entertain one another as People that know God hears what they say. After the Repast done, they have washed their hands, and lighted the Candles, they are invited to praise God, and sing Psalms taken out of the holy Scripture, or Hymns every one composes according to the capacity of his mind. By this it may be known, if they have committed any excess at Table; as the Repast began with Prayer, so it ends; they go forth not in divers Troops to defile their hands with the Blood of Men, not in several Bands running in the Streets, not to do insolencies; but with the same care they had in coming in, preserve their Modesty and Chastity.

29. Finally, Christians retire with so much staidness, that we may very well see they are not fed so much with corporal Meats, as the substance of Heavenly and Holy Discipline. Certainly, it were but reason that this Society of the Christians should be reputed unlawful, if it were like to that the Laws forbid; it were but good reason it should be condemned, if it were not different from that which deserves to be condemned; if one would reproach it with the same things wherewith they accuse factious Societies. But tell me, Did we ever assemble to procure the hurt of any one? we are the same in a body, as when separated: as we are in particular, so we are in general: that is to say, in whatsoever estate we are found, we injure no body; when any Virtuous or Godly People are associated, when any Pious or Chast Persons assemble together, their Union should not be called a Faction, but a lawful Society. Thus Tertullian, to whole words, as to the harmless carriage of the Christians in their Assemblies, Apostates witnessed, as appeareth from what Pliny the younger wrote to Trajan. As for the Crimes supposed to be committed by them, they ever challenged any witness to be produced of them, and sufficiently confute the vain reports in their Apologies. They laughed at the fiction of the Allic's head, and such like stuff, and as for worshipping Croffes, Octavius in his answer to Cecilius saith, Cruces etiam nec colimus nec optamus. Croffes we neither worship nor wish for. Neither did they meet for Seditious ends, as for the alteration of Governments, destruction of Princes, or changing of Magistrates. Though they, rather than any of late time, might pretend to Saintship, yet did they not make it an advantage to raise themselves; whereby they laid no claim to the Riches, Power, or Dominion of the World; they did not hold, That temporal Dominion was founded in Grace, nor that the true and spiritual Kingdom of Jesus Christ destroyed the Right and Interest of earthly Princes. They made no Insurrections, covered on Rebellious Designs with the name of Religion; neither did by violence attempt a Reformation; although they were so many Thoulands, as in all probability they might have born down all before them; though they filled all Places, consisted of all Degrees, and hereby shared in all Interests, in Power and Intelligence, and by their Combinations might have taken their Opportunities, and easily by force of Arms made way for their Designs, yet obedience to their Princes, they ever held most inviolable by the Principles of their Religion, and made Use of no other weapons than Prayers and Tears, though for their own Safety and Preservation. Hear to this purpose what Challenges Tertullian makes to such, as if he had not had truth on his side, would have been sufficiently ready to infance wherein the Christians offended, which they yet never adventured to do.

30. In the midst of all these outrages you observed that these People, who (as you think) have framed so strange a Conspiracy, and on the other side might be animated enough for revenge, by the Punishment wherewith you take away their lives, endeavoured any thing against you to resent the evil treating they have received? Think you that they want an Occasion? when in one Night only a small number of Torches would be enough to satisfy their Revenge, if with us it were permitted to render evil for evil; but God forbid we should do so. A Religion that is all divine, ought not to revenge by the instigation of Men, and must not think it strange to suffer that which is made Use of to prove them. If we would declare against you as open; rather than pursue you as secret Enemies, might we not have Forces and Troops enough? It may be the Moors and Marcomanni, the Perthians, or whatsoever People they are shut up in the bounds of the Country they Inhabit, make a greater number of Men, than they that are spread throughout all the Universe, and have no other Limits than that of the World. Our Religion is but of late, and we fill already all that your Power acknowledgeth, Cities, Fortresses, Isles, Provinces, the Assemblies of the People, the Armies also, the Wards and Tents of Rome, the Palace, the Senate, and the Publick places; Finally, we leave you but the Temples. What Wars were we not able to undertake with what readines might we not arm our selves, although we should be the weaker? we that suffer our selves so willingly to be killed, if in our Religion it were not rather lawful to let our selves be killed, than to kill others; we could also make War against you without taking up Arms, by casting our selves into a revolt; it were enough not to live with you, and to separate our selves, our Divorce would print Shame in your foreheads. For, if Christians, who make so great a multitude of all sorts of Persons, should abandon you, to retire unto some Country of the World dispersed from all Society; truly the loss of so many Citizens, of what condition soever, would disparage your Government, and also our retreat would be a rude Punishment to you; without doubt this solitude that would remain with you, this silence of all things, this

'general astonishment of Nature, even as if all the world were dead, would frighten you, you might go seek Subjects to Command, there would remain to you more Enemies than Citizens: now you have more Citizens than Enemies, because there are a greater number of Christians among you.

31. Thus we see their peaceable demeanour; how their minds stood affected towards their Princes, let Tertullian also inform us: 'As for us, in the Prayers we make for the Emperors, we call upon the Eternal God, the true God, the living God, &c. [In the same place:] It is to him to whom we Christians address our Prayers, make them with hands opened and lifted up, because Innocent, the head bare, because no cause to be ashamed when we pray to God: There is none telleth us the words we are to say, because it is our heart that speaketh, rather than our Tongue. We Pray for all the Emperors, and ask of God that he would give them a long Life, that their Empire enjoy a profound Peace, their House happy Concord, their Armies be innumerable, themselves assisted with good Councils, the People remain in their Duties, no trouble arise in the World against their Authority. In Conclusion, we forget nothing the Prince can wish for, either as a Man, or as an Emperor. [A little after:] Whilst we implore the Grace of God for the Emperors with our hands lifted up, and stretched towards Heaven, let Irons pierce us, let us be put on Gibbets and Crosses, Fires consume us, Knives cut our Throats, Beasts devour us: A Christian while in Prayer lifting up his hands to God, is in a condition fit to receive all sorts of Punishment; and therefore continue, O Magistrates, do affected to Justice; ravish our Souls whilst they are in Prayers for the welfare of the Emperors, and make a Crime of Truth and the Service of God. [In the following Chapter:] We treat them who believe our Religion takes no care of the preservation of the Emperors, to examine the Laws of our God, to read our Books which we hide not, and which by divers accidents fall into other hands than ours. They will learn there, that it is commanded by a superabundant Charity, to pray to God for our Enemies, and to wish good to them that persecute us. Now, have we greater Enemies, and ruder Persecutors, than those who make offended Majesty the ground of the Crime they impute unto us? Holy Scriptures content not themselves with this Commandment; they have another more precise and clearer. Pray, say they, for Kings, Princes, and Powers, that you may live in Peace in the midst of Publick Tranquillity. [In another place:] But why should I stay longer in making known with what sense of Religion and Piety Christians honour Emperors? It sufficeth to say, we are obliged to render them our Duties, as to whom our Master hath commanded us so to do.

32. As these Primitive Saints were good Christians in the exercise of their Religion, and dutiful Subjects towards their Princes, so also good Men, free from vice, and adorned with Virtues, or if any were noted to be of contrary practice they were disowned, and the Censures of the Church cut them off from its Society. "We speak as boldly (saith Tertullian) of the Christians you put to Death, for we have an unprovable Testimony of their Integrity, which we take also from your Registers. You who are employed every day in judging those that are kept in Prisons, and who terminate their Processes by the Sentences you give against them, of all the Malefactors accused before you of so many sorts of Crimes, is there any of them charged with Murder, Robbery, Sacrilege, and other faults, to whom they impute also that he is a Christian? either, when Christians are presented to be punished as Criminals, because they are Christians, is there any amongst them whose life is like that of other Prisoners? all the Malefactors wherewith your Prisons are so filled; that they are overcharged, are of your Religion, they are also of your Religion; that make the Mines grope under the weight of their strokes, they are the wretched Creatures of the same Religion you are, wherewith the wild Beasts fill their Bellies. All those poor Criminals which your Citizens keep to make them cruelly kill one another before a bloody People, have the same opinion you have of the Deity. Finally, among all those wretched Creatures there's not one Christian, unless he be charged by justice, because of his name Christian: Or if there be a Christian found attainted of the same Crime, he hath no more the name Christian, because he hath lost that divine quality in losing his Innocency. [Elsewhere:] But some will say, even among us there are 'a People that give themselves the liberty of doing evil, that free themselves from subjection to our Laws, from any whatever exact observation of what is legally commanded by us. It is true there are some such, but so soon as they fall into this disorder, we hold them no more for Christians. The fear of God, and purity of his Precepts constrained them to this holy demeanour; for opinion of Men and their Rules, as this our Author observeth, cannot reach the heart, nor procure that Virtue which is truly good. "The admirable fruits their Doctrine produced (the knowledge whereof became Publick by the Commerce they had in the World) made so down-right a Conflict with rude Incredulity, that to defend herself she was forced to say, That their Profession had no Divine matter in it, but was only a Sect of Philosophy, that obliged Christians to rank themselves there in the exercise of Moral Virtues.

33. Though there was some diversity of Opinions amongst them, yet as we shewed before, they maintained mutual Love; and that herein they were highly eminent as to all Pious Effects, is already evident. Origen in his Work against Celsus (wherein he especially answereth to Cavils raised against the Author and Doctrine of Christian Religion) takes off that prejudice that might arise from diversity of Opinions, by a Comparison of this difference with the numerous (or rather innumerable) Sects of Heathen Philosophers. Tertullian layeth the great guilt of Heresie upon such, who being animated with the Spirit of Philosophy, infected the Purity of the Gospel with the corruption of their own Opinions. In the same place he acquainteth us what was the Primitive touch-stone of Doctrines most worthy now to be considered. "These People (saith he) that are separated from us, have violated the Faith of Jesus Christ, and we beat down their errors by this only exception, That the true rule of Truth is, that which hath been taught by our Master, and transmitted to us by those holy Persons who had the happiness to hear his Word, and receive his Divine Institutions; we shall shew in another place, that all which is not conformable to this rule, hath been invented by new Doctors, who came not till after the blessed Companions of the Son of God.

34. All these excellent qualities in those Holy Persons, might have sufficed to stop the mouths of Calumniators, and had weight sufficient to have moved the minds of all Men to the Truth. But that Victory which Christians obtained over Devils, might much more have convinced them of the Power which was Superior to that of their false Gods. "Christians were wont to drive away these Devils from the Bodies of Men, forced them to confess that they were no other than Devils, and that Jesus Christ was the Son of God, and his way the true Religion. [As to the former, first hear Tertullian.] But if we were not near you, who would snatch you away from these secret Enemies, whose Malignant Operations make so strange a confusion in your Minds, and so horrible an alteration of your Healths? I have heard speak of the possession of Devils, where with you are tormented; from whence we deliver you freely, and without reward; if we had the Spirit of Revenge, it were enough to satisfy us, that these corrupted Spirits might, at all times seize on your Bodies, and that entrance therein were always open to them. But as you do not think of that you ought, viz. to fear a Protection, you cease not to declare a People to be your Enemies, who do you no hurt, whose assistance is so absolutely necessary for you. It is true, we are Enemies, yet not of Men; but of their Errors. [In another place.] As for Devils or Genies, we are wont to conjure them, to drive them away from the Bodies of Men, whereof they are seized, and render them not the Honours due to God only, by swearing by them. [Justin Martyr in his first Apology.] Many possessed with Devils throughout the World, and this your City, whom many Exorcists, Incanters, and Conjurers, could not cure, Many of our Men through the Name of Jesus Christ crucified under Pontius Pilate have healed, and now also do heal, disarming and driving out of Men those Devils that had possessed them. [In his Dialogue with Trypho the Jew.] Kαὶ τὸ πρῶτον, &c. For in the Name of this the Son of God, the first-born of every Creature, and born of a Virgin, and made a Man subject to Suffering, and crucified by your People under Pontius Pilate, who died for the dead, and ascended into Heaven, every Devil adjured is overcome and subdued. [In another place of this Apology.] And now we who believe in Jesus Christ our Lord crucified under Pontius Pilate, adjuring all Devils and Malignant Spirits, have them subject under our Power. He affirmeth the same thing in other places.

35. That Christians constrained Devils to confess themselves such, and to acknowledge the Truth of the Gospel, in this matter hear also Tertullian: "If a man should bring before your Tribunals one that were truly possess'd of a Devil, if a Christian should command him to speak, this wicked Spirit will confess that he is a Devil, with as much Truth as he saith falsely at another time he is a god. Ap. cap. 23. let them present any one of these they believe to be wrought upon within by a Deity; that in the Ceremony of the Sacrifices they offer on the Altars have the Virtue of a God, in scenting the smell which goes out of the Sacrifices; who with force belch out words out of their stomachs; within breathing declare Oracles; if this Heavenly Virgin that promitteth rain; if this Æsculapius who teacheth the Secrets of Physick, who preserves the Lives of them that must live the same soon after, confess not by the mouths of these Impostors, the feigned Inspirations of whom deceive the World that they are but Devils; if the presence of a Christian takes not from them the boldness of lying, we are willing, that in the same place you shed the Blood of this Christian, and punish him as a wicked Person. [In the same Chapter:] Now seeing by our means your gods discover to you that they are no gods, and that all the other to whom Men erect Altars, are none in like manner; but this at the same time they make you know, who the true God is, if it be this only God whom we that are Christians worship, if we must believe of him what the Christians believe, if he must be served as their Laws ordain. When you conjure your gods in the Name of Jesus Christ, Do they ask who is that Jesus Christ? Do they call the History of his Life a Fable? Do they say he is a Man of the same Education as other Men? That he was a Magician? That after he was dead, his Disciples took away his Body privately from the Sepulchre? And that he is now in Hell? Say they not rather, he is in Heaven? That he must defend to the terror of all the World; with horror to the Universe? with the Lamentation of all Men but Christians? and that he shall come down on the Earth full of Majesty, as the Virtue of God, the Spirit of God, the Word, Wisdom, Reason, and the Son of God?

36. Whence Christians came to be so strong, as to wrest these Confessions from them, hear him in the same place. "Now all the Power we have of them, is the Name of Jesus Christ who gives it us, it is the threatening we give them of the evils God is ready to pour on their heads, and which one day Jesus Christ must declare unto them. As they fear Jesus Christ in God, and God in Jesus Christ, they are under the Government of the Servants of God and of Jesus Christ: so by the only touch of our hands, and breath of our mouths, the Devils seized with fear at the sight of the Flames that environ them are forced to obey us, to come out of the Bodies they possess, in despite of them, and with murmuring to suffer this shame in our presence. You that are wont to believe them when they lie, believe them when they speak of themselves. None will tell a lie to get shame by it, but rather to gain honour; one will sooner believe them that confess against their own Interest, than those that deny to their Advantage. These Testimonies which we have of your gods make Men to be Christians; for we cannot give a full Belief to what they say, without believing in Jesus Christ our Master. Your gods kindle in our hearts the Faith which the Holy Scripture teacheth us, they strengthen our Hope, and confirm us in the assurance we have of our Salvation. As for you, to honour them, you offer them also the Blood of Christians; and if it were permitted them to lie when Christians interrogate them, and labour to make you know the Truth by their Confession, they would take good heed of discovering your Errors to you, as well for keeping the Profit they have of them, and the Honours you render them, as for the fear they might have, that in becoming your selves Christians, you drive them away as we do, from the Bodies they torment with so much rage. [In the beginning of the following Chapter:] "We need nothing but the acknowledgment we have from your gods, when we make them confess they are no gods, and when they answer us, there is no other God than the only God we serve, to purge us from the Crimes of High-Treason and Impiety to the Roman Religion.

37. No wonder then that these impure Spirits enraged at Christians, sought all manner of ways to destroy them. But yet in their Deaths they overcame them, and in all sorts of Indignities and Tortures triumphed over their implacable Adversaries; for, The Blood of the Martyrs was the Seed of the Church. That this was so indeed, Tertullian also informeth us, the veracity of whom, as to these things alleged is unquestionable, because appealing to his Adversaries, he muiltened in behalf of his cause produce such things as were most certain: the contrary whereof would have Apologized sufficiently for what he laboured to confute. We shall with the last words of his excellent Apology conclude this most delightful Subject. "But do what you please, all Inventions the most exquisite Cruelty can advise you unto, are to no purpose; so far are they from Profitting you, that contrarily they draw all the World to our Religion. The oftner you make an Harvest of the Christians, the oftner their Number increaseth: their Blood is a Seed which dies not on the earth, but puts forth prosperously. Many among you have laboured to perfwade men to suffer constantly Pain and Death, (as Cicero in his Tusculans; Seneca in his Treatise of casual things, Diogenes, Pyrrhon, and Callinicus) but Christians have better taught Constancy, by the Examples they have given, in supporting patiently so many Evils, than all the Philosophers with all their Discourses. This same obstinacy, wherewith you reproach us, is an excellent Mistress of Truth, which we believe: for who is there not that striveth with Contemplation to seek what it is, who, after his search made, comes not on our side? who having embraced the Faith of Jesus Christ, desires not to suffer for him, that by his sufferings he may get the Infinite Treasures of the grace of God, And that in the price of his Blood, they may obtain the Pardon of their Faults? for the Remission of all our Sins, is the assured recompence of our Punishments. This is the reason that when they read your Sentences of Death unto us, we render you thanks; because by an happy Emulation that meets between the Judgments of God, and the Judgment of Men, at the same instant when you condemn us here below, God pronounceth our Absolution in Heaven.

38. The Soldiers being at a Stand after the Murder of Antoninus Bassianus, were without an Emperor for two days. Then hearing that Ariabianus, the Parthian, was coming to revenge the injury offered to him, they made choice of Armenius one of their Principal Officers, but he excused himself by his Age, and the Dignity was conferred on Macrinus, by the especial inducement of the Tribunes, who alone were conscious of the fact towards Antoninus. He gave a Battle to Ariabianus, and made incredible slaughter of Men for two days, during which time, the Parthian knew nothing of his Enemies Death, but on the next day being certified thereof by Macrinus, he received the Captives with the Spoil taken in his Country, and making a League with the Roman Emperor, departed into his own Kingdom. Macrinus returning to Antioch, by Letters gave the Senate an account of his Success, and endeavouring to remove all prejudice which might arise from the obscurity of his Birth, promised to Rule with as much Moderation as any. He was cheerfully owned, not so much out of respect to himself, as hatred towards his Predecessor. During the time he Reigned, things were well reformed, but lying idle at Antioch, he gave up himself to Pleasures, and keeping there the Soldiers against their Inclination, thereby drew contempt and hatred upon himself, which wrought his Destruction.

Macrinus succeeded his Father.

39. Maja's Phœnician, Sister to Julia the Wife of Severus, had two Daughters, Soemias and Mamma. The former had a Son named Bassianus fourteen years old, and the later one called Alexianus two years younger. Both these Boys were Priests of the Sun, in the Phœnician Language called Heliogabalus, and the elder being the Chief, was also a Youth of an excellent Beauty, and for it was very much admired by the Roman Soldiers. Their Grandmother Maja hereat took occasion to affirm (whether truly or otherwise) that they were both the Sons of Antoninus, who had been familiar with both her Daughters, dwelling with her under the same roof. Having got great store of Wealth by living at Court in her Sister's time, she promised large Sums to the Soldiers, in case the Empire could be devolved upon one of them. The Soldiers hearing of, neglected it, only he sent Julianus with a Party against the Revolters, but this Party allured with the sight of the Boy and Money together, cut off their Captain's Head, and sending it back to Macrinus, were also received into the Camp. After this a Battle was fought in the Confines of Syria and Phœnicia, wherein Macrinus having the worst, fled towards Italy, but was taken at

CHAP. VII.

From the Death of Maximinus the first created Emperor without Consent of the Senate, to the Monarchy of Constantine the first Christian Emperor, who reformed Religion, and translated the Imperial Seat to Byzantium, the space of Eighty six years.

THE news of Maximinus his Death being brought to Rome, filled the City with extraordinary joy, having taken Maximus as he was Lifting Men in Italy, who thereupon went to Aquileia, and received the Army, to which he pardoned all things past. Then returned he to Rome, where he and his Collegue managed Matters with Discretion enough, could they have agreed betwixt themselves; but the one being jealous of the other, and both endeavouring to grapple all the Power into their own hands, thereby wrought to themselves sudden Destruction. The Prætorian Bands hated them both, as created by the Senate, and resolved, for the removal of such an Indignity offered to the Army, to make them away, which Maximus understanding, would have sent for the Guard of Germans; which he knew both to be faithful to him, and able to resist the Power of the other; but Balbinus suspecting that he intended something against himself, would not suffer it; and so the Soldiers entering the Palace hated them out, and after all sorts of Indignities offered to their Persons, upon report that the Germans were coming, slew them both. Now knowing no fit Person whom they might prefer, and being assured it would be very acceptable to the People, they made choice of Gordianus, who had been formerly made Cæsar. At his beginning so great an Eclipse of the Sun happened (April 2. on the second Feria, as Cappellus agreeth with Mulierus) that the Day seemed to be turned into Night, and nothing could could be done in Houses without Candles. Sabinianus in Africa attempted new Matters, but was slain. Gordianus being yet very young, undertook an Expedition against the Perfians, over whom Sapor in his Third year began to Reign, A. D. 238. having succeeded Ariarxes their first King. By the good Conduct of Misthebus his Father-in-Law he prospered very well, but he being slain or made away, the Soldiers not enduring the rawness of Gordianus, transferred the Sovereignty unto Philip, and killed him, after he had Reigned six years. It's observed, that all those Nine that slew him perished by their own hands, their own Swords, and the very fame with which they destroyed him.

2. Julius Philippus was by Birth an Arabian of Trachonitis, his Father being a notable Captain of Thieves in that Country. He made his Son partaker with him in the Imperial Dignity. In his fourth year fell on the 1000th of Rome, which was celebrated with great Pomp, and all manner of Games, from April 21st to April 21st of the following year. Engh. Hist. L. 4. c. 34. Engh. Hist. L. 4. c. 34. Christian Emperor, and that being desirous to joyn with the multitude in the Ecclesiastical Prayers, he could not be admitted till he had first rendered an account of his Faith, and joyned himself with such, as for their Sins were examined, and set in the place of Penitents; therefore because he was faulty in many things, faith the Historian, he willingly obeyed, and declared by his works his sincere and religious mind towards God. The Martyrologies will have him and his Son converted by occasion of the Solemnity of the 1000th year, and being Baptized by Fabianus Bishop of Rome, after confession of his Sins, to have been admitted to the Communion. But faith Cappellus, if any of this had been true, would the Senate that was so set against the Christians have reckoned him amongst the gods? At least would not Decius have objected this as a Crime against him? The Scythians, in his time infecting the Empire, he repelled by his Lieutenants. Marinus raising a Commotion in Pannonia, he sent Decius to quiet the Soldiers, who put the Purple upon him. Philip then led an Army against this Usurper, and they met at Verona, where the old Emperor was defeated and slain, which News coming to Rome, his Son a Child of Twelve years of Age was Murdered by the Prætorian Bands, after they had reigned about five years.

3. Quintus Trajanus Decius, as Orosius calleth him, was born in Pannonia. according to the Custom he assumed his Son into participation of the Empire. He quieted at his beginning, some motions in Gaul, but raised a great one against the Church, being Author of the seventh Persecution, out of hatred to Philip, or as others say, having conspired against Philip, out of hatred to Christianity; by his Edicts many were put to most cruel Deaths. He received his reward after a short time; for now the Goths (originally Inhabitants of Scanzia) invaded Thrace, and other places, both by Land and Sea, because fuch of them as served in the Wars had been defrauded of their pay. At the desire of the Senate, to which he commended the Commonwealth in his absence, he marched against and overthrew them in several Battels (notwithstanding that he lost his Son and Prifus Governor of Philippi revolted) but had perfected his Victory, but that he was betrayed by Gallus Hostilianus Governor of the lower Mæsa. He persuaded him to fight in a Fenny Ground, and then revealed his intention to the Enemy, by whom he was beset, and was swallowed up in a Bog, so as his Body could never be found. He was courteous enough to all but Christians, and gave satisfaction to Senate and People. He reigned two years and an half.

c. 29. c. 34

4. Vibius Gallus Hostilianus succeeded him, both in his Empire, his malice towards Christians, and his punishment. He clapped up an ignominious Peace with the Goths; unto whom he promised Money, a thing scarcely heard of before amongst the Romans; and this not being long kept, the Goths and Scythians made Incursions into Thrace, Macedonia, and Thessaly, and also into Asia, making great spoils in all places. Many other Nations after their example rebelled, and made havock of the Provinces: the Parthians also pierced into Armenia, and thence expelled Tiridates the King. The Scythians proceeded so furiously, that they seemed to carry all before them, till that Amilianus a Moor, and who commanded the Legions in Pannonia, by promises drew on his Soldiers against them, and so repelled them, that he invaded their Country; for which Service he was saluted Emperor by this Army. Gallus hearing of this, went presently against him, but was slain, together with Volusian his Son and Partner in the Empire. Such was the end of him who persecuted this Church of God, and chased away such holy Men as prayed for his peaceable and prosperous Estate.

The Persecutions of the Christians in the days of Decius and Gallus <sup>Enf. lib. 1. 7.</sup> were accompanied or followed with a most grievous Pestilence, which <sup>Enf. lib. 1. 7.</sup> so vehemently raged, that there was scarcely any Province, City or Houfe, but <sup>Enf. lib. 1. 7.</sup> was almost wasted and ruined by it. Gallus and Valerianus his Son reigned little more than one year.

Valerianus.

5. Aemilianus enjoyed the Dignity near long, for another Army near the Alpes creating Emperor one Valerianus, a Man of noble descent, his Soldiers, left they should incur any danger or trouble, killed him after three Months. Valerianus <sup>Olymp. 238. an. 1.</sup> then taking the Government upon him in Rhætia, the Senate at Rome gave the title of Cæsar to Gallienus his Son. He was at first very courteous to the Christians, and so familiarly embraced them, that his Palace was filled with Professors of the Faith; but afterward, he was persuaded by the Master of the Egyptian <sup>Enf. lib. 1. 7.</sup> Sorcerers to slay them, as Enemies to their Art, and hinderers of its operation in their presence; so that he raised the eighth Persecution, wherein many perished. But God avenged the cause of his Saints upon him; for going against Sapores the King of the Persians, he was taken Prisoner, and could not be released, notwithstanding the intercession of the Persian's Confederates, who alleged, that the Romans the more they were overcome, the more vehemently they ever resisted. Sapores kept and used him as a fool to tread on when he got on Horse-back, and at length pulling his skin over his ears, tortured him to death. Gallienus <sup>Enf. lib. 1. 7.</sup> his Son, who all this time had reigned with him, terrified hereat, stopped the Persecution of the Christians; but many of the Romans who had been the instruments of the Emperor's Cruelty, being to be punished as well as he, many Nations fell like a flood upon the Roman Empire, Gallienus giving up himself to all wantonness and luxury. The Germans over-running Rhætia and part of Italy, came as far as Ravenna, the Allemands also waiking Gall pierced into Italy, Greece, Macedonia, Pontus, and Asia, were overwhelmed with an Inundation of the Goths and Scythians. Dacia beyond Danubius was perpetually lost, the Quadi and Sarmatæ seized on Pannonia, and the Parthians having got into their hands Mesopotamia, made Incursions into Syria.

Gallienus.

6. Gallienus neglected these motions, answering always concerning these matters, as if notwithstanding them the Empire might flourish and do well enough. He thus little minding the Commonwealth, the Soldiers almost in all places chose them Emperors; so that at this time there were no less than thirty Tyrants. The most notable of these upstarts was Posthumus, who reigned in Gall with great commendations ten years; he used much Moderation, expelled the Enemies, and recovered Provinces. All those Thirty fell at length, either fighting with one another, or with the Emperor. But Gallienus at last, being contemned, was slain, having reigned six years together with his Father, and nine by himself, A.V.C. 1021. A.D. 268. His Successor was Flavius Claudius a Dalmatian born, according to his own desire, and the will of the Senate, who killing of the Goths and other Barbarians, to the number of Three hundred and thirty thousand Men, and sinking Two thousand Vessels, the Senate decreed him a Golden Shield to be set up in the Court, and a Statue in the Capitol; but to the great loss of the Commonwealth, he was slain at Syracuse, when he had scarcely reigned two years. Into his place was advanced Aurelius Quintillus his Brother, an excellent Person; but being too good, they that set him up pulled him down, because they could not bear his gravity and strictness, killing him the seventeenth day after, at Aquileia. Then reigned Valerius Aurelianus, born either at Syracuse or some place in Dacia, of mean Parentage. Being by Claudius appointed to drive the Goths out of Thrace, he was after his death faluted Emperor. He was an excellent Soldier, and restored the Empire well nigh to its former bounds. He drove out the Goths from about Danubius; then returning to Rome, and there punishing some Seditious Persons, he marched into the East, to reduce those parts to their former Obedience.

Aurelianus.

7. In the days of Gallienus, the Persians having subdued Mesopotamia, and invaded Syria, one Odenatus an Inhabitant of Palmyra, a City of this Country, gathering together a Company of Boors, fell upon them, and so ordered his affairs, that he beat them out of Syria, recovered Mesopotamia, and incamped before Ctesiphon the Metropolis. Being slain after this Conquest, Zenobia his Wife in right of her Children kept Possession of the East, together with Egypt. Aurelianus now going against her, in his way, in Illyricum, Thrace, and other places, defeated such Enemies as he met, and then entering Syria, after some trouble and danger, danger, overthrew, and took the Queen her self near Antioch, and then recovered all her Dominions. But after his departure the Inhabitants of Palmyra killed his Garrison and revolted, which calling him back, he destroyed both the City and them therein, sparing neither Sex nor Age, and after this recovered Egypt. Then returning into the West, he bent his endeavours against Tetricus, who reigned in Gall. Tetricus being vexed by his Seditious Soldiers, desired him, whom he termed Invisible, to rescue him from such evils, and betrayed his Army into his hands. Valerian, growing proud upon such success, first of all Romans let a Diadem on his head, and adorned himself with Gold and Pearl. He began also to persecute the Christians; but undertaking a War against the Persians, he was slain betwixt Byzantium and Heraclea, through the malice of his Secretary, in the sixth year of his Reign. In his first year, Horismis the third Persian King began his Reign, which lasted but one year. Him succeeded Varane, and Reigned three years, and him followed Narzes, who continued twenty eight. In his first year also died Plotinus the Platonist, who deriding all Religion, perished through the just Judgment of God by a filthy and painful Disease, although he had chosen a pleasant and wholesome place wherein to live in Campania. Now also flourished Porphyrius his Scholar, who of a Christian became a great Enemy to Christianity, and wrote Fifteen Books against it, to which Eusebius answered in thirty, of which twenty were extant in the time of Jerome, but at this day not one.

Tacitus.

Probus.

8. There was an inter-regnum after the Death of Valerian for eight Months, the Senate and Army framing countess the one with the other, at length the Senate made choice of Tacitus, a man of Consular Dignity, who in his sixth Month died of a Fever at Tarsum. The Senate desired him, that in case he should die presently, he would not leave his Children his Successors, but some man of approved worth and valour, as the necessity of the State required. This man was Probus; yet notwithstanding, Florianus the Brother of Tacitus invaded the Empire, but was cut off by Probus near Tarsum, within the space of two or three Months. Probus unwillingly receiving the burthen upon him, managed the Government with great commendation. He recovered Gall out of the hand of the Francones; a people of Germany, which now first seized on it, after many bloody Battels, and after this was engaged in Civil Wars. For Sabinianus was saluted Emperor in Egypt, who was overthrown also, and killed also against his mind, and the same success he had against Proculus in Gall and Bonosus a Britann born. He overthrew the Sarmatians, subdued several barbarous Nations about Thrace, by the terror of his name only, quieted all Asia, and forced the Parthian King to desire Peace, which he granted. Returning afterward into Thrace, he planted several barbarous People within the Roman Empire, whereof some revolting, he chastized and reduced them. Now all things flourished exceedingly through Peace and Security, which made him something slight the Soldiers, who thereupon, as he was marching through Illyricum against the Persians, murdered him at Syracuse, though he fled for safety into a fortified Tower. That saying undid him, Si visceris non opus erit amplius Romano Imperio militibus, a speech of great Despair for the Soldiers. Witty and sharp speeches fallen from Princes have often given fire to Seditions. Surely, saith the most Learned Viscount of St. Albans, Princes had need in tender matters, and ticklish times, to beware what they say: especially in those short speeches, which fly abroad like Darts, and are thought to be shot out of their secret intentions. For as for large Discourses, they are flat things, and not so much noted.

Carus.

Diocletian.

9. M. Aurelius Carus, of the Province of Narbon in Gall, succeeded him, who, when he had created Cæsar: his two Sons, Carinus and Numerianus, restrained the Sarmatians, that upon the death of Probus threatened Syria: But going against the Persians, after he had recovered Mesopotamia, and taken the two noble Cities of Parthia, Ctesiphon, and Cocbe, he was slain by a Thunder-bolt in his Tent near to the River Tigris. Of his two Sons, Numerianus was with him, and Carinus was left behind to look to Gall. Numerianus returning out of the East as Conqueror, and lying sick in his Litter, was killed by Arim Afer his Father-in-Law, who gaped after the Empire. Scarcely after some days was this wickedness detected by the stench of the Carcass, and then the Author of it being also discovered, Valerius Diocle- ianus, who governed the Family of Carus, was chosen Emperor, and rewarded Aper as he had deserved. On the Fifteenth before the Calends of December, and ten days after, he entered Nicomedia in Purple. From the beginning of this Diocletian the Egyptians began a new Era, fetching its Rise from the new Moon of Thoth the preceding Month (Aug. 29) which they called the Era of Grace, for some reason or other. Capellus observeth, that the fluctuating and vitious Chronology of Baronius henceforth beginneth to be right. For thinking, faith he, that he exhibited the years both of the true, and received Era of Christ, in truth, he exhibited neither the one nor the other. Beginning the Era of Diocletian from the 284 year of our Lord, it's true, and right, so that it be understood of the received, not of the true Era of Christ: and the same is to be said concerning the years of the following Emperors. But after this, Carinus and Diocletian fought for the Sovereignty, and Carinus after much ado was slain by his own Soldiers for his lasciviousness, which made an end of a bloody and laborious War.

to, Diocletian then enjoyed the Dignity alone; but great stir arising in Gall, Carausius also, who was set to defend the Sea-Coasts from the Invasion of the Franks and Saxons, rather taking part with them than otherwise, he was constrained to create Cæsar, Maximianus Herculius. He suppressed the motions in Gall, but commanding Carausius to be killed, this man put on the Purple, though a man of mean condition, and Narjes King of Persia invaded the Eastern parts. Diocletian, awakened with these dangers, promoted Maximianus to be Augustus, and they two adopted for Cæsars Maximianus Galerius, and Constantius Chlorus, who Married Theodora the Wife's Daughter of Hercules, and by her had six Sons, as of other, the Daughter of Diocletian, Carausius valiantly held Britain for seven years, and then was slain by Allectus, who having kept possession of the Island three years, was overthrown by Asterodorus. Constantius fighting against the Allemans in Gall, at first was worsted, but afterwards got a great Victory, wherein Sixty thousand of them are said to have been slain. Maximianus Herculius reduced Africa. Diocletian himself besieging Achilles in Alexandria eight Months, at length slew him therein, gave up the City to be plundered by the Soldiers, and vexed all Egypt with Proscriptions and Slaughters. Galerius was overthrown by the Persian King, and fled to Diocletian who received him with great disdain, and made him run in his Purple Robe for some miles before his Chariot. Galerius much moved by this disgrace, recruited his Army throughout Illyricum and Mæsa, and returning against Narjes, routed his Army, took his Camp, his Wives, Sisters, and Children, many of his Nobles, and great Treasure, wherewith returning into Mesopotamia unto Diocletian, he was then received most honourably; for he had taken Cressphor, subdued Affria, and recovered those five Provinces beyond Tigris, which revolted from Assyria.

11. After this were the Carpi, Bastarnæ, and Sarmatians overthrown; and divers other Nations quited. Diocletian now suffered himself to be called Lord, and worshipped as a God. He in the East, and his Collegue in the West, raised against the Christians the most heavy Persecution that ever yet had happened both for length and cruelty. The Soldiers were first begun with, whereof all such as would not sacrifice to Devils were cashiered; but the Persecutors proceeded to such cruelty and rage that some were Crucified, others Burnt alive, others roasted with slow Fires, and others pulled in pieces by having their Limbs made fast to boughs of Trees, which being brought together for that purpose, were afterwards suffered to return to their natural Position. Some were starved to death, many slain with the sword, and many devoured of wild Beasts. Some were fled alive, others beaten to death by hot burning Iron Rods, and some returned to Prison after their Torments; there to languish away. Women were hung naked by one foot, and some had their Breasts feared: no Sex, no Age, no condition was spared. A terrible Earthquake followed in Syria, which destroyed many Thousands about Tyre and Sidon. But in the second year of this Persecution Diocletian perswaded his Collegue, though unwilling, That they both might resign the Empire to the two Cæsars, so that he being seized with a foul Disease, after he had almost reigned twenty years, put off the Purple at Nicomedia, and Maximianus Herculius the same day at Milain.

The former withdrew to Salene into his own Countrey; and the later into Lucania.

12. Diocletian was still buffed and perplexed with Wars during his Reign, and well might be wearied and content to resign the Empire; and yet he was also extraordinarily taken up with making Laws, being consulted and Petitioned by multitudes of Persons upon occasion, whose Names are set to his Answers, still extant in Justinian's Code. And his Rescripts are rather more numerous than those of any Prince mentioned and recorded for Laws in that Code, except it be those of Justinian himself. But they, and those of other Princes till Constantine, generally concern the Rights of Private Persons, and belong to the Jus privatum; and therefore are not by us to be handled or considered, who write an History, not a Book of Law. And those Answers are generally directed and inscribed to private Persons consulting; whereas those made by Constantine, and his Successors, as they much appertain to the Jus publicum, and consequently are Historical, so are they directed to the Præfidi Prætorio, or other great Officers or Governors, either serving at Court, or in the Provinces.

Galerius*, and Constantius Chlorus.

13. The two Cæsars, Maximianus Galerius, and Constantius Chlorus became Augusti after the resignation of their Fathers-in-Law, and first of all others parted the Empire between them. To Constantius fell Gall, Britain, Spain, Italy, and Africa; to the other Illyricum, with Greece, and Asia. Galerius created Cæsars his Sister's two Sons, Galerius Maximinus and Severus. The East he appointed to Maximinus, and intended Italy for Severus; if he could but take it from Constantius. For this purpose he kept at Rome, as an Hostage, Constantine the Son of Constantius by Helena a British Woman, as some say, which he put away when he Married the Daughter of Maximianus. But Constantine made an escape to his Father, who died at Tork in Britain not long after; on the 25 of July, in the third year of his reign, he and his Collegue both the sixth time being Con- year of the 27 Olympiad ending. His Son Constantine in Britain was now saluted Emperor.

14. The Image of Constantine was exhibited at Rome, according to the Custom. But Maxentius the Son of Maximianus Herculius, as Zosimus writes, thinking it intolerable that he who was born of a Concubine should have his Matters succeed according to his Desire, and he the Son of an Emperor should lie neglected, and his Father's Dominion go to others, with the assistance of Marcellianus and Marcellus Tribunes of the Army, and Lucianus who provided Hog's Flesh, allowed by the Treasury to the Roman People, and of the Prætorian Soldiers, whom he obliged by great Promises, took the Title of Emperor upon him. Abyllus Præfidi of the City endeavoured to hinder their Proceedings, but was killed by them. Against him did Maximianus Galerius, sent his Nephew Severus; but Maxentius corrupted most of his Men, and drew to his side Anullinus, the Præfidi Prætorio, and thereby easily overthrew him, and forced him to fly to Ravenna. These things coming to the ears of Maximianus Herculius, he was concerned for Maxentius his Son, and leaving Lucania came to Ravenna, whence perceiving that Severus could not be driven out, the place was so strong and so well victualled, he circumvented him by Oaths, and perswaded him to go to Rome; in the way whither, when he came to the Tres Tabernæ, he was seized by some whom Maxentius had sent to intrap him, & strangled. Now was Maximianus Galerius as much concerned in behalf of his Nephew, as Maximianus Herculius was for his Son, and he resolved to move from the East, and revenge his Death upon Maxentius, but coming to the Coasts of Italy, and finding his Soldiers not firm unto him, he returned into the East without a Battle. Maximianus Herculius being disturbed with these disorders, repaired to his old Collegue Diocletian, who then lay at Carnuntum a Town of Gall, faith Zosimus, for which Sigonius writes, Carnuntum a place of Illyricum, and endeavoured to perswade him to resume the Empire, and not suffer that which they with so great labours had preserved, to be exposed to the youth and madness of those who had seized it. But Diocletian would not consent, preferring his Quiet before business, and perhaps, Zosimus tells you, foreseeing how things would be disordered; as he was a man most observant of Religion. Poor Christians, indeed, found he was of Paganish Superstition and Idolatry, to their cost:

15. Herculus this way frustrated; went toward the Alpes, having taken Ravenna in his way, to meet with Constantine: And being naturally unquiet and unfaithful; thought to cheat him by giving him his Daughter in Marriage. Thereby he engaged him to pursue Maximianus Galerius, now quitting Italy, and to circumvent even Maxentius his own Son. Finding that he would obey him, he departed, and indeavoured to recover the Imperial Power, hoping to beget a quarrel betwixt his Son-in-law, and his Son. While he was indeavoured to bring this about, Maximianus Galerius being much acquainted with one Licinius, created him Emperor, purposing by him to make War against Maxentius; but died in the mean time of a Wound which was incurable; and then Licinius managed his own Matters. All this while was Herculus employed in drawing off the Soldiers from his own Son, and when by Largesses and miserable requests he had got them over to himself; then began to deal in the same manner with his Son-in-law, and tampered also with his Soldiers. But he was prevented by his Daughter Faustina, who revealed all to Constantine her Husband; at which Discovery, falling into despair, he died at Tarzus of Sickness; as Zofimus writes, but as Sigonius hath it from others, was strangled at Marcellis by Command of Constantine: Maxentius by his Death freed from former Inconveniences thought himself secure, and sent some into Africa, and to Carthage to carry about his Pictures. The Soldiers in those Parts out of love to the memory of Galerius, would not permit this to be done, and afterward hearing that he was about to undertake an Expedition to chastise them, departed for Alexandria, but meeting with such Forces as they were not able to over-power, returned to Carthage. Now did Maxentius resolve to go into Africa, and be revenged on them, but the Haruspices discouraging him from what they saw by their Birds, and he fearing that Alexander, who in Africa exercised the Office of Præfatus Prætorio might withstand him, thought it safest to deal first with him; and demand of him his Son for an Hostage. Alexander suspecting that he would deal perfidiously, denied to send his Son, whereupon Maxentius employed some to take advantage and make him away. This being discovered, the Soldiers were glad of the occasion; and rebelling, delivered the Purple to Alexander.

16. This Alexander was a Phrygian by descent, a Coward, slow to all Business, and besides, an old Man. At this time a Fire happened in Rome, it's uncertain, Zofimus saith, whether from the Air or the Earth, and the Temple of Fortune was burnt. Great Concourse being made to quench it; a certain Soldier spake some Blasphemous words (Thus Writers term them) against the Divinity, and was killed by the multitude, out of Piety roit. Hereupon the Soldiers fell into a Mutiny, and were hardly kept from destroying the City, their fury being appeased by Maxentius. Now did he look for some pretence to make War upon Constantine, and pretending to grieve for the Death of his Father, of which he was the Cause, purposed to take the way leading to Rhetia, as nearest to Gall and the Illyrican Regions; for he Dreamt that he should seize upon Dalmatia and Illyricum, by the assistance of the Military Officers of those quarters, and of the Forces of Licinius. But he resolved first to settle matters in Africa, and for this purpose he sent over Rufus Velusianus his Præfatus Prætorio, with whom he joynted Zenas, a Man most famous for his Skill in War, and his gentleness of disposition. By them Alexander was easily mastered, taken, and put to Death. The War being in this manner composed, a large opportunity was afforded to Calumniation; and all in a manner who were in Africa, considerable for Birth or Wealth, were accused as having sided with him, and none were spared, some being killed, and others deprived of their Estates. And a Triumph there was at Rome, for those mischiefs that were done at Carthage, and Maxentius in Italy, and in the City carried all things on, as suited with his Lust and Cruelty.

17. Constantine having the man formerly suspected, now found more reason to beware of him, and prepared to make War against him. At this time he had his Abode in Gallia Belgica, at Colleis, where in his second Consulship, and that of Licinius, he composed matters about the Tributes of Gall, and granted Indulgence to Arraers, particularly through Lugdunensis Prima (for now there were two Lugdunenses, though afterwards four) amongst the Cities, of which was Augustodunum, an Inhabitant whereof Eumenius an Orator, gave him thanks in a Panegyric still extant. Having arrived at the seventh year of his Reign, he moved against Maxentius, who was in his fifth, from Gall into Italy, in the Month of August and September, at the latter end of which he there arrived.

From

From this Month, the eighth before the Calends of October, and his arrival and making War against Maxentius is the Original of the Indictions to be reckoned, of which mention is made in the Code of Theodosius. The first Law of this Code concerning Tribute, and directed to Antonius Marcellinus, the President of the Province of Lugdunensis Prima, was made this year also, by Constantine, and dated at Calein on the first of July, as Gothofred shewes. Zofimus writes, That having raised Forces out of such barbarous People as he had subdued, as also from amongst the Germans, other Celtick Nations, and the Britans, to the number of Ninety thousand Foot, and Eight thousand Horse, he moved from the Alpes into Italy, where, such Towns as yielded he hurt not at all, but such as stood out he reduced by force. With Maxentius who was furnishing himself with far more numerous Forces, Eighty thousand Romans and Italians joined, and as many of the Tyrrhenians as inhabited the Sea-Coast. The Carthaginians also sent him an Army of Forty thousand, and the Sicilians furnished him with Men; so that all his Forces consisted of an Hundred and seventy thousand Foot, and Eighteen thousand Horse.

18. Such were the Forces on both sides, when Maxentius, the more to provide for his Security, caused a Bridge to be laid over the River Tiber, so divided in the middle that it might be drawn asunder, and the sides parted upon occasion; and he commanded the Workmen, that when they should fee the Army of Constantine upon the Joynt of the Bridge, they should draw back those Irons that held it together, and dissolve it, that as many as were thereon might fall and be Drowned. In the mean time, Constantine comes before Rome, and incamps himself in a large plain, very convenient for Horse. Maxentius being besieged, farthest to his Gods, consults the Extripices concerning the Event of the War, and searcheth the Sybilline Books, wherein he finds an Oracle, That he who should design things tending to the detriment of the Roman People should perish by a miserable Death. This he applied to himself, as fighting against those who attempted to take Rome; and the Event shewed the truth. For when he had led his Forces out of the City, and passed the Bridge which he had Built, an infinite number of Owles flew and filled the Walls, which being seen by Constantine, he Commands his Men to be drawn out. The Armies facing each other, he sent his Horse to Engage the Cavalry of the Enemy, and then gave the Sign to his Footmen. A Bloody Engagement following, the Romans and Italians their Associates, were slow in venturing their lives, hoping to be freed from a Cruel Tyranny; but of the rest fell an innumerable Multitude, as well trodden down by the Horse as killed by the Foot of Constantine. As long as the Horse made resistance, some hope remained to Maxentius; but it being beaten, he with the rest thought it best to fly over the Bridge into the City. With the weight of them that fled the Bridge was forced asunder, and Maxentius falling down with the rest of the Multitude, perished in the River. The noise of the Victory being brought into the City, none of the Inhabitants durst rejoice, for fear it should prove false; but when the Head of Maxentius was carried in upon a Pole, they changed their folly for gladness. Constantine after this Success, punished a few of those that had been most familiar with Maxentius, but took off the Prætorian Soldiers, and demolished the Holds where they were wont to lye. And when he had settled matters of the City, removed to the Celtæ and Galles. Thus writes Zofimus.

19. Others confirm, that in the sixth year of his Tyranny, the very day whereon he had Usurped; the third after he had parted from Rome, he was overthrown near the Bridge called Pons Milvius, by Constantine, and by the fall of it was precipitated and drown'd. The day following Constantine entered Rome, where he staid about two Months, viz. the latter part of October, all November, and the latter part of December. As for what he did while in the City, he restored Aurelius Rufinus to be Præfatus, who upon Maxentius his quitting it, had been put out, and Amnius Annuleanus placed in his stead. And Maxentius being now subdued, as the Custom had been of other good Princes his Predecessors, he took care for Suppression of Informers, by Penalties inflicted on them which he had formerly inflicted, which also he enforced the following year, according as Victor the Historian testifies of him. That he silenced Calumnies by most severe Laws. Having settled matters at Rome, he went to Milan, where he Married to Licinius, his Sister Constantia, having formerly promised her to him when he had a mind to engage him against Maxentius. The year following, we find Constantine also at Milan in the Month of March. This year he took care for the Affairs of Africk, both as to Religion by giving Incouragement, and granting Immunities to Christian Clerks and Churches, and also by settling the Country after the great disorder there raised, by means of Maxentius. Having settled matters in Africk and Italy, he departed from Milan, and went into the Lower Germany, where, returning to Triers, he repressed the Franks, and other Barbarians, who would have passed the Rhine, and continued there in the Months of November and December, making several Laws for Reformation of Abuses.

They fall out.

20. In the mean time Disorder arose betwixt Licinius and Maximianus, or Maximinus Caesar, the Son of Maximianus Galerius his Benefactor, and it grew so high, that it proceeded to a War, wherein at first Licinius had the worst, but presently again he recruited, and engaging in another Battle, put Maximianus to flight, who taking his way for Aegypt, came to Tarsus, and there died. By this means came the Empire to be devolved on Licinius and Constantine, who also after a little time fell out, not for that Licinius, you must know, gave any just Cause, but because Constantine seemed, according to his Custom, to have observed Agreements with little Truth and Fidelity. So Zosimus is pleased to write, and begin his Game of Calumnies against Constantine, with what Success we shall see largely hereafter. But besides this seeming, or appearing to break Covenants, he adds, That he would also have drawn some Nations subject to Licinius, from their Obedience. Therefore their Discord increasing, they both provided to decide the Controversy by the Sword. Licinius gathered his Forces together at Cibalæ, a Town of Pannonia, seated on an Hill, to which lay a way up of the breadth of five Furlongs, but at the end of this passage was a vast Plain, where he incamped himself, near to which adjoynd a deep Fenn. Licinius drew out his Forces in length under the Hill, for the strength of his Wings; and Constantine ordered his Battle at the Mountain, and placed his Horse in the Front, left the Enemy should fall on a sudden on his Foot, which was slow in motion. Having this Advantage, he fell with violence upon Licinius his Men; and a Fight was fought, Zosimus had almost said, sharper than any other. Both having spent their Missile Weapons, for a long time they disputed it with their Swords and Pikes. When the Battle had continued from Morning to Night, the Right Wing wherein Constantine Commanded, had the better. Therefore Licinius his Legions seeing him leaping on Horseback, and prepared for Flight, durst not stay any longer in that place, nor Sup, but leaving their Sheep and Cattle, and all their Baggage; and taking only so much Meal along with them, as would serve to drive away hunger that Night, in all haste they came with him to Sirmium, a City of Pannonia, washed on both Sides by a River, which empties it self into Ister. Licinius staid not here, but broke down the Bridge, and made all the haste he could to get into Thrace, and there to Reinforce his Troops.

Licinius is worsted at Cibalæ.

21. Constantine having taken in Cibalæ, Sirmium, and all other places in that Tract, which Licinius had forsaken, sent to pursue him Five thousand Legionary Soldiers; but they not knowing the ways through which he fled, could not reach him. He repaired then the Bridge over Savus, which Licinius had broken, and marched after him, and coming into Thrace, found him again incamped on a Plain. The same Night he arrived, he put his Men into order of Battle, and gave Orders they should be ready against the Morning; and Licinius then drew out his Men also, being assisted by Valens, to whom he had given the Title of Cæsar, after his Flight from Cibalæ. The Armies upon facing each other, plied it with their Arrows, and those and other Missile Weapons being spent, engaged with their Pikes and Swords, which while they were doing, that Party which Constantine had sent to pursue Licinius, appeared from an Hill, and were now ready to join with their Companions, and encompass their Enemies. But Licinius his Men valiantly received them, and bore up against them all, and after an innumerable Company was slain on both Sides, and they were on equal terms, the Sign was given, and the Armies parted asunder. The day following, they agreed to enter into a Mutual League and Society, the terms of which were, That Constantine should hold Illyricum, and other Nations thereabouts; as, Pannonia, Dacia, Mæsa, Macedonia, all the Tract of the Danube, & Græce or Achaia. To Licinius were to remain Thrace, and the East, and other Provinces; as, Mæsa Minor, Scythia, Asia, and the rest. It was agreed that Valens, the lately created Cæsar being accounted Author of these Mischiefs, should should be removed. This done, and the Agreement confirmed by Oaths, Constantine conferred the Dignity of Cæsar on Crispus his Son, by Miservina his Concubine, who was grown up to be a youth, and on another called Constantinus, born not many days before at Arles; and to Licinius also, the Son of Licinius, was given the same Dignity.

Constantine visits several Countries.

22. This War and League following upon it, happened in the CCCXIIIth year of our Lord, and the Consulship of Volsianus, and Anianus, as Guthofred proves from a certain Law, dated on the beginning of March at Thessalonica, where Constantine then resided, and therefore those Parts must then have been in his Power, and the Division been made. Having staid here, and at Heraclæa some time, he removed from Macedonia into Myfia, Dacia, and the Upper Pannonia, as appears by various Constitutions he made for the Advantage of Christian Religion, and removing of Grievances and Abuses. After this he Travelled into Italy, being found by a certain Law to have been at Aquileia, in the middle of July. From Aquileia he removed to Rome, where, how he employed himself, is to be shown in another place; and thence he went to Milan, this being in the fourth Consulship of himself, and the fourth also of Licinius. Into the following, wherein Sabinus and Rufinus were Consuls, fell the Celebration of his Decennalia, it being the Tenth year of his Reign. At the beginning of it he had his Abode in Gall, at the City of Triers, and thence removed to Piemont, and Arles, where was born to him of his Wife Fantia another Son called Constantine, who shortly after was also created Cæsar. This City of Arles being demolished, he repaired, and some think that he gave to it the Name of Constantina. But now he removed out of Gall, whither he never returned, being found at the beginning of December at Serdica, in Dacia. He had much augmented his District, which at first contained but Gall, Spain, and Britain; and now his Affairs called him Eastward. This year died Diocletian, at the beginning of December at Salone. The next year in the Consulship of Gallicanus, and Bassus, Crispus, young Constantine his Brother, and Licinius were made Cæsars on the first of March; and in this year, in the month of August, Constantinus, another Son of Constantine seems to have been born. The Father lay some time at Serdica, and at Sirmium, as appears by some Laws.

He overthrows the Sarmatæ.

23. For the year next following, being of our Lord the CCCXVIIIth. Crispus Cæsar was Consul, together with Licinius, who bore that Title now the fifth time; and Constantine is found to have been at Sirmium. And for the four following years, he was either in Pannonia, at Sirmium, and Sebaria; or in Dacia at Serdica, and Naissus, except he pleased to make an Incursion to Aquileia, which was near to Pannonia. For he was engaged in War with the Sarmatæ for four years, at Campona, Margus, and Bononia. For this War he called the Sons of Veteran Soldiers into the Field, of whom many throughout Italy declined the Service. Zosimus writes, That hearing how the Sarmatæ, who lived upon the Fen of Meotis, passed over Ister, and harassed his Dominions, he led his Forces against them, and the Barbarians met him under Conduct of Raufmodus their King. In their way they fell upon a certain Town which was defended by a Garrison strong enough, and had Walls made of Stone at the bottom, and Wood at the top. They thought they should easily become Masters of the place, if they could but burn what was at the top, and they cast fire on it, and plied with Arrows those that came to make defence. But they within by tumbling down Stones, and otherwise improving the advantage which the higher place afforded, killed many of them, and Constantine now came in View, fell upon their backs, killed many, took more, and put to flight the rest. Raufmodus having lost the greatest part of his Forces, took Boat, and passed the Ister, with a resolution again to invade the Roman Pale, which Constantine understanding, passed the River after him, and fell upon the Barbarians, who had fled to an Hill that was full of Wood, where he flew many; and amongst the rest, Raufmodus himself. Many he took alive, and received to mercy the Multitude which yielded to him; which done, he returned to his Quarters, with a great number of Captives. Those he distributed into the Cities, and came to Thessalonica. Here he made an Haven, where formerly none had been, and again prepared to make War against Licinius. Thus Zosimus writes of him.

L. 1. De filiis Min. Apert.

24. All this while he endeavoured to reform the Manners of the Roman People, and reduce them to Piety, Humanity, Peace, and Concord, as well by Edicts directed to the People, as by Constitutions sent to Bassus and Maximus, Præfects of of the City. He moderated the power of Masters over their Slaves, made Professors secure against violent Intruders, and prevented fraudulent Donations. He restrained the levity of Divorces, and gave strength to lawful Contracts and Marriages, and was agreeable to the Sanctuary of that Religion which he Professed.

He cut off from the Laws many Ambages, and Snare thereby, from the Necks of the Subject, by another most merciful Edict directed to the People, and exposed to the View of all men at Rome. He published Laws against the ravishing of Virgins, against the levity and temerity of Accusations, and against the Use of Concubines, all which proceeding from his Zeal to propagate that Sanctity which Christian Religion requireth, are to be treated of in that Part of this Work, which is solely appropriate to Ecclesiastical Affairs. But his great care for the Incouragement of Physitians, Grammarians, and other Professors of Learning, we cannot in this place omit, whereby is made evident what Villor writeth concerning him, That he nourished good Arts, and especially the Studies of Learning, as on the contrary, it is written of Licinius, that he was an Enemy to Learning, which through his Ignorance he termed Poison, and the publick Plague, especially the Industry of the Law; and no wonder it was when Constantine was very Learned himself as Sext. Aurelius Villor published by Schottus doth testify; if now it be lawful to commend him, or say with that Author, that for this, and other Virtues, he was extolled. And as he was Learned himself, he took care that his Children should be well seen in good Letters, for which purpose he provided them of the best Masters that were to be found.

Takes care for Reformation of Abuses.

He is very favourable to Physitians and Professors.

25. Now he that loveth Learning, loveth also the Learned, and such as would have either themselves or others instructed, will study to incourage and reward them that are to do, or have already done it. Constantine shewed himself of this mind by three several Constitutions made in favour of such Persons. He confirmed whatsoever Privileges had been granted by his Predecessors. For, Vespasian had first of all others allotted Salaries to Professors, and gave them Immunity from Quarter and Personal Services, which Hadrian confirmed; But these were but Personal Services. Constantine now made them free not only from Personal, but Patrimonial; so as their Possessions should not be liable to Charges in Cities where they inhabited, and yet if they pleased they should obtain the Honours thereof, as to be Duoviri, Ædiles, Refectores, Gyrarchae, Priests, Flamines, Legati; but so as to take or refuse them, whether they pleased. More than this, he prohibits that they be incurred by any, or forced to appear by violence in Courts of Judicature, under a Penalty of an Hundred thousand Nummi to be levied for the Treasury by the Magistrates (as the Decemviri and Quinquennales of the Municipia; or Cities, who upon default were to forfeit the like Sum. In case a Slave do them any Injury, he commands that he be whipped by his Lord, before him whom he injured; and if the Lord was consenting, he shall pay Twenty thousand Nummi, and his Slave be left for a pledge till it be paid to the Treasury. Afterwards he granted to the Archiatrs, or the Physicians of the Palace, and the Exarchiatrs, That they and their Sons should be free from all Duties belonging to the Curiales, Senatores, Comites, and Perfectissimi; so as not to be forced to the Payment of Gold or Silver, Finding of Horses; or other Services incumbent on these Persons. And other Immunities he granted to Physitians and Professors after the Founding of Constantinople; of which at that time we shall speak.

26. After the Finishing of the War with the Sarmatae, for joy thereof Games were Celebrated, called Ludi Sarmatici, in the later end of November, and beginning of December following of the fourth year. At the beginning of the next, Constantine was at Thessalonica in Macedonia. When there he lay, the Goths, breaking through the Limits which were neglected, wasted Thrace, and Mesha, but for fear of him again retreated, having obtained Pardon by restoring Captives; and such of them as were taken Prisoners, were distributed throughout the Cities. After this he returned to Thessalonica, and in February following were Games Celebrated at Rome, called Ludi Gothici. But taking notice how by the Negligence of the Soldiers upon the Limits, those of Thrace and Mesha had been broken through by the Barbarians, to provide against their Incursions and Depredations, he sent out a severe Constitution in the Month of April, whereof we are hereafter to speak. Now this War against the Goths,

Goths, gave occasion to another War against Licinius. Thrace and Mesha had been wasted by them, and they had been repressed by Constantine. This Licinius complained of, as against the Agreement that the Quarters that were Subject to him should be medled with by another Person: And sometimes sending submissive Letters, but otherwhiles proud and haughty, he excited the Indignation of Constantine, who was also angry with him; for having lately banished all Christians out of his Palace, as an Anonymous Author writes, formerly published by Simondus, and since by Valesius, together with his Edition of Amianus Marcellinus. He adds, That in the mean time while both prepared for another Civil War, Licinius raged in his District against his Subjects with Wickedness, Covetousness, Cruelty, and Lust; Killing many for their Wealth, and corrupting their Wives. Zosimus still making Constantine the Aggressor, tells us, That he provided two hundred Gallies, which carried thirty Oars apiece; and of Ships of Burthen above two thousand; of Foot-Soldiers an hundred and twenty thousand; and of Horse and other Forces belonging to his Navy, ten thousand more.

Constantine and Licinius again prepare for War.

27. Licinius hearing of his Preparations, sent Messengers about to divers Nations, to provide both a sufficient Navy and Land-Forces. Accordingly were sent him without delay from Aegypt, eighty Triremes, as many by the Phoenicians; by the Ionians, and the Apatick Dorienles sixty; thirty by the Cyprians, twenty by the Carians, thirty by the Bithynians; and the Africans furnished him with fifty. He had of foot almost an hundred and fifty thousand; and of Horse fifteen thousand, sent out of Phrygia and Cappadocia. The Navy of Constantine lay in the Piræus, and that of Licinius in the Hellepont. Licinius lay at Hadrianople in Thrace. Constantine sent away for his Fleet, which had been for the most part raised out of Greece, and marched with his Land-Army from Thessalonica, and incamped himself on the Banks of the River Hebrus, which on the left hand watereth Hadrianople. The Author lately mentioned writes, That he sent his Son Crispus with a great Fleet, to seize on Asia, against whom Amasius was employed by Licinius. That Licinius had seized the Roots of an high Mountain about Hadrianople, with a vast Army, and that thither marched Constantine with all his Forces. Zosimus makes this Mountain two hundred Furlongs from Hadrianople, where the River Ionus joyns with Hebrus, and then for many days, he saith, the Armies faced each other. But Constantine, taking notice where the River was the narrowest, had this Device: He commanded his Soldiers to cut Wood from the adjoining Mountain, and joyned them with Ropes together, as if he intended to make a Bridge, and by it to pass over his Forces. Having thus amused the Enemy, he ascended the Mountain, and in the thick Woods where they could not be discovered, placed five thousand Archers, with Eighty Horsemen. This done, he took with him twelve Horse, and passing over Hebrus where it was narrowest, fell suddenly upon his Enemies. Some now were slain, some ran with all speed, and others gaped and stared at this so unexpected an Onset; for a mighty Slaughter followed after the rest of the Horse, and the whole Army had passed the River. Thirty and four thousand Men were slain, and at Evening Constantine took the Camp; Licinius being fled with as many as he could get together toward his Fleet. The next Morning, such as had betaken themselves into the Mountain, or Valleys, yielded to Constantine, together with such as Licinius had left behind. Such an account Zosimus gives of Constantine his Victory, something odd. The other Writer faith in short, That the War being drawn on, though his Men were put to difficulties, by his Military Discipline and Felicity, he overthrew the confused and disordered Army of Licinius, receiving a slight Wound in his Thigh.

Constantine obtained a great Victory.

28. Licinius betook himself to Byzantium, and thither Constantine pursued him, and besetged the City. He sent for his Fleet, which from the Piræus was come into Macedonia, of which his Officers advised to engage in Fight only Eighty of the Swiftest, which carried Thirty Oars apiece, because of the frailties of the Hellepont. This small number was despatched by the Admiral of Licinius, whom Zosimus calls Abantius, and Sigohius Abas; and he doubted not but easily to Master it with his Two hundred Gallies. But coming to Fight, the Commanders of Constantine joyntly fell upon their Enemies, whereas he fell on without Order, and by reason of their multitude, his Ships fell foul one of another, and were exposed to be easily Sunk and Destroyed by the Enemy. Many men being lost, the Fight was broken off by the intervening of Night, and the one Party took in to the Port of Eleus in Thrace, and the other into that of Ajax. The day following, when a vehement Wind blew from the North, Abantus got his Ships out of the Port of Ajax, and prepared himself for another Engagement. But the other Gallies of thirty Oars which staid behind, being now come to Eleus, he began to be afraid of the great number of Constantine's Ships, and to doubt whether he should set upon them. Now about Noon did the Wind turn about into the South, and so great a Tempest arose, that it drove the Fleet of Licinius, lying on the Astac Coast, upon the Shoar, or upon Rocks, and with an hundred and thirty Vessels perished five thousand Men, Licinius in the Vessels having Transported part of his Soldiers into Asia, because Byzantium was crowded with People. Abantus now being fled with four Ships into Asia, and the Sea-Fight thus ended; when also the Vessels were come into the Hellepont; which brought Provisions for Constantine's Army, they all departed with the Fleet to Byzantium, to join with those that Besieged the City, to compals it in both by Sea and Land. As for the Forces of Licinius, they not daring to much as to look upon them, got Vessels, and departed to Eleus.

29. Constantine prepared Mounts and Turrets, and all things requisite for insuring the Siege; at which Licinius being affrighted, resolved to quit the place, and with the best resolved of his Men to go to Chalcedon, a City of Bithynia, where he hoped to raise more Forces; and renew the War. Going thither by Boat, he created Cæsar Martinian his Magister Officiorum, to have a Companion of his Fortune, and sent him to Lampacus to hinder the Enemy from passing from Thrace to the Hellepont; he himself bestowing his Men in the Hills and Straits about Chalcedon. In the mean time, Constantine having a multitude of Ships of all sorts, but fearing that those of Bithynia would not be able to come near the Shoar of Bithynia, prepared light Vessels and Boats, and passed over his Army to the Sacred Promontory, as it was called, at the Entrance of Pontus, and two hundred Furlongs distant from Chalcedon. There on certain Hills he incamped himself, whom though Licinius perceived to be Master of Bithynia, yet being a man exercised in all Dangers, he sent for Martinian away from Lampacus, and encouraging his Soldiers; drew out of the Town to give Battle. A cruel Battle was fought betwixt the Town and the Fannus, wherein Constantine had by far the better, who falling with violence on the Enemy, made such Slaughter, that of an hundred and thirty thousand Men, scarcely thirty thousand escaped. This being done, they of Byzantium opened their Gates, and received him; which also did the Citizens of Chalcedon. Licinius thus beaten, with the remainders of his Horse, and a few Foot fled to Nicomedia.

30. At this time a Persian, Hormisdas by Name, of the Royal Family, fled over to Constantine upon this occasion: When the Persian King his Father, was Celebrating his Birth-day, this Hormisdas came to Court, bringing along with him great store of Venison. But it so happened, that such as were entertained at the Feast, neither rose up to do him Reverence, nor shew'd him any other respect, at which being Angry, he threatened them with the Death of Marfai. Most of them understood not that Speech, as foreign, but a certain Persian, who had lived in Phrygia, and had heard the Story of Marfai, told the rest what it was that Hormisdas meant. They remembering his Threats, when his Father died, made his younger Brother King, contrary to the Law, and putting Chains upon Hormisdas, kept him Prisoner on a Hill near the City, till by the Invention of his Wife he was delivered. She opened the Belly of a large Fish, and therein put a File, and fowing up the Belly again, gave the Fish to a Trusty Eunuch, and bad him charge her Husband not to eat the Fish when any one was by, that he might make use of what he should find in it. This done, she loaded some Camels with Wine and Provisions, and therewith Feasted those that kept him. While they were busy at making Merry, Hormisdas opening the Fish, found the File, wherewith he filed off his Fetters, and putting on the Habit of an Eunuch, passed through the middle of them being Drunk, and taking one of the Eunuchs along with him, escaped away to the King of the Armenians, his Friend, and by his assistance got safe to Constantine, who received him with all Honour and Respect imaginable.

31. But Constantine pursued Licinius to Nicomedia, and there also Besieged him. He now knowing he had not strength to grapple with him, despaired of any any Success in Arms, and coming out of the City, presented himself as Suppliant to Constantine, and offering him the Purple, called him Emperor and Lord, and begged his Pardon for what had passed. For he had promised his Life to his Sister the Wife of Licinius; and that by Oath. As for Martinian, he delivered him to those of his Guard to be slain. Thus much writeth Zogmus, concerning this War betwixt Constantine and Licinius. The Anonymous Author, lately named, writes, that the day following the Victory at Chalcedon, the Wife of Licinius came to her Brother's Camp, and begged her Husband's Pardon, which was granted: That Licinius, now a private Man, was admitted to Constantine's Table; and that Martinian had his life granted him at this time, though afterwards he was put to Death. But so became Constantine Monarch of the Roman Empire, in (or toward) the Nineteenth year of his Reign, wherein his two Sons, Crispus and Constantinus were Consuls; the third Consulship of whom fell into the CCCXXIII year of our Lord.

In the second year of Decius, was Fabianus Bishop of Rome crowned with Martyrdom, on the fourteenth of the Calends of February. The See was vacant for one year, and then was chosen Cornelius, whose election displeasing some, Novatus ordained against him: Novatus. The year following Cornelius was Martyred, on the eighth of the Calends of October; and Licinius succeeded him, who shortly after was banished. In the second of Galienus was he Beheaded, and after a vacancy of thirty five days, Stephen succeeded on the Ninth of April the first Persia, who interceding for Basilides condemned by the Spaniards; they defended their rights against him, and condemned his Usurpation against the Africans, as appeared from Cyprian's Epistles, as also that the boldness of the Roman See, was now checked by all the Provinces. After three years Stephen was Beheaded by the command of Valerian, and Sixtus succeeded him; who being Beheaded, when Laurence the Deacon was Fied to death by the command of Valerian, Dionysius succeeded. After him came Pellex, and then Eutychianus, who being martyred in the first of Carus; after Nine days Caius succeeded, December 16. Caius was crowned with Martyrdom in the twelfth of Diocletian; and after eleven days Marcellinus succeeded, who through fear offering incense to Idols, when he denied it, was reproved by the testimony of a multitude of witnesses, confessed his fault, and afterwards redeemed his credit by suffering Martyrdom. Marcellus succeeded him. After Marcellus succeeded Eusebius, and then Miltiades, then Sylvestre, who was Bishop at the time of the Council of Nice, in the twentieth year of Constantine.

33. After Alexander, Mazlanus was Bishop of Jerusalem until the reign of Galus and Volusianus, after him Hymerius till the time of Aurelian. Then followed Zambdas and Videron; according to (a) Eusebius, who writeth, That the See of (c) Jerusalem was always honoured; and the Succession continued unto his own days. After Hermion, Macarius was Bishop and was present at the Council of Nice. In the Church of Antioch after Phileas succeeded Zebinus, and then Babylas; who died in Prison, in the Persecution under Decius. Him followed Fabius, him Demetrius, and him Paulus Samosatenus the Heretick, who denying the Divinity of the Son of God, was excommunicated, and deprived by the second Synod held against him at Antioch in the days of (c) Aurelianus. And when he would neither depart the Church, nor avoid the house, the Emperor was besought (the first application to the Prince in this Nature by the Christians) to interpose and command by Edict, that such should have the house as agreed in Doctrine with the followers of the Bishop of Rome and Italy. Domnus was by the Synod appointed to succeed him, after whom followed Timens, Cyrillus, Dorotheus, Tyrannus, Vitalis, Philogonus a Martyr, and (d) Eusebius, who was at the Council of Nice. He fell into the Heresie of Sabellius, who being the Scholar of Noetus, taught that the three Persons of the Trinity were but one; but they differed, in that Sabellius said not the Father to have suffered. He was deposed by a Council held at Antioch. Eusebius Pamphilus Bishop of Cæsarea confuted him. After his deposition the See was vacant eight years. In the See of Alexandria after Heracles, Dionysius the Scholar of Origen was Bishop, in the third year of Philip. He reporteth in (e) Eusebius the Peril he stood in, and the Persecution he suffered under Decius. He wrote of the Alexandrian Martyrs to Fabius Bishop of Antioch; and to Novatus the Heretick; who being a Priest of Rome, fell from his Order, and calling his Sect Cathari, would not admit unto the Church such as fell after Repentance, and he abhorred second Marriage. Dionysius also wrote to Hermion, to Steven, and Xifus Bishops of Rome, unto Philemon

Philemon a Minister of Rome, and unto Dionysius Bishop of Rome. He confuted the Book of Nepos the Chiliast, and confounded in open Disputation Coracio his Disciple. Hitherto this error of the Millenaries propagated by Papias, had many of the Fathers that adhered to it, who yet held, That Christ when he came was to do his own work, without any prejudice to Earthly Princes in the mean time. Some observe, That Dionysius striking at this error, traducth the Apocalypse, as also defending the distinction of Persons against Sabellius, seemeth to make three Effences. Many betook themselves to Dionysius Bishop of Rome, that he would reclaim him, and obtained it. After he had governed the Church seventeen years he died, and Maximianus succeeded him, whom followed Theonas, and him Peter, who was martyred under Diocletian. Him succeeded Achillas, and then came Alexander, who was at the Council of Nice. He by preaching of the Trinity somewhat curiously, gave occasion to Arius one of his Clergy to fall from the Faith as Socrates informeth us. * L. 1. 5. 2

34. In the fifth year of Philip whilst Fabianus was Bishop of Rome, Donatus the Bishop of Carthage died, and Cyprian succeeded him by consent of all men except Felicitus, who, whilst the Heathens invaded his Patrimony, endeavoured to deprive him of his Bishoprick. Felicitus was ordained Bishop by Novatus, who also ordained Novatianus against Cornelius Bishop of Rome. Yet Cornelius favoured Felicitus against Cyprian, and would have taken Cognizance of their business, whereupon Cyprian vehemently rebuketh him, and denies that any one beyond the See hath Right to pass Judgment upon any Matters concerning Africa. And a little after, the Pride of the Roman See, was reprehended by all those of the Provinces, an occasion being given about Basilides, who being censured in Spain, complained to Stephen the Bishop of Rome. Cyprian was several times driven into Exile. (a) Eusebius maketh him to have erred in Rebaptizing Hereticks. In the fourth of Valerian died Origen seventy years old, a man of admirable Parts, most austere life, indefatigable industry, and stupendious Learning, but of impure Doctrine. Jerome sheweth how full of portentous Errors his Book magis apocryphus is. (b) Augustin saith, he held the Devil at length should be delivered from Hell, and associated with the Holy Angels, and for this, and other things, especially for holding alternate or successive blessedness and misery for ever, the Church did reject him. Pamphilus wrote an Apology for him. But his works are to be read with especial care, and especially his Commentaries upon the Scripture, concerning some of which Theodore (c) Beza passeth this censure: Certe hoc ausum dicere si hoc sunt Origenis cuius titulum praeferunt, hunc hominem fuisse sceleratum Diaboli organum Apostolica Doctrinae evertendae destinatum; for he evaporateth the solid and substantial Doctrine of the Gospel, into Allegorical, and airy Notions.

35. But, God having exercised his People by many a fiery trial, was pleased to preserve the bull unburned, and at length to grant them Peace by Constantine, who proved a nursing Father to the Church, taking away all Penal Laws against them, and enacting new ones, not only for their preservation, but convenience and comfort.
